She thought a little coal-oil would surely make it go.
So it did; the flames went up, higher and higher—
And Winnie? She is singing in the angel choir.

A Fossilian Ballad.

I sing of the Kinkajou,
The carnivorous Kinkajou,
Who fell in love with the prodigal son
Of an antediluvian mastodon;
And when in love—so proud she grew—
The prehensile tail of Miss Kinkajou
Curled round with an extra kink or two.

They danced the matatin,
The elegant matatin,
They'd hardly accomplished a step or two,
When the plantigrade heel of Miss Kinkajou
Upset the colossal form of the one
She loved—y-e-a, even the graceful son
Of the antediluvian mastodon.

Alas! for the matatin,
For the stately matatin,
Uprose the pachydermatous son
Of the antediluvian mastodon,
And bade her adieu, with never a tear,
But munched an arachnis hypogaea,
Commenting on heels in a manner severe.

Alas! for the Kinkajou,
The deserted Kinkajou,
She went for the antediluvian son
Of the antediluvian mastodon,
Then wiped her eyes, and wearily sighed,
Uncurled the tail, now shorn of its pride,
Turned up her plantigrade heels—and died.

A Run for Two Hands.

When the darling little females aren't a-gadding—
Aren't a-gadding!
Their household duties they will always shirk!—
Always shirk!
And lay around the house both night and morning—
Night and morning!
And let their mothers do the work—
Do the work!

Political Points.

The Washburnes are all for Grant, viz:
Elihu B.,
And Cadwallader C.,
And William D.,
And Israel G.,
Each of whom swears that he
Has in his bonnet no White House bee.

Cupid and Psyche.

You have read of the story of Cupid and Psyche
How her lover was coy and would not be seen,
Till one evening she crept with a lamp to his chamber,
And spilled on his shoulder some hot kerosene.

The fair god awoke, opened his eyes, spread his pinions,
And betook him at once from her bed and her heart,
As indignant he flew to the first pharmacist's,
For bi-carbon of soda to soften the smart.

There's more than one moral to this little story.
There's the obvious one of "Take care of your light,"
And a finer, which warns that love seeks gentle treatment,
Come too close, handle roughly, and lo! he takes flight.

It was not long since that he came to my dwelling,
This god, fair and fickle, whose rambles I sing,
But too closely I pressed, and too fondly I plied him,
Till he fled, and I fear with a smart on his wing.

Yet Cupid returned when his wing had ceased aching,
And in Psyche's soft arms he forgot all his pain.
Ah, might he once more but tap at my casement,
So softly, so sweetly I'd greet him again.

Clerical Error.

Ten little parsons, preaching love divine,
One kissed his servant girl, then there were 9.
Nine little parsons, preaching sinners' fate,
One kissed his neighbor's wife, then there were 8.
Eight little parsons, smoothing paths to heaven,
One kissed his boarding mistress, then there were 7.
Seven little parsons, exposing Satan's tricks
One starved the children, then there were 6.
Six little parsons, preaching Christ alive,
One got slinging arsenic, then there were 5.
Five little parsons, preaching sin no more,
One shot his sexton, then there were 4.
Four little parsons, preaching Calvary,
One got horsewhipped, then there were 3.
Three little parsons, preaching Christ as true,
One cut his baby's throat, then there were 2.
Two little parsons, following the Son,
One beat his child to death, then there was 1.
One little parson, just for pious fun
Eloped with a deacon's wife, then there were none.

What Came from His Gizzard.

Instead of a blizzard;
Oh, give me a lizard,
To crawl down the back of my neck,
For the question is whether
This infernal weather
Will not make us a tee-total wreck.
I'd file no objection,
Nor make a correction,
If winter would linger with May;
But these kind of breezes
Will essentially freeze us,
Though we hail from the coast of Norway.
So, instead of a blizzard,
You may give me a lizard,
To crawl down the spine of my back;
The cold, clammy creature
Will be a nice feature
Compared with such weather, alack!

The Serenade.

"I will stay," he sang, "and will sing my lay,
While slumber seals your eyes;
And the still, deep night will see me stay
Under the star-lit skies.
I will wake and sing, till the morning star
Shall glow in the eastern sky.
But he didn't; her "pa" came out right 'thar
And "lifted" him nine feet high.

The Source of Woe.

Upon what slender threads
Hang gum-elastic things!
A button here,
Another near;
A pin put there,
A hook elsewhere;
And breaks in some of these
Is whence the trouble springs.

Sealed Proposals.

"What are sealed proposals, Tom?"
Archly asked a bright-eyed Miss,
Whose mouth up-turned, like a rose-hud sweet
Seemed asking for a kiss.

"Why, Fanny dear, I'll illustrate;
'Tis plain as a, h, c;
Give me your hand—you have my heart—
And now * * 'tis sealed—you see!"

Explode the Mine.

In the glorious Russian nation
There lived a beauteous dame,
Who indulged in osculation,
And Anna was her name,
But now this lovely vision
From her mourning home is missed,
They dragged her off to prison—
Said she was an anarchist.

A Bad Case Seized.

A gentle Miss, once seized with chill,
Was feeling most infernal ill,

"Do you Ind. Tenn. to murder me?"
"La," said the doctor, "I Kan. save

If you will let me Conn. your case,
And hang this liver-pad in place."

"Am Ia. fool?" the patient cried—
"I can not Del.," the brute replied,
"But no one can be long time Ill.
Who Tex. a patent blue Mass. pill

"Ark!" shrieked the girl, "I'll hear no Mo.,
Your nostrums are N. J.—no go!"

ABOUT EDITORS.

"Editors are usually wealthy," remarked the man with the sample case.

"Yes," I said, "they are familiar with all the slang and business phrases of the money market; they write about millions as ordinary men talk about dollars; they know how to pay the national debt; they build railroads; they organize mining and magnificent transportation companies with fabulous capital; they declare war without consulting the Rothschilds, and if all the banks in America were to fail to-morrow they wouldn't be a cent poorer than they are to-day. They are rich. They associate with the moneyed classes; they sit down at the table with kings, and sometimes, in happier, luckier moments, with aces. If you want to borrow money, go to the editor; he will turn to his advertising columns and tell you where you can borrow it. If you have money to loan, rather than see you suffer he will borrow it of you himself. Rich? He knows the secrets of the moneyed rings; he divulges the plans and schemes of the heavy operators to the people; he roars himself louder than the bulls, and growls among the bears; his voice is heard in the temples of the money-changers, asking for money; he warbles his little roundelay out on the curbstone, in a melancholy minor key, when he doesn't get it. Oh, yes, editors are rich. When you want to spend all the money you have in this wide world, go to your lawyer; when you want something done for nothing, hie you to your newspaper office. Then, when you want to send some man to Congress, send your lawyer, because you can get along without him."

I paused, and a profound, impressive silence filled the air like a dream of peace. I looked around upon my audience.

It was asleep.—Burdette.

The man who wants a light for his cigar on coming out of the theatre is getting to be an unbearable nuisance. People who smoke good cigars have sense enough to carry match-boxes; so it happens that when you oblige these careless men, there is invariably left on your cigar a taste of the abominable weeds they affect. If you strike a match, before you have time to light your own cigar you are surrounded by a crowd of impudent fellows who demand a light. Why should not the theatres have, in their outer lobbies, such hanging lights as may be seen in any cigar store?

Patti is singing songs in private houses in Paris, where ballets danced by helles of the fashionable world are now given in Lent. She sings a song as each corps de ballet comes in, and for doing so receives the trifling sum of $3,000 a song. If four songs are sung she knocks off $7,000 from each song; but when one of her friends asked her to sing a single song for less, she replied that she did not make two prices, and that she could not allow sentimental considerations to affect her tariff.

His umbrella fell with a bang during one of the most pathetic scenes in the play, and when everybody turned around, as they always do under such circumstances, to see who was responsible for the racket, he was intently watching the stage, and nobody suspected him.

"I admire your self-possession," whispered his friend; "if that had been my umbrella I would, as a matter of course, have picked it up."

"Naturally; but, you see, that umbrella is not mine; it belongs to Jones."

Mr. Sothorn writes, enthusiastically: "W. S. Gilbert's new piece for me is simply lovely in its utter reckless, clever wildness. I never yet had such a chance of saying and doing such crazy things, and still with an air of earnestness and intensity that keeps the idea just within the bounds of comedy and reason."

A London society paper says that American women would be far more beautiful if they weighed about two hundred pounds apiece. American opinion is that English women would look better if they weighed two hundred pounds less than they do.

AN EMOTIONAL FAMILY.

The New York World is of the opinion that there is a great difference in families. Of course there is. For example, in some families the current of life runs smoothly on like a canal. In others the stream of existence is full of cataracts, snags, and sand-bars—so to speak. There are the Tibbatts. There is not a week but that events really momentous take place in that family—events which are not only intensely absorbing to themselves, but whose interest rami-fies throughout the entire length and breadth of their acquaintance. Last week, for instance, Susie Tibbatts had her ears pierced. On Thursday, her brother John Henry, who was to give her a pair of diamond ear-rings provided she could make up her mind to endure the operation, which for some time had been doubtful, felt her pulse and remarked, seriously:

"You must brace up, Susie. To-morrow is the day. Mother, feel her pulse and tell me what you think of it."

Mrs. Tibbatts laid hold of Susie's wrist, and, taking on a listening and meditative air for some seconds, said, with affectionate solicitude:

"I'd be careful of my diet, my child. Maybe you'd better take a little of my tonic throughout the day."

"I don't know, mamma; I feel quite calm now. I'm getting familiarized with the idea."

Mrs. Tibbatts shook her head doubtfully, and slightly smiled at the ignorant confidence of a young girl.

Her sister-in-law Annie, James's wife, who had come down from the country to be present at the operation—Mrs. Tibbatts not feeling herself equal to it—added, encouragingly:

"Oh, dear, it will soon be over. I have gone through with it, you know."

"Oh, I don't think I'll be much frightened. But don't forget, Annie, you've promised to hold my hand."

"No, indeed, dear. And don't you think, mamma, Susie had better go to bed now? She will be so much stronger to-morrow, after a good, long sleep."

"That is an admirable suggestion, Annie. Good-night, dear. Just let everything pass out of your mind, and shut your eyes, and you will soon be asleep."

The next morning the family appeared heavy-eyed at the breakfast table, no one of them having slept a wink, and each began in turn to relate their bad dreams. Mrs. Tibbatts, whose mind finally began to act, thinking that these might have a bad effect on Susie's nerves, made warning faces all around the table, accompanied with glances at Susie. John Henry, who is very quick of thought, and the wit of the family, broke into such a gale of laughter he could scarcely speak.

"I must tell you of such a good thing I heard yesterday. Ha, ha, ha! Such a good thing! Why is an old dog like an inclined plane? Ha, ha! the best thing! No. Give it up? Well, ha, ha! It's because it's a slope up. See it? Slo-pup. Slo-pup, ha, ha! Good, isn't it?"

The whole family immediately fell into a state of reckless gaiety, which more than anything else revealed the tenseness of their feelings.

When the carriage came to the door, John Henry brought out the foot-warmer, James put on Susie's arctics, Annie buttoned up her sealskin sacque, and Mrs. Tibbatts brought her fur cloak as an overwrap.

"See that there are plenty of robes, James, and, Annie, you had best take my vinaigrette," said the anxious mother.

"John Henry, I wouldn't excite her more than I could help."

"Do you think, mamma, it would be better to leave her to her own thoughts in the carriage, or to try and beguile her so she won't think?"

"I really can't decide, John Henry. Watch her face carefully, and be governed by the indications."

"I am ready now," said Susie, in a faint voice beneath her wraps.

"Farewell, dear one." Mrs. Tibbatts kissed her passionately, and pressed her to her bosom.

"Come, Susie," said the stout-hearted James, with tears in his eyes.

"How shall I bear the suspense?" cried Mrs. Tibbatts as the carriage rolled away.

By lunch-time that lady was in an agonizing frame of mind at the delay, and waved away, with dramatic fervor, Thomas's offer of a cup of tea. She walked once more to the window, and there saw John Henry half carrying into the house the bundle of furs in which Susie was swathed.

"My child! my child! Here, John Henry, place her here." She swung around an easy-chair.

"I fainted, mamma. Only think, I fainted! Didn't I faint, Annie?"

"Fainted!"

"Yes, indeed, mamma, she really fainted; and I was alone with her."

"Except the clerk, Annie."

"Yes, Susie; except the clerk, mamma."

"Alone! Oh, John Henry, my son, where were you?"

"I'd gone round the corner to see a man. She seemed so calm and composed, mamma; and I was really afraid I'd see her suffer."

"Oh, my cruel neglect! I should have sent a physician with her. Tell me all about it. I must know all. I thought I could trust you, John Henry." Mrs. Tibbatts drew her handkerchief across her eyes.

"But Annie did remarkably well."

"Alone! What a fearful ordeal! Annie alone with this lifeless child! Tell me all about it."

"Let me tell, Annie—that is, until I fainted—and then you can tell. They were very kind, mamma. I sat in a chair, and Annie took my hand. I felt a little nervous, but I had determined to be brave."

"Dear child!"

"I only said, 'Don't let me see the instruments!' That was all, wasn't it, Annie?"

"Yes, love; I think that was all."

"And the clerk—such a nice clerk, mamma—he laid my head against his breast, and took up my ear and placed something behind it. What was it, Annie?"

"Cork, dear."

"And then," said Susie, solemnly—

"What, dear? Oh, don't tell me!" Mrs. Tibbatts shuddered with horror.

He jabbed right through! Now, Annie."

"Then she fainted. I saw the color leave her lips."

"My cheeks didn't get white at all, Annie says. Did they, Annie?"

"No; just her lips. And then she sank back and closed her eyes."

"Oh, how frightful!"

"We laid her gently—the clerk and I—on a sofa, for I had learned what to do before we went. I feared as much. Then I applied the vinaigrette, and the clerk brought water. As soon as her eyes were open we sat her up, but she seemed so weak I told her I would get some brandy before the second operation was performed. I ran to the nearest drug store and said: 'Give me some brandy, quick—some of your best brandy!' They wanted to know whether I wanted a pint or a quart, but I said: 'Give me some in a glass; it is important.' They quickly poured me a half glass, and I flew back, and she drank it."

"All, mamma; every bit! I wish you could have seen those clerks look at me. Such astonishment! I couldn't have done it, of course, except under such extraordinary circumstances."

"You poor dear! You may well say extraordinary circumstances."

"Then," resumed Annie, "we persuaded her to undergo the second operation."

"I made a great effort, mamma. You know my brothers say I have the strongest will of any woman in the United States."

"Yes, she got through it admirably; and they then inserted the gold wires of the purest possible gold."

"And they didn't charge a cent, mamma, for all that trouble! Wasn't it kind?—as we only bought the little gold rings there; not the diamonds."

"Now, dear, don't you think you had better lie down and keep quiet? What did they prescribe as subsequent treatment, Annie?"

"Oh, mamma, mayn't I have some lunch? I feel really unusually exhilarated."

"It is the brandy!" said John Henry, laconically.

"It is a reaction, dear, and will soon pass away. What did you say, Annie?"

"They thought she had better not expose herself for several days."

"There is no danger of fever, then?"

"They didn't mention it, mamma."

That evening a number of friends, who knew that Friday had been appointed for the operation, called to inquire about the result. Several were invited for Saturday—that is, enough to make the day pass and not enough to prove too exciting.

On Sunday the confinement was quite trying, but on Monday Susie was permitted to take the air, being well wrapped up, as the crisis was thought to have passed. She met on her walk old Mrs. Robinson, her Sunday-school teacher, who, strangely, hadn't heard of the affair.

"I didn't see you out yesterday, my dear?" inquired the kind old lady.

"I have been quite ill for several days," said Susie, with some dignity.

Theodore Martin has omitted some minor episodes of the domestic life of Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, which would, perhaps, have cost him his spurs had he related them in his Life of the Late Prince Consort. When the august pair were first married, although the match was one of love, at least on the queen's part, her majesty could not always control her temper; and on the occasion of one of those trifling quarrels, which occur even in the best regulated families, she threw a teacup at the prince's head. He, excessively indignant, retired to his apartments and locked the door.

The queen's anger having somewhat abated, she thought him sufficiently punished, and knocked at his door. To the question, "Who's there?" she replied, in imperious tones: "The queen."

Prince Albert did not answer, and she went away. By and by she thought she would try again, and to the "Who's there?" answered: "Victoria." Again there was complete silence, and she again retired. With the perseverance characteristic of a woman alarmed at the trouble to come, she determined to try a third time, and, in response to the "Who's there?" replied, sobbingly: "Your own loving wife."

This brought Prince Albert to terms, and peace was reestablished. It is said there was no more teacup-throwing in the happy family.

A young man who had been drinking a good deal came down to the breakfast-table one morning, and said to his mother: "Look, ma, what a big bug is on your dress!"

"There, Charles," she said, "I've told you all along if you didn't quit drinking you would see things, and here you've got 'em sure enough." She wanted him to go right back to bed and take some medicine, and he had to explain to her very hastily that it was "April Fools' Day" to prevent her sending for a doctor.

"When I was young," said Mrs. — to her little girl, "I used to love my dear mamma too well to act as you do."

"And did your mamma," replied Bertha, quickly, "used to be all the time telling you what she did when she was a little girl?"

The only drawback with Hannay's process of making artificial diamonds is the depressing fact that it costs twenty-five dollars to make a ten-dollar diamond. He is now trying to reverse the figures, but they always come 13—15—14.

Ben Hill deprecates the practice of naming babies after living statesmen. He says parents incur a great risk by so doing, for man is only mortal, and may bring disgrace upon his name before he dies. "Which nobody can deny."

It looks now as if Columbus discovered this country for the especial purpose of enabling English walkers, lecturers, and opera constructors to come here and carry home thousands of dollars belonging to Americans.

That was a most astonishing case of color blindness when the fellow mistook a fine green silk umbrella for a blue cotton one.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

Servant enters the apartment of his master, and hands him a visiting card on which is penciled an invitation to dinner.

"Ah, did the gentleman leave it?"

"No; it was the gentleman's gentleman himself."

A young girl endeavors to soften the obdurate heart of her stern parent.

"No," says her father, "I never will consent to your marrying him. He is only an artist—nay, what is worse, he is not even an artist—he lacks the divine afflatus and the first principles of his art."

"What! My Carmine Lake not a true artist!"

"No; I know what I am talking about, I tell you. I own the house he rooms in, and he pays his rent regularly."

A new definition of Sarah Bernhardt: "A prolonged neck." This is a trifle more refined than "an animated bone."

"M'sieu, give me a little sou?"

The monsieur, with an imposing air: "I haven't a little sou."

"Eh bien! give me a big one, then. I will divide it with my little sister!"

Two Bohemians, pretty well worn out, were stretching their legs in a promenade. One of them stopped before a handsome house, and, begging his friend to wait for him a moment, went in. At the end of twenty minutes he returned, and said:

"I only called a moment upon an Academician to ask him to vote for me at the coming election."

"Did he promise?"

"No. Nevertheless he gave me proof that he holds me in the highest esteem."

And he showed a five-franc piece.

A famous liar told an extraordinary story which, strangely enough, chanced to be true.

"It is so extraordinary," said a listener, "that if I did not know it to be true I should believe it false."

"Ah," said the narrator, "if it had been false I should have told it in a much more truthful manner than I did."

The gay Comtesse de C. is discovered just rising from bed by one of her friends who is infatuated with a certain fashionable preacher.

"What! my dear, not yet dressed?" said her friend. "Come, quick, quick! We shall be too late for the sermon. Make yourself as pretty as possible. All Paris will be there!"

"At the sermon! Are you insane? The father can do without me. I can not go to his church."

"Why?"

"I am not of society. I am in mourning."

Parisian ingenuity: On the door of a shop one reads:

"Fine face-powder for negroes."

It is merely pulverized charcoal.

A calculating mother reads her list of invited guests to her husband.

"But, my dear, what an extraordinary list," he cries. "You have only the names of men, and not a single woman. What will you do for dancers? There will be only our daughter."

"Eh bien! stupid! do you suppose I am giving a ball to marry off other peoples' daughters?"

Lying ill in bed, Madame X. desires her faithful maid to open a box and to find therein a letter from her absent spouse.

"Here is one," said the maid; "it must be the one you wish, as it commences 'Adored Angel.'"

"Silliness! that's not the one! That's one of his old ones. Look for one that commences 'Infamous Creature!'"

There are many women who would be very agreeable if they could only for a little while forget that they are so.

How to learn details of family histories.

A Frenchman arrived in Zurich. Having business with a man named Muller, and not knowing the address of Muller, he went to the post-office.

"Pardon, monsieur," said the Frenchman to the employee, "can you give me the address of M. Muller?"

"There are thirty Mullers!" answered the employee, slamming down the little window behind which he was stamping letters.

The Frenchman rapped again. The window reopened.

"This Muller married his cousin."

"There are fifteen of them," snapped the clerk, and down banged the window.

Again the Frenchman tapped.

"This Muller is jealous of his wife."

"There are seven of them," hissed the clerk, and again the window banged.

"But monsieur!" called the Frenchman through the glass, "this Muller has reason to be jealous of his wife."

"There are six of them," yelled the employee, in a rage, and the Frenchman went forth to run down Mr. Muller on some other trail.

Local item from the Gaulois:

"The dame Rougissard has been yesterday morning victim of accident cruel. This dame, who is merchant of apples of earth fried, street Our-Dame-of-Nazareth, was surveying the cooking of her merchandise, and bended on her large stove to fry was making herself ready to retire the slices of apples of earth gilded by the flame, when all of a blow she was taken of a giddiness, and fell the head in front in the lard in ebullition."

"A passing precipitated himself to her succor, and after having retired her in a lively manner from this frightful situation, bore her into a pharmacy where cares were prodigal to her. On the order of the Commissary of Police of the Quarter, this unhappy has been with urgency transported to the Hotel-God."

THE REVELATIONS OF MR. JOSS.

CHAPTER I.

I beg the young lady's pardon, but I must take you into her boudoir. It is richly furnished, with lavish splendor and faultless taste. The chairs seem to have been invented by the God of Laziness, in one of his most sensuous moments; the ottomans are marvels of beauty; the couch is rather a bower than a bed, made snowy with shruhbry of the chastest lace. Everything about the apartment speaks of a life of whose careless magnificence nine-tenths of the world do not even dream.

Our intrusion can hardly disturb her. She is passing through one of the supreme climaxes of life; she is profoundly happy, because she is anticipating that which will never be realized. She has accepted him; she looks from her face in the mirror to the superb gem on her finger. In the first, she sees her own loveliness complacently reflected; in the second, she has brilliant evidence that the dream is real. He is rich, proud, noble, and refinedly ugly. He is better than handsome, he is distinguished looking, and solidly homely. He is the Count Marechal de Blazaroni. Is not that enough? Her reveries paint her a perfect picture; but, alas, canvas made of hopes is mortal—paint made of promises will fade.

Her father's name was Colonel Vesey. His immense fortune was the result of shrewdness and enterprise—in the canned-tomato trade with the South Sea Islands. He had carried his own cargoes, so that he was called "Captain" as well as "Colonel" Vesey. From long exposure, his face had the true tomato hue; his ample waistcoat was always immaculately white, and, informally speaking, he was a genial old cuss. His wife, never strong, died in giving birth to their daughter, whose sorrowful entry into the world was soon forgotten, as she grew into a picture of robust health and matured beauty.

If anything was needed to add sadness to the circumstances of her birth, it was the alliterative fiends to whom was given the duty of naming the child. They called her Vesta—Vesta Vesey. Having calmly accomplished their purpose, they left her to live a life that was destined to hear all the changes rung on—"Vesta Vesey! What an odd name!" "What a queer name!" "What a ridiculous name," etc.

They were residing now in Shanghai. The colonel could never exactly leave trade for good, and the ports of the Yang-tse-Kiang made a splendid field for the hermetical tomato. There is no better place in the world than Shanghai to find a husband that will suit an heiress. No one knew this better than the Yankee trader, and he had cause to praise his own foresight when the Count de Blazaroni laid successful siege to the heart of the beautiful Vesta.

Shanghai society is very exclusive. No amount of monetary prestige gains you admittance to it. The doors of its English Club can only be passed by those having a legitimate demand on the aristocracy. Its foreign population has distributed itself and segregated itself with the nicety of drops of water that fall on a greased surface. There is the Dutch settlement, the French settlement, the English and American—all within limits neatly and definitely prescribed.

But where is the society that has ever locked the door to loveliness? Radiant Miss Vesey, in spite of her tomato origin and catsup atmosphere, was the acknowledged queen of more than one salon.

Under the light of a chandelier the beauty of the heiress was very striking—her face was sympathetic and attractive, while she was remarkable in being the possessor of common sense enough to make a quiet corner conversationally cosy. She shone in tête-à-tête quite as much as she did in the promenade.

But why linger on her merits, when they are all the property—or soon will be—of the sallow Count de Blazaroni? She is thinking of him now, as she sits in her regal chamber. And in a little while she goes into an alcove, hidden by silken hangings. She is going to confession; her confessor is waiting patiently. He is one hundred years old; is covered with gold leaf; sits on a pedestal painted in vermilion. He is a Chinese Joss, with stoical features; he is a wooden man, and he waits patiently.

Miss Vesta has no confidant but him. Into his worm-eaten and non-responsive ear does she daily pour the secrets of her bosom. It is no child's play with her; from a habit it has become a necessity. With the same calm eyes he receives alike her joys and sorrows; he neither chides nor praises; he is not vexed with her tears, nor amused at her innocence; he does not assume the moral mantle, and give her such wholesome advice as would break her heart to follow; he simply sits and takes it in.

But, though he does not indulge even in idol talk, she comes to a better understanding and finds a more perfect peace in a conference with him than if she pillowed her pretty head on her father's area of white vest, and received his human consolation.

I can not explain the sincerity of her feelings, nor unveil those subtleties of mind that enabled her to gain so much comfort from this Confucian image. She was not even a Catholic—who rely more on the forms of their religion than on any particular belief. After all, the golden idol may have only been a subterfuge, in whose smileless presence she might commune with herself and annihilate her passions, secure from mistaken sympathy, or, worse still, misguided pity.

But hark!—behind the curtain she is speaking.

"Oh, Mr. Joss, I am very, very happy! Marechal has asked me to be his wife. Marechal has asked me to be a countess. Just think of it, Mr. Joss, a countess! Is it not grand?—is it not beautiful? But, Mr. Joss, I don't like the name—Blazaroni—it is horrid. Is it wrong for me to hate the name, when I am so happy? Well, I shall be 'Vesta Marechal'; and he—he shall be simply 'Marechal.' There, the Blazaroni is gone! And then he is so good, so kind, so thoughtful. He can sit quiet by the hour—even like you, Mr. Joss; he always rests me; he is himself, and is satisfied. The others tire me with their too-apparent efforts to be something which they are not. The most modest are really the most vain; the most witty yawn when you are not looking; the most earnest become trifling to gain a woman's smile; and after the wine they are all one—machine-made, exact.

"But Marechal is a count, and a man. True, he thinks much of money—more than papa, who thinks how to make it all the time. And Marechal loves me, Mr. Joss—he loves me. And I love him—yes, I love him. I am sure that I love him!"

The last sentence is in a self-convincing tone, as though the speaker would remove all doubt from her own mind. In a few minutes more her confession is ended. Mr. Joss, with his worm-eaten ear pretty full, is left to cogitate on what he has heard.

Miss Vesta's finger presses a bell in the wall, and her maid, a Chinese damsel with invisible eyes and pointed feet, answers it.

"I shall ride to-day, Ahma; have the phaeton brought around."

With a bow of obedience the girl hobbles away, but halts at the door.

"The new horse-boy has come," she says, in tolerable English.

"Well?" inquires her mistress.

"He is a white man," returns Ahma.

"A white man?"

"Yes."

"I never heard of such a thing. Send him up," orders Miss Vesta, with quite an air of interest.

"A horse-boy" in China can not properly be called a coachman, footman, groom, or stable-boy, though he frequently performs the functions of all of these. His principal duty is to "hang on behind," like the American gamin, and when the horse is brought to a stop he suddenly appears at its head, where he stands, like a statue, for any number of hours that his master or mistress may be detained. More frequently he runs at a trot by the side of the vehicle, and though many of the Chinese ponies are very fleet, he manages to be at the bridle when the destination is reached. Even among servants, the office of horse-boy is very much looked down upon; he often has the felicity of not only fighting all the other subalterns, but of being made responsible for the performance of many of their duties, and the shouldering of their faults and negligences.

Therefore Miss Vesta was surprised that a white man should accept so poor a position.

Ahma reappeared.

"He is here," said she.

"Tell him to come in," said Miss Vesey.

Ahma's head came through the door again.

"He would rather not," said she.

"Rather not! Order him to step in at once."

In an instant the new servant stood before her.

"You are disobedient," said the heiress, sternly.

"Not intentionally, my lady," in a low voice.

"Why did you not enter at once?"

The man fumbled with his cap before he answered.

"Should the horse-boy enter the boudoir of his mistress?"

he asked, mildly.

"He should obey instructions," said Miss Vesey, coldly.

"What is your name?"

"Macaire."

"You can go."

Evidently relieved, the man started.

"Stay a moment. Please do not address me as 'My lady'; it does not please me. 'Miss Vesey' will answer."

When the man had left, Miss Vesta looked in her mirror. This trifling interview had made her beauty rosete. The fellow had angered her with his impertinent question and subdued manner. She was conscious of being strangely moved at the first sight of him. For he was not an ordinary appearing man. He was tall and well-made; his clothes had a smack of the sea about them. So far he would not have been remarked. His face, however, was at once handsome and odd. He wore a full beard, of a rich brown shade and a silken texture. It was a thing of beauty, and at once attracted the eye. That part of his features not covered by his beard was heavily bronzed by life at sea, or under a tropical sun. But, just above his eyes, the constant wearing of a cap had made a distinct line of tan; above this was a forehead singularly broad and white. It was like a piece of pure marble set between his dark hair above and the brown of exposure beneath. His eyes were hazel; they had a mild, steady, and deep look, that impressed you with the power of the man who owned them.

With his cap on, Duncan Macaire showed a handsome heard, and that was all. Bareheaded, his face was an impressive study for those who love to read the human features.

Miss Vesta was one of these. Her appreciative eye and receptive mind had noted, with emotion, this man's beautiful countenance. The list of questions she had intended asking was not to be thought of with such a man, so she had dismissed him at once.

Ahma came in lightly. "The count," said she.

"Tell him I have a headache, and can not see him," said the heiress, thoroughly out of humor. As the count leaves, he bestows an absent glance on the waiting phaeton, and on the silent figure of the patient horse-boy.

CHAPTER II.

As I have already intimated, Miss Vesta had too much good sense to allow a sudden and certainly foolish sensation at the sight of a stranger to have anything more than a temporary impression upon her. Her unreasonable interest, even for a moment, in a person so far beneath her, wounded her dignity and made her vexed with what she termed her "whimsical curiosity."

When another day had passed, the man with the white forehead had been consigned to oblivion, the heiress's peace of mind restored—and all without the aid of Mr. Joss, who could not be consulted on a subject so foreign to his functions. It was midsummer. The moonlit nights were glorious. So thought the Count Marechal, as he passed them on the veranda, enjoying the double solace of a good cigar and the dark eyes of his betrothed. He could go on in this way forever—life was so luxuriously pleasant. When this moon would have waned, and another be in its place, his wedding and his happiness should be consummated.

But his moonlight, his wedding, and his happiness were all upset and forever delayed by a little pile of mud.

Colonel Vesey, by mere accident, was the first to discover the mud. He found the room of the white horse-boy full of it, which occasioned his remark one day at the table:

"That Macaire," said he, "is a lazy rascal. Instead of attending to his duties, he has filled his room with dirt, and spends his time making things with it. He has littered up the place with mud cows, mud dogs, mud men, and mud everything. He must stop it or go."

Miss Vesta's ears, in spite of the fact that she was no longer interested in him, always became attentive at the mention of Macaire's name. She made some casual answer to her father's observation, and privately determined to investigate these regions of mud without delay.

The next day, she concluded that "Prince," her favorite bay, was not quite well, and she must see him in his stall. Her investigation developed the fact that he was in an alarming state of perfect horse-health; in fact, he was so far gone that, in a very pretty excess of solicitude and trepidation, she hastened up stairs to the quarters of Macaire, evidently forgetting that she could easily have called him down.

Arrived at the threshold, her boldness misgave her. She wished she was back again, and her heart insisted on being very foolish—it kept beating on her bodice, as though she were not doing the simplest thing in the world. She could see him at his work (or play); he was surrounded with clay, which he moulded with his hands. His back was toward her; it looked so harmless, she gathered courage and advanced. So engrossed was the clay-worker that none of the small noises which she made to acquaint him with her presence succeeded in doing so.

"Oh, Mr. Macaire," said she, suddenly.

The poor man started, almost guiltily. His cap, which he seemed never without, was off in a moment. His fine face was a picture of mute astonishment, at the visit of this—angel, he would have called her.

"Don't you think that Prince has picked up a nail?" continued the angel, with innocent cunning.

"Is it possible! I hadn't noticed—I'll go down and see to it," and he would have been off, but for her detaining question:

"What is that you are making?"

"The leg of a horse."

"What for?"

"The horse, to be sure. Here it is." He showed her the statuette of a horse, not at all badly done. In fact, the more her eyes wandered about the place, the more interested she became. Woman-like, she pressed her finger in the clay; on withdrawing it, she perceived it was not soiled. This seemed to surprise her.

"What is that?" she asked.

"Sculptors' clay."

"Are you a sculptor?"

"Hardly." The horse-boy laughed. He had watched intently her white finger sink into his material; what a magnificent diamond it was that sparkled for an instant amid the clay! He would have departed to see about the lame animal below, but her constant inquiries had to be attended to.

"I guess it is a very small nail," she said, absently, when he had expressed some anxiety about it.

She was still examining, commenting, criticising, praising, when a voice at the door said: "They told me you were here," and the Count de Blazaroni advanced, and greeted his fiancée rather coldly. The clay-worker might have been a chair, for all the notice the new-comer bestowed on him. In fact, a chair would have gained more attention; she might have sat down on it.

"Are these not beautiful, Marechal?" exclaimed Miss Vesta, with enthusiasm, retaining her sang froid under the frown of her lover. The latter was, in truth, a connoisseur in such matters. He minutely inspected several specimens. His displeasure vanished somewhat, as he frankly pronounced them the work of a master hand.

"Are they indeed?" said Miss Vesta, opening wide her eyes.

"Who made them?" asked the count, carelessly.

"Mr. Macaire."

"And who may Mr. Macaire be?"

"The gentleman behind you, Marechal."

The lover turned languidly about, and surveyed the horse-boy. His manner said as plainly as words could have: "Oh, do you mean this thing?"

The "gentleman behind him," moved by his mood, had pulled that inevitable cap over his eyes (for this act of disrespect he remembered to beg the lady's forgiveness two years later) and stood with his arms folded—if not the master of the situation, at least not perturbed by it. His silent indifference annoyed the count, who made a gesture of disdain; and as for Miss Vesta, she blushed with painful consciousness when the sculptor departed with the remark that he would "look for that nail."

CHAPTER III.

If Mr. Joss had been in the habit of drawing conclusions, or of taking notes of the changes that took place in the mental weather of his fair confidante, he would have made a sad estimate of her sex. You see, his confessional practice was limited; being a wooden man himself, and, with all his years, sublimely ignorant of all those varied passions that sway flesh and blood, he had long ago determined that men—that is, wooden men, with hearts of oak—were the correct thing in this world. The dust on his own head was to him invisible. The contraries and absurdities in that of the heiress he daily witnessed.

A few weeks after the severe indisposition of Prince, Mr. Joss arranged his gold-leaf robe, prepared for a judicial nap, and intelligently absorbed what follows:

"Oh, Mr. Joss, I am so very, very unhappy! I wish papa would send Mr. Macaire away. But he won't. He says he has watched the horse-boy, who he says does more work than any other of the servants, in spite of his mud pies. Papa calls them 'mud pies'—it's a shame, when they are really so beautiful. I know they are beautiful, and Marechal agrees with me. But then I think Macaire—I mean Mr. Macaire—is beautiful also. What an exquisitely white brow he has! And his beard is like spun silk. Marechal don't like him, I'm afraid. He says that he is an impostor—a very clever impostor. I never saw a clever impostor before, and I wish I had never seen this one. He won't go away—from my mind, I mean. He is always there with his cap and his clay. He is a low person, and I am glad that I love Marechal—for when one loves, one is safe. Wait—let me think. No, Mr. Joss, he is not a low person; I take that back. He may be a clever impostor—yes, he may—but I was vexed with Marechal when he laughed at me for calling the horse-boy 'that gentleman behind him'! Well, I suppose of course he can't be a gentleman—but how foolish of me! I sometimes wish that Marechal was a clever impostor, too. Oh, dear, I do wish papa would send Macaire away! How I should hate to see him go!

"When the day is glorious, and Marechal and I are riding in the country, he talks of our wedding and his happiness. Sometimes, Mr. Joss, I do not hear him—I am thinking of the man in the room above the stable! I never would have believed that a few clay images could have so impressed me. It is good, and I am grateful for it, that I love Marechal—yet I am so miserable!"

The Confucian image looks down unmoved, with eyes of granite, on the tears that tremble on those long lashes. A very weak proceeding, he would think, if he were awake. Miss Vesta is again calm. "I think I shall pray," she murmurs softly, and glides from the alcove. She has a God, then, it seems, and seeks Him in her trouble.

Any cloud of mystery that may have gathered about the innocent but trouble-creating horse-boy it is time to dispel. Duncan Macaire was, indeed, an impostor, but his imposition was a reversal of the order of things. People of obscure origin frequently ape the character and manners of those of gentle birth; but it is rarely that we find one "to the manor born" filling a station such as Macaire's. Yet his father was of the Scotch aristocracy, who left his son a beggar, but a gentleman born, nevertheless. Like all poor people, he fell in love early in life; but love on a crust does not seem to have been to his taste. Leaving his lassie in tears, he sailed into the world to seek his fortune. And we find the poor fellow still seeking it—his bad luck as constant as his love. Form had always been a predominating passion with him, but in the various positions in which he had gained his bread, the opportunity was not always present to foster and develop his love for sculpture. In the employ of Colonel Vesey, the sun had suddenly shown itself on the horizon of his hopes. The poor devil sometimes believed that he felt the divine fire burning within him; there were occasions when he trembled under the excitement of imaginary successes; the temples which Miss Vesta thought so pure and white seemed bursting at times, so great was the humble clay-worker's love for art.

Time wore on, as time will. The loveliness of Miss Vesey began, flower-like, to fade. Hollows came in her cheeks, and circles under her eyes. The morning of her wedding found it postponed at the wish of the invalid. She lost all interest in passing events, and events to come, even. Mr. Joss gathered dust in solitude, and waited in vain. Some odd little figures that the horse-boy had sent up, in his simple way, seemed to please her more than anything. Ah, her maid, would surprise her, at times, talking to them and fondling them. The little, fat, French physician, whose rufous face and twinkling black eyes reminded one of the little men we see in the shop windows with abdominal clocks set in their paunches, was quite at a loss to account for Vesta's malady. He rubbed his chubby palms together, and admitted that he was temporarily baffled. Her problematic disease, already solved by the reader, was first discovered by the sight of his lamp, Macaire was working away alone

one night, busy and happy, when he was startled by a touch on his shoulder. Miss Vesta—white-robed, wan, and pale—stood before him. Her great eyes beamed on him with a sorrowful tenderness that he never forgot; she shook her head slowly from side to side as she said:

"Man, man, who are you? Do you not see that I love you?"

It was an appeal from her misery. Before he could collect himself, she had uttered a cry of terror and shame, and had fled from his sight.

The next day Colonel Vesey was sent for by his daughter. "Papa," said she, from where she lay, "you must do me two favors, and you must do them to-day. They may be the last I will ever ask of you. You must send away the horse-boy—but buy all his statues first. Be sure you buy all of them. Then, when Marechal comes, you must tell him that I do not love him—he must forgive me if he can, and leave me. Mind—he is not to see me again."

The invalid repeated this, like a lesson that had been learned perfectly.

Poor Mr. Vesey protested weakly—he could not see what the sculptor had to do with the matter. At last it dawned on him. She was silent, till he said: "Can it be that Macaire—"

"Yes, it can be, father. I love your groom, and have lowered myself to the level of telling him so."

Poor old man, it quite unmanned him. But he sternly did his duty. What he had deemed the easiest part of it, proved the most difficult: it was the huying of the clay figures. Macaire was loth to part with them, and did so at a nominal sum, only because it was the wish of the woman whose life he had so unwittingly blighted. The count was disposed of, after an hour's stormy interview.

"They have gone," said her father, wearily. It was sunset; he was holding his daughter's hand.

"Then bring me his works," she said, in a low voice.

They were brought to her—quite a varied group of them.

"I had to fight hard to get that one," said Mr. Vesey, pointing to one of the figures. Miss Vesta examined it. It represented a milkmaid, in Scottish costume, with her milk-pail and a bunch of wild flowers. There was an inscription on it; the invalid held it up to the waning light, and read: "THE SCULPTOR'S BRIDE."

"I understand," she said, faintly.

CHAPTER IV.

The little, fat, French physician—he with the imaginary clock in his basement—went around Shanghai with his chin in his chubby hand and his eyes bent on the ground. He was in a deep study as to what could be the ailment of the invalid heiress. Her long-continued indisposition and the grief of her father were evils which, in an indirect way, he felt he was responsible for.

"I am the family doctor," he said, "and it remains for me to ascertain the cause." What puzzled him most was that his medicines had no effect. He could have gone to her funeral with complacent melancholy; that his patients died on his hands did not disturb his sleep. It was when they insisted on neither getting better nor shuffling off that his placid temper was ruffled.

He determined to combine detective diplomacy with professional skill. He noticed Miss Vesta's preoccupation with the little clay statues; he traced them to the stable; the dismissal of the man who made them was a clue. All this—which his patient and her father could have told him, with more added—he fancied he was unearthing from the realms of the insoluble.

But he found out one thing which they were ignorant of, and which did the little fellow credit, after all. The destination of Macaire's ship (for he had left the place) had been Rome, and writing to friends there, the doctor was astounded and delighted to learn that the horse-boy was now a sculptor of great promise, having already made a name for himself in art circles. He was delighted, because he reasoned, not illogically, that a man ineligible as a groom would be accepted with the laurels of fame on his brow. But he must proceed cautiously.

Not long after this, Mr. Vesey told his daughter that he had heard through the doctor of some mineral springs near Rome that possessed miraculous healing qualities; he thought they had better try them. Miss Vesta, who had already begun slowly to mend, was not averse to a change of scene and a sea voyage. It was decided that they should go, the doctor accompanying them.

Consequently, Mr. Joss may or may not have been startled, when, with something like her old manner, she fluttered in upon him with the remark: "What do you think, my dear? We are going to Italy, so I will put you in your box."

So, sure enough, he found himself snugly packed away, in startling proximity to the "Sculptor's Bride"—parted from the lady only by a wall of silken hosiery, carefully stuffed between them. Any comparison of notes between these two, both so rich in the confidences of their mistress, would have been disastrous to the peace of the entire trunk.

When they arrived in Rome, the doctor triumphantly called the attention of Mr. Vesey to his daughter. "The springs have little left to do," said he.

Miss Vesta had improved greatly. Her cheek was full again, with a slight return of color; her beautiful eyes took an interest in objects about her. But the doctor, now on his mettle, was not yet content; he started to hunt up the "springs." He found them in a studio, with "Duncan Macaire" in neat letters on the door. He thought himself a great diplomat, as he rushed in excitedly. His diplomatic eyes failed to notice the dejected attitude of the sculptor, his gaunt form and haggard face.

"Do you love her yet?" he cried, waiving all formalities.

Macaire knew the doctor by sight and recognized him. He looked at him blankly for a while, evidently undecided whether to kick him out for his impudence, or forgive him as a lunatic. Then he dropped his eyes and forgot him—he was alone again, alone by a grave in Scotland, the grave of his Margie. "I shall love her forever," he unconsciously repeated.

"You shall see her this week!" cried the excited doctor. Macaire touched a bell in the panel. When the servant answered it, he handed him a slip of paper which read: "This man is crazy—have him removed."

"You shall marry her this summer!" continued the unabashed doctor. The sculptor, bestowed on him a look of infinite pity, and, in order to temporize till assistance arrived, he asked, carelessly: "Marry who?"

"Miss Vesey, the heiress."

Macaire bit his lip at his own stupid blindness. Two men appeared at the door, whom he dismissed with a wave of his hand.

"My dear sir," said he, turning calmly to his visitor, "your heat and zeal are no doubt well-intentioned, but they are untimely. I loved but one woman, and she—is dead. I beg of you to respect my sorrow, and to leave me."

Poor, chagrined little doctor! More trouble waited for him at the hotel. Colonel Vesey had been thrown from a horse, and a hasty diagnosis of his case said that he must die. That night at eleven he breathed his last. When his eyes were glazing, he whispered: "Beaupère—take—care—of—her." The man of medicine was really affected at last.

With the inevitableness of human destiny they met, one sunny day, on the Roman Campagna. Whatever constraint existed on both sides was lost in their double sorrow. Each felt that they must be friends—solitude would always make each think of the other. Vesta knew that her love was dead—in the way that lovely women "know" things; while Macaire was sure (in about the same way) that he could never love again. Life flowed quietly for these two friends; each morning sun brought with it the glad thought that they would see each other that day. They re-told their lives again and again. Vesta told him about what she called her "childish confessions to Mr. Joss."

One day they were talking about this love for inanimate things—what a space it filled in the human heart, quite distinct from the social affections. He admitted to being enamored of some of his own creations—he could appreciate her penchant for Mr. Joss.

"I sometimes wish I could hear the story he has to tell of me," said she; and then added, unguardedly: "There would be one novelty about it—it would not end with a marriage."

The day was very warm; the lining in Miss Vesta's sunshade was of a bright rose color; it may have been the reflection from it that dyed her cheeks when Macaire answered wickedly:

"Are you so sure of that?"

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1880. JOHN C. CHALMERS.

Patience was sitting on a monument, without, however, smiling on Grief—that young gentleman having disappeared behind the portico of the capitol. Nevertheless, in order to keep her hand, or rather her mouth, in, Miss Patience was smiling quite industriously at Master Sammy Tilden, who sat on a pretty little cask, or keg, or "barr'l" mounted on a little dust-heap at the base of the monument. The young gentleman, on his part, seemed almost adoringly attentive to the tips of Miss Patience's French boots. At last Master Tilden made bold to speak, and said, in a plaintive, quavering voice:

"Now, really, Miss Patience, don't you think I've waited long enough?"

"Not nearly long enough, Master Sam."

"But I'm just as good as the other boys—just as good as Hod Seymour or—"

"The trouble is, Sammy dear—I like to call you 'Sammy dear,' because I know you are too polite to presume—the trouble is that folks can't be made to believe you. They say you don't pay your taxes, and that your virtue is all assumed, and that you have lumbago, and that you can't see in a straight line, and that your teeth and your calves and your cheeks and your hair are f—"

"I know who told you that lie, it's that Kelly boy. I let him whip me once at school, and he's never forgiven me because I wouldn't let him break my nose."

"Well, they say he did it out of joint! But never mind, you're all right if you'll only wait long enough, Samivel. There's a land that is fairer than this; but I guess they've a returning-board there, too, and you can easily arrange to send your barr'l as an avant-courreur. You'd best die first, and then try Neptune."

"I don't want to die. And then I learned at Sunday-school that I can't take my money away with me. 'As I brought nothing into the world, so shall I take nothing out of the world.' And if I do it will melt."

"Yes, Sammy, but that applies to ordinary men only—you are no ordinary man. The same skill, and tact, and unlimited knowledge of the law—all law is alike: traps for the unwary and fun for the funny man; and you are the funny man of mundanity, Sam—the same knowledge of law which makes you slippery here will aid you there, and with your experience—"

"My dear Miss Patience, you fill me with great joy. Your language thrills me like a draught from Helicon or the bar in the rotunda at Albany. But I think I see your young man coming around the corner. I'm awfully grateful, Adieu!"

All tongues are wagging about the extraordinarily great exposure, in the décolletée way, at the two recent Queen's drawing-rooms. A few of the leading beauties have got remarkably fine shoulders, and naturally, as court etiquette demands what is absurdly called full dress, when it is in reality far from being full, these ladies take advantage of that privilege to display them. The belle of the hour is undoubtedly the Countess of Lonsdale, Lady Gladys Herbert, whose marriage to the Earl of Lonsdale caused so much talk a season or two ago. Her dress is said to have cost one hundred guineas, and it quite looked as if it had. It was of the richest white satin, the petticoat being completely covered with the most exquisitely painted groups of flowers, which were repeated at intervals upon the train. The diamonds were indescribably magnificent, and on one side of her corsage was fastened a black pearl of fabulous size, set round with brilliants. From the shoulder-straps which served as sleeves hung strings of pearls, a novel and beautiful arrangement. Her loveliness is of the dark, Jewish type—she is called "The Gypsy"—and really, when enhanced by these magnificent adornments, she looked like some gorgeous vision of Oriental royalty summoned from the pages of Disraeli's glowing fiction. The Premier paid her marked attention at the drawing-room.

PROFESSOR POIRIER'S DREAM.

From the French of Erckmann-Chatrian.

Last Sunday afternoon, my maid-servant having gone out to vespers, and the heat of the day toward three o'clock being overpowering, I fell asleep reading Darwin.

My window opened upon the Charterhouse garden; the rustling of the leaves came vaguely to my ears; a light breath of air caressed my cheeks. Suddenly, in a dream, I saw myself transported to the banks of the Ganges, not far from Benares.

I was sitting in the shade of a great tamarind tree; the sacred river rolled before me like a lake, white with light, and upon its banks an immense forest of palms, bananas, and other exotic plants spread itself, whose lances, parasols, and fans mingled together as far as the eye could reach.

And while I contemplated in wonderment this splendid landscape, a slight noise in the leaves over my head drew my attention. I looked up and saw—guess what I saw!

I saw myself, Nicholas Poirier, Professor of Philosophy at the College of Saint Suzanne, in the form of a chimpanzee, hanging by one of my paws to the lower branch of the tamarind tree, and making faces at myself.

Judge of my astonishment!

Comprehending directly that my body had dissevered itself from my soul, and was capering about in the lonely forest, I was in consternation.

"If it wanders off into the depths of the wood," I said to myself, "it will never return, and I shall remain here alone, with my metaphysics and nothing else to console me."

The thought made me shudder. I wanted to summon my Not-Me to resume immediately its accustomed place, but the fear of frightening it modified my ideas, and with a conciliatory tone I said to it:

"Come! come! my dear Nicholas, consider—does that posture suit the dignity of your character? Ought a professor of philosophy to suspend himself from the branch of a tree? Is it proper? Come, my friend, come back to propriety!"

But the chimpanzee, after replying to me by two or three grimaces, said:

"Ah! now, do you take me for a fool, proud and stupid spirit? I descend from my tree to seat myself again in your old arm-chair, and wear out my eyes in deciphering silly stories! Ah, you know me little if you reckon on that. No, no! I am very well on my tree, and here I stay... until the fancy takes me to get down and munch a few almonds or treat myself to a cocoanut. That's what suits me. You! do what you like, discuss, dream, babble; that is your affair. I have had enough of it."

At this impertinent answer I had a mind to be angry, but for the second time reflecting that this would not be a good way to bring back the Not-Me, I resolved to convince it by the force of logic, and in softened accents cried:

"I comprehend, my dear Nicholas, the wish for liberty which has taken possession of you; the desire to stretch yourself was natural enough, after being thirty years at rest. But this once is enough. You should listen to reason. Come, my friend, come."

"Hear me," interrupted the chimpanzee. "For a long time I have known what you keep in store for me; that you distinguish between yourself and me, who are your own body and your own life; that you propose to survive me, after having made me work and sweat to satisfy your vanity. You have told me so a hundred times, while we were together under the same envelope. You have said to me, 'You, body, shall die; you shall turn to dust, after being buried ceremoniously; but I, spirit, I am of another essence than yours; my essence is one and indivisible; it is immortal, outside of space and time; time can not affect it. You, you were made to be eaten by worms.' Is it true? Did you say so?"

I could not deny it, my body having lived with me fifty years in the most intimate confidence, and, besides, I had taught the thing professionally in the lecture-room, according to the programme of the university. I could not, therefore, dispute the fact, and the chimpanzee, seeing me embarrassed, recommenced making faces at me, giving forth peals of laughter with an air of triumph.

I lost patience.

"Are you coming down directly?" I cried. "I am tired of all this talk. It is I who command, I the spirit; and matter ought to obey."

"You have told me so a hundred times," said the ape, sneeringly, "and I was stupid enough to believe you. But times are changed. Stay in your arm-chair. I am going to skip away, swing on the vines, and try to find some pretty monkey to beautify my existence."

At this threat a shudder of horror seized me; and, softening my voice, I said:

"Well, then, yes! I have said what has been repeated for six thousand years: It is clear that the body turns to dust, but that is not my fault; it is a fact, and every reasonable animal must submit to positive material facts. What is the use of struggling? That is evident to the senses. But the spirit, invisible, impalpable, is necessarily immortal."

On hearing this, my chimpanzee burst into endless roars of laughter, chattering his teeth and repeating:

"The spirit is immortal! immortal! Ha! ha! ha! that's a good joke! immortal!"

He slapped his thighs and went into such convulsions that I was afraid of seeing him fall from the tree, and began to cry out:

"Hook yourself on, animal! Hold yourself faster. With your extravagances you will end by breaking your neck, and I—I here, without a body, what will become of me? How shall I get up before my scholars and make them recognize me?"

These reasons appeared to affect the ape, for he was interested in his preservation as much as I. Then, having calmed himself, he continued:

"You are immortal, and I must disappear! Yet we have but one 'I.' For fifty years we have been working together for the development of this 'I,' both of us. I have suffered, as well as you, the privations which were needed for your greatness. Haven't we had to pass day and night digging into Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Sanscrit, without speaking of living languages, to get your chair of philosophy. And now I must perish, while you will survive me in an existence of unalterable satisfaction and felicity for ever and ever? Come, now, that is contrary to common sense. Where would be the eternal justice of which you are always talking?"

My spirit, having no other answer to make, cried: "Shut up!" But, directly, feeling the necessity of wheeling this subtle animal by some sort of reasoning, I added:

"Your physical sufferings were nothing in comparison with my intellectual and moral sufferings. Besides, they were compensated by a host of pleasures suited to your nature. I never refused you anything. As soon as my means permitted, I put on you a fine brown suit of clothes, patent-leather shoes, according to the taste you have always shown; waist-coats, fashionable cravats, the latest trousers were not lacking to you—for your vanity was as great as mine. You had to have white linen, ornaments to your watch-chain—things which I could have done without, but for you. And your love of good living—I never saw the like. Haven't we shouted and sung and feasted at the Prado, at the Chaumière? How many sausages with sourcrot, slices of ham, and crawfish haven't you swallowed at the Strasburg Brewery, La Harpe Street? Have I ever reproached you in the least? Even when my pockets were empty, and I had to go on tick, did I hesitate? I do not speak of the innumerable pints of beer which have gone down your throat; they would make thousands of kegs if you would reckon them up. And the cigars, and the music, and the theatre—and all the rest."

My chimpanzee half shut his eyes impatiently. "Good!" said he, "you never refused anything to yourself, either, and a thousand times you have deprived me of the greatest necessities in order to adorn your library with some new book and satisfy your vain curiosity. In the early days, especially, I had to pass winters without fire; my fingers numb with cold and my stomach empty."

"I suffered from it more than you. Your privations enfeebled me, and the fear of losing you gave me a fever."

"Ah!" cried the rascally ape, "to be so afraid you must have been not quite sure of surviving me. Say what you will, we shall end together; you shall not survive me a second. When I sleep, we both lose the sense of the 'I,' when I begin to wake up, you dream, you babble; when I open my eyes, you revive; when I am sick and you suspect the slightest dangerous injury to me, you do not know what saint to pray to. Go! your case is as clear as mine; soothe yourself with your darling illusions, we shall none the less depart arm-in-arm."

He stopped, and seeing me reduced to silence, the animal went on with redoubled insolence:

"Formerly, in the time of the Egyptians, I was embalmed after my death, and remained hundreds of years in the condition of a mummy. It was a just tribute rendered to my services; the honor of being enveloped in consecrated bandages and stuffed with rare perfumes consoled me a little for my loss of life. But at present you disdain me; you think to elevate yourself by despising your body. For all that, it is only a comedy on your part. Do you remember our rheumatism in the stomach, when Dr. Boniface gave us both up? I could hardly help laughing, in spite of the sadness of the moment, at your looks when you received the last consolations of this terrestrial world; the big Latin words served out to you had not the appearance of reassuring you much as to your final lot, and for the sake of keeping me only two or three years more you would not have hesitated a minute to sacrifice your eternal life. Come, own up; be honest to yourself. Is it true?"

I was confounded at his impudence; then, with a movement of indignation and as a last resource, striking my breast, I cried:

"I think; therefore, I am."

And the chimpanzee, imitating my gesture and caressing his stomach, jeeringly cried:

"I digest; therefore I am. One can doubt everything except that one digests; for to doubt one must digest, doubt being a phase of good digestion."

So much audacity deserved chastisement. I rose to bring the rascal to his senses, when I perceived in the deep shadow of the leaves a moving object. Looking closer, I recognized with horror the flat head of one of those enormous serpents of the Ganges marshes, with whom apes are a favorite dainty. His tail loosened itself from the tip of the tamarind tree, and his scaly belly glided undulatingly in silence down to the lower branches. A cry of horror burst from my very bowels:

"Look out!"

And the chimpanzee, perceiving from the corner of his eye the fearful reptile, made a prodigious leap.

It was too late; the python had followed him like a dart, and I heard his bones cracking, when my maid-servant, returning from vespers, opened the door, asking:

"Did you call, sir?"

What luck! I seemed to feel all the hairs on my body stand on end, and I stammered:

"Nothing, Jeannette, nothing; I only sneezed."

See, for all that, the emotions to which a man is exposed in reading Darwin.

A little boy's composition on his school-ma'am concluded with the following touching lines:

A noble woman, nobly planned
To warm, to wallop, and command.

To the ordinary lad, entrance into society is a fiery ordeal. It is a great trial, either for a tender or a riper age, for an overgrown boy to go to a door, knowing that there are a dozen girls inside, and knock or ring with an absolute certainty that in a few moments all eyes will be upon him; it is a severe test of courage to go before these girls, and make the tour of the room without stepping on their toes, and to sit down and dispose of his hands without putting them in his pockets is an achievement which few boys can boast. But even if he acquits himself tolerably well during the evening, his trials are not yet over. The girls don their hoods and put on their shawls, and look so saucy and mischievous, so unimpressible and independent, as if they did not wish anybody to go home with them. Then comes the pinch; and the boy who has the most pluck goes up to the prettiest girl in the room, with his tongue clinging to the roof of his mouth, and croaking out his elbow, stammers out the words, "Shall I see you home?" She touches her fingers on his arm, and they walk home, feeling as awkward as two goslings. Well, life has its trials.

A NEW INDUSTRY.

This is Alden's latest: A leading citizen—for of such are notoriously all the inhabitants of Western towns—found himself last month without any means of support. Had he been a literary man, he would have immediately accepted a consulship; but in the circumstance this was impossible. It is true that he might have found work to do, but he had been so long in the habit of living on money borrowed from the Shylocks of the East that his spirit revolted from the idea of working. In this emergency he remembered his ulster, and he decided to use it as an instrument for spoiling the Chicago hotel-keepers. He began operations by equipping himself with a small hand-bag, and by putting on his ulster, unaccompanied by trousers. Thus arrayed, he entered a Chicago hotel, and mentioning that he had just arrived in the city, and intended to start for St. Louis early in the morning, he took a room, and went to bed. The next morning the hotel was aroused by the violent ringing of the new guest's bell. The servant who answered the bell found him in a state of great excitement, in consequence of a robbery which he said had been perpetrated upon him. He demanded to see the landlord, to whom he complained that his room had been feloniously entered during the night, and that his only pair of trousers, which cost eighteen dollars, and in one pocket of which was his purse, containing fifteen dollars, and a through ticket to St. Louis, had been stolen. The landlord was greatly grieved, and a thorough inspection of the room conclusively showed that the guest was wholly devoid of trousers. The conclusion that he had really been robbed was inevitable, and the landlord foresaw that his house would be denounced as a den of thieves. He, therefore, like a wise man, begged the bereaved stranger not to be annoyed, and assured him that his losses would be made good. A supply of trousers from a ready-made clothing establishment was brought in, and the man selected a satisfactory pair. The landlord then gave him fifteen dollars and a ticket to St. Louis, and, as a further peace-offering, handed him a receipted bill for supper, lodging, and breakfast. Thus the reputation of the hotel was saved, and the wearer of the ulster returned to his lodgings, having made fifteen dollars in cash, a ticket worth several dollars more, and a new pair of trousers. There are many hotels of different degrees of excellence in Chicago, and to twenty-two of these the wearer of the ulster paid a trouserless visit. Twenty-two times did the astute man complain to the landlord that he had been robbed. The result was the collection of twenty-two pairs of desirable trousers, of sums of money varying from five to fifteen dollars, and amounting in the aggregate to over two hundred dollars, and a series of tickets to all sorts of places. Each landlord was so annoyed in finding that a robbery had taken place in his house that he kept the matter carefully secret, and in some cases bribed his servants to do the same. Thus, the ingenious Chicago man, in the space of little more than a month, lived sumptuously at a variety of hotels free of cost, and accumulated clothing and spending money with the greatest ease. It was prosperity that finally ruined him. He fell into the habit of drinking too much champagne, and when under the influence thereof made the terrible mistake of being robbed a second time in the Plumber House. The landlord immediately recognized him, and, being a prompt and determined man, informed his guest that he was an impostor, and "hadn't never brought no trousers into that there room." Furthermore, he seized the unfortunate man's ulster, and, instead of supplying him with trousers, coated his defenseless legs with tar and cotton-batting, and in that deplorable plight cast him out. Still, in spite of this failure, the owner of the ulster deserves the credit of inventing a new industry, and had he had the wisdom to abandon Chicago in time, and to select as his prey the landlords of other towns, he might now be rich and prosperous.

Amelia Donnerschlog brought suit against Augustus Behrens, who had promised to marry her, but failed to keep his word. The plaintiff set her damages at two hundred dollars. The suit came on to be tried before Mr. Justice Banyon; and Behrens, not denying the principal facts alleged against him, excused himself by saying that the plaintiff insisted, as a condition of the marriage, that her mother should keep house for the young couple, and this defendant could not consent to.

"I told her," said he, "that I loved her deeply, and was ready to marry her, but did not wish to marry her mother also, who was a woman of lordly and unpleasant habits, and insisted on feeding me too much on cabbage—a vegetable I always disliked."

Mr. Justice Banyon said: "Which would you rather do—marry the lady and take her mother to live with you, or pay two hundred dollars?"

Defendant answered: "I will pay two hundred dollars." Judgment was then delivered by the court: "Allow me to shake hands with you. I envy your firmness. There was a period in the life of this court, Mr. Behrens, when it was in circumstances somewhat similar to your own. If it had had the moral courage which you possess, it would have saved about twenty-five years of misery and unhappiness."

"The alternative was presented to this court whether it would marry a young lady and her mother, or whether it would pay one hundred and twenty-five dollars in gold. The court was poor at that time. It was earning an unsatisfactory living at the restaurant business. It yielded. It took the young woman and mother-in-law, and kept the one hundred and twenty-five dollars."

"For a quarter of a century this court has regretted its hasty action. It is glad to meet a man who cherishes happiness more than he does money. The order of the court is that the defendant stand discharged, and that the complainant, who has been trying to bring a man into slavery to a mother-in-law, be fined ten dollars and costs."

There is really a man creature in this city who wears bangles! He entered a crowded horse-car the other night, and hung elegantly to a strap, displaying the jingling baubles on his manly wrists, to the intense amusement of the unsympathizing passengers.

A little girl joyfully assured her mother the other night she had found out where they made horses; she saw a man finishing one—"he was nailing on his nails."

EDITORS ARGUMENT: Will you give a strangerroom to express herself just once in your columns? I have never troubled you before by "talking back," but have been for years a "constant reader," and have kept up a mighty thinking. My only object in breaking the silence now is that I see one of my own sex wandering about in a wilderness of her own "supposing," and not likely to find her way out very soon. Will anybody have the kindness to ask "Buttercup" if she has the slightest idea what she wanted to say in that not too pellucid article of last Saturday's issue? As near as I can ascertain from her own words, she is "tired of hearing the slurs and slightes on woman's incompetency, and would like to know one single young man whose brains would stand the strain of this unnatural system of educational forcing"—the "forcing" consisting of the ability, at eighteen years of age, to "speak and write English correctly; to be thoroughly grounded in the essentials of mathematics; to be a moderately proficient musician, an accomplished linguist," a good cook, seamstress, and household manager, with a few other smaller accomplishments, which come so naturally to women as not to require mention. In the first place, "Buttercup," who has been so maligning us that you feel it your duty to lay aside your basket of "ribbons and laces" and leave your bum-boat to take up the cudgel for a cause so far, far beyond your comprehension? You complain that "it is all wrong, this cramming of girls' brains, however strong, with too many indigestible and unsuitable stimulants," fearing, no doubt, that our tender brains are crowded with subjects beyond our years. Of course, your words confirm what your position in life would imply—that this "process of forcing" is something which you have never experienced, so I hasten to reassure you. "Buttercup" and inform you that it is all backwards about its being beyond our abilities to have obtained the small amount of education you mention at the mature age of eighteen. As for the other domestic accomplishments of sewing, cooking, etc. (excepting, of course, the rare talent of being a brilliant conversationalist), they come so naturally to the generality of women as to be considered almost an attribute of the sex, which only requires a little observation and the stimulus of necessity to develop in the stupidest of women. Never mind, "Buttercup," this championship of your sex does your honest heart more credit, mistaken though it be, than that spiteful dig at the charming society of the "rosebud table" by that "last rose of last summer," Miss "Ada Ven." Now, "Ada," while I am defending my much-sat-upon "rose-bud companions," (I hope you won't say my petals are falling just yet, as honestly I am not yet twenty), just let me entreat you not to be so cruelly severe upon poor quaking society in general. No wonder the gentlemen were afraid to appear after your terrible "strictures upon dress coats by daylight," and can you blame us for welcoming those heroic ones who dared to brave the eagle glances of your "discerning eye"? Now, "Ada," if you appeared at Mrs. Crocker's kettle-drum as you threatened, "IN YOUR BUNNIT" (capitals please, Mr. Editor), and, indeed, how can we blame you?—the hair on the top of your head may be a little thin by this time—please don't forget your glasses, as then your "discerning eyes" may discover in the lovely unopened heads of dainty waving hair a reason, and at the same time an excuse, for this conduct not altogether "de rigueur."

EDITORS ARGONAUT: Among them many good hits made by the Argonaut the one on phenology deserves approval. Many of us have examined the subject—in faith at first, but with contempt at last. The brain does not control the shape of the head, but exerts only influence outwardly; being eighty per cent. water, it does not press on one place more than another, and extends the skull in directions where bone and muscle resist the least; the latter are boss architects in deciding the form of the head. People who live on hard food develop strong jaws—the muscles used are attached to the side of the head, which is drawn downward and widened. Language is claimed to be shown by the eye, which is outside of the skull, and not crowded by the brain. The "perceptive faculties" are composed of bone, individuality and order being sometimes an inch from the brain, and all are small in children and small-boned adults. Very muscular people have low, broad, and round heads; wherever muscles are attached their influence is perceptible. Bone exerts its power to make the head rough, high, long, and narrow; the great variety in the shapes of heads is due to the different proportion and strength of the bone and muscle. The skull has plates of bone whose ups and downs are partially independent of each other. In old age the vertex and floor of the cranium become flattened (i. e., settle as a house does), and the sides bulge out. Dr. J. W. Draper says that the cerebellum and amateness have no connection at all. O. W. Holmes writes that you might as well try to tell the amount of money in a safe by feeling of the rivets on the outside, as to try to tell the value of a man by feeling of his skull.

OAKLAND, W. B. KELSEY.

DEAR ARGONAUT : Does a beastly, drizzling rain make you cross and out of sorts? Have your merchants flaunted their airy, fairy spring goods in their windows, only to haul them down again and exhibit water-proof cloths, ulsters, and umbrellas. Did you put on your light habit, and your joli chapeau de paille, and go sauntering the street in the bright spring sunshine, and then come sneaking home with your habit all spotted by the "gentle rain," and your straw hat all limp and crestfallen—like your disgusted countenances? That's the kind of tricks these "April showers" have been playing Sacramentoians; three hours of unclouded sky, and twenty-one of pouring rain; none of your gentle, rippling showers of April that you read so much about, but regular, pelting November rains, that mean business. Picnics advertised for three days from now, and the picnic grounds three inches under water. Interesting—for the grounds!

Notwithstanding all that, Mr. and Mrs. Gallatin gathered a large number of friends on Wednesday evening, and we all came home in a pouring rain. Their home is so grand—one of the very finest places in the city. The rooms are both large and elegant, and little nooks and windows surprise you at every turn. Dancing was partly the order of the evening (floors canvased, as usual), though it was varied by Mr. Crandall giving us a little ballad, well rendered. Refreshments were served in the billiard-room, up two flights of stairs. Mrs. Gallatin received us in a very becoming lavender silk and light grenadine; not at all gorgeously arrayed. Did you never notice the very poor taste exhibited by some hostesses, who over-dress and out-dress their guests—and how shockingly shoddy it looks? Mrs. Gallatin is always lovely in anything, so it didn't at all matter if she did leave her diamonds in her jewel-case and her trailing velvets in her closet. It was regular session night at the Legislature; and, just because a few of its members thought ladies' eyes fairer than the president's, and Mr. Gallatin's mansion more hospitable than the State's capital, that awe-inspiring sergeant-at-arms must invite himself to our host's dwelling and request the pleasure of their company in the Senate chamber. And such an oh-ling and ah-ling and awful-ling from every one of the guests would have scared away any ordinary officer, but he "held the fort" until he marched them all off. Mrs. Senator Brown was there, Mrs. Beckman, Miss Fox, of Oakland, Mrs. Haymond, Mrs. Lyons, Mrs. Chesley, Misses Felter, Wilburn, Seeley, Cosby, and Bernard (who, by the way, received with Mrs. Gallatin), Mrs. Clarke and Porter, Mrs. Safford, Hamilton, Miller, and dozens of others. Some of the most elegant costumes of the season were worn; and though it was probably the last party of the winter, it was a great distance from being the least. A thoroughly elegant, enjoyable affair, of which mine host and his fair lady could well be proud.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: From the papers, I see that there are still just judges in the land, and that Kearney's sentence has been affirmed, and that he has been committed to prison. I feel an irresistible desire to clap my hands, shout "Well done!" and say "Amen!" If you kindly allow me, will do so through the columns of the Argonaut.

knowant. I am a falseigner by birth, and love the "old country" with a love that will end only with my life. But I am an American by adoption and naturalization, and am firmly impressed with the belief that we owe some duties to the land which has given us food, shelter, and a home—something that all foreigners who, like Kearney and Steinmann, are now "bellying" on the Sand-lot could not find in their own country. Else why did they come here? I repeat that I am of foreign birth; and premising that I have noticed through all the years of my residence here that it is not the better class of foreigners who seek office and political power—in other words, who want to run the Government—but generally those who spring from the lowest dregs of the society of the old world. I should like to ask a simple question of my American-horn fellow-citizens: Why do you allow a rabble of foreign-horn ignoramuses to actually govern your country? Mind, I do not say that foreigners are all ignoramuses, or all Americans Solons. Far from it. France, Germany, Ireland, England, have sent us men of profound intellect and great attainments in the world of letters, of art, and science; and some of you Americans are very ignorant people. But the foreign men of intellect are not those who run to the Sand-lot and clamor for office and position six months after stepping on American soil. They go quietly about their business, take advantage of the greater facility and wider range for the acquisition of knowledge and wealth that is afforded them here, and add to the prestige and lustre with which this country already shines abroad. The very men, however, who in their own country would never dare open their mouths on the subject of governing or law-making, for fear of being clapped into jail as traitors and prisoners, go blustering about the public streets here, vilifying the Government that protects them, gives them a chance for a livelihood, or feeds them if they are paupers, and speak openly of forming into "aggressive" companies and practicing military drill. Never, till the mob of the Sand-lot began to haul its meetings, and talk blood, hemp, and braggadocio in general, have I felt anything but pride at the thought of being fellow-citizens with the brave, the brave, Kearney, Steinmann, and the rest of the rabble. I have sometimes felt ashamed of my own countrymen. Being a woman, I confess that I do not know enough of the financial, political, and commercial situation to enter into a dissertation as to the causes of the present crisis in our city; but my reason tells me that the senseless threats of the very classes to which Kearney and Steinmann belong have caused most of the troubles that are on us now. No one has greater sympathy for the working classes than I have, and I echo Kearney's cry "The Chinese must go;" but while we are abating nuisances, why should not this crying nuisance be abated first of all? If Denis Kearney wants to reform any government, why doesn't he go back to Ireland and begin his labors there? Steinmann ditto; let him go back and tell old Kaiser Wilhelm and Chancellor Bismarck how to run the government-machine in the Fatherland. After they have taken counsel of his superior administrative talent, and his country has been reformed to suit his notion, then let him come back here and give us the benefit of his advanced views and his broken English; but until then, for gracious sake, let some one clap a muzzle on his big mouth, and lay him away beside his guide and fellow-reformer, Kearney.

We reproduce the following bit of sprightly correspondence of a young Jewish lady to the Jewish Messenger, explaining why the Hebrew maiden does not often wed the young Philistine. The Jewish girl sacrifices more to her religion, the Christian girl more to love. We think this young lady altogether wrong in allowing her religious prejudices to prevent her acquaintance with the young Christian gentlemen. This young lady is wrong in resisting the temptation that comes from social intermingling. We look upon all this business of sacrificing religious emotions as bosh, and we can not help thinking that if we Christians are good enough to barter and trade with—if this our country is good enough to attract a race that has none—if the Christian and Hebrew may engage together in business pursuits and social life—may work together, live together, and vote together—then our boys ought to be good enough to husband the very nicest of Jewish maidens. We always rejoice when we hear of a runaway match between Christian and Jew, and our sympathies have always been with Jessica as against her merchant father, especially when she carries away the jewels and the ducats.

My object is to show how faithfully our Hebrew maidens still cling to their inherited ancient religion, and that in matters of constant adherence to their belief they are superior to their Christian sisters. In beauty, grace, refinement, intellect, and education, they have certainly their perfect equals among the women of other denominations. Virtue and charity are not any more the exclusive property of single creeds. Humanity preaches its doctrines inside of the church as well as outside thereof. But when it comes to abandon her ancient faith, when loved good prospects would prompt her to embrace another creed, then the Jewish girl will cling more firmly and truly to her religion than the Christian girl, nay, even more than the Jewish young man. The vicissitudes of life and love are the same for all who mingle with the world and consent to be ruled and governed by that despotic monarch called society. The barriers are broken. Free and unmolested, independent of religious prejudices, can we seek the companionship of congenial minds. And yet notice the hesitation a Jewish young lady shows on forming the acquaintance of Christian young gentlemen. Very few receive their social calls. On the other hand, look at our Jewish young men. To most of them it is perfectly immaterial to what creed a young lady belongs—as long as she is pretty, sprightly, and entertaining, they are anxious to form her acquaintance. Some of our Jewish free-thinkers go even so far as to say that those enchanting qualities of a young lady are only to be found among those outside of the pale of Judaism. What is the consequence? If we had statistics about intermarriages we would find that ninety per cent. of them consist of Jewish men marrying fair Christians, who are willing to become Jewesses in order to marry the man they love, or the man who can best provide for them the luxuries of life. But how many Jewesses have become converted to the Christian faith in order to make a matrimonial hit? Can anybody deny that their dazzling oriental beauty is admired by the male sex of Christendom? Can anybody doubt that such charms are as much sought after as the dollars of the Jewish daddies of our young dandies? I claim that Jewish girls have to battle against as many temptations of intermarriage as the Christian girls have. But, knowing the danger, they avoid it in the beginning, and hesitate to be on intimate social footing with Christian young men. "An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." But, nevertheless, if sometimes little Cupid, that great cosmopolitan, has pierced the heart of a daughter of Israel, and made her love regardless of scientific blood, and such accidents happen even in well-regulated Jewish families, the young lady will nearly always sacrifice the strongest emotions of her heart to the holy belief of her mind. Knowing that habits and customs of a race or a church are more rigidly observed than their laws, and believing them the surest safeguard for future generations, I can only approve and applaud the strong convictions of our faithful Jewish daughters.

Once, twice, thrice—
Hold! 'Tis sacred ground!
Thrice did you say?
In all the earth
No mortal ever can be found—
No mortal man, no living head,
Shall thus exceed our honored dead.

Enough, when he is dead shall be,
 That he was one
 (And we have three)
 That in the nation's sacred roll
 There is enshrined another soul.
 When he is dead, when all is done,
 And honor's goal is fairly won,
 Then may he with our father sleep,
 And with our martyr glory reap.
 But while his erring steps may stray
 In foul ambition's devious way,
 While yet remains one step to try,
 He can not peer with these on high.

Back! back! Three times! It can not be!
That chair is not again for thee!
Uniosue thy tongue! Quick, quick, disclaim.
Let not ambition blast thy fame!
This silence all thy glory pales—
He loses all who schemes and fails.
This Cameron-Pennsylvania plan
Of binding, pledging every man;
This Conkling-New York unity
Is not the thing to win the free.
The "wild horse" of a general boom
Disdains the saddle, bit, and groom—
Rises spontaneous from the ground,
And hounds and leaps and prances round.
This gagged and bound and hampered crew,
That perforce votes as others do,
Has not the bright, spontaneous ring
That to the polls bold freemen bring.

Grant? Well, no! Not Grant again!
No third term—never!
Above our George and Abraham
Shall none aspire
Now and forever!
Within our hearts are they enshrined—
Tried, trusty, true!
And numbered with the silent dead
Grand lives run through!
Unfinished, erring, mortal clay,
With time to fall and go astray,
And every glittering hope betray—
No, never, never,
"Twere sacrifice! Away! away!

Now that nearly all the nations of the world have had their industrial and art expositions, their world's fairs for the display of products, machinery, implements of war, fabrics, inventions, and works of art, why would it not be a good idea to have a world's naval display? Let all the governments unite, and send to the harbor of San Francisco their war ships; let all the great steam lines send one or more of their model steamers; let the merchant marine display its commercial vessels; let every ship-yard be represented in models of its handiwork; let all the gentlemen who own yachts come with them on a pleasure excursion to our Bay of San Francisco; and let there be a grand display of every kind of thing that floats, from the iron-clad to the skeleton rowed by sculls. This port would be a convenient centre for all to gather. Here the new navies of Japan and China could display their first efforts with the monster ships of Europe. Here would be an opportunity for all sorts of trials—trials of speed, trials of guns, trials in handling ships. Our great, spacious, inner bay, with its diurnal breezes, would be a splendid place for yacht races. To the Farallones might race the craft that would dare the ocean; to the Sandwich Islands the steamers of heavier tonnage. It would be a splendid sight to see gathered around our city such an exhibition of all the navies of the world; and grand to see the bunting of all nations flung to our trade winds in a peaceful display. It would be profitable, too—a great deal more profitable than war. Sham battles and a comparison of navies might save the world from the horrors of naval conflicts; and it is possible that out of such a friendly meeting there might come the recognition of the uselessness of war vessels, and an international congress that would consent to the disbanding of armies, the dismantling of forts, and the discontinuance of navies. Suppose we fix upon the year 1885 as the time, and the harbor of San Francisco as the place, for the world's first great naval exposition.

A recent tornado, destroying the village of Marshfield in Missouri, is suggestive of unpleasant possibilities. Scarce a year passes that we do not hear of one or more destructive wind-storms in the Northwest. Sometimes the track of ruin lies through forests or over plains; sometimes through fields and orchards, farms and towns. But wherever the tempest directs its line of march, ruin attends it. Houses, barns, fences, trees, human beings, and cattle are tossed like straws before a whirlwind. Chicago has had a touch of the tornado. Had this destructive whirlwind struck Chicago or St. Louis, or any of the great towns, what would have been the result? Would not the giant have as easily demolished the great brick and wooden edifices of those cities as it did the lesser structures of Marshfield? We may not willingly contemplate the terrible ruin and the destruction to life and property that would attend the tornado in its attack upon a great city, with its dense population, its streets, buildings, and warehouses, and running all through its buildings, and under its streets and into its piles of merchandise, arteries filled with gas, to break forth into a thousand conflagrations. Yet this is the dreadful possibility suggested by these oft recurring and destructive tornadoes. The Northwest is subject to them; Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, and Missouri lie in their track.

And then, Johnny, as I come out under the bay tree this side ov Missis Doppy's ole pater patch a monstrous grate stump-suckin flabbibumpus stude up and wank its ey at me insultin."

Then I tole Uncle Ned I never heard of sech animals in ol my life, and I bet Billy haddent in his'n, and Uncle Ned he sed: "Very likely, Johnny, very likely; but, ol the same, some things is, and continews for to be, wich you and Billy aint never been aprized of. Frinstence, theres the purple tagger, wich is ten times more frocious than the stripy feller, and can lick the rhi nosy rose every time. And theres the panzy-face hippopotsumus, with a pocket on the stummuck of its belly, into wich it retires wen pursude by the goblin gally grampus of the dezert. And then there's the fuzzifungo of Madgisker, wich has a ostridge for its father and a foggy morning for its mother. I confess, Johnny, yure the boss beast-sharp, as yure learned artickles into the Argonaut have amply prove; but then Nature does sometimes sort o' sling to gather a few vestidges of creation and make a animal without reportin' the feller's peculiarities to you."

But wot Uncle Ned meant by all that rigmy roll jest kanocks me down, and I guess it wude flore Billy too.

An now I wil tel you a little story. One time there was a man which had a tagger, and the tagger it was a sho and the man he tuke the money for to get in. The man he had a big paper naid onto the tagger's den, and the paper it sed, the paper did:

ROIL BENGOL TAGGER,
some times cald
THE MONNERK OF THE JUNGLE.
HANDS OF
NO TETCHIN THE TAGGER!

The monnerk of the jungle it was always a layin down with its nose tween its poz, and the fokes wich had paid for to get in thay was mad cos it wudent wock, and rore like dissent thunder. But the sho man he sed: "That's ol rite wen I git the new cage done, but this is the same cage wich the offle feller broke out of in Oregon, time he et up them seventeen men and their families."

Then the fokes they wude ol stand back and tock in wispers wile the tagger slep. But one day a feller wich was drunk he tuke to punchin the tagger with the mast hed of his umbreller, wich -stampeded the oddience, wild; and the wimmen fokes thay stude onto chairs and hollerd like it was a mouse; but the drunk chap he kep a jobbin the monnerk of the jungle crewel. Prety sune the monnerk it bellerd offle, and riggled, but the feller kep a pokn like he was fireman to a steam engin. Bimeby the monnerk it jumpt onto its hine feets, and shucked itsself out of its skin, and roled up its sleefs, and spit onto its hands, and spoke up an sed: "I bedam if I cant jest whollip the pea green stufn out o' the gum dasted galoot wich has ben a proddin this ere tagger!"

And the oddience thay was a stonish!

There was a other tagger wich was a sho, an one day it got out and hid its self in a man's gardn. Then the sho man he went to the house, and he sed to the other man, the sho man did: "Mister, my tagger is in yure gardn, an I gess you better tie up that dog o' yourn."

The other man he sed: "Bles my sole, do you sposse Ime a goin a navigatin round outside wen theres taggers, and lions, and catamints, an rhi nosy roses, and hiphiphurrah-cusses loose? Dog be blode!—he aint wurth 2 bits, any how."

Then the sho man he sed: "Mebby not, but that tagger o' mine is a vallable animal wich was made a present to me by the King of Soodan, and no son of a sea cook's 2 bit yaller dog shal spile a five 100 dollar sho for me if I can git a kick in wen the tussle comes."

But for spilin taggers jest gimme a cracky dile or a ally gater. Uncle Ned, wich has ben in Injy and evry were, he says the diles and gaters likes like ly taggers bettern any uther kind of board; and my sisters yung man he says one time in Africa there was a natif nigger a talkn to a dile, wen a mitionary preacher cum a long and preached at the nigger. Wen he had went a way the dile it sed: "Wot use hav we heethens got for that feller with his new fangle notions? Niggers and cracky diles is pretty wel pvided for, I gess, cos we dont need no cloze, and we git plenty board and lodgn."

The natif nigger he thot a wile, and then he sed: "Yes, thats a fack—plenty sech as it is; but Ive observ that we wooly-heds is always the board, and you saw-backs is always the lodgn."

One day Mister Pitchel, thats the preacher, was to our house, and he sed: "I got a offer to go for a mitionary among the cannibals."

Uncle Ned he ast him where, and Mister Pitchel he sed it was to the Sandwich Islands. Then my father he spoke up and sed:

"You better go. I don't sposse yude amount to much as a mitionary, but I guess you wude make a pretty good sandwich."

A suckn pig nice roasted is the kind of sandwich for me and Billy, plenty apple sass, and some mash ptatose with butter in the middle and lots of grafy, hooray!

My father he says: "Johnny, wen it comes to spredn the gospel in forn parts I aint the boss contributionist. But Ime mity wel dispoze tord the mitionary business, an, genly speakin, delighted to see the ballance of trade so much in our favor. But, Johnny, my lad, if a ship load or so of them fellers cude come from Greenling's icy mountains or Injy's quarrel strand for to labor among the Demmicrats, yure ole father wude kill and eat as few of em as any cannibal in California."

Then Missy she sed: "Wy, pa!" But Bildad, thats the new dog, he whaggled his tail approvin, and Mose, wich is the cat, licked him like it was a stick of candy.

These stones with my one, two, three!
I would that I never had uttered
The thoughts that arose in me.

Oh well for the Kalloch boy

That he shouts in a milder way!

Oh well for the Steinman lad,

That they care not what he may say!

The stately Smith goes on

With her raving, wonderful shrill,

But oh for the sight of the vanished sand,

And the sound of my voice, which is still!

My teeth on these serags (no tea),

But the tender steaks of a day that is dead

Will never come back to me.

Coroner Hamilton, of Alameda, merits a leather medal made out of a whole hide. At his hash-house in Oakland he had several hundred pounds of miscellaneous "remains," gleaned from an area of as many acres circumjacent to the exploded powder-works. These poor shreds and scraps of humanity, ranging in size from a chew of tobacco to an Oakland girl's foot, were entirely unidentified. But because eight white men were known to have perished, the fragments of distinguishable Caucasian texture were put into eight caskets, taken to the cemetery in eight hearses, and buried in eight graves; a more preposterous and ridiculous proceeding the grimmest humorist could hardly imagine. Whether the Chinese debris was also divided by the number of missing Mongols we are not at this moment informed; but already an additional half a hundred-weight or so of "Meli-can man has been picked up, and we are curious to know what disposition this ingenious coroner will make of it. To save himself the trouble of "pro-rating" he will perhaps affirm the loss of another life.

The matter is really too serious for the perpetration of any such fantastic pranks to go unrebuked. The decent thing to do was perfectly obvious—bury these indistinguishable remains all together, and as quickly as possible. Nothing but bad taste, morbid sentimentality, confused thinking, and a misapprehension of official duty could have suggested any other course. But a sentimentalist is necessarily a fool, and so frequently a rascal also that we shall be agreeably surprised if the sombre circumstances of this inquest do not include some dismal instance of malfeasance in office—perhaps the misappropriation of a segment of skull, or the embezzlement of two or three sets of fingers and toes.

Mr. Nathan Blackburn, the House of Correction officer who shot Austin, a refractory prisoner, appears from his own testimony to have a tolerably cool head on his shoulders. Austin had grappled with him, but was frightened off by two shots which the forbearing Blackburn fired at a wall. Then Austin advanced to strike, and when his fist was within four inches of its destination—Blackburn's face—the imperilled officer thought it was time to act. With a presence of mind and a deliberate calculating of chances, equally admirable under the circumstances, he cocked his pistol, and, mercifully aiming at the arm which propelled the coming fist, inflicted a wound just sufficient to arrest the blow, but not serious enough to permanently disable the limb. The uncommon degree of effectiveness to which this officer has trained and developed several of his mental faculties and physical powers has been surpassed, we believe, in but one instance—that of the man lying under a tree, who, in the act of being struck by lightning, so disposed his legs that if the electric fluid ran down his left it would go off in the direction of his enemy's haystack, but if it followed his right it would assist in plowing up his own potato field.

If Mr. Tilden should not be a candidate, there is probably no leading Democrat with a stronger backing for the Presidential nomination than Judge Stephen J. Field of the United States Supreme Court. He comes from California, and the Pacific slope is almost indispensable to Democratic success.—New York Tribune editorial.

TRUE STORIES OF HUMANS.

At one of Mrs. S——'s dinner parties a "sweet girl graduate" of one of our high schools, daintily pecking at the delicacies on her plate, overheard a gentleman opposite mention the name of "Dr. Harvey."

"I beg your pardon, Mr. B——," said she, sweetly, "but do you refer to the distinguished philanthropist who invented the circumlocution of the blood?"

Mr. B—— attempted to say he did, but uttered a mouthful of soup instead.

And this occurred at a reception at Mr. C——'s: Brown—"I say, Jones, I saw that horrible vulgarian, Tom Tompson, a few minutes ago. How on earth do you suppose he got in here?"

Tom Tompson (from behind)—"Do you allude to me, sir?" Brown—"Allude? I am afraid I went to the length of actually mentioning you."

She loved a lord better than anything, and she was brought up in Chico. Soon after the departure of the last English nobleman she said to her father:

"Papa, dear, Lord—— told me that San Francisco would probably be honored soon by a visit from the Marquis of Bute. Of course you will help ma and me to secure him for one of our Wednesday evenings."

The old man (reflectively)—"Marquis of Butte—Marquis of Butte? Oh, yes, certainly: we mustn't go back on anybody from that section."

A brace of sentimental ladies, having withal a morbid curiosity, ventured the other day to solicit (and obtained) a peep into the dissecting room of one of our public hospitals, the bodies on the tables having, of course, been decently covered with sheets, those in pickle anchored to the bottom of the vat, and things tidied up generally for the occasion.

"Ah," said one, "how peacefully the holy dead submit to the indignities here offered them!"

"Yes'm," said the janitor; "the wholly dead can't help themselves; but there's mighty lively clawin' round on the part o' them which ain't quite got their everlastin' afore they're started in onto."

Another grim one which "actually occurred" is this: An affectionate young married couple were discussing the melancholy subject of death, or rather that phase of it affecting their selfish selves:

"Promise me, Henry," said the wife, "that if I die before you do I shall not be made a show. It is dreadful to think of anybody seeing my poor dead body except just you and me."

Mr. Alfred Cranch Davis is in San Francisco. Mr. Davis lives in Galveston, Texas, and was there during General Grant's visit. Just before he left he met a friend, the Rev. Mr. Hemway, a Methodist minister, who had had the honor of dining with the Grants, en famille.

"Well, is the general sound in his religious views?" asked Mr. Davis.

"Not entirely, I fear," was the thoughtful reply—"at least I judge he is not altogether satisfied with the divine scheme of rewards. He likes this life, and favors the life eternal, as far as it goes; but I think he hopes for a third term."

"My boy," said a dying stock-broker to his sorrowing son, "You can never know until you are laid upon your death-bed how trivial and paltry the interests of this world really are. With eternity opening before me, the petty struggles for wealth and temporal distinction, the baubles and gauds of this ephemeral life, the tiresome vicissitudes of fortune—all are seen as vanities and empty visions."

"I know, father, I know; and in this solemn hour they are as little to me as to you. To one who is about to part with such a father as you it matters nothing that they have uncovered a bonanza in the North End, and Sierra Nevada has jumped up six points."

"No! you don't say so!"

"My dear," said Mrs. P——, toying with the nut-cracker after dinner, "I happened in at Colonel Andrews's this afternoon, and he said he hoped I was pleased with the pearl necklace you bought for me last week. Now I had to say something, you know; so I told him I would send it back and have some trifling alterations made in it. So you'd better get it from the fortunate possessor, whoever she may be, and take it down and have something or other done to it."

"Really, Matilda, this is awfully magnanimous of you, and I hope to die if I ever deceive you again as long——"

"Oh, don't mention it; we must spare one another's feelings and reputations, you know, and it was very kind of you to say it was for me. Just do as I suggest, and I will say no more about it."

The next day Mr. P—— loads her down with presents of jewelry; but all the same, on the day after she goes to the man of gems, carelessly mentions that she has changed her mind about having the pearl necklace altered, takes it home with her, and wears it at dinner. Mr. P——, knowing there is not another like it in America, does not particularly well enjoy his meal.

Jonesmith was intently scanning the stock-list in his Bulletin, when his wife entered with her head tied up, and began to pace the floor, distracted.

"Oh, Gus," said she, "I have such a horrible ear-ache!"

"H'm," muttered the brute, absently, without looking up, "you must have it out."

"Mr. Jonesmith," said the lady, coldly, "don't you think I could save it by having it filled?"

Q., of San Rafael, has quartered on him a maiden aunt of whom neither he nor his wife is over-fond, her chief advantage as a member of the family being her invincible deafness. The other day, however, she purchased an audiphone, which enabled her to hear perfectly, and that evening appeared in the parlor with the edge of it duly inserted between her teeth.

"Tell you, Mary," said the unsuspecting Q. to the wife of his bosom, "I'm just sick o' seein' that m—— body relic sittin' round here all winter eternally ch——— and old fan!"

B.

A MIDNIGHT VIGIL.

Translated for the "Argonaut" from the French of G. Hamor.

The story which I am about to relate, strange as it may seem, is positively authentic. The event transpired several years ago in one of the large German universities. There are, doubtless, those who will find it very lugubrious, but, as says Murger: "One can not always laugh." I tell the tale as 'twas told to me.

It was at H—, a little town of Wurtemberg, December 25, 185—. The city had donned its gala robes, for, on the other side of the Rhine, Christmas is the feast of feasts, the day of family reunions, of joyous suppers, of charming reminiscences; the day when relatives assemble to talk together of the past, reading in the prismatic hues of the convivial glass a brilliant future. In short, it is the day when, as flowers brighten if turned to the sun's warm rays, even so do the countenances of the little ones, standing around the traditional tree, assume a bright glow of expectancy under the dazzling rays of the lighted Christmas tree.

Upon this particular morning the good people of H— hurried through the streets, running from house to house, exchanging here and there a hearty hand-shake, offering at the same time the compliments of the season in that old-fashioned phrase, which can yet never grow old: "A merry Christmas!" The fresh, bracing atmosphere lent fleetness to the footstep. In the pendent icicles were reflected rays of sunlight, as though the sun, too, were determined to lend animation to the scene. Children, running hither and thither through the town, made the very air ring with their joyous exclamations, and the happy refrain was taken up and sung in chorus by knots of students as they gaily sauntered forth.

One house alone appeared to take no part in the universal joy. It rather threw a shadow upon the prevailing happiness. Even the children lowered their voices and hushed their merry laughter on passing the closed door. Alas! mourning has there set its seal, at an hour when all the world resounds to the signal for the dance, for joyous revelry. The unhappy denizens of this beautiful home have just lost their only daughter, a beautiful child, scarcely sixteen years of age; fair and pure as Goethe's "Marguerite," whose name she bore. She faded away as a flower broken from its stem—without any shock, almost without suffering, and none could tell to what malady she had succumbed. A strange thing at her age, she had seen death approach without a thought of fear, and without regret. It might be said that she looked upon it rather as a liberator than as an enemy, and the "dark valley," which has such terrors for the strongest of us, was to her but the end of a mysterious sorrow. Stranger yet, none knew the cause of her grief. What cloud could have obscured the sun of her young life? Rich, young, beautiful, loved and cherished by all who knew her, had she not everything which can constitute happiness here below? That—notwithstanding all this—she had suffered, they were assured; but from what cause they knew not.

One man alone could possibly have solved the mystery: the young student, Franck Livins. He was tall, handsome, possessed of a magnificent figure, a proud step, and a lofty, somewhat haughty, mien; a man whose physical strength and powerful logic were the admiration and envy of his comrades. He was of a peculiar type—such as is occasionally met with in the universities beyond the Rhine. Philosopher and metaphysician in his soul, he boasted of absolute skepticism. For a motto, he adopted the "Nil admirari" of Horace. Faith, love, glory itself, all these he looked upon as senseless dreams, passing follies. He believed in nothing, loved nobody, and straightway followed his own course, without concerning himself about anything. However, he was a jolly good fellow, ready to laugh at all times. He never refused a convivial glass. He was brave to excess, and never declined to fight a duel. In short, he would have been described by Rabelais as "the best fellow in the world."

He had already turned many hearts, and had his conquests been counted they might have been summed up by the dozen. But little did he trouble himself as to what the world thought about him; he concerned himself only about his sword, his pipe and his philosophical problems. Passion being an anti-metaphysical sentiment, he had erased it from his life, and seemed to have in the place where his heart should have been, a volume of Kant. He could not, however, spite of his proud indifference, blind himself to the fact that, when he passed a certain street in H—, a curtain was raised, behind which, yet hardly hidden, was the fresh, smiling face of a young girl. He had often noticed, on the promenade, pretty Marguerite Seiler, who invariably responded to his bow with a rosy blush, and when he approached her had oftentimes stammered with pretty embarrassment. Likewise had he noticed, at a ball one evening of the previous winter, when he paid her the customary gallantries, when he whispered in her ear pretty flatteries, that the poor little one listened without anger, and her heart beat loudly as he guided her through the bewildering mazes of a Strauss waltz. Perhaps the handsome Franck had been flattered by the emotion, of which he could not doubt that he was the cause, but of which, in accordance with his doctrine of calm skepticism, he had never appeared conscious.

Nevertheless, upon this particular Christmas morning of which I speak, a close observer might have detected upon his countenance traces of a passing emotion, when from her father's house went forth the sad funeral procession of the young girl who had just departed this life. But if his heart were touched by this naïve love which he had awakened—if this sudden and cruel death, of which, perhaps, his coldness had been the cause, affected him for an instant—he showed to his friends no indication of such a sentiment, and like the rest he appeared disposed to feast joyously while the gay season lasted. So well did he carry out the programme that midnight found him at the table with his comrades, doing honor to that saint which in college slang is called "Saint Révéillon."

Here were assembled eight bachelors—licentiate doctors—attired in the classical dress of the German student—the flowing turtletail belted at the waist, trousers of white leather, large cavalry boots, the rapier hung at the side, and the elaborately embroidered head-piece so worn as to incline toward one ear. Around the smoke-grimed hall were hung portraits of ancient comrades; here and there were scattered panoplies, goblets, and other trophies of grand occasions; while upon the table an enormous quantity of monumental cups, for the most part empty, bore witness that the orgie left nothing to be desired. The large porcelain pipes performed their functions without relaxation; to a noisy and joyful key were the voices raised—now in laughter, now in harmonious refrain, and gay words and witty speeches were not wanting.

Franck had plunged into a grave philosophical discussion with a long individual of lugubrious countenance, of thin hair, and gold spectacles, who discoursed blindly upon the ego and non ego, upon the objective and the subjective, and upon the identity primarily synthetical of the perception à priori (from cause to effect) of "myself." Lost in the most ethereal regions of metaphysical speculation, the interlocutors heard nothing of all that was going on around them, until a direct interpolation interrupted their discussion and abruptly conveyed them back to earth.

"Ho! down with them! Make away with these philosophers!" cried a tall student, whose rubicund face and sparkling eyes gave undeniable evidence of the most complete ebriety. "Will you never cease overwhelming us with your phrases a mile long, and deafening us with your Hebrew jargon? Leave Kant and De Schopenhauer alone for the present, and tell me, Franck, if I am not right."

"It is hardly probable," replied Franck; "but, first, what do you uphold?"

"I maintain that fear is a physical sensation; and that man, however brave he may be, must experience the feeling at least once during his life."

"You are wrong," gravely replied Franck. "Fear is a sentiment, like any other, and as such can be controlled by the will."

"That is all very well theoretically," said another interlocutor; "but, in my opinion, if put to the test, you yourself would be the first to gainsay it. I wager that you will not go alone at this hour to pass five minutes in the cemetery on the hill-side above us, near the old château."

"I accept the wager," said Franck; "what will you bet?" "My large pipe of Ulm against your Hungarian glass. But how are we to know whether you fulfill your engagement?"

"That is very simple. The cemetery is a quarter of an hour's walk from here; it will take ten minutes to return from there. I will be back here in half an hour, and we will go together to seek some object which I will leave in the cemetery—my rapier, for instance, which I will plant in a grave. Is it agreed?"

"Yes! yes! it is agreed!" they cried in one voice.

"Very well. Look at the clock—it is now a quarter past one. At a quarter of two I will be with you."

Franck went out. The night was clear; the moon shone with a brilliant lustre, and the footsteps of the student loudly resounded upon the frozen pavement. He walked rapidly. Soon he stood before the cemetery wall. He easily leaped it, and stopped before a newly-made grave. A simple cross was placed upon it. Franck stooped, and deciphered these words:

MARGUERITE SEILER.

Aged sixteen years. Dec. 25th, 185—.

The student stepped quickly back. He was at the grave of the young girl who had loved him, and whose love he had despised. He asked himself then, for the first time, if he might not have been mistaken; if he had the right to steel his heart to all pure and true emotions; and if, above all, this stoicism which he affected, and which possibly had caused the death of an innocent victim, was not, if called by its proper name, monstrous egotism. These reflections crossed his mind and troubled him; but soon he banished this weakness as unworthy of him.

"Bah!" said he. And drawing his sword, he buried it in the newly-broken earth. He then turned to retrace his steps, but he felt himself detained from behind. He quickly turned around. In a foolish hallucination, he thought he saw standing before him the spectre of the young girl; he extended his arms, gave one scream, and fell as though struck by a thunderbolt.

Below, meanwhile, at the brewery, the orgie continued, but less madly, not so noisily. Franck's abrupt departure, the strange object of his expedition, had cooled the enthusiasm and put gayety to flight. The nearer did the moment approach for their comrade's return, the more silent became the guests. The hour passed. Franck did not appear. Gradually, surprise gave way to fear; they knew not how to reconcile his long absence.

At the suggestion of one of the party it was resolved that they should investigate the matter, should see what had befallen him.

They sallied forth, and hurried together to the appointed place. Judge of their horror when, upon the tomb of the young girl, they found the corpse of their comrade! The first stupor over, they tried to raise him; but something fastened the body to the earth.

It was Franck's sword, which, unconsciously, he had thrust through the folds of his long mantle, and, as it were, nailed himself to the soil. SALLIE R. HEATH.

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1880.

As red as a rose was my love last night—
Yes, red as a rose was she;
But to-day my love's as pale and white
As the blooms of the apple tree.

Poor thing, she is pining for me I think,
But the wicked neighbors say
Her mother stole in, while my love was asleep,
And stole her pink saucer away.

If more attention was paid to the study of elocution in schools and colleges, there would not be so many complaints of the way the service is read in some of our fashionable Episcopal churches. Bad management of the tones of the voice, and emphasizing the wrong words, is about as disturbing to an educated ear as false intonations in singing, to say nothing of the ridiculous effects such faults produce. Solemnity is quite out of the question when the fine church service is gabbled over in a monotonous undertone, almost unintelligible to those most familiar with it. This lack of intelligent reading in high places is about equal to the ungrammatical talk heard from the public-school children, who are never instructed to avoid two negatives out of school, whatever they may be told to do in.

INTAGLIOS.

Sharp Trailing Briars.

Sharp trailing briars, where'er I pass,
Across my temples bind and beat;
Quick stinging weeds inweave the grass
And bite my blindly feeling feet.

Still toil I, with a heart that scorns
Such cheer as riven darkness shows;
Content, if-but these vicious thorns
Would yield me here or there one rose.

A Bird of Passage.

As the day's last light is dying,
As the night's first breeze is sighing,
I send you, love,
Like a messenger dove,
My thoughts through the distance flying!

'Tis a bird that in plume and sinew
Is strong as the truth within you.
'Tis a bird as white
As the faith you plight
With the lover so proud to win you!

I bid it speed till it meet you,
Then, fluttering downward, greet you
With a coo, perchance,
Or with glowing glance
That softly seems to entreat you!

Let it perch on your sill; or better,
Let it feel your white hands' fetter—
For under its wing
It shall surely bring
Love hidden away like a letter!—Edgar Fawcett.

Too Late.

As, through the wind-waved mist of morning,
Down a far sweep of sylvan glade,
Come glimpses of some glistening statue,
Perplexed with shifting sheen and shade,

So, through a veil of spectral vapors—
Now shrouded in sun, now steeped in gloom—
I see a sweet, mysterious phantom
Of one beloved beyond the tomb.

To love, and then to lose, is better
Than never to have loved. Ah, well!
But of a love by loss engendered,
A phoenix passion, who may tell?

Think that I never loved her, living—
Think of the awful throes of birth,
The sudden travail of my passion,
Begun the night she quitted earth.

And ever since, beyond forgetting
Of wasting care or wild caprice,
It grows upon me in the pauses,
And feeds upon its own increase.

And ever, in the spectral shadows,
Now sun-enshrined, now draped in gloom,
I see the sad, mysterious phantom
Of her—beloved beyond the tomb.—D. C. Gardette.

An Incident.*

Unarmed and unattended walks the Czar
Through Moscow's busy street one winter's day,
The crowd uncovers as his face they see—
"God greet the Czar!" they say.

Along his path there moved a funeral,
Gray spectacle of poverty and woe,
A wretched sledge, dragged by one weary man,
Slowly across the snow.

And on the sledge, blown by the winter wind,
Lay a poor coffin, very rude and bare.
And he who drew it bent before his load,
With dull and sullen air.

The emperor stopped and beckoned to the man;
"Who is't thou bearest to the grave?" he said.
"Only a soldier, Sire!" the short reply.
"Only a soldier dead."

"Only a soldier!" musing, said the Czar;
"Only a Russian, who was poor and brave.
Move on. I follow. Such an one goes not Unhonored to his grave."

He bent his head, and silent raised his cap;
The Czar of all the Russias, pacing slow,
Following the coffin, as again it went,
Slowly across the snow.

The passers of the street, all wondering,
Looked on that sight, then followed silently;
Peasant and prince, and artisan and clerk,
All in one company.

Still, as they went, the crowd grew ever more,
Till thousands stood around the friendless grave,
Led by that princely heart, who, royal, true,
Honored the poor and brave.—Agnes MacDonell.

The Dance in the Kitchen.

Oh, that winter afternoon,
Such a merry, merry tune
As the jolly, fat tea-kettle chose its singing to begin!
'Twas the lilting Scottish air,
And it seemed, I do declare,
As though bagpipe played by fairy was forever joining in.

Then the bagpipe ceased to play,
And another tune straightway
Sang the kettle, louder, louder, till its voice grew very big;
And the feet of laughing girls
(Girls with shamrocks in their curls)
You could almost hear a-keeping time to that old Irish jig.

Darling, smiling, cunning Bess
Grasped with tiny hands her dress,
And a pretty curtsy making, while the kettle made a bow:
"I'll your partner be," said she,
"Forward, backward, one, two, three!"
And Pussy cried, "Bravo, my dears!" in one immense meow.

And they danced right merrily
Till 'twas nearly time for tea,
The kettle tilting this way and then that way—oh, what fun!
And its hat bobbed up and down
On its moist and steamy crown,
With a clatter falling off at last, and then the dance was done.

* NOTE.—This incident is narrated by a lady who was living in Moscow when it took place.

A LEAP-YEAR PROPOSAL.

"Never mind," said Sarah Bernhardt (not the world-famous Sarah), "we will have a chance before long, and I mean to use it; I shall propose to some man before the year is out."

"O Sarah, you dare not! what will people say?" exclaimed the other girls, looking at her with wide, horrified eyes.

"Much what they are always saying," was the quiet answer. "People will interest themselves in things that do not concern them, so they might just as well have something to make their hair stand up and set their tongues going—something really shocking. But you need not say a word, girls, for it is written in the laws of the Medes and Persians that I am to offer heart and hand to some man during leap-year, and I can not avoid the inexorable."

"And I'll wager, Miss Bernhardt," said Jack Jernym, "that you do nothing of the sort. Women are cowards before custom, and you are a woman, you know."

Jack was a long-legged fellow of thirty-five, who was never in a hurry, and who could say the most exasperating things with an air that would drive you almost wild; yet it was unsafe to measure swords with him in a tilt of words. He was usually quiet, and some persons not knowing his power had roused his wrath, and ever afterward they heard his name with a sense of angry humility.

Miss Bernhardt was plain and dark, and he had never given her a thought beyond ordinary notice; but now she turned her level brows and intense eyes on him with a look that made him thrill.

"I take your wager," she said, "and against a box of gloves I put a dressing-gown, that I will propose to you, and that you will refuse me."

"Sarah! how can you?" came in shocked tones from all parts of the room.

"Let Miss Sarah alone," said Jack, into whose eyes a queer expression had come. "I admire pluck, and if she will do as she says, I will double the gloves that I do not refuse. You may try disguises, young lady, but I have a pet theory that if we know another the personality will make itself felt through any disguise. Some of my friends, among whom are a few actors, have tried to deceive me as to their identity; but, though some were marvelously changed, I was not long in finding out each one. Disguise as you will, Miss Bernhardt, I shall know you."

"Of course I shall not tell what I mean to do, nor how I shall accomplish my design, but I shall surely accomplish it," quietly answered Miss Bernhardt.

"By the great horn spoon! I believe you will," exclaimed Tad Brompton, a straggling boy of eighteen. "I think your cake is dough on both sides, Mr. Jernym, and that you will be scared to death if she does propose to you. You might as well be looking out for those gloves."

"No, Tad," was the reply, "I am more than willing to buy the gloves, but I do not think they will be needed."

Miss Bernhardt smiled in a way that was very aggravating to Mr. Jack, but he kept quiet, and through the rest of the evening watched her closely, a fact that did not escape her, though she remained cool under the inspection.

"Tell you what, Miss Bernhardt," confidentially remarked Tad, as they stood together, apart from the others, "that fellow is going to win that dressing-gown if he can. He's ever so sly about it, but he has been watching you all evening as if he wanted to see how you were put up. You'll have to get up early if you catch him napping."

"So much more glory if I win those gloves."

"I'd give something to know how you mean to do it," said Tad.

"I will tell you when I wear the first pair of gloves."

"All right, and I'll take you to Baldwin's, and then we'll have a jolly supper afterward."

"What are you plotting?" said Jack, with suave rudeness, as he sauntered up to them.

"Discussing human nature," replied Miss Bernhardt, inhaling the perfume of a rose.

"In the abstract, or with the assistance of a particular subject?" he questioned, his half-closed eyes carelessly on her face.

"Abstractions have little charm for me; only the substance makes them interesting."

"That hardly answers my question, but I am glad to learn that you take so much interest in the actual. Please look upon me as a fact, an actuality, and tell me what you think of me. How do I appear to you—as good, bad, or indifferent? No lady has ever had the temerity to tell me the truth on this subject, but I believe you not only have an explicit opinion, but that you have the courage to express it."

Tad had been called away, and they were alone. Miss Bernhardt slowly plucked the leaves from her rose, and dropped them, idly. Jack looked at her dark face, and wondered if it were really plain. Finally she looked up.

"I think," she said, "that you have a strong, healthy body, and a sound mind that has been brought carefully through the schools and absorbed some knowledge. You have seen more of the world than I have, and learned many things there not taught in the schools. You have a business that is called good, money enough to make you comfortable, a fair share of good looks, and are on friendly terms with yourself. You seldom go to church, because you are apt to hear things that make you uncomfortable, and you do not like to feel uncomfortable. You do not take any part in charities, only to pay your money at some fair. You do not like to visit prisons, for you are sympathetic, and there your feelings are lacerated. You do not work for the temperance cause, for you enjoy a good glass of wine. You laugh at peace congresses, and at men and women who have missions, and believe in them. You think there is no work, or device, or knowledge, unless self-interest lies back of all. You have little reverence for creed or profession, and look with cynical eyes on every action of man or woman, and speculate as to what motive prompts to this or that apparently unselfish deed. You work because you must, to earn the money you love to spend, and because others work, and it is respectable. You believe men are selfish, weak, grasping; that women are vain, silly, and careless; and that after a life not very different from those of your fellows, you will die and go, you know not where. Of course at times you rouse, and feel dull pains in heart and mind that will not let you rest; but you give them some ready opiate, and soon they sleep again—pardon me, you asked what I thought, and I have told you."

"No pardon is necessary," he replied, in a low tone. "I thank you for your plain speech, and will look about in the dust inside to see if it is true."

"Don't let the dust blind your eyes," she answered, significantly.

"I will endeavor to avoid such a result; but you know that dust has just that peculiarity. Could you not help me?"

"No, I would only be in the way. I shall, however, take a deep interest in your investigations. Good-night, for I see my friends are going."

* * * * *

On Christmas Eve they met at the house where their queer wager had been made, and Tad was full of something he had to tell.

"You see," he said, "I have chum who is the jolliest fellow in the world, but he has his troubles. The biggest one is his old-maid aunt, who thinks all the men love her, and are waiting around corners to tell her so, and inveigle her into matrimony. She nags Bob awfully, and tells him of her narrow escapes at the hands of some man, so that he just wants to die, and wishes some man would carry her off and then eat her up. But the old rosebud holds the purse, and Bob is helpless, for he has nothing of his own, and will not have until he is twenty-one. Lately, the unappreciated but sanguine virgin has had some trouble about her property, and wanted me to tell her of a gentle, honest lawyer; and I told her of you, Mr. Jernym, as being the gentlest man I know, and she is coming to see you next week. But you mustn't entertain designs upon her heart, for you never could keep her if you got her; some other fellow would be sure to wile her away."

There was a laugh at Tad's story that annoyed Jack, for he saw Miss Bernhardt enjoyed the prospect of his future sufferings.

"She will prepare the way for me, and so spoil Mr. Jernym's temper that he would say no to a houri if she came in petticoats," said Miss Bernhardt.

Tad laughed: "I never thought of that. You'll have to make me a dressing-gown for sending her to him and helping you out."

"You shall have a dressing-gown, and some slippers, too, and shall be my chancellor. Don't let the lady darken your entire horizon, Mr. Jernym. Look at her with a sharp, cool eye, and she may think you do not like romance; or, better still, intimate that you are married, and have seven children."

"Oh, that won't do a bit of good," put in Tad; "Bob says she suffers more from the married men than from the single ones, and that a score of wives are dying of jealousy because of her."

"Well, the only way I can see, then, is for Mr. Jernym to tell her that madness is hereditary in his family, and that he is liable to go mad at any moment, and that a peculiarity of the family affliction is that they, in their paroxysms, invariably bite the one thing they love best on earth."

Even Jack had to smile at this.

"Thank you, Miss Bernhardt," he said; "if I am troubled I will surely do as you say."

The next week, as Jack sat in his office, there was a tap at the door, and to his "Come in," there entered a lady of uncertain years, who smiled at him till he looked down.

"Are you Mr. Jernym?" she asked, in a clear, low voice, with a complacent ring to it.

"I am. Can I serve you, madam?"

"I am Miss Toddle, Bob Scrope's aunt, and I want you to do some law business for me."

Astonished Jack had looked for a spinster in spectacles and a plaid shawl. This woman, though past middle age, was well preserved and possessed of a good figure of medium height, a bright, dark eye, ordinary features, and apparently the usual manner of woman. Her dress was black, fashionably made, and worn with a girlish air. The only things that made Jack uneasy were the glances she gave him and her constant smile.

"Certainly," he said. "Will you please state just what the business is, and what you desire done?"

"O Mr. Jernym, I hope you will be able to save me from the clutches of a bold, bad man."

"It's coming," thought Jack; and aloud he said: "I hope you will have no trouble, Miss Toddle, that I can not relieve"—thinking that if she wanted to make love to him he would help her along and see just what she would do.

"This man has had charge of some of my property, and he says that he will not yield it up to me to be placed in the hands of another."

"The property is exclusively your own, and he is but your man of business?"

"Yes."

"Well, I think you have a right to take another man if you want to," said the wicked Jack.

"Oh, Mr. Jernym, how good you are! And you will take charge of the matter, and get my property away from that awful man, and manage it yourself?"

"I never was called good before," said Jack, meekly; "but I will make that wretch give up his prey, and afterward do my humble best to take good care of it—the prey, I mean."

"If you only will, I will do anything for you, Mr. Jernym. Ask anything of me, and it shall be yours."

"Thank you, Miss Toddle; I am only too happy to serve you in any way. After my work is done, I may ask a great favor at your hands."

In a few days Miss Toddle again visited him to see how the business came on, and she was a trifle more gushing than at first. The calls became frequent, and Jack knew from her manner that she was making a "dead set for him," and that she surely would give him the chance to possess herself and fortune. It was not long, of course, before he was heartily sick of the whole thing, but made no sign, for Tad never failed, when they were in company together, to ask him how his wooing sped, and Miss Bernhardt would smile, and kindly inquire if he were prospering in business.

Two weeks after New Year's Day Miss Toddle had visited him and set him almost crazy, while he tried to keep her from making a fool of herself. By desperate efforts he succeeded, but he felt that it was only for the time—that on her next visit she would doubtless renew her attentions, and, very likely, make him a point-blank proposal. His very back hair stood up at the thought; and it was with a deep feeling of thankfulness and relief that he heard she was sick—laid up with the neuralgia and toothache. He uncharitably hoped the combined pains would kill her, and set him free from her dreadful presence—for dreadful it had grown. On the evening that he heard of Miss Toddle's afflictions, he was once more spending an hour or two where we first met him, and Tad and Miss Bernhardt were both there.

"I'd like to know, Sarah," said one of the girls, "when you mean to propose to Mr. Jernym?"

"Yes, Miss Sarah; can't you give me some idea of when to look for you?" inquired Jack.

"Of course not; but you may be ready at any time to receive me."

"Do you really mean to do it, Sarah?" asked the girls.

"Did I not say I would? I shall do it if I have to crawl to his office."

"I'll carry you, Miss Bernhardt," said Tad; "you wouldn't be much of a load."

"If you will allow me, I will send a carriage for you whenever you make up your mind to come," said Jack.

"Thank you; you are oppressively kind. I will let you know if I need the carriage."

"Where were you yesterday, all day, Miss Bernhardt?" asked Tad. "I was here three times to get you to help me with my lessons, but I couldn't find even your knitting to commence with."

For the first time since Jack had known her, he saw Miss Bernhardt blush and look annoyed. He was surprised, for Tad's question, though boyishly rude, was simple; and he could see no cause why she should change color at it.

"I was calling on a lady," she answered, recovering her usual manner, "and spent most of the day out."

"I'd like to know what she blushed about," thought Jack. "I wonder if she has a lover anywhere."

He was more uncomfortable than he liked at the surmise, and he determined to find out, if possible, if such a reality existed.

The next day he was sitting in his office, wondering about this possible lover, and feeling unnecessarily fierce toward the poor, cloudy fellow, when a low tap at the door brought him back to actual things. The door opened, and Miss Toddle, her face tied up and with smoked glasses on her eyes, came in. She spoke in a sort of smothered voice, and looked ten years older.

"I could not stay away, my dear friend," she half whispered; "I did so want a manly heart on which to lean, and a tender friend to sympathize with me in my pain and trouble."

"Dashed old fool," thought Jack; but he placed a chair, and tried to look tender and properly sympathetic, and then he said: "I am truly sorry for your troubles, Miss Toddle, and wish I could relieve them."

"Don't call me Miss Toddle, call me Jemima," she exclaimed in watery tones, as she hitched her chair nearer to Jack, and put her hand on his shoulder. "I am a woman with a tender, loving heart, and I want some soul to whom I can turn for help. Do you never, my dear friend, feel that you want to be loved, and have some gentle nature all your own, to care for you, and soothe your lonely hours; on whose bosom you can lean and whisper words of love?"

"Can't say that I do, my dear madam," said unresponsive Jack.

"My dear madam! Oh, you will break my heart! Can you not see that I am all your own?—that I love you—do you understand?—love you, and only wait to be taken by you?"

"Well, but my dear Miss Toddle," said Jack, wishing he were in heaven, or that his visitor were, "I do not love you. I do not think our natures assimilate. In fact, I am an awful man: I never could love only one; I love 'em by the wholesale; I love 'em all, and can't help it. I would drive you crazy running after some new face all the time. I tell you, you don't know how wicked I am."

"Yes, I do," said poor Miss Toddle—reaching for his neck, while he almost broke that member trying to escape her arms—"yes, I do; I know you are a man who can never be deceived in the identity of his friends, and whose pet theory never fails—that through all disguises the personality will show," and a choking laugh came from the apparently heart-broken Miss Toddle.

"The devil!" exploded Jack. "Who, in the name of Jupiter, are you?"

"Miss Bernhardt," said the lady, taking off her glasses, and the wrappings from her head and face. "I will take number sixes, and in light colors, if you please. I like four buttons, too, I think."

Jack sat down and looked at her, wholly unable to say a word.

"Well, haven't I earned my gloves?" she asked, as he sat and looked at her.

"Yes," he slowly answered, "I think you have. You are the sharpest woman I ever saw, and I am the worst beaten man I know."

"Don't get low-spirited," she replied. "I am the one who ought to be dejected—after such a cool refusal of my heart and hand."

There was an awkward pause, and then he said, earnestly: "I deserve to be punished, after being such a fool. Miss Bernhardt, I know you do not admire me, but I must speak for myself. Do you think, after all, I could ever make myself worthy of your love, and have some time a hope of winning you for my wife?"

Jack spoke impelled by he knew not what, and yet he was in deep earnest.

"You surprise me, Mr. Jernym," said his visitor, blushing deeply, and looking ready to run away. "I never supposed you cared for me in that way. I made the wager in a moment of thoughtlessness, and I am so obstinate that I would have done as I have if I had been sure you had the yellow-fever. You don't know me, or you would not ask me to be your wife. I am plain, and quiet, and not at all suited to you."

"Will you let me be the judge of that?" he answered quickly; "I think I know you, and the only question is, do I suit you?"

"Well"—was Miss Bernhardt's somewhat halting answer; but one may suppose Jack found it satisfactory, for the girls tell me that Sarah is working an elaborate smoking-jacket in Mr. Jernym's favorite colors, and I know that Sarah has been wearing four-button gloves very recklessly of late.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1880.

A report has gained currency throughout the State that the Argonaut was to be changed to a daily newspaper. This report has no foundation in fact. No change is contemplated, and none will be made in this respect. The Argonaut is prosperous, and will be continued as a weekly journal. It will be edited and conducted on the same general plan and platform. We do not expect to please everybody. We do not try to do so, and we do not disguise our contempt nor withhold our criticism from those who do. We do not expect to be always right, nor always upon the popular side; but we do expect to be always frank, and honest, and independent, and American without prejudice. Will those interior journals who have aided to give currency to the "daily" rumor be generous enough to advise their readers that the Argonaut will sail its originally charted course?

The Legislature has adjourned, and we feel the relief that is natural when a danger is passed. It is a painful fact that this is an oft-recurring danger. We look forward with dread to the meeting of our Legislature; we hold our breath in suspense while it continues; and when its deliberations are ended we look cautiously out to see whether we may venture forth to resume our business avocations, or whether, under its enactments, we may venture upon new enterprises. A brief review of the past four months will illustrate our meaning. Out of the chaos and confusion of a revolution that had given us a new organic law—out of an election that had stirred the worst passions of our people—we had chosen a new body of law-makers. That from this mad and hateful conflict we had evolved no worse men than composed our Legislature we may and ought to be thankful; that the ignorant, propertyless, and unprincipled did not outnumber the intelligent, respectable, and well-meaning was the result of accident rather than deliberative judgment. When the roll of members was called, we found the Republican party in a small majority, the Democracy in minority. A strong body of ignorant, inexperienced, unprincipled adventurers, flung to the surface by an agrarian agitation, was introduced to our law-making council. For four months intelligence wrangled with ignorance, demanding the physical courage of a Tyler to brave the ignorant and insolent impudence of a Brauhart. Kane, the Irish coal-heaver of Tar Flat, illustrates the depths we have plunged and the dangers we have escaped. For four months every legitimate industry folded its arms, enterprise was paralyzed, money hid itself, and labor stood idle. For four months the railroad companies fought for their lives, against the confiscation of their property. The Spring Valley Water Company was compelled to fight for its defense against the shameful assumption that sixteen millions of expenditure for the catchment and distribution of water was not property. The stock exchange of San Francisco, representing the leading industry of the coast, was summoned to the Legislature to defend itself for dealing in stocks, and was called upon to defeat legislative schemes which, if successful, would have arrested the development of our mines. Commercial and savings banks made a vain effort to protect the accumulations of their depositors from unjust and double taxation. The owners of landed estates, acquired in accordance with the laws of the land, were threatened with a discriminating and aggressive taxation that would have rendered their estates valueless. The great agricultural valleys and the cities did not escape paying tribute to the gravel-sluicing industry, that claimed the privilege of sending mining debris over farms and orchards, unless farmers and orchardists would pay to restrain it—to destroy harbors and navigable streams, unless commerce and commercial cities would pay to prevent their destruction. To this class of effort, add the lesser enormities of school-marm and normal school extravagances, and the almost entire neglect of those great industries that demand legislation, such as are involved in the questions of irrigation, reclamation, viticulture, manufacturing, etc., and we may have some idea of the feelings and apprehensions of a business and tax-paying people during the session of a Legislature. Thank God that it is over for the present, and that for eight months we may have time to recover and fortify ourselves for the next session. It would be God's blessing if there could be no legislation and no State election for the next ten years. Better: bad laws and fixed, than this constant, never-ending turmoil. But better than all this, that our people would for once awake to the necessity of performing those public duties that our republican form of government necessarily devolves upon them.

The conclusion of the Sand-lot insurrection by the trial, conviction, sentence, and imprisonment of Denis Kearney—whose name properly spelled is Carney—will by many be considered as a more rational ending of a disgraceful episode in our history than as though he and his associate culprits had been taken by a vigilance committee and hanged. Some will think differently, and believe that the more heroic remedy would have been a more permanent one. Belonging to the more moderate and conservative class, we rejoice that the remedy has been found within the law. The lamp-post is the last resort of an indignant and outraged people, and should not be used until more peaceful and legal attempts have failed. Our own history justifies us in speaking kindly of the rude justice of vigilance committees, administered under lynch law. The lessons taught to the "Hounds" and repeated in 1852 and again in 1856, ought to last a generation at least. An alien immigration brings us new men, to whom it may be necessary to repeat the lesson. If so, the old schoolmasters are abroad. Yes, we are glad that the law had within itself the power to teach these agitators that they could no longer imperil our city by their illegal conduct, and we are glad that judges have been found who have had the courage to enforce its mandates. On the whole, perhaps, it is better than to have commended to these disturbers the medicine of their own prescription, viz., strangulation by hemp.

And yet Kearney is but the symptom, and not the disease. He is the pustule that, coming to the surface, indicates the blood that stagnates beneath. He is the effect, and not the cause. It is not Kearney that makes the cauldron to seethe and bubble; he is not the fire that rages beneath the pot; he is but the scum that gathers, froths, and dances on the boiling surface. Kearney is not at the source of our troubled waters; he is far away down stream, a rotting chip upon the muddy, turbulent, political wave. Kearney is a sign of our political troubles. Born in Ireland, of an ignorant, bigoted, oppressed, and pauper race, himself ignorant and bigoted, he is the type of a bad and dangerous class. He inherited from his progenitors, who in turn, and for generations, had inherited from theirs, a hatred of the band that governed them. From a long descent was evolved an active-brained, strong-muscled, undisciplined barbarian, who knew nothing of self-restraint, nothing of respect for law, nothing of the duties and responsibilities and dignities of republican government; who grew up in jealousy of those above him, in hatred of the rich, in contempt of authority, and in impatience of labor. The accidents of grievous poverty and want of employment drove him to leave his native land and seek an asylum in ours. Cheap navigation made his emigration possible. Immigration societies aided him, our laws invited him, and he came to America. He came, and bringing this inherited contempt of government, law, social order, rights of persons, this undisciplined barbarian our system took up, and after five years of pupillage made him a citizen, clothed him with political power, crowned him elector, sovereign, and ruler—made him equal with the native-born. More than this, it gave to him an unrestricted enjoyment of all the privileges and opportunities of American citizenship, and in this declared the false and dangerous doctrine that in a republican government, ignorance, superstition, bigotry, idleness, crime, jealousy of social position, and resistance to authority, should have the same power at the electoral urn as the intelligent, native-born, patriotic American citizen who possessed all the virtues. Kearney is one of many millions whom the redundant populations of European States have sent to us. We have taken them in faster than we can digest and assimilate them. We have been too hasty in giving them the electoral privilege, and they have abused it. This foreign immigration has dehaunched our political system. It has become a body so strong in influence, and so powerful in numbers, that it imperils the safety of our government. It is the cause that invites politicians to acts of shameless demagoguery.

Had it not been for this strong Irish vote, and had not the Irish as a nationality consolidated their political influence to control a great national party, and had not the leaders of that national—Democratic—party yielded to the dictation of Irish insolence, and given way to the demands of Irish politicians, we should have had no Irish rioters resisting the draft in New York, no Irish laborers burning railroad property in Pittsburgh, and no Irish Sand-lot imperiling government in San Francisco. We should have no high-toned

Southern gentlemen plotting with ignorant bog-trotters to be made Senators of the United States; no Chief Justice and Associate Justices, Superior Judges and inferior magistrates, to whom the Sand-lot could say, "I created you;" no legislative body standing in awe of law-breakers, while it made the laws; no press bidding for its support, and making its circulation dependent upon a most cowardly and contemptible subserviency to a dirty and unwashed mob of Irish law-breakers. This condition of things we have—and it is not ended because we have sent one flannel-mouthed swash-buckler, with cropped hair and striped clothes, to break stones. It is not ended if all his associates, male and female; clerical and lay, are sent to keep him company. The cause still exists, the fountain is unclean, the fires burn, the foul stream runs on, and new scum will rise to the surface. New riots will occur, new insurrections take place, and other Sand-lots breed other vermin, and other cities be cursed by other demagogues; and, unless the evil is arrested, the experiment of republican government will have proved a failure upon this continent, as it has failed oftentimes in other lands before.

The remedy for this evil is to discourage indiscriminate immigration; to prevent by penal laws the immigration to our shores of the discontented, unruly, criminal, or pauper class of other lands, and to repeal, by one broad, sweeping enactment, our naturalization laws. Let no man of foreign birth come to regard the privilege of American citizenship other than as a boon, to be obtained by some distinctive act of service, or to be merited by qualifications that stamp him as a citizen most desirable to acquire. Give to the men of foreign birth the right of domicile, of inheritance, of acquisition of property; give to them the right to transmit their accumulations by bequest or devise; let them be protected under our laws. Let their rights of person and property be held inviolate; let them be free in their conscience, their worship, and their faith; let their children be taught a rudimentary education in English at our free schools; and let them be content to live under laws made by and executed by the native-born American citizen. This gives to their children the inheritance of free government, and it gives us no citizens clothed with political power who do not acknowledge the allegiance that comes with birth and education, and who have not some preparation for, and knowledge of, the duties and responsibilities that go with the electoral privilege. To the Congress of the United States, as to the Parliament of England, the Assembly of France, the Reichstag of Germany, the legislative body of Belgium, the imperial authority of Austria, and the higher law-making bodies of every nation in Europe, should be relegated this authority of naturalization. The American-born may not become a British subject except by an act of Parliament, and that act may not be expected except in favor toward some distinguished person who would honor the land whose citizen or subject he would be. We fling this jewel of American citizenship to every adventurous swine that is driven into the ocean by the devil of poverty or crime, and has the luck to reach our shore without drowning. And now, again, as ever, when we write upon this topic, there come to our mind the exceptional, worthy, excellent foreigners whom we welcome as an addition to our population. We say to them—and in reply they say to us—this is right, and we would be willing to recognize, and do recognize, the necessity of this rule so defined. It is right that America should be governed by Americans, and an "American party" would embrace the intelligent, respectable, non-partisan, orderly, law-abiding foreigners from all European nations, now naturalized and domiciled among us. This embraces the better Irish, the German, the Catholic, the Jew. It embraces all but the vicious, the idle, the discontented, the ignorant, and the native-born cowardly demagogue.

If there was but one man in America who, stretching his huge legs across the continent, could compel us pigmies to walk between them, we still might be allowed to speculate upon his chance of becoming President. But this Caesar of ours, who has become so great, has not yet crossed the Rubicon, and we still are free—free at least to repeat our prophecy, made when first he returned from Gaul, laden with the trophies and honors of his trip around the world, and entered upon his triumphal march, with all his slaves of office and flunkies of politicians chained captive to his chariot wheels. Plain people—who do not worship heroes—are getting weary of all this pagan business. The echo of the "whoop up" and the "hoom" is dying out. The people are tired of hearing about Grant, and he will not be nominated at Chicago; and if he is, it will be in utter and shameful defiance of the wishes of the better class of Republicans. If he is nominated, it will produce such a bolt and stampede as will make Cameron, Conkling, and the machine politicians at Washington think one of those Western tornadoes, mixed with a California earthquake, and wet down by a cloud-hurst, had struck the Republican party. Since the Pennsylvania and New York conventions, not a single Grant delegate has been chosen in any Northern State. Connecticut, Rhode Island, Vermont, Maine, Massachusetts, Kansas, Iowa, and Oregon have had conventions, and in every one of them Grant has been overwhelmingly defeated. In Connecticut the delegation is divided between Edmunds, Blaine, and Washburne—Grant's name not mentioned. In Massachusetts a strong effort was made to secure two or three Grant delegates. A ticket composed of four ex-governors was placed before the convention in his interest, and defeated nearly six to one in a convention of twelve hundred delegates. In Iowa, where the largest Republican majorities in the West are found, Grant did not carry a single congressional district at the primaries; it sends twenty-two delegates to Chicago for Blaine. In Kansas Grant's friends made a desperate fight, resulting in an entire delegation for Blaine. Indiana elects by congressional districts, and, so far, not a Grant delegate has been chosen from that State. In Michigan the sentiment is overwhelmingly for Blaine; so it is in Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Nebraska. In Ohio—Grant's native State—the contest lies between Sherman and Blaine. The Cincinnati Gazette says there is not a single representative Republican in Ohio for Grant. The Cincinnati Commercial says: "Signals of distress of the Grant party are flying all around the political sky." In the three Pacific States Grant will get no vote; Blaine will secure all. At the Virginia City primary a Grant ticket was run, and beaten three to one. In Washoe County the Grant ticket was smashed; also in Humboldt County. Oregon has already spoken, and in favor of Blaine. California Republicans will meet at Sacramento next week, and, out of four hundred delegates, there will be no man for Grant that has not got into the convention by the underhand intrigue of a little clique of political coyotes, who have been, as ever, plotting to cheat and defraud the rank and file of the party. In Illinois the third-termers are making their last desperate efforts, but the latest advices indicate that the Grant party will be routed, horse, foot, and dragoons, and that the delegation will be substantially divided between Blaine and Washburne. The only counties in Illinois carried for Grant so far are Democratic. Sangamon County, which contains the capital, held its convention last week, and refused to instruct for Grant. This is significant, as Springfield is the headquarters of Senator Logan's machine, and, up to the time of the convention, the county had been conceded to Grant. It is quite probable that Grant will lose Illinois, which his friends admit is the pivotal point upon which his nomination depends. If the conventions had not been held in Pennsylvania and New York at so early a day (a trick of the machine), Grant would have carried neither State.

Having shown, then, an almost solid North against Grant's nomination, it of course remains that if he is nominated the Southern States will do it. To suppose that the great Republican party of the nation will allow a distasteful and unpopular candidate to be thrust upon it by the negroes and carpet-baggers of fifteen States who have no electoral votes to give, is preposterous and absurd. The vast majority of the Northern Republicans, the moral power of such States as Massachusetts, Iowa, Michigan, and Wisconsin, will certainly influence and change enough Southern delegates away from Grant to defeat him. It is true Missouri and Kentucky are instructed for Grant, but Texas is not, and it is believed that Alabama, Georgia, and Louisiana will not instruct their delegates. A loss of any one of the larger Southern States defeats Grant. The carpet-baggers are now his only hope; and it may, and probably will, turn out that even they are not always to be depended upon. West Virginia, Delaware, and Maryland will probably send anti-Grant delegations. Black and Tan has recently made some figures and published them in the Chronicle, by which he claims Grant's nomination assured. But to get that result he has placed in the Grant column such ridiculous figures as these: Indiana, 16; Texas, 16; Massachusetts, 26; New Jersey, 18; Illinois, 42; Wisconsin, 20; Nevada, 6. As Grant will not have a vote in either Massachusetts, Indiana, New Jersey, Wisconsin, or Nevada, and probably none in either Texas, Illinois, or Nebraska, he shows what a false hireling witness he is by making the statements above quoted. He claims every Southern State for Grant, solid, while the truth is that there will probably be divided delegations in Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, and Mississippi. As to whether there is to be a "dark horse," who shall come in and capture the nomination over the heads of the now leading candidates, is a hard question to answer. Such things have occurred in national politics, but not often. Usually the contest has been fought out between the leading candidates. In this connection it is asserted that the second choice of Don Cameron and the Pennsylvania delegation is Blaine. And it is believed that the choice of Ohio, after Sherman, is also Blaine. If, therefore, Grant and Sherman should be withdrawn, it is doubtful if the entire opposition, headed by Senator Conkling and the New York delegation, could keep the Chicago Convention from nominating James G. Blaine.

The Hon. Stephen J. Field is becoming one of the prominent possibilities of a Democratic Presidential nomination. He is discussed as one of the probabilities by the knowing ones, and if it should happen that the mantle of the Moses who came so near the promised Presidential land at the last election should fall upon the shoulders of Mr. Justice

Field, we may regard his nomination certain, and his election probable. If the contest should come between General Grant and Judge Field, the issues would be clear-cut and well-defined. Judge Field was a loyal man during the war—as only an appointment of President Lincoln could have been—and represents the highest order of legal and judicial talent, as General Grant represents the highest order of military capacity and genius. General Grant will embody the idea of centralization and military power, and Judge Field will embody the idea of State sovereignty and the majesty of the civil law. General Grant will reflect the glory of Augustus, while Judge Field will stand as a representative of that constitutional principle that declares the "civil" to be superior to the "military" power. The one will carry with him into the campaign the emblems of peace—the pen, the gown, the civic wreath, generosity to the South, forgetfulness of the war; the other, the sword, the glittering uniform, the laurel crown, the bloody shirt. The one will be a new man, taken from peaceful pursuits, asking for gifts; the other a hero demanding his rights. The one seeking a first term; the other a third. The one maintaining an honored political and as yet inviolate tradition; the other casting before him the threatening menace of dynasty. As neither of these distinguished gentlemen may be nominated, we will continue to indulge ourselves in thinking that we will do as we please until a real issue is presented to us for our decision.

The Associated Press dispatches are popularly regarded as indispensable to the prosperity of a daily paper. We do not think so. A contract for two thousand words a day, at so much for telegraphic transmission, results in sending words, words, words. A negro robs a hen-roost in Kentucky, or a Democrat burns a barn in Canada, and it is telegraphed across the continent as news. Every accident, calamity, or scandal that occurs within the reach of the Associated Press news-gatherer is dispatched westward as news. It would make an amusing book if the contradictory statements, lies, rumors, false reports, corrections, and misstatements made concerning Governor Tilden could be gathered together. To-day he is a Presidential candidate; to-morrow he retires. To-day he is in robust health—a rosy, hale, and hearty middle-aged gentleman, full of promise and labor; to-morrow he is a poor, old, and feeble octogenarian, trembling upon the verge of the grave. To-day he is to be married—lady's name, age, and fortune, with time, place, and circumstance, all given; to-morrow it is denied. At one time he is represented as a subtle, scheming spider, engaged in the dark intrigue of weaving political webs to catch unwary partisan flies; and then it turns out that he is not meddling in politics, but enjoying his otium cum dig. in his library, or quietly fishing in the Highlands. At one time he is spending money by the barrel, tampering with commissions, up to his eyes in cipher dispatches; and then it is authoritatively announced that he is taking no part and spending no money in politics. Now he is plotting for delegates to make himself the candidate, then he is represented as content to make the nominee; yesterday it was Randall, to-day it is Field, and to-morrow it will be John Kelly. He quarrels and reconciles with Tammany each alternate day—and so the Associated Press dispatches mix and jumble and toss and huddle, not only this, but all news. The result is, there is not a man on this side of the continent that knows anything about the condition of that class of events over which the Associated Press thinks it must speculate. One intelligent person at St. Louis could gather more and better news for a daily journal than all the rubbish that is sent across the wires to the Associated Press.

The murder of Mr. Severance by a Chinaman has its moral. A deliberately planned murder for a mercenary purpose is something exceedingly rare upon this coast. We recall no single case where money was the sole cause of a premeditated murder, except where murder has followed as an incident to highway robbery or burglary. This Chinaman came to California when almost a boy in years. He was a good servant, industrious, obedient, frugal. He saved money enough to return to his native land. He asked Mr. Throckmorton, his employer, for leave of absence. He would go home to China and marry him a wife. He would then come back to California, and "would Mr. Throckmorton keep his place open for him?" He was a good servant, so faithful and reliable that he easily obtained his employer's promise. He went to China, bought himself three acres of land, married him a wife, built him a house, and returned to California to make more money, to add three acres more to his home, and then he would "be a rich man in China." He lived in the country, a single servant in a large farm-house. Mr. Severance, bailiff of Mr. Throckmorton's estate, came and went with his money. The Chinaman was honest, and there were no secrets from him. Before this Chinaman, every month, was an amount of gold coin that to him represented a life of ease. A stranger in a strange land, there came over him the heart-sickness for his wife and home. He dreamed of his loved ones. Into his heart as he dreamed, and into his imagination as he toiled, during these dreary winter days, came the temptation to murder—to murder this outcast. This Chinaman, this man whose money would enable him to realize his dreams of home and wife and child. And so, one dismal, rainy night, he came behind Mr. Severance; shot him to his death; buried his body; gathered his money; hid it; covered over the corpse of his dead friend, and prepared to return to China. He had no anger against Severance, none against Mr. Throckmorton, none against any one. He was a good Chinaman—honest, law-abiding, and non-resistant; industrious, frugal, loved his native land and his family, worshipped the tablets of his ancestors, believed in the precepts of Confucius, and had faith that the only road to the heavenly realm was from the Flowery Kingdom. His murder grew out of all these virtues; and could he have got away with his plunder, who that does not believe in God or conscience can doubt that this Chinaman would have been a good husband, father, and citizen, and that his days would have been long and honored in that Chinese land, where he would have been distinguished for his wealth, his liberality, and his many pagan virtues? He was a murderer, and took this good man's life—made his wife desolate, his babes fatherless, and wrenched the hearts of loving, aged parents—because he was a Chinaman, and had not the education, the civilization, or the conscience that would restrain him from one or an hundred murders if one or an hundred lives were between him and his home. Moral: No more Chinese.

When recently, at Portland, one Ah Lee was to have been hung on the following day, a strong guard was placed in the county jail, composed of men detailed from the several military companies of the city, and every precaution was observed to prevent the Chinaman from committing suicide. When Ah Lung, the murderer of Severance, killed himself in the county jail at San Rafael, the sheriff expressed great regret. It is a universal custom to so guard criminals on the eve of execution that they may not take their own lives. Now, why is this? Why should not the murderer be allowed the privilege of suicide if he pleases? Why—if to-morrow noon he is to die by the hangman, in the yard of the county jail, in the presence of reporters and other morbid people, with women and children looking through fences and crowding the roofs of adjoining buildings to gaze upon him—why may he not, at midnight, in the seclusion and darkness of his cell, settle his account between himself, his conscience, and his God, by wrapping the mantle of death around him, and voluntarily stepping out into the darkness of the eternal night? Have the hangman and the law any higher warrant to take human life than the guilty owner of the soul that sins? If society demands the criminal's death, is it not satisfied, and is not the debt as fully paid by the voluntary death as by the execution of the law? Why not? And if so, then where is the propriety of calling out the military to guard the poor devil from going his own way to the unknown country? When the sentence of death has become irrevocable, and government has decreed that in self-defense the man must die, why not leave to him the choice of his mode of exit, and place within his reach knife, cord, and drug? We ask "why?" and leave to preachers, statesmen, and county sheriffs the task of answering. In this argument, we waive all the advantage of such considerations on our side as the shame of friends, the agony of the criminal's suspense, the demoralization of an execution, the saving of the cost of incarceration and execution, and—as in Ah Lung's case—the expense of trial. The possible perjuries may not be considered, nor the advantages that society gains in depriving the newspapers of an unprofitable sensation, and denying preachers the professional satisfaction of sending a penitent murderer from the scaffold to the over-burdened bosom of Abraham.

A religious idiot named Clark, at a recent gathering of pious folks of his kind at the Larkin Street Presbyterian Church, advised a week of prayer to ask God to send the phylloxera to destroy all the grape-vines, so that he and his associate imbeciles might be rescued from the temptation to get drunk on wine or brandy. As God made the vine, and the devil makes this kind of Presbyterians and the phylloxera, we suggest that the idiot named Clark pray to the devil; and while he is on his marrow-bones, he may as well invoke the weevil for the corn crop, and ask a light upon barley, and pray for the Colorado-bug to destroy the potato crop. If the devil should answer this pious idiot's prayer, Clark would be compelled to eat his own head.

A FIRE IN A COUNTRY TOWN.

When Thomas Carlyle was writing his Sartor Resartus from the mouth of Teufelsdröckh, he described a city by night, and village life in the day-time. He carried his old hero to the world-promontory at the North Cape, and from that point, at midnight in June, allowed the old wanderer to paint a word-picture of the "silence as of death" and the appalling solitude of that hyperborean region. With his grand powers of description, this real old writer has descended upon matters material, from earth to sky; from the highest imperial sceptre and Charlemagne-mantle to the poorest ox-goad and gypsy blanket, and withal he dealt in quaint, yet telling style of purest poetry and prose, but he has left undone one thing—he has not described a fire in a country town. He should not have been thus misfeisant. He ought to have written about this thing that heads my screech, for I cannot. (There is no egotism in this.) But I am going to try, from a personal stand-point, because the world needs the picture, even though it be but a daub. A master may yet take the suggestion, and make it his chef d'œuvre. For this attempt there need be no other excuse than that which my warmest friends may find for me in the aphorism that "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread," or words to that effect. A fire in a country town is startling, ridiculous, interesting, appalling, amusing, comparatively harmless, and is the property of every citizen, from the hootblack and scullion at the tavern to the side-whiskered Presbyterian elder who is the president of the county bank, which stands in its white-lined, red-brick prominence on the chief corner, shaded by a big tree, accompanied by the town-pump.

I lived in a certain country town in California once for nine months, and I'm sorry for it. So are the people there. But I have never been able to account for this situation, either individually or collectively, to my own satisfaction, except through the reasons that shall here follow. The probabilities are that I was beginning to get too prominent, and tried to do too much toward the ambitious end of becoming a valuable citizen. The other men, in a town like that, with as much ambition as I had, and less brains, never like a man who promises to become popular. If he sings a good song, tells a roaring fine story, makes pretty efforts in oratory, and reads like a horn elocutionist—all of which I do in more than an average manner—he is the lion for a brief space, but it soon becomes a settled fact, among the haut ton and the place-seekers of the place, that "that fellow is a little too smart, or at least thinks himself so."

It is true that, during the few months I lived in that town, I started a lyceum, laid the foundation for a public library, instituted a new benevolent lodge, taught a class in Sunday-school, became presiding officer of a temperance organization, played the leading part in all the amateur theatricals, participated in concerts for the benefit of the churches, the poor, or anything else, directed tableaux vivants, allowed impetuous cusses to win their cigars from me on "bean poker" and "pigeon-hole" hilliards, was working well along toward establishing an agricultural fair, and was editing a spicy, newsy paper, which was losing money, but I was all this time getting "too smart," and to cap the climax, a fire broke out. I happened, at the moment of this catastrophe, to be at work at my editorial desk. Everybody rushed out at the tap of the little, lower-case, italic fire-bell, and the town went wild, I suppose.

I was deeply engrossed, however, in an editorial, which I fondly hoped would be the means of opening the eyes of the people to the necessity of a more thorough and effective system of irrigation, and hadn't thought of the fire until some of the village wisecracks—who had a habit of haunting my sanctum, which was a sort of accepted debating-place for their rustic subjects, and a remarkably satisfactory rendezvous for the retailers of smutty stories—returned from the fire, which had only amounted to the burning of a hay-shed in a vacant lot. They were petrified with indignation to find that I had sat there, through all this excitement, attending to my business. One of the number, with a moiety more of coolness than the others, finally found voice enough to ask what on earth I meant by not going to the fire. I told them that I hadn't lost any fire—and that made it worse. I was then disjointedly, incoherently, but earnestly and unanimously, reprimanded by the entire party, and informed that it was the duty of every citizen to turn out to a fire and help save the property of his neighbors. This seemed very sensible and just to me, but I apologized by informing the crowd that I had been brought up in such a cold and uncharitable place that somehow I had become imbued with the idea that it was the duty of the firemen to look after conflagrations, and that such affairs were not particularly interesting to any save that band of noble martyrs and the individuals who owned the property which the Fiend of Caloric essayed to devour. This appeased their wrath and indignation to a comfortable extent, and even created for me some degree of pity. But there were others in the town who, when the matter became bruited abroad, insisted that I was "putting on style and assuming city airs." Unfortunately I hadn't acquired any country airs, for lack of opportunity, but I resolved to become as bucolic as my metropolitan rearing would admit of. Alas! "it is a difficult thing to teach an old dog new tricks."

Matters went along fairly for about two weeks, when, one Sunday evening, I went to church, leaving my wife, who was indisposed, and my two-year-old daughter at our room in the hotel. The minister—God bless him!—was an able, earnest, and eloquent man, who deserved a higher place in the vineyard, and who, I thank heaven, has since acquired it. He was preaching a beautiful sermon, and I was deeply interested in it—more, I confess, on its literary merits than its soul-saving and religion-inspiring attributes, which were sufficiently strong to be highly commendable—when that tenor-toned fire-bell rattled excitedly; then away went that heretofore enrapt congregation. The manner in which that aggregation of piety, vanity, store-clothes, and property-holders went pell-mell out by the windows and down the aisles, over pew-benches and old women, was a caution. This was amusing to me—a beathen Bohemian and city-raised cuss. But there were, perhaps, a dozen other persons—for the most part strangers—who were more interested in the sermon than they were in the fire, and we sat until the fleeing portion of the assemblage had cleared out and was rushing madly down the streets. Quiet was restored, and the minister took up the thread of his discourse. He had barely spoken twenty words more, however, when the "tang-tang" of the little fire-bell broke out afresh, madder, more wildly than before, and a glare from the conflagration lit up the windows on one side of the sanctuary. The good minister then closed the holy book, and remarked that as the fire seemed to be somewhat serious, and all the conditions for preaching on that occasion were somewhat disturbed, it would be better to defer the remainder of the discourse until some more fortuitous time; and so the decimated congregation left the church, while the minister remained to turn off the lights and lock the door.

Having nothing better to do, I sauntered leisurely in the direction of the blaze, more particularly for the reason that it was in my direction, though far beyond my hotel-home. Turning down a cross street, which would take me to the hotel, about a block away, and thinking I would call in and tell my sicker half that I was going to the fire, judge of my astonishment, if you please, when reaching the corner directly opposite the hotel, I beheld coatless men and half-clad women emptying that caravansary of its contents. They carried mattresses down-stairs, and laid them tenderly on the side-walks half a block away; mirrors were dashed from second-story windows to the street below; the kind-hearted people, intent on saving the movable property of the landlord and his guests, had rushed in, forgetting every idea of such a thing as privacy, snatched up the temporarily discarded garments of guests who had retired, and flung them through the windows. And now, thoroughly aroused, I rushed through a shower of valises, hoots, trunks, chinaware, vases, and house-keeping paraphernalia, "too numerous to mention," as they say in the auction-hills, to the hotel entrance, thence up the stair-way, and through the halls, jammed with people who were "working" at the fire and the debris of a hotel wreck. Upon reaching my own room I found wife and baby gone, and the apartment looked as if some violent convulsion had taken place. My books and papers were scattered over the floor and out on the balcony; the carpets had been torn up and "chugged" into a corner; the spring mattress stood on edge against the wall; the bureau was half-way out of a window, with the looking-glass smashed to "smithereens;" the bedstead had been torn apart; the chairs were disjointed, and the rocker was a clear case of kindling wood. This, and all else, had been done by the solicitous neighbors who were "working at the fire," which was half a block away, burning two or three frame shanties and a grocery store, and as the hotel was of brick, even had the building been in imminent danger, a dozen cool-headed men could have taken everything out of it to a place of safety before the house could have ignited to such an extent as to make it unapproachable. Naturally, the first thing that I proposed to attend to was to find my wife and baby. Some one told me in an excited manner where they were, and going to the place, a millinery store about two blocks further away from the supposed-to-be appalling conflagration, I found them, with other lady guests and children from the hotel, the whole lot in deshabille and hysterics. When I reached the place they unanimously and tearfully desired to know if I thought that would "go too." Assuring them that there was about as much danger of it as that I would be a rich man next week, they began to be somewhat consoled. The assurance, in the manner it was put, was particularly consoling to my wife, who knew, poor child, that there was no more danger of my getting rich than that I might be translated like Elijah of old, and she laughed while shivering in my ulster, and I scowled to see the baby swaddled in my dress coat. Of course the "workers" at the fire had frightened all these women and children into the belief that the Chicago fire was not a river-bank wood-yard blaze to what this would be "if the wind don't change."

Leaving this fair but disheveled party feeling somewhat safer and in better spirits, I returned to the scene of the conflagration. The fire had spent its force, and now the fire-company, with its hand-engine, was deluging the upper floors of the hotel with water to still further "save" it; the street facing the fire was strewn with barrels of sugar and salt, which had been saved to be kicked in and the contents spilled and mixed and muddled; sacks of potatoes, rat-traps, office furniture, and all sorts of truck, with here and there a section of leaking hose-pipe, were piled and scattered in delightful confusion and profusion, and the mud was ankle-deep. As the fire went down, the crowd gathered in knots and discussed the awful event, and talked in an animated way about who had first discovered the blaze, how it had caught, with many theories thereon, and nearly every one was sounding his own praises as to how he had "worked."

After a while the unfortunate landlord went to work, with his hired help and one or two volunteers, who expected a drink of whisky when they had done, to "sorter set things to rights." Little by little the crowd dwindled to a few men who had got drunk, and toward daylight the town was asleep again. All the next day parties of ladies and others came to view the "burnt district," sigh and turn away, and little boys dug in the ashes for burnt nails and mementoes of the great conflagration. The insurance agent also came around with his committee of appraisers, and the owner of the grocery-store haunted the scene for two or three days, sitting about, here and there, disconsolately, on an inverted nail-keg or cracker-box, or answering questions concerning his losses. The town talk about the disaster finally fell off in a week to such an extent that when the "scare-head" article in the other paper, written by its editor in his first paroxysm of excitement and exaggeration, about "The Fire-fiend in Our Midst," came out, it was barely noticed by the readers of that "widely circulated and influential journal," while I was roundly abused over the "coldness" of the modest paragraph in my paper, giving the facts in a few words, according to my metropolitan journalistic training.

The landlord of the hotel was the heaviest loser by the fire, because he got no insurance. His property was destroyed in the "work" of saving it, and the insurance man from the city could see no reason why it should have been disturbed. But in a little while another grocery-store grew on the black spot which the fire had left; little by little the other vacant places are being filled with far better buildings than occupied them before; but I have "exodusted," and can not enjoy these growing beauties, all because I am a failure as a bucolic editor, and don't know how to work at a fire.

IN LIFE AND IN DEATH.

She rides like a bird on the wing,
As free as the breeze of heaven;
And her flying steed—
Unmatched for speed—
Is black as the gloom of even.

His trappings are fringed with gold,
And studded with golden stars,
And his coal-black mane
Flows over a rein
That is bitted with golden bars.

The rider is lithe of form,
With a wealth of yellow hair,
But her still, cold face
Has a marble grace
That a statue of stone might wear.

The sun is caught in the mesh
Of her tresses' golden cloud,
But the carven rose
Of her lips repose
In calm, as though under a shroud.

Her eyes have a far, fixed look,
As at something one can not see;
And ever she rides
Down the brown hillsides,
And, passing, sees not me.

One day I followed afar
The coal-black steed and his queen;
The rhythmic beat
Of the horse's feet
Led away o'er hill and ravine.

The blue sky girdled the earth,
The hot sun beat on its breast,
Through sunlight and shade,
That the woodland made,
In her flight she did not rest.

The still morn slept on the hills,
The blue haze lay on the plain,
The rush of the air
Tossed back her hair
In a shower of golden rain.

She gave no backward glance
At the gray I held in hand,
But her horse urged on—
And then she was gone,
And I was alone in the land.

Not even the echo of hoofs
Lingered under the air;
Still the hot sun shone;
The black was gone,
But the gray and I were there.

I wheeled my steed through the wood,
I rode to the brow of the hill;
I searched for a trace
Of the vanished face—
But even the birds were still.

O maid of maidens most fair!
Thy steed fled over my heart,
O lily of stone!
I rode back alone,
And slowly, as one apart.

And day after day I watched
For the coal-black steed to pass;
And followed afar
My life's white star,
To see it vanish, alas!

* * * * *

Down under the sentinel pines,
Where the shadows lie dark and deep,
There riseth a mound
From the dry, dead ground,
Where thy lover doth calmly sleep.

He answereth not thy voice,
Nor the magic of thy caress.
Oh, call unto me,
Who lovest thee,
And see if I answer less!

Mine is a heart of red blood—
The heart thou lovest is dust.
Oh, turn thee away
From mouldering clay,
And bestow on me thy trust!

She Don't Know It.

I know a girl as beautiful
As yon bright moon, or aught below it,
And my fond heart is brimming full
Of burning love—but she don't know it.

She's absent now, and ceaseless thought
Such pleasure yields, I can't forego it—
So, all day long, I think of naught
Except my love—but she don't know it.

And oh, I have a trysting-place;
And gentle Somnus guides me to it,
There oft I meet her angel face,
Beaming with smiles—but she don't know it.

Land of dreams—oh! blessed land—
Full streams of bliss flow purling through it—
'Tis there I press her little hand,
And kiss her, too—but she don't know it.

Masculine attire begins to show the decorative, highly-colored spirit of the day in a marked degree. It has grown, by a slow process, from gay hosiery to gayer jewelry; but the entering wedge is in now, and no one would be surprised if dress suits took a decided turn for the worse, such as an attack of embroidery on the white or colored silk linings and lappels, and that lace ruffles broke out on the cuffs. As for the trousers, a vine of embroidery running up the outside seam would be chic; and on the waistcoat it might look well to have only one button, and that a brilliant diamond. These suggestions are gratis; but since Paris fashion prohibits flowers in the button-hole, it is a shame not to invent some lively device for those poor men who are struggling to keep pace with the gorgeous livery of their wives, sisters and sweet-hearts.

REALITIES OF IRISH LIFE.

The house of Billings, Harbourn & Co. send us, from the publishing house of Roberts Brothers, of Boston, a most interesting work on Ireland. It is written by Mr. W. Steuart Trench, and is entitled Realities of Irish Life. We take from it a chapter for publication. The author is an educated man—agent for several large estates—who has lived among and dealt with the Irish people during the last eventful half-century. He speaks from an intimate knowledge of and friendly sympathy for them. We have undertaken in the editorial columns of this journal, to advocate a limitation to our immigration laws, and a total repeal of our naturalization laws. This argument we direct more especially against Irish immigration, because we think that in some particulars it is more embarrassing and dangerous than Chinese. We know that in advocating this line of policy we shall place ourselves in antagonism to the judgment of some people, and run contra to the prejudices of many. Hence it becomes us to be very cautious in the statement of facts, and very careful in the deduction of opinions from those facts. We can not do better than, from time to time, make extracts from the work before us, and commend to our readers a careful consideration of them. We have in other articles declared that European countries are sending to us their paupers, their uneducated and vicious classes, and we print this chapter from Realities of Irish Life as tending to prove at least one of our grave assertions.

After a very graphic description of the potato rot, and the dreadful scenes of famine and destitution that accompanied it in 1846, Mr. Trench—afterward, in 1849, becoming agent of Lord Lansdowne in the union of Kenmare—says:

When I first reached Kenmare, in the winter of 1849-50, the form of destitution had changed in some degree; but it was still very great. It was true that people no longer died of starvation, but they were dying nearly as fast of fever, dysentery, and scurvy within the walls of the work-house. Food was now in abundance, but to entitle the people to obtain it, they were compelled to go into the work-house and "auxiliary sheds," until these were crowded almost to suffocation. And although out-door relief had also been resorted to, in consequence of the impossibility of finding room for the paupers in the houses, yet the quantity of food given was so small, and the previous destitution through which they had passed was so severe, that nearly as many died now under the hands of the guardians as had perished before by actual starvation.

In illustration of this state of things, I may mention an event which occurred to myself, soon after my arrival in the district:

I was in the habit, at this time, of attending the meetings of the Poor Law Board of Guardians, of which I had not yet become a member.

The numbers at that time receiving relief in the whole union of Kenmare were somewhere about ten thousand. In June, 1849, six months previous to my coming, they had reached the highest point, about ten thousand four hundred persons being then in receipt of relief. They had diminished slightly at the time to which I allude.

After a day of painful toil, in the duty of admitting paupers, I was obliged to leave before the board broke up, as I had important business in Killarney, and I started on horseback to ride across the mountains. I had not gone far, when a messenger came posting after me to say that the government officer, then in attendance at the board, was very desirous to see me. I asked if the case was urgent, and was told that it was very urgent indeed.

I returned, of course, and found the members of the board looking certainly blank enough. The officer immediately informed me that the contractor, to whom a very large amount of money was due, had positively refused to give another sack of meal unless he received an installment in cash that day. No one could well blame him. The board was bankrupt; repeated promises had been made to him of payments, which had not been fulfilled, and credit was utterly gone. At length I proposed that we should all put our hands in our pockets, and offered, on my own account, to double whatever total the rest of the board would subscribe among them, and take chance for the union refunding the money afterward. The board, however, declined, and I could not get a £10 note subscribed. I called the Government officer aside into another room, and said: "Will you tell me exactly what you think will be the consequence if the contractor refuses to let us have another load of meal?"

"I have thought over this," he replied; "and, considering the numbers who are depending exclusively on this food and who are already in the last stage of destitution, on out-door relief, in distant parts of the union where this meal should now be sent, I feel confident that not less than from twelve to fifteen hundred persons will be dead before twenty-four hours are over."

"Is it possible?" said I. "Can this really be true?"

"I think, sir," said he, "I am rather under than over the estimate." I could no longer hesitate. I, fortunately, happened to have some private funds in bank. I made the necessary arrangements for the payment of a portion of the debt, and the contractor forwarded the meal. Even now I tremble to think what might have occurred, either if I had gone too far toward Killarney to be recalled, or if I had not happened, at the time, to be in a position to make the necessary arrangements.

It may readily be supposed that this was a very serious state of things for a stranger to enter upon as the agent of Lord Lansdowne's estate in this union, and consequently, as such, the most responsible person in the district. I can hardly describe my anxiety of mind as, day after day, the increasing responsibilities of the post I had assumed developed themselves before me. No one else would stir. They had not done much before; and now, that I took a prominent part among them, they held back and would do nothing. All, indeed, cried aloud that "something ought to be done," but few were able or willing to subscribe, and none had energy enough to attempt to grapple with the difficulty. Thus, by degrees, I felt myself placed almost alone, to meet, as I could, this fearful mass of pauperism.

The position was a most anxious one, but I endeavored to meet it steadily. Lord Lansdowne had kindly intimated to me that funds on the most liberal scale—in fact, to any amount required—would be at my disposal for anything which would be for the advantage of the district, and the development of my plans was looked forward to with much anxiety.

Such was the state of things in Kenmare at the time to which I allude. My first step was to endeavor to relieve, in some degree, the plethora of the poor-house; and for this purpose I offered employment, outside, to all those who had entered it, chargeable to Lord Lansdowne's estate. I promised them reasonable wages in draining, subsoiling, removing rocks and stones, and such like out-of-door labor. No sooner had I made this proposal, than about three hundred gaunt, half-famished men, and nearly as many boys and women, appeared in my field the next morning, all of them claiming my promise, but none of them having any tools wherewith to labor! Here was a new dilemma. The offer of employment had been accepted with only too great avidity, but the creatures had not a spade, nor a pick-axe, nor a working tool among them. Fortunately, a large depot of these articles had lain stored in a tool-house hard by—remnants of the public works. These I immediately appropriated, and, before noon, about one-half the people were employed. The remainder I sent again to the poor-house, telling them, however, to return the next day and I would endeavor to procure implements to lend them. They did so. And, partly by buying, partly by borrowing, and by making some of them work with their hands alone, I managed to keep most of them employed.

But although at first this system met with great approbation in the district, yet I found it quite impossible to continue it. In the first place, not much more than one-fourth of a reasonable value in labor could be obtained from those who proposed to work; and in the next, being now in employment, they had, of course, to leave the work-house. Where, then, were they to lodge at night? Every lane, every alley, every cabin in the town was crowded to excess with these unhappy work-people, and they slept by threes and fours together wherever they could get a pallet of straw to lie upon. But I plainly saw that this could not go on. The towns-people began to complain of the scenes in the town at night; and when a wet day came and the people could not work, nearly one-half of them were obliged to return for the day to the poor-house, creating immense confusion by the sudden influx of such a body of famished new-comers, and the remainder wandered about, objects of the utmost compassion.

Accordingly, after the most anxious deliberation, I arrived at the final conclusion that this system could not be carried on. I felt it would be madness in me to assume the responsibility of keeping three hundred paupers in employment, most of them removed only one step from the grave, as, if any accident should happen to prevent them from obtaining daily pay, whether they had work or not—which I had hitherto managed at great inconvenience to give them—many lives might be lost in a night; a result for which I—not in law, but perhaps in public opinion—might immediately be called to account.

I therefore resolved to put into practice a scheme which I had meditated for a long time previously, namely: to go myself to Lord Lansdowne, at Bowood, to state to him the whole circumstances of the case, and to recommend him to adopt an extensive system of voluntary emigration as the only practicable and effective means of relieving this frightful destitution.

This plan, accordingly, I carried into effect. And in the month of November, 1850, I went over to England; and, having been invited to visit his lordship at Bowood, I remained there five days.

During my stay I had frequent and lengthened interviews with that most enlightened and liberal statesman. The broad sketch of the plan I laid before him was as follows: I showed him, by the poor-house returns, that the number of paupers off his estate and receiving relief in the work-house amounted to about three thousand. That I was wholly unable to undertake the employment of these people in their present condition, on reproductive works; and that, if left in the work-house, the smallest amount they could possibly cost would be £5 per head per annum, and thus that the poor-rates must necessarily amount, for some years to come, to £15,000 per annum, unless these people died or left—and the latter was not probable. I stated, also, that hitherto the people had been kept alive in the work-house by grants from the rates in aid and other public money, but that this could not always go on. That the valuation of his estate in that district scarcely reached £10,000 per annum, and thus, that the poor-rates necessary to be raised in the future off the estate, to support this number of people, would amount to at least thirty shillings in the pound. I explained further to him that, under these circumstances, inasmuch as the poor-rates were a charge prior to the rent, it would be impossible for his lordship to expect any rent whatever out of his estate for many years to come.

The remedy I proposed was as follows: That he should forthwith offer free emigration to every man, woman, and child now in the poor-house and chargeable to his estate. That I had been in communication with an emigration agent, who had offered to contract to take them to whatever port in America each pleased, at a reasonable rate per head. That, even supposing they all accepted this offer, the total, together with a small sum per head for outfit and a few shillings on landing, would not exceed from £13,000 to £14,000—a sum less than it would cost to support them in the work-house for a single year. That in the one case he would not only free his estate of this mass of pauperism which had been allowed to accumulate upon it, but would put the people themselves in a far better way of earning their bread hereafter; whereas, by feeding and retaining them where they were, they must remain as a mill-stone around the neck of his estate, and prevent its rise for many years to come. And I plainly proved that it would be cheaper to him, and better for them, to pay for their emigration at once, than to continue to support them at home.

His lordship discussed the matter very fully, and with that kindness, good sense, and liberality which characterized all his acts. And on my leaving Bowood he gave me an order for £8,000, wherewith to commence the system of emigration, with a full understanding that more should be forthcoming if required.

I shall not readily forget the scenes that occurred in Kenmare when I returned, and announced that I was prepared, at Lord Lansdowne's expense, to send to America every one now in the poor-house who was chargeable to his lordship's estate, and who desired to go, leaving each to select what port in America he pleased—whether Boston, New York, New Orleans, or Quebec.

The announcement at first was scarcely credited. It was considered by the paupers to be too good news to be true. But when it began to be believed and appreciated, a rush was made to get away at once.

The organization of the system required, however, much care and thought.

The mode adopted was as follows: Two hundred each week were selected of those apparently most suited for emigration. And, having arranged their slender outfit, a steady man, on whom I could depend—Mr. Jeremiah O'Shea—was employed to take charge of them on their journey to Cork, and not to leave them nor allow them to scatter until he saw them safely on board the emigrant ship. This plan succeeded admirably; and, week after week, to the astonishment of the good people of Cork, and sometimes not a little to their dismay, a batch of two hundred paupers appeared on the quays of Cork, bound for the Far West.

A cry was now raised that I was exterminating the people. But the people knew well that those who now cried loudest had given them no help when in the extremity of their distress, and they rushed from the country like a panic-stricken throng, each only fearing that the funds at my disposal might fall before he and his family could get their passage.

So great was the rush from the poor-house to emigrate, and so great was the influx into the bouse to qualify (as I generally required the application of that sure test of abject poverty before I gave an order for emigration), that the guardians became uneasy, and said the poor-house would be filled with those seeking emigration even faster than it could be emptied. But I told them not to be alarmed—that all demands should be met. And thus, two hundred after two hundred, week after week, departed for Cork, until the poor-house was nearly emptied of paupers chargeable to the Lansdowne estate; and in little more than a year three thousand five hundred paupers had left Kenmare for America, all free emigrants, without any ejectments having been brought against them to enforce it, or the slightest pressure put upon them to go.

It must be admitted that the paupers dispatched to America on such a sudden pressure as this, were of a very motley type; and a strange figure these wild batches of two hundred each—most of them speaking only the Irish language—made in the streets of Cork, as well as on the quays of Liverpool and America. There was great difficulty in keeping them from breaking loose from the ship, not only in Cork, but in Liverpool, where the ships touched before they left for the West. Their chief device was to escape out of the ships almost naked, to hide all their good clothes which had been furnished them as an outfit, and to appear only in their worst rags. In this costume they took delight in rushing through the streets of Cork and Liverpool in large bodies, to the real terror of the inhabitants. In short, I do believe that so strange, unmanageable, and wild a crew had never before left the shores of Ireland.

We submit the foregoing to our readers without further present comment, only asking of the thinking and reasonable Irish among us to reflect upon this condition of things, and answer to themselves the question whether, in their judgment, this pauper immigration from the estate of Kenmare is good material out of which to fabricate American citizens and electors in the short period of five years. And we might perhaps indulge ourselves in asking of the Irish agitators of the Sand-lot whether the lowest, meanest, and most drunken of their vile mob had not had his condition improved by being transplanted from an Irish poor-house, or an Irish cabin, or an Irish bog to this land of liberty and plenty.

A Grecian bandit, having captured an unfortunate traveler, sends word to the traveler's wife that the captive's ransom is fixed at one thousand drachmas. If it is not paid on the 15th, his nose is to be cut off; on the 16th, off will come one ear; on the 17th, another; on the 18th, his lips; and if the money does not come to hand on the 19th the prisoner will be killed.

The unhappy woman goes to work to raise the money, but the process of obtaining it is so difficult that by the 15th she has only obtained three hundred drachmas, by the 16th four hundred, by the 17th six hundred, and it is the night of the 18th when the whole sum of one thousand drachmas has been put together.

Then she says, with a bitter burst of tears, to her sympathizing sister:

"Poor Epaminondas! He never was particularly handsome, and now, with his nose, ears, and lips cut off, he must look like a regular guy. I guess I'll use this money toward buying me my mourning and a new trousseau. I look well in black. Besides, it would be a mercy to Epam to put him out of his sufferings."

Local item from the Journal des Débats:

Last night, toward midnight, the cries of "Stop it!" resounded all of a blow on the Boulevard Saint-Germain at the height of the Theatre Cluny.

A man of a fortieth of years, the visage ensanguined, was flying himself at all legs in the direction of the Street St. James.

The agents put themselves to his pursuit and could obtain him after a course furious. He was otherwise at the end of forces in the reason of the blood which he was losing.

At the succession of a riot which had exploded in a house of the street of the English he had wounded one of his comrades, the named C—, so grievously that this one here was rested inanimate on the soil.

Well, though wounded himself, X— had lost the head and was enfeebled himself (s'était enfié). After having received the cares which reclaimed his state, X— has been put at the disposition of the Commissary of Police of the quarter.

One day, during the Second Empire, Arthur Ranc was sent for by a juge d'instruction.

"Monsieur," said the official, turning over a formidable dossier, "you are acquainted with X?"

"I have the pleasure of the gentleman's acquaintance."

"X, I may say, has been arrested for conspiring against the life of the emperor."

No answer.

"We have learned, in the course of our examination, that he confided to you his project."

Still no answer.

"And that you endeavored to dissuade him from his purpose."

"True, I did," said Ranc with eagerness, seeing an apparently favorable issue from the decidedly embarrassing situation.

"True, you did," continued the official; "you said to him: 'Don't fire at the emperor! You are short-sighted; you'll miss him!'"

Ranc was sent to Lambessa.

An old tradesman in a country town sends his nephew Alfred to study law at Paris. He gives him an old code annotated by a leading member of the village bar, and says to his young relative: "I will pay you a visit in March, and if I am pleased with your progress, I will give you such a tip as will make glad your heart and cause your face to shine."

In March, the old gentleman calls on his nephew.

"Well, Alfred, hard at work, I see. Made good progress with your code? Pretty well through it, I expect, by this time."

"Yes, respected sir, my life has been one demnition grind (Dickens on Mantlini, iv. 11-44). Your venerable friend's marginal notes I found of great service to me while laboring at the code."

"Good boy, excellent young man. You got my draft, of course? It is a pleasure to me to reflect that my bounty was not ill-bestowed."

"Your draft, uncle? No; I never received it."

"Gimme that code." The old man opens the old book and shows his stupefied nephew a draft for two thousand francs, dated five months before, which has all the time been reposing between the first two leaves of the code.

American news from Le Gaulois:

A mode bizarre exists in America. There is in that country the daughters of the companies of sappers-pumpers, as there were with us formerly the daughters of the regiments. These young persons are adopted by the companies for the acts of charity and of devotion. They are recognizable by a number special which they carry on them, and which is reproduced above the door of their house. Each time the company of pumpers is appealed to the fire the windows of the daughters of pumpers open themselves in the streets where they pass; the young girl appears with the helmet and the insignia of her title; she salutes her fathers, who render themselves to the appeal of the duty.

There, happily, bounds himself her mission. She conflagration to extinguish, not even those which eyes

The question, "What will draw the public?" is the perennial conundrum torturing the wits of a theatrical manager. Any rule that would serve to indicate its answer would be worth a fortune to the discoverer. No amount of experience, added to whatever amount of the showman faculty, has ever proved equal to a solution of the mystery. Looking at some of the triumphs of dramatic hits, it is possible to discern the special circumstance that accounts for each; yet it would have been quite impossible to predict such a result from the known cause. A few examples, taken quite at random, will illustrate the point, and at the same time serve to show the perverse freakiness of popular fancy: When the extraordinary vogue of The Monk had given its author the sobriquet of "Monk" Lewis, and Ann Radcliffe's Mysteries of Udolpho had contributed to raise a temporary appetite for horrors, the fortunes of the old Drury under Sheridan's management were tottering to their fall. In despair, he accepted Lewis's absurd, grotesque, puerile play of The Castle Spectre. No one is surprised, after the event, that it proved an enormous hit. The perverted public appetite craved for the moment just such perverted pabulum. Yet on perusal of the play it is even more difficult to understand how they could have swallowed such a wash, than it is, on perusal of the books, to understand how the same public had contrived to swallow them. However, the connection between the success of the two is clear. At no other epoch in the history of the English stage could The Castle Spectre have been played at all. At that particular moment it transcended Shakspeare. And yet, on the manager's part, the hit was the purest luck. He ventured it, on the verge of bankruptcy, in sheer desperation.

Of recent years there has been a class of Lady Audley's Secrets that have fallen as pecuniary manna on the heads of managers, the success of which has palpably had its foundation in the vogue of the whole class of novels indicated by the title of one. Again, there was the Guy Livingston line of novel, represented by a few successful plays, the Ainsworth novel and Jack Sheppard, the earlier Bulwer novel and George Barnwell. Yet the character, or rather the spirit, of our permanent novel literature appears not to lend itself to dramatic reproduction. We have had nothing on the stage corresponding to the work of Thackeray, Dickens, or George Eliot; or even of Scott, or Marryatt, or Lever, or Jane Austin. Yet each of these had in turn a vogue greater than that of Wilkie Collins or Miss Braddon. Hence it is clear that a manager could not safely rely on a play, even a clever one, that happened to reproduce the very spirit of a school of literature prevailing at the moment among play-goers; yet, in rejecting such a play, he might be rejecting a colossal hit.

It is curious to note, too, how hits are sometimes forced on managers almost against their will. Rich succeeded in producing a reaction against Garrick—when nothing else would—by his pantomimes! And when the public had had its surfeit of "Harlequin," and the manager of Covent Garden was forced to return to the regular drama—which he despised—and his house was packed for a tragedy, he was heard to say, peeping through a hole in the green curtain: "What! You're there, you fools, are you? Well, much good may it do you." More often, an actor-manager is found ruining himself in an effort to run the legitimate, finding his salvation in a live elephant piece, or blue-fire spectacle, or infant phenomenon, and damning his audiences from pit to gallery.

In Mathews's autobiography, recently published, we read how, as by an accident, his second season as lessee of Covent Garden was saved from abrupt disaster. By advice of his solicitor he was making up a statement of his affairs, with a view to compounding with his creditors, when "The Beggar's Opera" was produced as an afterpiece. To the surprise of every one, ourselves included, up went the receipts. The houses were crammed, and a long and successful run was the consequence. The corner was turned."

A foot-note at this page of Mr. Mathews's memoirs shows the load under which a great London theatre had to stagger forty years ago. He gives the payroll of Covent Garden, showing the appalling number of 684 attachés in all. Of these, "the company" embraced 38 gentlemen and 34 ladies; "the band," 32 pieces. Employed in the department of the "gentlemen's wardrobe" were 56 hands, and in that of the "ladies' wardrobe," 60 more. This is frightful. What a season's total outgo came to in those days Mathews does not tell us; he paid five per cent. per month for money to meet them, it appears, and they soon swamped him. His rent was $25,000 per year. He then takes the comparatively small and cheap Lyceum Theatre, and lands in disaster after seasons the receipts of which average $570, $485, and $500 per night; yet each of these seasons had its episode of "brilliant houses" and "large receipts."

However, the days of modern salaries were already fairly at hand. The change in this respect from old times had been nearly as sudden as it was enormous. C. J. Mathews's own father had written, only thirty years before, "Now to my offer, which I think stupendous and magnificent—£17 per week." (The italics are his own.) John Kemble then received only £36; Miss O'Neil (Lady Becher), at her zenith, £25. But in 1840, Macready was up to £150; Tyrone Power, £120; while Miss Ellen Tree, who had left Drury Lane at £15 per week to try America, returned after a few seasons to Drury at £150 per week—or, as the indignant chronicler puts it, "She comes, demands, and actually obtains, £25 a night!"—with an exclamation point of exasperation. The salaries of other members of the company had mounted in proportion. How they have all continued to mount since is a familiar story. John Poole gives as the terms of a modern star, "eight-tenths of the clear receipts and free benefit, for a twelve-nights' engagement," in which there is very little caricature.

No, the times had changed when Mathews undertook management in 1840; the actors had gradually come to hold the whip-hand of the situation, and a rather protracted period of hard times for managers ensued, both in England and America. Before it ended the actors began to suffer, too. There appeared not to be room for all hands at the going prices. Little by little, changes wrought themselves out, and among these one notable one is the modern small theatre, seating about one thousand people; another is the manager-actor, letting himself out with or without a company to perform a half-dozen favorite pieces, or, it may be, only one; a third is the protracted run—covering, perhaps, one or two entire seasons. In all these departures from the old-time methods that originated in the "patent" system, and crossed the water to us, bringing a train of managerial disaster, it is not difficult to recognize features of a process of adjustment looking toward some fairness of method in dividing up the receipts at the door. We see the actor assuming some risk by buying and paying for his own play; or, if he still exact "eight-tenths of the clear receipts and a free benefit," he has an assured attraction to dispose of on those terms.

But after all is said and done, Mr. Manager has but a risky, dubious, worrying outlook before him, with a very shady chance of competence at the end of it. For the conundrum at the head of this column springs perpetually green—What attraction will attract? And the answer that proves to-day the right one, proves to-morrow to be wrong; nor is there rhyme or reason to be found for the change. What shall it be—"Macbeth" or "Harlequin"? Cherry and Fair Star or She Stoops to Conquer? The Infant Pinafore or Edwin Booth? Clara Morris and Camille or John Raymond and the Almighty Dollar? Henry V. or Humpty-Dumpty? the Corsican Brothers or Billy Emerson's Minstrels? Mazeppa or the Lady of Lyons? the Japanese jugglers or School for Scandal? Ada Cavendish or Buffalo Bill? What shall it be?—and if so, which? when? why? where? fore?

Answer it you must, poor manager, and answer it aright—or slap empty pockets. The many-headed monster can not itself tell what it wants. It knows, but it is inarticulate. It is sure only not to want what it says it does. If it calls for a Tempest give it a Sea of Ice; if it thinks it yearns for a Midsummer Night's Dream, engage Billy Williamson; if it fall into a virtuous fit, underline Mazeppa for next week.

Thus may the much-bedevised manager chance to stave off insolvency for another season, and close that in hand—objurgated impartially by patrons, critics, landlords, actors, ushers, and creditors. There's not a soul of them, from the steady patron of the right-hand proscenium-box down to the bill-sticker, but knows how much better he could have managed, and what a wooden-head the manager is anyhow. Why there is not a Dutch girl in the chorus but is prepared to teach him his business any day in the week. But when he himself feels that he really needs advice—solid chunks of useful counsel—we know where he goes for it. He goes where it is to be had—to the critics of the press. That's what he does. Truly, as Stephen Blackpool hath it, "It's a' a muddle;" or in language more familiar to our ears, it is one of those things no fellow can find out.

The success which is attending the production of the Royal Middy is a natural one. This serio-buffo operetta possesses all the elements of a "draw." The mind is pleased by good acting; the ear, by good music, well sung; the eye, by picturesque costumes; and the fun-humor of the action is the thread that holds these different effects together, and puts the audience in the proper pleasant mood to appreciate the whole. As a musical work it has considerable merit: the solos are tuneful, the concerted pieces pretty bits of harmony. At times the composition approaches the serious opera in its nature, then again becomes decidedly Offenbachian in style. The plot is lively, sprightly, brimful of opportunities for the individual artists to develop their respective abilities. Max Freeman is evidently the central figure, overshadowing all of the others by the force and self-assertion of his effort. In make-up and mercurial activity he is decidedly tropical. His manner is full of desinvolture and his speech bristling with verve. There is an ease and airiness about his every word and movement that carries all before it. In the early days of opera-bouffe its popular and most celebrated delineators—Schneider, Dupuis, and Milher, for instance—were singularly devoid of musical talent. They all possessed, though, the charming gift of, as the French call it, "dire une chanson"—saying a song—that is to half speak it, artistically slurring over the technical musical difficulties, but giving the words with rare diction, putting expression and emphasis into every phrase, and bringing out the meaning—hidden or visible—with clearness. Max Freeman is an adept in this line; his solos are forcible, and his parts in the quartets and ensembles minutely distinct. "Fanchette" is a delicious, soubrette character. A lively, vivacious, arch little body, full of that abandon which the freedom from social restraints engenders. In fact, a true ecotote, with all her charms and attractions. The part fits its holder like a glove, and a better performance from a dramatic point of view could not be devised. Unfortunately, as much can not be said about the singing. The tendency of Miss Melville to sing flat at times is remarkable. She seems to suffer from spells of this nature. This was noticeable during the Pinafore run, and is painfully apparent in the Middy. Miss Montague and Mr. Turner sing their respective scores admirably, but the least said of their dramatic efforts the better. Peakes's fine bass voice resounds to advantage in the ensembles. This artist's endeavors to keep himself in the foreground are, in view of the minor importance of his character, rather annoying. Casselli is a young actor of promise, but he must endeavor to rid himself of certain defects of gesture and intonation that are too strongly reminiscent of his former dramatic sphere. The middies, led by Miss Lily Post, are an octette of pretty girls. The costume is hardly a graceful one, but was insisted upon from above for grave reasons. The introduction of the quarrel duet, a composition of Offenbach's, is in bad taste. It is miserably rendered, and is not in keeping with the surroundings. It has nothing of the flavor of aristocratic sprigs in a royal academy, and a good deal of the smell of a Tenth Ward gang of hoodlums. The management has done everything to present the play in fine style. It is to be regretted, though, that the adapter of the text has done his work so carelessly. The lines are full of cant phrases, vulgarisms, and slang, California slang at that. Whoever the writer is, and it is unknown, he does well to hide his light under a bushel. M.

What a superstition there is concerning birds just now among New York professional people. At a little dinner given in Boucicault's magnificent apartments, a week ago, there alighted for an instant at the window opening on Fifteenth Street a jet-black bird—somebody's escaped pet—probably a Mino bird. "Good heavens!" exclaimed Dion; "that's a fore-runner of ill-luck."

Those at the table had not forgotten the incident when the papers set forth the proceedings of Mrs. B.'s lawyers.

Fanny Davenport devoutly believes the ownership of a bird brings her misfortune. A pet canary popped into her room from the balcony one night a few years ago.

"Ah," said Fanny, "that's not a present nor a purchase; it's a waif and stray. Let it remain. I can't think that will be bad luck."

She went to the theatre—playing "Vesta," the blind old woman; and in the second act, unable from the arrangements over her eyes to see exactly where she fell, miscounted her distance and struck her face on the iron work of the footlights, disfiguring herself for months.

Augustin Daly is another enemy of birds, even in a pictured form.

A suite of furniture was brought in to the Fifth Avenue from Pottier & Styums, for use in a play whose rehearsals had been thought sure forerunners of a great success by actors and managers. Just before the curtain rang up, after one act of perfect satisfaction, Mr. Daly stood on the stage surveying the new set; of a sudden he espied a tiny swallow poised amid the flowers of the brocade covering.

"It's up with this piece," he cried out. "There's a miserable fowl on the chair-back."

"One swallow don't make a summer," said an actor standing by.

"But one swallow makes a respectable fall for me," returned Mr. Daly; and, sure enough, the piece was a flat failure for the ensuing end of the evening.

The famous English tenor, Sims Reeves, contemplates retiring from his profession. As he must be nearly sixty years old, and is very rich, the wisdom of such a course seems undeniable, though he is still without a rival in oratorio singing. About fifteen years ago his voice deteriorated considerably, but soon regained its power. It is an open secret among the profession that he is obliged to have all his songs transposed a couple of tones lower than he used to sing them. Sims Reeves was, curiously enough, both idolized and hated by the English public. To account for this, it must be borne in mind that he could never be depended on to fulfill his engagements. This gave a start to all sorts of stories about his being a confirmed drunkard. But they were utterly untrue, as the fact that he has retained his voice to his present age conclusively proves. The truth is that his throat was always most delicate; a simple journey by rail was often sufficient to make him "as hoarse as a crow." In the height of summer he did not dare to walk across Hyde Park without as many wraps around his neck as an ordinary man would wear with the thermometer below zero.

Reeves was a native of Woolwich, and as a boy attracted the attention of the officers of the garrison by his musical talent. He began his career as a baritone, and the real register of his voice was not discovered for some time. Even in those early days his throat was most susceptible to cold and fatigue, and after any severe exertion he was liable to spit blood. Much of his subsequent success was due to the care taken of him by his wife, who sacrificed her own musical career for the sake of looking after that of her husband. She took as much care of him as a trainer does of the favorite for the Derby, and during years and years waited for him behind the scenes with beef tea, gargles, and other restoratives. The report about Reeves's habits of intoxication arose from his fondness for beef tea. He was accustomed to carry about with him a pocket-flask of that nutritious but insipid beverage, and persons seeing him constantly interviewing the little bottle jumped at the conclusion that it contained brandy. He was never liked personally by his brother artists. His jealousy of the success of other singers was extreme, and he could not hide it. On one occasion he was on a tour with a concert party, among whom was a rising contralto, who now takes the foremost place among English singers, and commands a larger fee than Reeves himself. Unfortunately for the harmony of the evening, the audience applauded this lady more than they had the tenor, and on her return to the green-room Reeves grossly insulted her and refused to sing again. The manager, however, forced him to continue the tour.

When the Kirafls brought to Detroit their spectacular play, Around the World in Eighty Days, they had one of the stage-settings representing the deck of a steamer. The spectator was supposed to look along the deck from stem to bow, instead of getting a side-section view, as he does in that later-launched craft, Pinafore. This steamer had two masts and the regulation funnel, and as the boat was running against time, and the fuel was exhausted, they cut most of the ship to pieces to keep the pot boiling. At the end of the act the steamer was supposed to sink. The masts and the funnel went down beautifully, but the deck refused to move, and the extraordinary marine view was given of the masts sinking gradually through the deck, while the crew danced with rage at not getting a chance to drown. A good deal of knocking was heard below, and suddenly, just as the masts were disappearing, down went the deck, and up came the blue-cloth waves.

When the Crook struck Detroit the spectacle had the usual electrical effect. A splendid orchestra accompanied the troupe, and the music they pounded out drew forth tumultuous applause. One light-fingered individual with a piccolo was particularly popular, and his mocking-bird and whip-poor-will business brought down the house in a way that was disgusting to the lovers of classical music. But there was an unseen and energetic individual that earned his salary manfully. He was situated at the right-hand corner of the depths in which the orchestra are seated. He manipulated a triangle, a muffled drum, a metalophone, a pair of cymbals, a young gong, and another instrument that went "swish, swish, swish," when he shook it. He worked everything by turns, and nothing long.

We knew all the machines he operated except the one that went "swish," and that puzzled everybody. Some thought the noise was made by rubbing a couple of brushes together, and others didn't know. One lanky, long-haired party, evidently from Kalamazoo, stood it as long as he could. Chucking his soft hat under his arm, he walked down the aisle to the orchestra pit, and placing both his hands on the railing, gazed over at the industrious musician for a full minute. Then, with a broad smile of supreme satisfaction, he walked back to his seat, the observed of all observers. As he sat down beside his equally lank companion, the latter whispered, "What is it, Jim?"

Jim answered, in a deep, coarse voice, plainly audible all over the house:

"Durn'd if 'twasn't a lot o' peas in a sieve."

This brought down the house, and made Jim and his friend blush deeply.

He was right about the peas, but the sieve was a tambourine.

Mlle. Blanc, the wealthy daughter of the M. She came up beaming. "How do you like my new bonnet, heavenliest?" He over his newspaper—"Very well, very well—what there is of it! In future, when we go to the theatre I shall sit behind you and enjoy myself."

A well-known manager was applauding a pretty actress the other evening in a New York theatre, when he suddenly discovered that it was one of his former wives who had married some other man. He stopped applauding and began hissing; which proves the force of prejudice.

When you find a sun-bonnet floating around on the surface of a pond, it is not always safe to conclude that there is a woman at the bottom of it. She may have eloped with the hired man, and thrown the bonnet in there so as to get a good start while the neighbors are dragging the pond and the husband is trying to beat down the undertaker on the price of a rose-wood coffin.

A New Haven belle, according to the Register, tired of living an aimless, plague-painting life, has actually taken to cooking. She dumped the contents of her rouge-box in her first pan of dough instead of saleratus to be sure, but the beautiful rose tint imparted to the bread after it was baked amply atoned for the error. It was ornamental cooking merely. It wasn't intended for dietetic purposes.

A bill to prevent female walking-matches was offered in the New York Legislature, but a bill to prevent female minstrel and ballet shows will never be heard of there. There are too many old men among the members to entertain such a measure.

"These goods are cut bias, lady," said the sales gentleman. "Are they, indeed!" she exclaimed. "I didn't know that you manufactured garments." "No more we don't, lady." "Then why do you say 'they are cut by us,' young man?" The look of bewilderment that overcame the face of that young person was most pathetic. Fortunately, the joke didn't get through his skull. It would have had a lonely time of it there.

There was uproar in a Philadelphia theatre recently. A caged lion from a menagerie had been introduced on the stage, with marked success. The curtain had gone down, and the stage was crowded with actors and actresses. Nero was led quietly to his stage, some ten feet behind, by W. Thompson, of Forepaugh's, who had him in charge during the day. Just at this moment, Jack, a large and rather ferocious-looking dog, approached the lion's cage. Just as soon as Nero beheld Jack he arose to his feet, and with a roar which startled all, bit at one of the iron bars, which parted as though it had been made of wood. In a twinkling another bar was snapped by his vigorous jaws. All this was done so quickly that the second bar had gone before the owner of the dog had time to cry out: "My God! the lion's getting out!" Instantly there was a rush from the stage. Several actors and actresses fled into the street in their stage costumes by the back-door. Jack himself stood on the defensive, as though he was willing to chance an encounter with the king of the forest. Before, however, Nero had had time to snap the third bar, which would have given him liberty, Keeper Thompson secured the chain which was fastened around the animal's neck.

A wealthy English parvenu, who began life with a lapstone on his knee, invited Kulak, the great pianist, to dinner, and immediately after the meal insisted on his playing for the company. Kulak complied, and invited the snob to a dinner at his residence on the following Sunday. After the meal Kulak astonished his guests by placing a pair of old shoes before his rich parvenu friend. "What are these for?" queried the latter. Kulak replied: "Last Sunday you did me the honor to invite me to dinner, and insisted upon my paying with music. I have returned the compliment, and require my shoes to be mended. Every man to his trade."

Senator Christy's unfortunate matrimonial venture will not tend in the least to discourage elderly gentlemen who are inclined to take unto themselves young wives. The Senator's mistake was not in picking out a juvenile, but a red-haired girl, with a temper of her own.

An Icelandic youth has written a five-act tragedy entitled "Sigridur Eyyjafjardarsol." We have often wondered why some one didn't write a play thus entitled. It will be worth a small fortune to hear the young man who goes out between acts for cloths attempt to pronounce the name of the tragedy.

One night Toole, the well-known actor, occupied a private box during the first performance of an opera at the Theatre Royal, Dublin. No sooner had the gods, with whom he was a great favorite, caught sight of him than a perfect storm of voices filled the house. Cries of "Toole! Toole!" "Sing us 'A Horrible Tale,' Toole!" "Dodger Toole!" "Toole, me bye, get up yid ye and jine the oporoi!" It was not until the comedian had made a little speech, and promised to appear the following week, that the "oporoi" ceased.

A PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE.

Our Democratic Correspondent for Hugh J. Jewett.

MR. ARGONAUT—SIR: Doubtless you believe, and certainly I think, that you are publishing a Republican newspaper, therefore it is important to your readers to know what the Democrats are driving at as the Presidential campaign approaches. Well, we have no secrets which the American people may not know. I had just as lief tell all I know about politics as not.

We are in a little pool of trouble. The fact is, you Republicans are trying to nominate "owd Sammy" Tilden for us, and we are anxious to nominate old Third Term for you. We may both succeed in our efforts, but I hope we shall not. We can both do better for each other, and for the afflicted country we inhabit. There is little further to go in this country in search of a fit man to be President than there is in the search for a fit man to be justice of the peace. The trouble seems to be in finding a man fit to be a candidate—one who has a character well enough known to save him, or partly save him, from the ephemeral damnation of a million scribblers and squibblers. These remarks, Mr. Editor, need not apply to yourself or myself, as there is probably no danger that either of us will be nominated, or elected, for President; and certainly neither of us would, for political effect, aim to scribble away into thin blatherskism the good name or fair fame of any capable candidate.

But there are men in these United States to-day who live in hourly expectation of being struck by the lightning of vox populi; then, again, there are a few—a choice few—who may be stricken partly unawares. Among this few on the Democratic side of home-thought is HUGH J. JEWETT, formerly of Ohio, but now a citizen of New York State.

The average Democrat of California, and many people who are not Democrats, would like to vote for Allen G. Thurman for President, knowing his great ability as a statesman, his renown as an advocate and judge of the laws, as well as his inborn sympathy with the average voter; but there may be reasons why politicians and men of much money power will not permit the nomination of Allen G. Thurman; and in such case we may not have a chance to vote for him, however much we may desire to do it.

If not Thurman, who then? All things considered with reference to the probability of carrying the States of New York and Ohio, no man among sound and safe Democrats comes nearer to answering the need than HUGH JEWETT.

The writer hereof lived in the same Ohio town and trained in the same political party with Mr. Jewett for ten years; and while this statement may not greatly enhance his Presidential chances, it does show that I ought to know the man.

There is only one objection that can be made to Mr. Jewett, and, if the American people have sense enough to look this objection coolly and fairly in the face, it is no objection at all. The objection is, that he is a railroad man. It is true, too, but it is not any too true. I remember very well the time when Mr. Jewett was, by the courts of law in Ohio, appointed receiver of the broken-down business of the Central Ohio Road. That was his first employment as a railroad man. Everything of the business was at odds and ends. The road was in debt, was paying badly; the engines and trains were being taken by attachment as they passed through the towns along the line; the employees were growling and threatening. But Mr. Jewett, with a rare patience and firmness, steered the road through all these troubles, and was getting the business to run smoothly, when, one bright morning in July, 1857, the great Breslin-Gibson defalcation of $800,000 in the State treasury of Ohio burst upon the financial sky like a bomb, and with it came a horrible July black frost, which mowed the young heads of the filling grain over half the State. Credit became a myth; banking houses burst in every direction; everybody tried to pay everybody else with depreciating bank paper, and consequently all sorts of business, as "the lamented martyred President" would say, "went hell-west and crooked."

This state of affairs struck the Central Ohio Railroad a fearful blow. It staggered beneath the shock. Jewett was everywhere, actively, yet not noisily, keeping it from sinking. Success seemed to crown his efforts, and the road was steadily but very slowly working forward. At this juncture Mr. Jewett was called away on business of the road. Hardly was his back turned when the rumor went afloat that "the Central Ohio has been assigned to the Baltimore & Ohio, and the men—the general class of employees—who have trusted the road on back pay will all be swindled." Whoop! How the rumor flew from one end of the road to the other! At Zanesville—midway on the line, where the repair shops, etc., were located—a strike commenced among the employees of the road. Meetings of indignant workmen were held in the market-house of the town; resolutions were passed, cuss-words speeches were made, and a committee appointed to stop the trains as they came in. The committee was a success. Nearly every train as it came in was boarded and peacefully captured, and either then and right there set off on a side-track, or else run through to the end of the line and sided there.

Stockholders and bondholders of the road rushed about among the men, explaining, and trying to explain, that it was the effect of "hard times" and tough luck, and not any intention to wrong them, that made the trouble. No. The men would believe nothing. The mischief-maker and "the agitator" were among them. Confidence was destroyed and business rapidly coming to a disastrous end. In the midst of this confusion and peril, Jewett came steaming along the deserted road; his lone locomotive yelling into the depot among the buzzing and gesticulating crowd; and as he jumped upon the platform and entered the office, a brakeman, who had got pretty druuk in honor of the occasion, leered into Jewett's firm and anxious face as it passed by, and then said, in brief description of the exact state of the case: "The old man's just a-bilin'." He was "bilin'"; but he did not "bile over"—he seldom does. What did he do? He simply gathered his personal friends, and he and they borrowed the money on private account to pay the men. And it was no easy thing to borrow good money that day, even on the best of security. The men were called into a meeting of their own in the market-house. Mr. Jewett addressed the meeting, saying, in his deep, gruff, but not unpleasant voice: "Men, you shall have your money. You ought to know that I would not permit you to be robbed of your wages, even if the company were going into bankruptcy; but there is nothing of the kind taking place. You know what kind of times these are—they are times in which men should bear and forbear. We cannot better things by swindling you; you can not help the case by crippling us. It is very hard for us to raise the money at this time, but we have raised it, and your money is ready for you. You men who belong on the delayed trains will meet me at the office after this meeting adjourns; the men of the shops will meet at the round-house to-morrow at ten o'clock A. M. Now, men, go home, or about your work, and let this affair end right here; and remember, that no man was ever employed by me or for me and failed to get his pay; and no man ever shall fail to get his pay when I can get it for him." The men believed him and got their pay. The Central Ohio Railroad gradually recovered, until years afterward it consolidated with the Baltimore & Ohio; and from that day to this, whenever Mr. Jewett takes hold of a railroad its credit improves, and its employees are the last to enter into a strike or a riot. That is the sort of railroad man he is. He is no railroad king, no "wrecker."

Mr. Jewett is a lawyer by profession, and when he took charge of the Central Ohio had a lucrative practice in the law-firm of Jewett & O'Neill, in Zanesville, Ohio.

He was born in Maryland about sixty years ago, but came early in life to Ohio and settled in Belmont County, where he married, in St. Clairsville, the younger, if not the youngest, daughter of Ezra Ellis. I think Judge Kennon, of St. Clairsville, George W. Monypenny, Indian Commissioner under President Pierce, Isaac Eaton, of Kansas, and ex-Governor Wilson Shannon, of Ohio and Kansas, married four other of the Ellis girls. At all events, these men are—except Shannon, who is dead—brothers-in-law of Mr. Jewett. Mr. Jewett had three brothers, all good lawyers, and all, I think, now dead. He has served in the State Senate of Ohio. He was nominated and ran for Governor of Ohio against David Todd in 1861, and was beaten, as he expected to be when he accepted the nomination, on account of the prejudice then existing against any man who adhered to the Democratic organization. Although "Davy" Todd never saw the day that he was any better patriot than Hugh J. Jewett, as was proved not only by Jewett's utterances and actions at the time, but by the further fact that his own son, though under age and subject to his father's full legal control, was among the first to take up arms and go to the front, where he made a good record, for a boy, until he was severely wounded and crippled for life.

Since Mr. Jewett ran for Governor in 1861, he has been elected to Congress from Ohio—the Central District; and while serving in Congress he was offered the receivership and presidency of the Erie Railroad, which institution was then sinking into bankruptcy and exhaustion from the manipulations of Fisk, Gould, et al. Under Mr. Jewett's management the kinks have been taken out of Erie, and the business of the road runs straight as a string—straight as a straight string.

In religion, Mr. J. is a Quaker, but not a non-combatant. He is the grandson of Hugh Judge, a distinguished Quaker preacher, who died years ago in Belmont County, Ohio. His Quaker origin and education is pretty good evidence to the initiated that he never was much struck after forced servitude, while I can assert without fear of truthful contradiction that he was never addicted to the agitation which brought on "the late unpleasantness."

Mr. Jewett is a neatly and compactly built man of about five feet nine inches in height, with dark hair and eyes, of a grave and dignified countenance. Such is my recollection of his personal appearance when I last saw him in 1864; he may have grown gray since then.

His personal character is clean of all scandal. He is a solid citizen, an honest business manager, a good lawyer, a safe man, and a sound Democrat. J. W. GALLY.

People who have a weakness for believing that the number thirteen is unlucky, says the Independence Belge, are requested to meditate upon the following fact, the authenticity of which is vouched for: A young soldier, Serigeries by name, was born on the thirteenth of the month of January, 1855. He lived at Brussels in a house numbered thirteen. On Friday, February 13, 1875, he was drafted into the army by virtue of having drawn the number thirteen. A lottery ticket was inherited by him bearing the number thirteen, which has lately drawn a prize of two hundred thousand francs. Which reminds one that Mr. Whitelaw Reid recently gave some bits of experience upon the point of thirteen at dinner, one of which is worth reporting. At the time of the Shepherd Ring scandals in Washington, Mr. Reid dined one day at a gentleman's house in that city. There were just thirteen persons at the table, and the fact was commented upon. During the dinner Mr. Reid was served with a writ of arrest in one of the vexatious suits, by means of which certain persons at the capital sought to punish him for the Tribune's boldness of speech, and this untoward event appeared, according to the superstition, to mark Mr. Reid as the doomed thirteenth guest. The superstition being thus brought to mind, Mr. Reid made a list of the persons present, and, although the dinner occurred many years ago, there is not one of its guests who is not in sounder health to-day than he was at the time when the thirteen dined together. One such fact as this is a complete, logical refutation of the teaching of the superstition.

Somebody who delights in spoiling poetry says that the pansy face looks like the countenance of a skate when pressed against the glass sides of an aquarium.

A little girl being asked, on the first day of school, how she liked her new teacher, replied: "I do not like her; she is just as saucy to me as my mother."

Painting on silk is not so popular as it has been. The effect on dresses is too refined, and it takes too much time. In fact, it doesn't pay.

The Bridge.

I stood on the bridge at midnight,
As the clock was striking the hour,
And the moon rose over the city
Behind the dark church tower.

Among the long black rafters
The wavering shadows lay,
And the current that came from the ocean
Seemed to lift and bear them away.

As sweeping, eddying through them
Rose the belated tide,
And streaming into the moonlight
The sea-weed floated wide.

And, like those waters rushing
Among the wooden piers,
A flood of thoughts came o'er me
That filled my eyes with tears.

How often, oh, how often,
In the days that had gone by,
I stood on that bridge at midnight,
And gazed on that wave and sky.

How often, oh, how often
I had wished the ebbing tide
Would bear me away on its bosom,
O'er the ocean wild and wide.

For my heart was hot and restless,
And my life was full of care,
And the burden laid upon me
Seemed greater than I could bear.

But now it has fallen from me—
It lies buried in the sea,
And only the sorrows of others
Throw a shadow over me.

And I think how many thousands
Of care-encumbered men,
Each bearing his burden of sorrow,
Have crossed the bridge since then.

Forever and forever,
As long as the river flows—
As long as the heart has passions,
As long as life has woes—

The moon and its broken reflections
And its shadows shall appear,
As the symbols of love in heaven,
And its wavering image here. —Longfellow.

Tubal Cain.

Old Tubal Cain was a man of might
In the days when the earth was young,
By the fierce red light of his furnace bright
The strokes of his hammer rung;
And he lifted high his brawny hand
On the iron glowing clear,
Till the sparks rushed out in scarlet showers
As he fashioned the sword and spear.
And he sang, "Hurrah for my handiwork!
Hurrah for the spear and sword!
Hurrah for the hand that shall wield them well!
For he shall be king and lord."

To Tubal Cain came many a one,
As he wrought by his roaring fire,
And each one prayed for a strong steel blade,
As the crown of his desire;
And he made them weapons sharp and strong,
Till they shouted loud in glee,
And gave him gifts of pearls and gold,
And spoils of forest free.
And they sang: "Hurrah for Tubal Cain,
Who hath given us strength anew!
Hurrah for the smith! hurrah for the fire!
And hurrah for the metal true!"

But a sudden change came o'er his heart
Ere the setting of the sun,
And Tubal Cain was filled with pain
For the evil he had done.
He saw that men, with rage and hate,
Made war upon their kind;
That the land was red with the blood they shed
In their lust for carnage blind.
And he said: "Alas, that ever I made,
Or that skill of mine should plan,
The spear and the sword, for men whose joy
Is to slay their fellow-man!"

And for many a day old Tubal Cain
Sat brooding o'er his woe;
And his hand forbore to smite the ore,
And his furnace smoldered low;
But he rose at last with a cheerful face,
And a bright, courageous eye,
And bared his strong right arm for work,
While the quick flames mounted high;
And he sang: "Hurrah for my handiwork!
And the red sparks lit the air—
"Not alone for the blade was the bright steel made,"
And he fashioned the first plowshare.

And men, taught wisdom from the past,
In friendship joined their hands;
Hung the sword in the hall, the spear on the wall,
And plowed the willing lands;
And sang: "Hurrah for Tubal Cain!
Our staunch good friend is he;
And, for the plowshare and the plow,
To him our praise shall be.
But while oppression lifts its head,
Or a tyrant would be lord,
Though we may thank him for the plow,
We'll not forget the sword." —Charles Mackay.

The Poet's Song.

The rain had fallen, the Poet arose,
He passed by the town and out of the street,
A light wind blew from the gates of the sun,
And waves of shadow went over the wheat.
And he sat him down in a lonely place,
And chanted a melody loud and sweet,
That made the wild-swan pause in her cloud,
And the lark drop down at his feet.

The swallow stopt as he hunted the bee,
The snake slept under a spray,
The wild-hawk stood with the down on his beak,
And stared, with his foot on the prey.
And the nightingale thought, "I have sung many songs,
But never a one so gay,
For he sings of what the world will be
When the years have died away." —Tennyson.

A Famous Painting, and the Strange Events Therewith Connected.

[ADAPTED FROM THE FRENCH OF HENRI MURGER.]

For five years Marcel had been engaged upon his famous painting, the "Crossing of the Red Sea." For five years this masterpiece of art had been annually refused at the exhibition. By dint of its numerous journeys from the artist's studio to the Louvre, and back again, the painting had acquired such a thorough knowledge of the road that if it had been placed upon rollers it would have gone there by itself. Marcel, who had entirely repainted it a dozen times, attributed its ostracism to personal hostility on the part of the jury. He had therefore composed in their honor a sort of hand-book of abuse, which was received with the utmost enthusiasm in all the studios of Paris.

Notwithstanding these repeated rebuffs, Marcel was not discouraged. He was of the firm opinion that this work was the only worthy successor to Raphael's "Last Supper." So each year, at the time of the exhibition, he sent the painting again to the jury. Each time, however, in order to evade the vigilance of his enemies, the jurymen, he would modify some detail and change the title of the work. Thus, upon one occasion, it arrived at the Salon under the name of "The Passage of the Rubicon." But, alas! Pharaoh, only partially disguised under Caesar's mantle, was recognized, and repulsed with all due honors. The following year Marcel spread a coat of snow over the ground, planted a leafless tree in one corner, changed his Egyptians into grenadiers, and christened it: "The Crossing of the Beresina upon the Retreat from Moscow." But the jury were not duped by this new stratagem. They recognized a certain parti-colored horse, and there were not enough blackballs for the vote which followed.

"How can they refuse this child of my genius, without waves of shame as red as my sea covering their faces? But I see their disgraceful plan: they wish to force me to throw aside my brush—to even throw myself from the window in despair! But little do they know the human heart. From this date I will cease to wait for the annual exhibition. My painting shall become a Damoclesian sword, suspended over their heads. Once a week, henceforth, I shall send it to each man's house—in the bosom of his family will he receive it. It will embitter his life, it will poison his domestic joys. One by one they will become mad, and when all are straight-jacketed I shall smile again."

Some days after, when Marcel had already forgotten his plans of vengeance against his persecutors, he received a visit from Father Medicis—otherwise Solomon Medicis, a Jew well known to all Bohemia. Father Medicis dealt in all kinds of bric-à-brac. He sold furniture-sets all the way from fifteen francs to fifteen thousand. His shop was a sort of enchanter's cave, where everything could be found. He was known by all literary men; he was intimate with all artists. He would exchange cigars for canards, slippers for sonnets, fresh fish for fiction; he would talk at so much per hour to reporters in quest of scandal; he would procure seats for you in the legislative chamber; he would get you invitations to private balls; he would furnish seedy artists with lodgings in exchange for copies after the great masters; he would procure you admission behind the scenes of the theatre; he would ensure your dramas being played there. He had in his head twenty-five thousand addresses, and would give you the name, residence, and family secrets of any celebrity—for a consideration.

Sueh was Father Medicis. A stray leaf from his day-book will give a better idea of the many-sidedness of his business than pages of description:

It will be seen by the foregoing extracts upon what a gigantic scale the business of Father Medicis was arranged.

When he entered the Bohemians' domicile the Jew saw at a glance that the time was a propitious one. In fact, Marcel and his three friends—Schaunard, the musician, Rodolphe, the poet, and Colline, the philosopher—were engaged in discussing the question of dinner. It was a Monday—fatal day! It was the first of the month—sinister date! His appearance was therefore hailed with joy, for all knew that he was too economical of his time to waste it in visits of politeness. "Good evening, gentlemen," he began. "How is your health?"

"Colline," remarked Rodolphe, "exercise the duties of hospitality, and offer our guest a chair—a guest is sacred. I salute you, O Medicis!" he added.

Colline advanced a chair which resembled bronze in its elasticity. The Jew dropped into it, and was about to complain of its unyielding disposition, when he suddenly thought him that he had himself sold it to Colline, and maintained a discreet silence upon the subject. As he seated himself, his pockets gave forth a mellow, silvery sound, which threw the Bohemians into a gentle reverie.

"Monsieur Marcel," said Medicis, "I have come to make your fortune. In a word, I come to offer you an opportunity to enter the temple of artistic fame. Art, you must know, Monsieur Marcel, is an arid desert, of which glory is the oasis."

"Father Medicis," replied Marcel, "here, lying upon the coals of impatience, I implore you by all you hold most dear—in the name of Fifty Per Cent., your revered patron saint—to be brief!"

"Very well," returned Medicis, "this is the case: a rich amateur is at present engaged in making a collection of paintings which is destined to be the wonder of Europe. He has commissioned me to procure for him a number of remarkable works. I have therefore come for the purpose of purchasing your painting, 'The Crossing of the Red Sea.'"

"Cash?" said Marcel.

"Cash," replied the Jew, jingling the argentine contents of his pockets.

"Father Medicis," said Marcel, "to you will I leave the honor of setting a price upon this priceless work."

The Jew placed upon the table fifty bright, new, silver crowns.

"Very good," said Marcel, "to begin with. But what follows?"

"Monsieur Marcel," said Medicis, "you know well that my first word is always my last. I will not add another franc. But pause—reflect! Fifty crowns—why, that's one hundred and fifty francs. One—hundred—and—fifty—f-r-a-n-c-s—that's the money, that is!"

"Oh, pooh!" said the artist, "why, there's at least that much cobalt in Pharaoh's robe. Come, come—be fair, O son of Abraham—and square as well. Make it four piles instead of three—equalize the thing—let's talk in round numbers!"

"Not another franc," said Father Medicis, "this is my last word. But I'm not a mean man. I tell you what I'll do—if you accept I'll invite the crowd to dinner—any kind of wine, as much dessert as you like, and after dinner I will pay cash—GOLD!"

"He is silent," said Colline, gravely rapping thrice upon the table. "Is it agreed?—it is."

Medicis treated the Bohemians in tip-top style. He caused to be placed before them a host of things which had previously remained to them completely unpublished. It was on this occasion that the Lobster ceased to be a myth to Schaunard, and he contracted for that gorgeous creature a passion verging upon delirium.

The four Bohemians left the table as drunk as fiddlers. Intoxication is always most deplorable, but on this occasion it had nearly been fatal to Marcel. In passing before the dwelling of his tailor he endeavored to awaken that slumbering fraction of humanity for the purpose of paying a long-standing bill. Fortunately, however, a glimmer of reason still shone athwart the wine-befogged brain of Colline, and he stayed his friend from this dreadful action.

On the morrow of the Medicis banquet, Marcel, Schaunard, Colline, and Rodolphe slept very late. The fumes of last night's wine still affected them, and at first not a man of them recollected what had passed. As the bell in the neighboring tower clanged forth the noon hour they regarded each other with melancholy smiles.

"Hark to the bell which calls mankind to table!" said Marcel.

"True," replied Rodolphe, "it is the solemn hour at which the world doth eat."

"Ah," sighed Schaunard, "square meals of my childhood, whither have ye flown?"

"Only to think," said Marcel, "that at this moment in Paris there are probably a hundred thousand chops on the gridiron!"

"And as many beefsteaks," groaned Rodolphe.

The irony of fate was such that in an adjoining restaurant the waiters were bawling at the tops of their voices the names of various appetizing dishes.

"Will those scoundrels never stop?" grumbled Marcel. "Gentlemen," said Colline, gravely, pointing to a weathercock upon a neighboring roof, "we shall not eat to-day—the wind is north—the elements therefore unfavorable."

"And why so?" asked Marcel.

"It is an atmospherical observation," continued the philosopher. "The north wind signifies abstinence, while the south wind indicates pleasure and good cheer. These are what philosophers call warnings from on high."

When he was fasting, Gustave Colline's humor was simply ferocious.

Suddenly, Schaunard, who had thrust his hand into one of his abysmal pockets, withdrew it with a cry of anguish: "Help! Help! There's something in my coat!" he shouted, striving to free his fingers from the clutches of a live lobster.

His cry was echoed by another. Marcel had mechanically put his hand into his own pocket, and there discovered the money given him by the Jew the night before. Memory returned to all four at once. Marcel placed his wealth upon the table, and the Bohemians saluted the glittering pile with frenzy.

"But where did that thing come from?" said Marcel, gazing at the lobster, which was gravely promenading the room.

"Oh," said Schaunard, "now I think of it, I was poking around Medicis's kitchen last night, and I suppose the reptile must have accidentally fallen into my pocket. The creatures are near-sighted, I believe."

"Gentlemen," cried Colline, "look, look! The wind has shifted to the south—we shall eat to-day!"

"You'd better believe we shall!" said Marcel.

The bill of fare was considered with a gravity befitting the occasion. After a lengthy discussion it was settled, and among the other articles appeared the agreeable titles of Lobster. Pâté.

Brochette.
Omelette. Dessert.
Coffee.
Wine at indiscretion.

The chimney was thrown into a state of sputtering surprise by the appearance of a fire—something almost unknown to it.

Marcel, however, was inexcusably careless. He had a letter to send, and in confiding it to the porter he allowed that functionary to perceive a quantity of money. No sooner had Marcel left him, than the porter hastened to the landlord with the astounding news.

"Monsieur Benoit," said he, breathlessly, "you know the artist on the sixth floor?"

"Yes," replied the landlord; "that fellow who had the impudence to borrow money of me to pay an installment on account. Yes, I know—I gave him notice to leave yesterday."

"He's just loaded down with coin to-day—I saw it a few moments ago. You'd better go and strike him before it's all gone."

"You are right," said Monsieur Benoit, "quite right. I will go immediately."

In the meanwhile the four Bohemians had drawn up to the table. They were mighty trenchermen, and did the repast ample justice. The snow was falling without, but within the fire burned brightly, and jollity reigned. Suddenly a knock was heard. Marcel went to the door. Upon the threshold was a gentleman with an agreeable smile and a somewhat faded dressing-gown. It was the landlord.

"Ah," said he, smiling affably upon the terror-stricken Bohemians, "ah, gentlemen, I am rejoiced to find you so pleasantly employed; and he fixed his eye upon the remains of the banquet.

"Ah, how fortunate!" cried Marcel, "Colline, a chair and a glass for Monsieur Benoit. We were just about to drink your health, sir. Colline, there, delivers the most touching toasts. Commence over again, Colline."

"No, gentlemen," said the landlord, "excuse me—I will not interrupt your festivities," and he unfolded a paper.

"What is that document?" said Marcel.

The landlord's restless eye roamed over the room, and detected the pile of gold and silver resting upon the mantel-piece.

"That," said he, "is a receipt, which I have already had the honor of presenting to you."

"So you have," said Marcel, "so you have. It was on a Friday—the 8th of October—at fifteen minutes after twelve o'clock, P. M."

"It is all signed and in form," said Monsieur Benoit, "and if you could settle the little bill—"

"But sit down, Monsieur Benoit, sit down, and take a glass of wine," said Marcel, compelling him to do so. "Well, monsieur, now that we are talking of business, I received a legal document from you yesterday."

"It was a notice to quit," said Monsieur Benoit.

"Ah, yes—a notice to quit. Yes, that's what I wanted to see you about. I would prefer not to go. The house pleases me, the street is an agreeable one, a fall upon the stairs would not be fatal—in short, a thousand things endear these walls to me."

"But," said the landlord, waving his receipt, "you haven't paid your last month's rent."

"Yes, yes, very true, I have not. However, it will be paid—that is all right."

But the landlord continued to stare at the money on the mantel-piece, and such was the intensity of his gaze that the coins seemed to wriggle beneath it.

"I am pleased to have arrived at a time when you can settle the little account without inconvenience," proffering the receipt to Marcel, who took three pieces from the mantel and placed them on the table, at some distance from his creditor.

Schaunard, Colline, and Rodolphe looked on with visible inquietude.

"Come, Monsieur Benoit," said Marcel, "I am sure you will not refuse to try a glass of this old Burgundy with me," and he poured a brimming one.

"Ab," said the other, smacking his lips, "magnificent." And he extended his hand toward the money.

"One moment," said Marcel, "as I am rather flush just now, I believe I'll pay a month in advance. Young men are foolish, you know, and I might dissipate the money." And, taking sixty francs, he added them to the money already on the table.

"An excellent idea," said the landlord; "indeed, a most excellent idea. I have some blank receipts in my pocket, and I'll fill one out for you."

The other three Bohemians were stupefied.

"But," said Marcel, "there's one thing I don't like—the chimney smokes."

"Why didn't you speak of it before? I'll have the workmen here to-morrow." And, pushing the second receipt to Marcel, he again extended his hand toward the money.

"Oh, don't be in a hurry to leave us, Monsieur Benoit—take another glass."

He did. He took two more. He took several more. He began to maintain his seat with some difficulty, and promised Marcel the most fabulous embellishments to his room. The latter winked to his companions, who were beginning to understand, and they advanced the brandy-bottle. After the first glass the landlord favored the company with an amorous ditty which made even Schaunard blush. After the second, he related his marital misfortunes; and, as his spouse's name was Helen, he compared himself to Menelaus. After the third, a philosophical fit seized him, and he emitted aphorisms like minute-guns: "Life is a river," "Man is but frail," "How sweet is love!" etc., etc. After the fourth glass he became confidential; and, laying his head upon Schaunard's bosom, he imparted to that gentleman's shirt-front the details of a love affair which he was conducting with a young lady whom he called Euphemia. Taking a letter from his pocket, he gave it to Schaunard. It began thus: "My own popsy-wopsy."

"Thaz me," said he; "thazme. I'm her pozzy-wozzy. I've rented her a nice lth establishment, magnific furnshoor. 'Svery dear, but whazmoney? I don't care for money—'mrish. I'll give her tha'money there. Why, where's tha'money gone? I'zgone!"

He was right. It was.

"It is impossible," said Marcel, with cold dignity, "for an honest man, even indirectly, to become a party to such shocking proceedings. My conscience forbids me to place this money in the hands of yonder debauched old man. I will not pay my rent—I will not have that sin upon my soul."

Monsieur Benoit was now upon the floor, engaged in sweet commune with the empty bottles. As he was pursuing this pleasing occupation, the porter entered, in search of him.

"What have you done to my master?" demanded he.

"Nothing," said Colline; "he came for his rent, and as we did not have the money he sat down to drink with us, which he did with so little discretion that he is as you now see him."

"He is so drunk," said Marcel, "that he made out receipts for two months' rent, and gave them to me. Here they are—give them to his wife. We do not wish to profit by his intoxication."

"O Lord!" said the porter, "won't he catch it though, nor nothin'!" And after a vain attempt to elevate his master upon his legs, he made use of those attachments to drag him out of the room. As he shot through the door his affable but now somewhat alcoholic smile still flickered upon his features.

"Well," said Rodolphe, "he will come again to-morrow—he has seen the money."

"When he does I will threaten to expose his love affair to his wife."

During five days the Bohemians lived like princes. A most admirable disorder reigned in the apartment. Upon a bank of oyster shells lay an army of bottles of all sizes, and upon the table every delicacy figured.

On the morning of the sixth day, Colline, as usual, drew up the bill of fare, and submitted it to the rest for approval. It was duly sealed with a cork, and he went to the money-drawer for the necessary lucre. But on opening it he recoiled with a cry of alarm.

"What is the matter?" cried the others.

"The matter is, O my children, that our capital is reduced to thirty sous."

"Thirty sous! Well, well! We must revise the bill of fare. We will begin by expunging the article 'Truffles.'"

In its revised and amended form the bill of fare was Spartan in its simplicity. Upon the table soon appeared, ranged with the utmost symmetry, the following:

Plate of Herrings.
Plate of Potatoes. Plate of Cheese.
Water at discretion.

The four Bohemians seated themselves, and gravely unfolded their napkins.

"It is singular," said Marcel, "but this herring has a sort of a pheasant flavor."

"The herring," said Colline, "is a most nutritious fish, and is only despised by ignorant people."

"But," said Schaunard, "where shall we dine to-day?"

"O man of little faith," said Colline, philosophically, "we shall know to-morrow."

A short time afterward, Marcel discovered in what gallery his masterpiece had found a place. He noticed a large crowd standing before a grocery-store, and joined them. The attraction was a new sign which hung before the establishment. Imagine the painter's pride when he beheld the darling of his heart dangling gracefully in the breeze. It is true, it had been modernized—grocerized, so to speak—by the addition of a steamboat and some bales of goods. But none the less flattering were the comments of the gazing crowd, and the painter continued his homeward way, murmuring to himself, with a gratified smile, "Vox populi, vox Dei!"

OUR OWN POETS.

Then, Now, and Hereafter.

The olden days, the golden days
Of summer sea and shore—
With their gleaming rays through the dreamy haze—
Oh, will they return no more?
To me, dear,
To thee, dear—
And ever the wild waves roar.

The present days, the pleasant days—
How fast they fly, loved heart!
Soon the gleaming prism and flowing chrym
Must beam and stream apart.
For me, dear,
For thee, dear,
Time flies like a hunter's dart.

The coming days, the foaming days!
When life shall spray like wine
In endless motion—a rosy ocean
Sparkling like love divine
For me, dear,
For thee, dear—
Like the ruby Almadine.

OMNIUM GATHERUM.

The Fisherman.

From the German of Goethe.

The waters swelled, the waters rose,
A fishing youth sat nigh,
Gazed at his rod in calm repose
With unrelenting eye.
And as he, glancing, forward bends,
The waters part and spray,
And from the rippling flood ascends
A maid fair as the day.

She sang to him, she said to him:
"Why lustest thou my brood,
With human skill, in human whim,
Out of my homely flood?
Oh, if thou knewest the happy life
The fish lead in the deep,
Thou'dst leave the world, its griefs and strife,
And come with us to sleep."

"The sun by day, the moon by night,
Bathe in the sea their face;
Does not their wave-reflected light
Return with heightened grace?
Makes not the sky, so blue and gay,
Thy heart with longing sore?
Begs not thy face beneath, these stay
With us for evermore?"

The waters swelled, the waters rose,
Played round his ankles bare;
His fond heart swelled, his sore heart rose,
As though his love was there.
She sang to him with all her charms,
The lovely Water Queen;
He sank into her tender arms—
He never more was seen.

HUGO WALDECK.

The Rustic Bridge.

It stands there still, though old and gray,
O'er the rivulet by the spring;
All covered with moss, and rotting away
By the winds and storms from day to day,
While the birds its requiem sing.

Ah, long in that arch of the forest green
It has kept its watch and ward,
While many a nimble sylvan queen,
By the light of the moonbeams faintly seen,
Has merrily danced on the sword.

And fairy music, distinct but low,
By unseen fingers played,
Seemed to rise and fall, to come and go,
Now gayer and faster, anon more slow,
From under the evergreen shade.

And all through the still and starry night
The revel goes on till morn;
Till the first faint blush of the coming light
Has made invisible each wee sprite,
And the bridge is left forlorn.

There May and her lover were wont to meet—
'Tis many long years gone by—
While the old bridge heard the murmur sweet
Of love's soft tones, and heard rustling feet
Mid the leaves so yellow and dry.

And the fond caress, and the last farewell,
When they for a time must part;
"But soon to return to claim my bride,"
Harry said with a smile; but the maiden sighed,
"A shadow stole over her heart."

* * * * *
One wild and cheerless December night
The struggling moonbeams show
To the heavens above a horrid sight,
And the old bridge shrinks aghast with fright
At crimson drops on the snow.

And only the bridge heard the victim's cry
For mercy to ears of lead;
It saw the bright dagger flash out on high—
The treacherous stab was the sole reply,
And the form of poor Harry fell dead.

* * * * *
May sleeps on the hill; for many a year
The daisies above her have grown,
With the dew on each bud like affection's tear,
And the mosses encircle the letters so dear,
Carved deep in the weather-beat stone.

Yet a while and the bridge will itself pass away
With the memories that entwine
Round every old plank with the mosses gray,
And the waters will bear their old friend away
To its grave in the ocean brine.

JAMES DE WITT.

The way ministers are being found guilty of kissing other women but their own wives, proves that you may roll a man under the wheels of theology for years and years, yet you can not squeeze all human nature out of him.

When a woman wants to be pretty she bangs her hair, and when she wants to be ugly she bangs the door.

MEANDERINGS IN SLANG LAND.

There are a great number of cant and slang expressions in use at present that are supposed to be new or nearly new, not a few of which are attributed to California birth. It will surprise the general reader to be informed that many of the cant and slang words and terms daily made use of are—at least, some of them—nearly "as old as Methuselah," and that comparatively few of them, indeed, are the legitimate offspring of the present age, while those of truly Californian origin are not so numerous as is generally supposed. I have spent some considerable time in the investigation of this subject, and I discover that most of the slang and cant expressions of the present day originated hundreds of years ago in London low life, although many may be traced to the Bible, Shakspeare, Horace, the English universities, and to the poets and orators and newspapers and resorts of fashion and frolic of all ages.

The expression, "to blow on" a man, or a thing, is Shakspearean. The following lines may be found in Act III, Scene 7, in "As You Like It": "I must have liberty withal, as large a charter as the wind, to blow on whom I please." "He's a bad man," or "I'm a bad man," is not new. It may be found in Spenser's "Faerie Queene," Book I, Chap. I, Stan. 37; also, in Massinger's play of "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," also, in Shakspeare's "King Henry VIII," Act II, Scene 2: "This bold, bad man!" In the same tragedy, Act IV, Scene 2, is the line: "He was a man of an unbounded stomach," which is a poetical way of denominating a ponderosity of belly a "bay window." The common expression of "It's (or that's) all Dutch to me," may be traced to Shakspeare. In Act I, Scene 2, of "Julius Caesar," may be found this line: "But, for mine own part, it was Greek to me." "All cry and no wool," may be found in Butler's "Hudibras," Part I, Canto 1, line 831: "Or shear swine, all cry and no wool!" We often hear men of bad reputations referred to as "frauds," naughty ministers and canting hypocrites are mentioned as "pious frauds." In Part I, Canto III, line 1145, "Hudibras," is "When pious frauds and holy shifts," etc. "I owe you one," is a felicitous salutation often heard. The line "Thank you, good sir, I owe you one," may be found in Act I, Scene 2, of George Colman's (the younger) play of "The Poor Gentleman." "What will Mrs. Grundy say?" is an interrogatory in Thomas Morton's "Speed the Plough," Act I, Scene 1. "I will see you d—d first!" is an expression that often meets the ear. In "The Friend of Humanity and the Knife-Grinder," written by George Canning, in 1795, there is the line: "I give thee sixpence! I will see thee d—d first!" "That's the kind of hair-pin I am," is new, and came from New York; also, "What do you say?" "Stolen fruits (or kisses) are the sweetest," may be traced to the Bible, in sentiment. In "Proverbs," IX, 17—"Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant." For the original of "What are you giving me?" which is supposed to be a Californianism, I refer the reader to "Genesis," XXXVIII, 16. "You bet!" is a Californianism, although not truly so, as the slang terms "You bet your boots," and "You bet your life," were in use in New York and Boston forty years ago. They were favorite expressions of grown-up boys; and so, also, was "Yes, sir-ee, horse-fly." The word "cheek," as applied to a book-agent or any other impudent person, has been in use in England and America for a hundred years. "Cheese it!" is a very old expression, and has been a slang term in London for hundreds of years; it has lately come into use in California, and perhaps elsewhere. Decker's "Bellman of London," published in 1608, says that "cheese it" is a corruption of cease it, and means leave off, or have done; "cheese your barrikin"—hold your noise, or tongue, or clatter. "That's the cheese" was also in use in London in 1600, and signified anything good, genuine, pleasant, or advantageous. "Hash-house" and "gin-mill" are specimens of Boston slang, and have been in use at the Hub and in other American cities for some forty years. "Hog-wash" originated in New Orleans, and was in use a good deal in the South years ago.

"To go to the bad" has been handed down for nearly two thousand years, and may be traced to Virgil—at least he has an exactly similar phrase: "in pejus ruere." There are many who suppose the word "bilk" as now often applied to a "beat" in California, originated here—that is, the modern application: this is not so; "Bailey's Dictionary of Cant and Flash Sayings," published in London in 1790, says: "Bilk—To defraud, to obtain goods, etc., without paying for them, to get information and experience without paying for it; thus, to bilk the school-master." In the Gypsy vocabulary the word "bilk" signifies a mean, mercenary fellow; in the London slang it means—see "Kent's Modern Flash Dictionary," published in 1825. The slang term "too thin," which has come into use during the past two years, may be found in Smollett's "Peregrine Pickle," published in London in 1761; the exact words are as follows: "This pretext was too thin to impose upon her lover, or deceive the observation of her friend Sophy." "They are too thin" may also be found in Shakspeare, "Henry VIII," Act V, Scene 1: "You were ever good at sudden commendations, Bishop of Winchester. But know I come not to hear such flattery now, and in my presence. They are too thin and bare to hide offenses." The slang term of "he's a brick," as applied to an excellent person, is of classic origin: King Agisilaus, being asked by an ambassador why they had no walls for Sparta, replied that the ambassador was mistaken; then drawing himself up proudly, and pointing to his army, he said: "There are the walls of Sparta—every man you see is a brick!" "Don't count your chickens before they're hatched" is a corruption of a line from Butler's "Hudibras," Part III, line 23: "And count their chickens ere they're hatched." "The cup that cheers but not inebriates" is a misquotation. Cowper, in "The Task," Book IV, line 34: "And the cups that cheer, but not inebriate." "Better late than never" is from Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," part II. "Ways that are dark and tricks that are vain" is from Bret Harte; also "Truthful James," etc. "Don't get your back up" is old, and the expression or idea is taken from a cat, so Decker says, on account of that animal always raising its back when angry; an allusion also sometimes used to jeer a crooked man, as, "So, sir, I see somebody has offended you, for your back is up." "That's all in my eye, Betty Martin" is a slang phrase that has been used by the cockneys of London for hundreds of years, and has given birth to "in a pig's eye," "over the left," "in a horn," "that's all in your eye," etc., of the New Yorkers, Bostonians, and Baltimoreans, and is an answer, as the others are answers, to any one who attempts transparent impositions; the above American expressions are from thirty to forty years old. "Not for Joe," or "Joseph," is American, and came out since the war. "Not if I know myself" is older, and may be traced to Chicago. "To tip the blarney" is Irish, and meant, originally, the telling of a marvelous or magnificent fabrication. The blarney stone is a triangular piece of granite on the very top of an ancient castle of that name, in the County Cork, Ireland, extremely difficult of access, so that to have ascended to it was considered a proof of perseverance, courage, and agility, whereof many have claimed the honor who have never achieved the adventure. To blarney nowadays means to flatter. "That's what's the matter with Hannah" is an American slang term—for the most part, however, borrowed from the English; see "Canting Dictionary," published in London in 1725: "Hannah—a Salopian phrase, to express a matter begun; as 'that's the man as married Hannah!'"

"Bore," a tedious or troublesome man or woman, one who bores the ears of his hearers with an uninteresting tale—a term much in fashion in England in 1700; see Bailey's "Etymological Dictionary," published in London in 1737. The word "bore" is a very proper term with us, and has lost its slang parentage. "Hard-up" is an old English slang term used in the universities. "To settle his hash," "cook his goose," "up to snuff," "throw up the sponge," "give him the bounce" (we now say give him the grand bounce), "in full feather," "to play second fiddle," "to run one's face," "cutting it fat," "drawing it mild," "give us a rest," "he's a dead-beat," "used up," "cleaned him out," "to tackle it," "on the shelf," "up the spout," "to sport a new tile," "that's all gammon," "on the square" (we say "dead on the square"), "a way-up spread" (meaning a superb lunch or dinner), "play or pay," "starchy," "brown study," "bumper" (a full glass), "double first-class man," "stunning," "gift o' the gab," etc., all do duty in a variety of senses in Cambridge and Oxford universities; see "Gentleman's (London) Magazine" for December, 1794; and they also do duty on Kearny, Market, Montgomery, and California Streets here; on Broadway, Wall Street, Fifth Avenue, and Fourteenth Street, New York; on Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Washington and Tremont Streets, Boston, and elsewhere in America; and yet none of the above slang terms originated in our country. "You know what the Governor of North Carolina said to the Governor of South Carolina—it's a long time between drinks," is, in my opinion, the neatest thing in the whole range of American slang. "There's millions in it," from Mark Twain's play of "The Gilded Age," is pleasant; and so also is "By a large majority," "B. T. I.—Big thing on Ice," and "Q. K.—Quite correct," from Ben Woolf's dramatic curiosity of "The Mighty Dollar." Opera bouffe and burlesque have given birth to "lots of slang." The "pretty waiter girl" era in New York was followed by the "blondes" and the "leg drama," and the latter was in turn succeeded by the burial service in "the little church around the corner." Twenty years ago in New York the Democratic drinking-place down town was known as the "Pewter Mug." After "guzzling" was prohibited at the Capitol in Washington, thirsty M. C.'s used to repair to the "hole in the wall," and West Point cadets clandestinely "drowned their sorrows" at "Benny Havens, O!" During the prevalence of the "Maine liquor law" in Massachusetts, twenty-six years ago, Bostonians "threw themselves outside their tods medicinally." The pet of a family is said to "have its nose put out of joint" upon the appearance of an additional member. The "Bowery Boy," as once impersonated by Frank Chanfrau, has passed away, and the "Broadway swell" of thirty years ago now "loafs around" the Windsor. "Step down and out" is an offspring of the celebrated Beecher trial; "addition, division, and silence" comes from Philadelphia; "fell down" and "I should smile" are Californianisms; the "roughs" of all American cities are called either "bullies," "bruisers," "buffers," or "shoulder-hitters;" gamblers are called "knights of the green cloth," and their lieutenants who are sent out after "greenhorns" are called "decoys," "cappers," and "steerers;" in New York there used to be species of "roughs" called "dead rabbits," "Five Pointers," and "Water-Street rats;" the "roughs" of Baltimore were known as "blood tubs" and "plug uglies;" in Philadelphia as "Shiffers" and "Moyamensingers;" in New Orleans as "Tigers." The representative American belle has for the past twenty-five years been known as "Miss Flora McFlimsney of Madison Square." General Grant's visits to Long Branch were called "junketings" by his enemies. "Au reservoir" is often indulged in by funny fellows for Au revoir. "Ta ta" is used by the bogus English swell for good-bye, and also by the American monkey who imitates him. "Thanks" is also one of those sickening ejaculations of the B. E. S., picked up and used by the average American society sharp and small-talk scavenger.

To "stand off the tailor" originated at Cambridge. "Hanging the landlady" is synonymous, and is the newest Californianism. "According to Gunter," "short cut," "guess not," "crack thing," "seedy," "all-fired," "correct thing," "small potatoes" (and) "few in the hill," "a whole team" (and) "a little dog under the wagon," "fizzle," "blue blazes," "gol durn it," "peculiar kink," "an up-hill job," "slick," "handy," "rooster," "nigger night" (applied to Saturday-night courting by young white people throughout New England), "doxology," "sockdologer," "pants," "panties," "unmentionables," "on the quivy vivy," "on the sly," "soft snap," "piece of calico," are all Bostonianisms. The terms "innocent," "acknowledge the corn," "on the fence," "buncombe," "Southron," "high-toned Southern gentleman," "bark up the wrong tree," "I reckon," "slip'try," "great snakes," "pick-aninny," "playing possum," "rifle whisky," "dead shot," "hog and hominy," "wood up," had their origin in the Southern States. The word "flap-jacks" originated on board an American man-of-war; also, "navy sherry." "Deadheads," "that beats the Dutch," "torchlight-procession whisky," "going out to meet a man," "on the half-shell," "modern Greeks," "Mickies," "Murphys," "Jerusalem" (for Chatham Street thirty years ago), are of New York birth. "Dog-gone it" was originally an Indiana ejaculation.

"Pull down your vest," "jim-jams," "got 'em bad," "flying axe-handles," "and that's what's the matter," "dry up," "divide the spoils," "go hire a hall," "take in your sign," "F. F. V.'s," "peg out," "shoot that hat," "wipe off your chin," "how's that for high?" "hump yourself," "it's the man around the corner," "putting up a job," "light out," "scatter," "irrigate," "put a head on him," "big head," "decorated bugle," "erected a mansard over his eye," "no back talk," "bottom dollar," "went off on his ear," "chalk it down," "it isn't a marker," "taking a snifter," "driving another nail," "staving him off," "making it warm," "dropping him gently," "three fingers of clear juice," "piling on the agony," "lobby," "third house," "caucus," "dead gone," "busted," "counter jumper," "scalper," "scrub," "two-forty," "put up or shut up," "throw the bones," "take that in out of the wet," "beer-jerker," "Tom Collins," "bang up," "Kentucky wine," "grubbing checks," "smart Aleck," "toddly blossom," "corner in grain," "too much jaw," "chin music," "swap votes," "top heavy," "bare-footed on top of his head," "tie up that whistle," "a little too fresh," "stem-winder," "bloated bondholder," "tough citizen," "jaw-bone," "champion liar," "irregularities," "chief cook and bottle-washer," "bag and baggage," "taking it all in," "sit down on him," "an ornament" (a mortgage), "beating his way through the world," "taking up the whole sidewalk," "at the lodge," "crookedness," "we make 'em ourselves," "as fine as silk," "nominate your poison," "no heels," "died with his boots on," "old hoss," "everything goes," "make your will," "hunkey dorey," "hold your horses," "galoot," "another man gone wrong," and many others, are nearly all American slang terms, and some of them quite modern.

"Go off and die," "hocked his ulster," "and don't you forget it," "you hear me," "rough deal," "square deal," "in the door," "tied up," "well heeled," "flush times," "snatch him baldheaded," "pool your issues," "go bury yourself," "she's a daisy," "git," "go drown yourself," "stand the racket," "the heathen Chinese," "Chinatown," "give your tongue a vacation," "change your breath," "the Jackson bounce" (a Palace Hotel saying, and means that Jackson, the policeman, gets after noisy children in the hotel court and elsewhere), "Nob Hill," "Tar Flat," "Barbary Coast," "Cliff House brigade," "bonanza kings," "a bad egg," "the sand-lot," "Kearneyism," "go climb a tree," ("up a tree" is old American backwoods slang), "honorable bilks," "plug hats," "black-and-tans," "Dolly Vardens," "sand-lot," "Ben Butler" (a noted sea-lion at the Cliff House), "well fixed," "down to the bed-rock," "hard-pan," "outfit," "pay-dirt," "petered out," "it won't wash," "handed in his checks," "gone to Lone Mountain," "finest climate in the world," "got the drop on him," "vigilantes," "square meal," "slug of whisky," "free-lunch fiend," "broke his back," "the Chinese must go," "John Chinaman," "the boss of the road," "hoodlums" and "hoodlumism," "49er," "quien sabe?" "the Bush fund," "agitators," "bob-tail cars," "workmen" (so-called), "biled shirt," "not as the roads are," "grass is short," "society sharp," "the big board," "to cinch," "to mash," "pans out well" (or otherwise, etc., are all, or nearly all, Californianisms that have attained more or less use and circulation at home and abroad. "Ewaldian answers" is a new term, and finds its way into the newspapers occasionally.

Shakespeare speaks of "crocodile's tears" in "Othello," Act IV, scene 1. Ben Jonson calls an alarmist a "croaker." Shakespeare used the word "flush" as the reverse of "hard-up." The immortal William also uses the words "lay for him" for watch him; he calls a paltry fellow a "patch," thus: "What a pined ninnys this? thou scurvy patch!" The word "party" is nowadays applied to a gentleman or lady derisively. Strange to say, the use is not modern. Get your Bible, turn to Tobit (Apocrypha), Chapter VI, verse 7: "If any evil spirit trouble any, one must make a smoke thereof before the man or the woman, and the party shall be no more vexed." Shakespeare uses the word in the same way in the "Tempest," and Walter Scott uses it as above in "Ivanhoe" and the "Bride of Lammermoor." Swift coins the word "phiz" for face. Bulwer's "Paul Clifford," Butler's "Hudibras," and Byron's "Don Juan" each contain a good deal of slang. Bulwer uses the word "stretch" for hang, "skid" for sovereign, "oliver" for moon, and "killing" for bewitching. The "Noctes Ambrosianae" is full of slang. "He put in the big licks," says North, in speaking of a person who was making great exertions. Thackeray, in his "Lovel, the Widower," calls a young surgeon a "lint-scraper." Lord Chesterfield used the cant word "flog" for whip. "Giving him taffy" (Welsh "soft-sap," or "blarney") was London slang two hundred years ago.

I am not quite sure, but I am of the impression that "fire him out," or "fired out," is a Californianism. "That's a dead give-away" is new—that is, it is only a few years old. "You can't play that on me" is a corruption from Shakespeare. In "Hamlet," Act III, Scene 2, the Prince says: "You would play upon me; do you think I am easier to be played upon? You can't play upon me!" Polonius, in Act II, Scene 2, same tragedy, declared that Hamlet "was gone, far gone," on his daughter Ophelia. The use of the word "boom," in a political sense, first found its way into a San Francisco daily paper. "Yum-yum-yum" signifies osculatory desires, and originated in California. "Me no sabby," or "me sabby," is Anglo-Chinese patois, and has been in use among the lower classes all over the world for hundreds of years. It is very much used in California. It also means acuteness, or cleverness—as that chap has plenty of savy; in French, savez-vous cela?—do you savy that? "Be off!" is slanged at Eton, "amputate your mahogany" (cut stick). The term "uncle" for pawnbroker was in use three hundred years ago in London. To be "spoony" on a girl means to be foolishly attached to one, whether she reciprocates or not. See play of "Everybody's Friend."

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1880. BEN C. TRUMAN.

[CONCLUDED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

Hebe, the Greek goddess of youth, daughter of no less distinguished personages than Jupiter and Juno, was a model for many young ladies of the present day in one particular: she wasn't afraid of work. Of course there wasn't much housework to do, but she personally attended to her mother's chariot, saw that the thoroughbraces were all right, the whip-socket in order, and the axles greased, and with her own fair hands she harnessed the peacocks, and we presume rubbed them down and bedded them after a hard day's drive. There are few daughters born to such regal state who would consent to anything like that. Hercules afterward released her from her menial service—on a writ of Hebeous corpus, perhaps—and married her. But she doubtless wanted a strong man.

THE FATE OF AN EGYPTIAN HAREM.

The New York Times learns that the ex-Khedive of Egypt is in an unhappy state of mind. By care and industry, accompanied by a large outlay, he succeeded while in Egypt in collecting a very fine harem. It was especially rich in what art critics would call "choice examples" of Circassian and Georgian, and it included the best specimens of Egyptian, Turkish, and Syrian girls, besides a small amount of select French moral bric-à-brac. When, in compliance with the enthusiastic desire of his fellow-countrymen, and the foreign consuls, the Khedive abdicated, he took his harem and such valuables as he could lay his hands on, and went to Naples, intending to live a quiet life of study and meditation, surrounded by his harem and his portable property. At Naples his troubles began. The government rented him a fine palace—popularly known as the Favorita—on the shore of the bay, and at the foot of Vesuvius, where he took up his residence and arranged his collection of wives in a series of pleasant rooms. It formed decidedly the best collection of the kind that any Italian city had seen since the days of the Roman Empire, and the ex-Khedive was naturally proud of it. Before very long, however, he found that a harem can not be kept together so easily in Naples as in Cairo. The windows of the palace were not latticed, and the ladies of the harem could not be prevented from looking out at the people in the street. Neither was it practicable to prevent stray Italians from seeing an occasional wife at a window. The eunuchs did their best to keep the harem in subjection, but their efforts were unavailing, and before the ex-Khedive had occupied his palace many weeks he was compelled to notice that his harem was gradually growing smaller. He at once spoke to the chief eunuch, and demanded to know if several of his wives were not missing. The eunuch maintained that, beyond the usual loss of wives by the wear and tear incidental to dressing, no losses had occurred. The ex-Khedive could not thus be deceived. He was confident that seven or eight of his best wives had vanished, and although, owing to the want of a trustworthy catalogue, he could not prove that he was right, he resolved that no more losses should occur without his knowledge. A careful watch soon showed the leak in the harem. Every night a throng of handsome young Italians would appear under the windows of the palace, and a few wives would jump into their arms. In this way a constant drain of wives was in progress, and the alarmed ex-Khedive saw that unless it could be stopped he would soon be wifeless. The Italian Government showed itself cold and heartless. When appealed to by the ex-Khedive, it explained that there was no law under which an Italian could be beheaded for taking one of the ex-Khedive's wives, or the latter prevented from jumping out of the window. In these circumstances he decided to take severe measures, and ordered his entire harem to be tied together by the ankles and chained to a post. To his great dismay, he found that his servants had been corrupted by civilization, and were unwilling to obey orders that would bring them into difficulties with the Italian police. They flatly refused to lay illegal hands upon a single ankle, and the ex-Khedive sadly realized that he was living in a free and Christian country. There was nothing for him to do but to sit up at night and watch his family. He walked up and down the corridors of the palace, bursting into a room whenever he heard a noise, and occasionally catching a wife in the act of climbing out of the window. But this could not last. The want of sleep soon told upon him. Moreover, his wives resented his conduct in watching them; and, whenever he put his head out of the window, the Italians that stood below in the street, watching for wives, and making bets as to who would catch the next one, addressed disrespectful language to him. Thus he was forced to see his harem melting away. Day after day he would walk through the rooms in which he had arranged his collection, and note how many valuable specimens were missing. One day it would be his most costly Circassian who had left him, taking all her back hair with her; and another day it would be a favorite Egyptian who had gone, after solemnly pledging herself never to leave her lord and master. At last it became more than the ex-Khedive could bear. When no less than fifty-seven valuable wives had been lost, the ex-Khedive abandoned the palace and fled to Rome, leaving the remnants of his once unique harem behind him. It is said that the five wives which he left at Naples will probably prove faithful to him, as they are the most unattractive of the lot, and have hitherto failed to find any Italian who would consent to take them. The ex-Khedive, however, has expressed the opinion that he does not care what becomes of them. He has definitely given up the profession of a wife-collector, and he is now living at a Roman hotel as a single man. Perhaps he will try to console himself by collecting postal stamps or other objects less elusive than wives. Meanwhile, the young Neapolitan dandy no longer blocks up the street in front of the Favorita Palace, and his recent athletic sport of catching the ex-Khedive's wives as they threw themselves from the windows is at an end.

The reigning beauty in Paris at the present time is an American girl. She generally is, by the way. An English journal, in describing her, says: "Her head is classical, and she wears her naturally wavy hair in Grecian bandeaux." If her nose were an atom shorter one might admire it more. No one is perfection, of course; but no doubt this American beauty, in order to gain the unequalled admiration of the English editor, would be willing to file off an atom of her nose—make it that much shorter. He further says that "the texture of her neck and shoulders was a thing to throw painters into rapture. It was without morbidezza, but smooth as a rose petal." When the "texture of a young lady's neck and shoulders is without morbidezza, she can afford to have a nose an atom too long.

If some one would successfully start the report that ice-cream spoiled the complexion and made women bow-legged, it would be thousands of dollars in the pockets of the poor but love-stricken young men.

A poet asks: "Who shall go first to the shadowy land—my love or I?" If they contemplate coming to the nether world, we suggest that they toss up a cent—heads, he goes; tails, she goes last.

ALL ABOUT WOMEN.

A fifty-cent fan makes as much wind as a fifty-dollar one.

Why is a Zulu belle like a prophet of old? Because she has not much on 'er in her own country.

The great discrepancy between Mr. and Mrs. Christianity's age is given by the Atlanta Constitution in a few words. He is sixty-three, and she is red-headed.

A Michigan widow who jumped down off a load of hay and knocked down a tramp who made fun of her sun-bonnet had three offers of marriage within a week.

"Is your wife's name Margaret?" asked the hired man. "No," said the farmer; "Marge's short for oleomargarine, and I calls her that 'cause I don't love any but her."

When a good-looking Indian girl has the measles, it always follows that from seven to fifteen of the young bucks in the neighborhood are soon taken down with the same disease.

At a printers' festival, lately, the following toast was offered: "Woman—second only to the press in the dissemination of news." The ladies are yet undecided whether to regard this as a compliment or otherwise. Ah! how true it is.

Mr. Grim, of Des Moines, wants a divorce, because—she says—his wife prayed that lightning might strike him. In all probability she meant the Jersey brand of lightning, and we are not in the least surprised that he yearns for a separation.

Ladies' lunch-parties flourish, and why they should no man can discover, for of all stupidities a lot of women—but no matter. There are always a few tough characters remaining to be pulled to pieces with the Charlotte Russe and ginger-snaps.

A Bridgeport woman unconsciously went to church the other Sunday with two hats on her head—one inside of the other—and a score or more of other women came very near expiring with envy before the error was discovered. They thought it was a new style of hat.

A young woman lost her husband, whom she seemed to adore. Nevertheless, it was remarked that her lids were scarcely damp at the funeral. At the end of some months the young widow went to the theatre, and witnessed a drama full of sorrowful mishaps. She soaked four handkerchiefs, and sobbed bitterly on the bosom of her neighbor. "And yet they said I had no heart!" she whispered, triumphantly.

Mrs. Lathbury, writing in the Nineteenth Century, on "Agnosticism and Women," says: "With their faith that of an ultimate age of ice, and their hope bounded by the grave, what is left to the women of the future but their love alone to tell them of how much happiness and misery they are capable? If such is the only truth possible for mankind, in very mercy let us pause long before we help others to attain to it."

A young girl arrived in London from Scotland. She was about seventeen, and was, she said, the daughter of a Presbyterian minister. She had come to marry a Zulu, and, accompanied by one of the oldest and most ill-favored of these dusky savages, she presented herself to the manager of the Aquarium and made known her wish. In vain he remonstrated with her on her folly. She replied that her heart was given. He suggested that she would only be one of many wives when her contemplated husband returned to Zululand; but she persisted. Finding that it was useless to reason with her, she was told she could not marry without the assent of her parents, and was sent back to Scotland to obtain it. She left, with the remark: "I go, but I will come again for that Zulu, and don't you forget it."

They say that Mary Anderson "isn't afraid of a cow." Of a stage cow perhaps not; but if Mary were in Marin County culling violets and flaming poppies, and a cow of the gentleman sex was to quite unexpectedly appear on the scene, and commence to paw up the earth, and claw sods with his horns, and sing bass louder than stage thunder, and eventually elevate his tail ominously at an angle of forty-five degrees, and make a bee-line for the fair actress, you can stake a fortune that she would, like Conkling, make the greatest effort of her life to get on the other side of the fence, without regard to stile or style. And if she dropped any of her back hair or other articles of wearing apparel in the arena she would generally let them remain there. When a cow of this description begins to paw dirt and switch his tail nervously as a storm-signal, he means business—and very mean business, too!

Mrs. Georgina Weldon, a well-known singer, a handsome and brilliant but impulsive woman, getting into a quarrel with M. Riviere, a Frenchman, who for several years has conducted the Covent Garden (London) Promenade Concerts, wrote privately to several of her friends that she had found Riviere to be a very disreputable person, intimating her intention to drive him out of London. The contents of these letters became known to M. Riviere, who brought an action in the Criminal Court for libel. Mrs. Weldon first apologized and then put in a defense of justification, undertaking to prove both charges, and that they were made with the motive of guarding her friends against a bad man. The Recorder, however, charged strongly against her, and the jury brought in a verdict of guilty, on the ground that, although the charges that he was a bigamist and a fugitive from justice were true, the motive was not a good one. Sentence was deferred until after the decision of a civil suit pending between the parties. This result ought to prove a caution to people who think they can say and write anything so long as it is not printed in a newspaper. Some of our San Francisco boss back-biters and silent slanderers can reflect over this item to their friends' great advantage.

KISSING VERSE.

The Sheep and Kiss Market.

[One of the prettiest of pastorals is the "Lendemain," by Dufresney, the clever poet, who, when Louis XIV. said to him, consolingly, "Poverty is no crime," replied, "No, sire, it's worse." "Le Lendemain" may thus be translated, almost with literalness:]

Phillis, greedier far than tender,
Naught gaining by refusing, I wis,
One day exacted of Clitander
Thirty sheep for a single kiss.

On the next day the youth was gaining—
Prices had ta'en a downward leap,
He from the shepherdess was gaining
Thirty kisses for one sheep.

On the next day, Phillis, tenderer,
Fearing to be denied her bliss,
To the youth did glad surrender her
Thirty muttons for one kiss.

Next day Phillis had been willing
To give both flock and sheep-dog large
For the one kiss she saw the villain
Give Lisette without any charge!

An Old Wretch Sings of Youthful Love.

He kisses me! Ah, now, at last,
He says good-night as it should be—
His great, warm eyes bent yearningly
Above my face, his arms locked fast
About me, and my own eyes dim
With happy tears for love of him.

He kisses me! Last night, beneath
A swarm of stars, he said I stood
His one fair form of womanhood;
And, springing, shut me in the sheath
Of a caress that almost hid
Me from the good his kisses did.

He kisses me! He kisses me!
This is the sweetest song I know,
And so I sing it very low
And faint, and oh, so tenderly
That, though you listen, none but he May hear it as he kisses me.

"How can I make you love me more?"
A thousand times she asks me this—
Her lips uplifted with the kiss
That I have tasted o'er and o'er,
Till now I drain it with no sense
Other than utter indolence.

"How can I make you love me more?"
A thousand times her questioning face
Has nestled in its resting-place
Unanswered, till, though I adore
This thing of being loved, I doubt
Not I could get along without.

"How can she make me love her more?"
Ah! little woman, if, indeed,
I might be frank as is the need
Of frankness, I would fall before
Your very feet, and there confess
My love were more if yours were less.

Since I am old I have no care
To babble silly tales of when
I loved, and lied, as other men
Have done, who boasted here and there
They would have died for the fair thing
They after murdered, marrying.

Since I am old I reason thus:
No thing survives of all the past,
But just regret enough to last
Us till the clouds have smothered us:
Then, with our dead loves, side by side,
We may, perhaps, be satisfied.

Since I am old, and strive to blow
Alive the embers of my youth
And early loves, I find, in sooth,
An old man's heart may burn so low,
'Tis better just to calmly sit
And rake the ashes over it.

At Rebeasal.

There as we stand, and when I say "my love,"
I'll to your side a trifle closer, so;
Good! Now I put my arm around your waist,
Your cue to whisper "Ernest, dear," you know.

That's right, I think. Ah, what is that you say?
The stage directions only say "a kiss?"
Let's see the book. Upon my word, you're right!
And I took two, which clearly was amiss.

I'm glad you called attention to the slip,
Wait till I con the book a moment, then;
For fear my treacherous memory play me false,
Suppose we just run through the scene again.—Puck.

Why Do I Kiss You?

Why do I kiss you?
Not this alone—prompted by friendship merely,
Nor as a lover, strictly speaking, cheerily;
But as a friend, true friend, sincere, confiding,
Whose love's both sympathetic and abiding:
That's why I kiss you!

Why do I kiss you?
I can not tell—yet strangely when I meet thee
(Nor can you tell), we glance, then something draws me;
I know 'tis mutual; your speaking bright eye tells it,
And then, the loving pressure of your sweet lips proves it:
That's why I kiss you!

Why do I kiss you?
Then let me tell: 'Tis but the heart revealing
Its inward feelings by the lips, thus sealing
Untold emotions—so yesterday, to-morrow,
Wishing you countless blessings, and but little sorrow:
That's why I kiss you!

Why do I kiss you?
May I still tell? Because the world is dreary;
So little true, that oft my heart grows weary.
If, then, our hearts be pure, 'tis "love excelling"
Sweet, foretaste of the heavenly, though on earth dwelling!
That's why I kiss you!

THE LETTER BOX.

A Word from Ada Ven.

On Tuesday evening General and Mrs. McDowell gave a dinner-party to Admiral Rodgers and the other officers of the Pensacola, at which twenty-two persons were present. The company adjourned at quite an early hour to the reception at Mrs. Crocker's, where most of our habitual party-goers were assembled. At the entertainments at this house, however, one is not dependent upon the company for their pleasure, as the inspection of the many works of art is alone sufficient enjoyment for any reasonable being. A profusion of flowers, arranged in novel and tasteful designs, added to the brilliancy of the house. A chain composed of camellias, with a large C formed of pansies in the back of it, I admired extremely. I have recently heard persons from the East assert that there was no comparison between our flowers and those of New York; and while observing this lavish display, found it impossible to realize that any could be more perfect or fragrant. Captain and Mrs. Floyd went East Tuesday last. Miss Gwinn has abandoned her proposed trip to New York. Miss McAllister is to be married to Lieutenant Wise the 27th of next month.

From Oakland.

During the past week society events have neither been numerous or prominent. The principal one was the entertainment held at Germania Hall for the benefit of the Homoeopathic Hospital. It was a complete success—financially and otherwise. Wednesday evening it is estimated that over twelve hundred people were present. Among those in costume were: Mrs. W. C. Ransome, "Bride of Lammemoor," long, flowing white satin dress, gauze veil, wreath of orange blossoms; Miss Nellie Mason, "Emilia," in Ohello, black velvet court dress, open in front, white satin petticoat slashed with silver; Miss Nettie Hayes, "Desdemona," rich court dress of white satin; Miss Edna Snell Poulsen, Egyptian costume of cardinal and black satin, richly embroidered with gold, necklace of massive gold coins, bracelets of Etruscan gold; Miss Wickliffe, Persian lady, short amber satin skirt, light-blue satin trousers, Persian sandals, dead gold jewelry; Miss May Pebbles, "Dora," Miss Linda Rutherford, "The Widow"; Emma Woelfel, "Little Boy," sailor suit of dark blue. There were very many elegant costumes besides those named, which made the spectacle a rarely brilliant one for Oakland. On Thursday evening the third act of Ohello was given, and Round at Last as an afterpiece, with D. R. Higgins as "Slasher" and M. O. Higgins as "Crasher," which was played in a very creditable manner. The principal topic of conversation, however, now in society circles, is the Loan and Art Exhibition, which is to be given on the 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th of May, for the benefit of the Presbyterian Church. About one hundred prominent gentlemen and ladies are on the various committees, besides a large corps of assistants. The exhibition will be held in the Walker mansion, on Central Avenue, between Jackson and Alice Streets. It had been decided at one time to hold it in the Pavilion, but the disinclination expressed by persons owning paintings and statuary to permit them in that building, decided the committee in favor of the Walker mansion, which is admirably adapted to the purpose. There are two large parlors, one of which will be converted into a drawing-room of 1780, and the other of 1880. In the former will be people in the costumes of that day, and in the other those of this period. There will also be an Egyptian Booth, a Scottish Booth, a French Booth, and a Spanish Booth. When the exhibition is opened the public will be surprised at the numerous articles of virtue and bric-a-brac owned in Oakland. Mr. David Hewes's collection of marble statues is exceptionally fine, and his Egyptian curios are wonderful. Not only Oakland, but San Francisco will contribute works of art for this exhibition. Preparations have only been in progress one month. A secret marriage in high life took place some time ago, but was known only to a chosen few. It will be made public soon. It is an open secret that the daughter of a prominent lawyer and politician of Oakland is soon to be married to a Santa Clara Senator. A club of the elite of Oakland is about to be formed, for purposes of mutual enjoyment.

N. B.

Our unfriendly but valuable contemporary, the Hebrew, printed every Friday, contains the following important and thrilling editorial:

Kosher or Terefa was a question for the Israelite as for Hamlet: "To be or not to be." No part of the Talmudical tenets has been better scrutinized and ventilated than the laws codified in the Yoreh Deah. Most of our Shaloth and Teshuboth, a distinct literature in itself, treat mostly on the questions of Kosher or not. For the killing of the cattle accordingly, the shochet is paid who, as a pious man, will conscientiously have to watch that the meat offered in the market for Jewish households shall be kosher. What is the trouble? We will explain it. We have here some shechit, who are morally and religiously unfit to be entrusted with the care of the shechita, and as our Rabbis do not take, or can not take, any interest in these mixed-up affairs, each shechit does what he pleases, or to use the old phrase Hakkol Shechattim, any one, fit or unfit, skilled or unskilled, examined or not, kills cattle and declares kosher or terefa. They have no higher authority to appeal to, they don't recognize any; and so it comes that so often impostors are trifling with the religious feelings of so many to whom kosher or terefa is of great importance. Secondly, and the most aggravating trouble is caused by the selfishness of some unscrupulous butchers. With a nonchalance unsurpassed in any trade they offer poor meat at a higher price, and terefa at that, to their pious co-religionist for sale. Many an old grandmother, who would sooner die than eat terefa, is nevertheless imposed upon every day by mercenary butchers and careless shechattim.

There is another serious question disturbing our Hebrew contemporary, and it is thus explained:

We may add, for orthodox Israelites there is another question worthy of investigation, viz., the matzos. It is rumored, nay, accepted as a sad reality, that in the last two years matzos were baked, and sold to Israelites for the Passover festival, which were chometz and inferior in every respect to the common crackers, and the worst of all is that people who are otherwise considered frum have committed these dastardly wrongs.

The Hebrew has a quarrel with the Argonaut; but it is never a serious controversy where only one side loses its temper and calls names. As an evidence of our friendly disposition, we offer the columns of this journal to settle these serious questions. We will unite with our contemporary to compel the shochet to do his duty, and compel the shechit to do his, and have these questions of "kosher" or "terefa," "matzos" or "chometz," finally disposed of.

The nomination of Grant (says the New York Tribune) would be the humiliating acknowledgment that the once powerful Republican party had become so poverty-stricken in brains, intelligence, and statesmen, that it has but one man fit, or whom they can elect President. If this be true, the sooner it goes into political bankruptcy the better.

LOVE AND FINANCE.

A Conversation in a French Salon—The Cost of a Wife.

In France, marriages are made not in heaven, but in the notary's parlor. A man with a position worth so much can marry a wife with a dowry of so much. It is all reckoned according to a sliding scale. Theoretically the wife ought to have a dowry, the interest on the capital of which is equal in amount to the annual earning of the husband. This is the theory; the practice departs from it but very slightly. Marriages of love are rare, and marriages of reason are not on the increase. I do not propose in this letter to treat the question of marriage in France from the point of view of statistics, which would more than bear out my statement above; I will simply treat it from the point of view of a Frenchman, by reporting, as faithfully as I can remember, a conversation which I happened to overhear in a salon a few nights ago. The salon was in the Boulevard Malesherbes, in one of those luxurious abodes where the modern stock-brokers live like princes. Two men, still young—that is to say, on the right side of forty—were lounging in a corner of the room, with eye-glasses fixed and restless eyes, seeking rather to see than to be seen.

At the moment when the orchestra gave the signal for a fresh quadrille the elder said suddenly to the other:

"Look, my friend, there is the charming person whom I wished to show you."

"That little brunette with a white rose in her hair?"

"Yes."

"Very pretty, indeed. Large blue eyes and long lashes."

"Well, you have only to ask her hand, in the old style. You will obtain it."

"One question—permit me. What is the figure of her dowry?"

"Three hundred thousand francs."

"A mere nothing! I might as well at once buy a rope to hang myself with. Merci, mon très cher."

"What! Three hundred thousand francs—do you call that nothing?"

"Certainly."

"Explain yourself, I pray."

"Three hundred thousand francs in 1880! The game is not worth the candle."

"Well?"

"For safety's sake, in order to avoid bankruptcy, a dowry of three hundred thousand francs would be placed in State securities at three per cent., or else in railway stock guaranteed by the State."

"Admitted."

"Consequently it does not bring in five per cent. Nevertheless, let us suppose that the dowry when invested does bring in five per cent.; that means an income of fifteen thousand francs. The little brunette with a white rose in her hair would cost more than that."

"Ah! you don't mean that?"

"You will see. My dear fellow, I go to the Bourse every day, and I must be allowed to know something about arithmetic. Now, let us consider and make our calculations. The little brunette is pretty; therefore she must be seen, and therefore she must be well dressed. She must have, at least, two dresses each season, which makes eight costumes a year. These costumes will cost the trifle of six thousand francs at the least, considering the present price of ribbons, silk, velvet, and dressmaker's work."

"Good—six thousand francs."

"Love, and by love I mean marriage, likes linen white as driven snow. Linen, lace, gloves, hair dressing, perfumery, jewelry, will cost, say two thousand francs, and that is a ridiculously small sum. Then I have not reckoned shoes. She has the feet of a fairy, and so she needs silk stockings, chamber brodequins like those of Cinderella, and what not. Put another thousand francs."

"Well, that will bring it up to nine thousand francs."

"Have I included hats and bonnets, artificial flowers, feathers, veils, muffs, false hair?—for the fairest use false hair. No! Well, let me be liberal for once, and not reckon on those items. Still, there are certain small expenses which are indispensable; there is the piano and the tuning of it, new music, new novels, an illustrated journal, Vie Parisienne, writing materials, postage stamps, wool work, knick-knacks to be bought, alms to be given. For all that let us say one thousand five hundred francs. Total, ten thousand five hundred francs. I beg you will remark that I have, out of pure magnanimity, not said a word about the necessary things of life—house rent, table, and servants. I have not done so because, in the actual state of society, it is admitted on all hands that a wife is no longer an object of utility, but an object of luxury. We must, therefore, continue our calculations on this hypothesis. Now, madame, having brought with her a dowry of three hundred thousand francs, thinks herself almost a princess. Besides the other servants, she must have a femme de chambre, specially devoted to her service. The wages, board, lodging, and presents of this chambermaid will cost at least two thousand francs."

"Very good. Twelve thousand five hundred francs."

"There is an item which I ought to have mentioned among the first—it is that of washing. Formerly washing was nothing. In Louis Philippe's time, when people nevertheless flattered themselves on being moderately clean, washing used to cost very little, because much less linen was shown than is now the case; and then, again, it was the custom for ladies, even if they were princesses, to look after their own linen. But all that has been changed. Nowadays there is not a petite bourgeoisie who does not spend fifteen hundred francs a year on washing. I therefore propose this figure, at the risk of making my contemporaries irradiate their countenances with a smile of pity."

"Fourteen thousand francs is our present total."

"Wait! During the winter madame will have been in society, at the theatre, at dinner parties, at races. Summer comes. Ah! summer is vacation-time for the women of Paris. Paris rivals Zanzibar in heat. It would be almost indecent for a pretty face to be seen there, and so we must go to watering places—to Switzerland, to Meudon, or to the seaside. Madame will throw her arms round her husband's neck, and remind him that it is the usage to leave Paris in the summer. To go to Vichy or Etretat, to stay simply a month with your inseparable chambermaid, will cost say two thousand francs. I defy you to do it for less. We have now gone beyond our income of fifteen thousand francs, and I leave you to be the judge of my figures. Well, this is nothing."

"Sixteen thousand francs for having committed matrimony. Do you call that nothing?"

"No, my dear fellow, it is merely the beginning. Just think for a moment of the almost inevitable consequences of marriage. By keeping strictly to the programme that I have traced, by using the income of the dowry as I have supposed, by working, by spending nothing on superfluities on his side, by providing for the household expenses and so forth, a man might find no reason to repent of having married. But you are aware why society advocates marriage: it is in order to perpetuate the race. Let us suppose that you have only a son and a daughter, or what the bourgeois calls a king's desire. Gracious heavens! Have you reflected on the series of servitudes without name which this paternal felicity involves? The nurses, schooling, professional training, a dowry—no, I dare not enter into details. It would make your hair stand on end. No! no! Let others cull the white rose; I am not a marrying man."

The two young men retired to the buffet, and left me to think. Whose fault is it that my stock-broker friend is not a marrying man? Is it the fault of the girls or of modern society? Formerly a young girl of seventeen used to elope with a handsome musketeer, or escape from the convent school with the help of a silken ladder. So the novels of those days were full of convents, musketeers, ladders, and elopements. In those days the heart spoke at the age of sixteen; nowadays it waits before it becomes the home of tenderness. The young girl of to-day, ambitious and vain, marries at eighteen for position, and takes her revenge at the age of twenty-five by means of a combination known in France as a ménage à trois, or triple household. As the conversations of my stock-brokers would lead you to suppose, the dreams of the young girl of modern France are dreams of pride. She marries a young man only on the condition that he give her a position in society, a handsome fortune, and a fine house. A young man who has hopes is refused; an old man who has no longer anything to hope is preferred. C'est triste, mais c'est comme ça.

THEODORE CHILD.

A noble lord, as proud and fond as a man should be of his beautiful young wife, was just about rising to speak in a debate when a telegram was put in his hands. He read it, left the house, jumped into a cab, drove to Charing Cross, and took the train to Dover. Next day he returned home, rushed into his wife's room, and, finding her there, upbraided the astonished lady in no unmeasured terms. She protested her ignorance of having done anything to offend him. "Then what did you mean by your telegram?" he asked. "Mean? What I said, of course. What are you talking about?" "Read it for yourself," said he. She read: "I flee with Mr. — to Dover straight. Pray for me." For a moment words would not come; then, after a merry fit of laughter, the suspected wife quietly remarked: "Oh, those dreadful telegraph people! No wonder you are out of your mind, dear. I telegraphed simply: 'I tea with Mrs. — in Dover Street. Stay for me.'"

A curious description is that given of the staff of the Russian Nihilist paper, The Will of the People, and the manner in which that journal is published. The paper is probably the smallest in the world, being only six by three inches. The editors and reporters have not only the ordinary work of editors to do, but carry around the type, presses, and stock of this remarkable journal in their pockets. One carries the type, another the ink, and another the paper on which The Will of the People is published. The editors meet in some retired and secluded spot, strike off a dozen copies, which are secretly carried to some town and there distributed. And yet, such is the power of the press, that this insignificant little journal, three inches by six, with a circulation of only twelve, is able to terrify the autocratic ruler of eighty millions of people.

"There!" she cried, in an excited voice; "I should like to know what became of that ambril. I sot it up again the counter when I come in, and afore I could turn round it's gone—and it was only on a Monday that I gin four and six for't!" "What kind of an umbrella was it, ma'am?" asked the clerk, in his blandest tones. "A spick and span new gingham, young man," was the eager response, "with an iv'ry handle on't and a—" "Like the one in your hand, ma'am, for instance?" "Sakes alive!" she exclaimed. One might have thought she saw a serpent rather than her own "spick and span gingham," with its "iv'ry handle," clutched fast in her hand. She colored up like a druggist's window, and went off amidst unintelligible excuses. She never felt so flustered in all her born days, as she told Jemina Ann when she got home.

A Texas horse-thief went to grass the other day, and his ballad sings:

A ranchman's daughter,
She shot McWhorter;
McWhorter he fell
Close by an old well;
All praise to the gal,
Whose front name is Sal.

The American Art Review for April contains eight articles besides the departments. The initial illustration—a portrait of Sir Gilbert Scott—is an etching after George Richmond by Mrs. Anna Lee Merritt. There are four other full-page illustrations and some twenty minor ones in this number. The most interesting paper is, of course, Mr. Linton's second article on the "History of Wood Engraving in America;" but nearly all the other articles repay careful consideration.

Japanese fans are the foundation for all sorts of grotesque designs, but the latest fancy, sewing the bright feathers of the golden pheasant and gorgeous peacock on infantile sizes no larger than the palm of the hand, is the prettiest yet.

WIT, WISDOM, AND SENTIMENT.

Anon: It is to live without the vanished light that strength is needed.

Seneca: The eyes will not see when the heart wishes them to be blind—desire conceals truth as darkness does the earth.

Anon: For that which is buried and dead there can be no resurrection.

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps: Every wish is a prayer with God.

Anon: 'Tis an awkward thing to play with souls,
And matter enough to save one's own.

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps: I'd like to see the man that was worth—down at the core of him—worth a woman getting jealous for.

Swinburne: Love, sleep, and death go to the sweet, same tune.

Swinburne: He who has loved often has loved never.

Anon: He that dies pays all debts.

J. G. Holland: He tossed me bitterness, and called it sweet.
L. E. H.

Byron: Full many a stoic eye and aspect stern
Mask hearts where grief hath little left to learn!
And many a withering thought lies hid, not lost,
In smiles that least heft who wear them most.

O. W. Holmes: There are a good many miseries in life that we can not help smiling at, but they are the smiles that make wrinkles and not dimples.

Robert Hall: In matters of prudence, last thoughts are best; in morality, first thoughts are best.

Ouida: A cruel story runs on wheels, and every hand oils the wheels as they run.

Colin d'Harleville: One is often the victim of his own artifice.

Young: Let not the cooling of the world allure thee;
Which of her lovers ever found her true?

Delille: Every age has its pleasures, every situation its charms.

Valaincourt: Common sense is no common thing, although every one believes he has enough of it.

Massillon: The praises which we give have always in some way a relation to ourselves.

Malesherbes: He who reckons ten friends has not one.

La Bruyère: Man is placed free between vice and virtue.

La Fontaine: Many are caught while attempting to catch others.

H. M. Field: Mankind worships success, but thinks too little of the means by which it is obtained.
N. B. S.

Pope: All manners take a tincture from our own,
Or come discolored through our passions shown.

Chateaubriand: We have plenty of personal sorrows, without adding to them griefs of strangers.

Matthieu de Montmorency: The finest faculties, the most brilliant fame, are but as dust if they receive no life from the moral sentiment.

Queen Hortense: Kindnesses show themselves in the smallest things, and are also felt by those who are the objects of them without their being equal to the expression of their feelings.

Keats: There never lived a mortal man who bent
His appetite beyond his natural sphere,
But starved and died.

George Eliot: The concentrated experience which, in great crises of emotion, reveals the bias of a nature, is prophetic of the ultimate act which will end an intermediate struggle.

Ouida: The imagined joy of angels over one who repents can never be one-thousandth part so sweet and strong as the actual joy of sinners over one purity that falls.

Bulwer: What tries the affection of people for each other so severely of a journey together? A post-chaise must have jolted many an intimacy to death.

Madame de Rémusat: There is a tendency in the human mind to bring to perfection anything with which it is exclusively occupied.

Alfieri: Self-love is the principal motive of all the great actions of man, when he unites to a knowledge of his own powers an enlightened enthusiasm for the sublime and beautiful, which are in fact only one and the same thing.

Carlyle: Our works are the mirror wherein the spirit first sees its natural lineaments. Hence the folly of that impossible precept, "Know thyself," till it be translated into the partially possible one, "Know what thou canst work at."

Herbert Spencer: We too often forget that not only is there "a soul of goodness in things evil," but very generally, also, a soul of truth in things erroneous.

Draper: An appeal to the imagination is much more alluring than the employment of reason.

Bulwer: What is death but the forgetfulness of some few hearts added to the general unconsciousness of our existence that pervades the universe? The bubble breaks in the vast desert of the air without a sound.

Huet: A man can not write much and well upon virtue without being virtuous, nor enter minutely and profoundly into the causes of vice without being vicious.

Landor: Love is a secondary passion in those who love most, a primary in those who love least.

MORE ABOUT WINES.

In an article on wines in our last issue we ventured to ridicule the practice pursued by proprietors of vineyards in California—that of making a large wine-cellar and an expensive and cumbersome plant an essential part of their business; whereas, efficient labor-saving appliances for crushing the grapes, and thoroughly aerating the musts before fermentation, and sufficient vats to hold them, ought to cover all that the proprietor should contemplate. Yet in this State nearly, if not quite, every owner of a vineyard is his own wine-maker, treater, cellarer, and, often, merchant also. The produce of his vineyard begins, progresses, and ends under his own direction, and the end is not always satisfactory. As a matter of course he must, for a number of years, continue to lay out money on increasing his cellarage and apparatus as his stock in hand continues to increase, and consequently must employ more and more hands upon it, and those frequently worse than useless in cellar work—such as sulphuring, racking, fining, and bottling.

When fermentation is complete, and the wine has settled, the sooner it passes into the hands of the wholesale treater or merchant the better; and the sooner this rule, which everywhere applies to wheat, dairy produce, fat cattle, etc., is applied to the wine industry, so much the sooner will it create a market for itself, and command the attention of capitalists and banks as it does in all the wine countries of Europe. Once this simple matter becomes thoroughly believed in and acted upon, every one of the millions of acres of vine land in this State, now bearing nothing better than chaparral, poison-oak, and brambles, may with certainty of profit be reduced into vine cultivation. With equal certainty we can aver that, until such becomes established, uncertainty about price, risks of loss in the cellar, and frequent actual losses—through ignorance of the changes which musts undergo on their way to become either mature wines, or vinegar—will harass the proprietor, and impose on him both expense and trouble which he need not endure.

Yet it is not for a moment contended that the vineyardist should not, if he chooses, keep a few thousand gallons, and nurse them for his own amusement or information. What we contend for is the establishment—near the city, or at some point which can be easily reached from the interior—of cellars, on a diminutive scale, of course, like those at Bercy, near Paris, where a few thorough cellar-masters could direct all operations. From such an establishment the supplies for the city could be constantly drawn, and they would be of uniform qualities. Want of uniformity in color and taste has ever been a great hindrance to the consumption of home-grown wines in new countries; for as soon as a relish has been acquired for a particular brand, it can no longer be obtained; hence disappointment. Uniformity of quality can be obtained by one means only, i. e., blending. This can never be done on a marketable scale unless by bringing together large quantities of different growths. It is thus that uniformity is established in the brands of the finest wines of Spain and Portugal. Duff, Gordon & Co.'s brands are the same the world over. Ask for their "white seal" or "golden sherry," for example, in any first-class hotel, and they are recognized at once. So with ports, and those known as "Lisbon sweet" and "Lisbon dry." All these are the results of judicious blending and treating; and here be it said that blended wine is pure wine so long as nothing else is added to it.

It will be, probably, matter of surprise to our readers who are not acquainted with the management of any of the great wine-cellars of Southern Europe, to be told that next after the proprietor himself the most important personage is he who forms and directs the processes of blending. This art cannot be taught to one man in every ten thousand, for it requires a sense, or rather several senses, each perfect in a high degree—an eye for the exact shade of the color required, an acute smell for bouquet, and a detective palate. But it requires yet more, and we hardly know how to describe it, unless we may call it an instinctive or intuitive apprehension of the favorable result of a blend, from mere observation of color and smell of two, three, or half-a-dozen kinds, even before mixing them together. There are men without any ear for music, to whom music is "the least disagreeable of sounds;" some men are color-blind, and we not infrequently meet with individuals who have only an imperfect sense of smell. With the absence of any one of these qualities in a high degree, no man can begin to learn wine-blending, any more than he who has no ear for music and no conception of harmony can ever become a great singer or composer. The value of an accomplished cellar-master lies in this—that whenever he hits off a brand that takes a market, he can continue to supply the same as long as fashion or taste calls for it; but he must have a large and varied stock to operate upon. This brings us back to our starting-point—large wine depots, where the produce of any number of vineyards can be disposed of at marketable rates, just as grain can be, and thence, for home consumption, supplied to the public, as the butcher and baker supply bread and flesh-meat.

In California, the same as in other new wine countries, we hear the wines blamed for what men are pleased to call an earthy taste. Why this term should have been applied to a certain peculiar flavor we know not, unless it be a translation of a French term sometimes used: gout de terroir. But what clear idea can be conveyed by a word like "earthy," since it must vary with every difference of soil?

But the underlying taste of many of our wines, far more commonly of our red wines, is very frequently of this character—so-called earthy. In endeavoring to discover the cause of it this writer has spent many years, and has studied hundreds of samples, and sought information from both wine-treaters and scientific chemists, and induced some of them to institute independent investigations, but hitherto without any certain and reliable results. He could find nothing by direct investigation to lead to the original cause. Regarded from a chemical point of view, we feel inclined to attribute it in a far higher degree to the present methods of crushing grapes, storing the musts, and conducting the fermentation, than to any effect of soil on the vines.

Now that the Legislature has made some provision for experimental investigation of wines, let us hope this matter will command early attention. It is quite certain that the present methods of crushing and treating the musts before fermentation sets in will not answer at all in the warmer portions of the State, nor indeed in Sonoma or Napa, if the grapes be left on the vines till they are more than naturally ripe, as is the present practice, founded on French teaching.

The less the methods described in the very best French works are imitated here, the better. Best of all would be to cast them aside altogether; for, perfect as they are for the climate of France, they only mislead here. We are thirteen degrees of latitude nearer the equator than the average of France or the Rhine. Where the musts are rich in sugar they require to be thoroughly brought in contact with air. The musts of port wines are worked on the skins, and part, at least, of the stalks by the feet of men, for eighteen hours consecutively. The work is done in large stone chambers, one man being allowed for every pipe of must. After part of a day's rest, the men enter again for another six hours; and only then is fermentation allowed to proceed quietly. Of course the aeration can be effected by other processes than treading with the feet, but without it none of the full-bodied wines is ever likely to be made in California any more than in Portugal; to which these climates and soils approximate in so many interesting particulars.

An' dey'd hab him in de cotton patch at fifty cents a day.

Mr. Peter B. Lay, of Lafayette, Indiana, is plaintiff in a divorce suit such as was never before commenced. Mr. Lay is a Democrat "of the most straightest sect." Mrs. Lay is not blessed with that indifference to politics which is the happy lot of many ladies. She is not only a Republican, but, what is more remarkable, she is a reader of editorial effusions. Lafayette boasts a Democratic journal of the true Western type, which was used to characterize Republicans in terms truly grateful to the Egyptian mind. To this virile sheet Mr. Lay had long been a subscriber, and, when he entered into the marriage contract, he did not, as he understood matters, covenant to give up the pleasure of reading vigorous assaults upon the corrupt and feeble faction which had so long controlled and so completely ruined his country. There is every probability that Mrs. Lay has a Republican father, or brothers or cousins or uncles or relatives of some kind, and when she read what the Democratic editor said about Republicans she waxed wroth. She did not at once render Mr. Lay prematurely bald, or require him, on pain of her eternal displeasure, to horsewhip the editor. On the contrary, she made a kind and Christian effort to convince him of the error of his ways. As he had frequently professed himself her slave, she had no doubt that he would yield at the first intimation of her desire for his reform, but, to her surprise, she found that he seemed to regard his protestations as merely figurative. In theory, of course, he was her humble servant, but he had been a born Democrat, and all theologians agree that nothing short of divine power can give a man a new birth. Mrs. Lay is not a theologian, and, having tried kindness in vain, she unwisely resorted to coercion, and declared that the vile paper should enter her house no more. At this point credit is due to Mr. Lay. He yielded, and, as a compromise, ordered the newsboy to leave his paper at the barn, where he proposed to read it clandestinely in the seclusion of a hay-mow. But Mrs. Lay was on the war path. She confiscated and destroyed the obnoxious journal, and though Mr. Lay retreated in succession to the smoke-house, the wood-pile, and the chicken-coop, she pursued him relentlessly from one hiding-place to another, till at last, in despair, he asks a court to set him free from her tyranny and persecution. The lesson of the Lay family is a terrible one. So long as women do not read editorial abuse of the party to which their fathers and brothers belong, there may be happy homes, but when they have secured the ballot and are required by duty to inform themselves on political affairs, the threatened result is too awful to contemplate.

Blithely remarks the genial Donn Piatt: "Grant has, since his return home, spoken the words of hope and promise," remarks George Gorham in the course of an arduous interview. This reassures us. We think we can now begin to comprehend what Grant was driving at when he spoke of government as a fertilizer for worn-out soils. We should say, however, that it would require a government unusually rich in phosphates to surpass, for manurial purposes, such cussed rot as our George gave us in that interview. What our George needs, apparently, is the application of Grant's patent guano government, or some other fertilizer, to his worn-out intellect.

Another result of the coming rush of British aristocracy is a bull movement in Burke's Peage and his Landed Gentry. Thackeray speaks somewhere of these books as the British Bible, and they are extensively called, in the country they illustrate, "The Snob's Dictionary." Unless some clever bookseller has provided for the increased demand, by a timely importation of these useful works, there may be a "corner" in them, and speculators will have as good a chance to operate in them as they have in opium and quinine.

Edison's song: "Life of my light, farewell."

THE HEROIC AGE OF CALIFORNIA.

A Defense of the Pioneer Days.

In responding for "The Old Forty-niners," Prentice Mulford said: "The Forty-niner is proud of many things. He was proud when whisky was fifty cents a drink, but when the price fell to twenty-five cents whisky lost its lustre, and when the price fell to fifteen cents its lustre was entirely gone. The Forty-niner was proud of his Vigilance Committee, who hung a man first and tried him afterward; and then, on reflection said it was a warning to the right one, who would be more careful in the future. He prided himself on salting claims. He was proud of the fires in San Francisco, and this added ciphers to the wealth of the country. Ciphers are nothing, you know. He was proud of his bull beef, taken from bulls that had engaged in every fight since the time of Cortez. He was proud of his shirt, which was inhabited by more beings than himself; and he was proud of his worn-out pants, patched with a salt-sack or flour-sack, and you could read, as he strode ahead of you, the sign: 'Genesee Flour,' which he carried."

It is with amusement, and at times disgust, that I read in these modern days the effusions of our younger Bohemians and those of foreign scribblers, whose wild and romantic imaginings of the past are as reckless and unprincipled as they would have one believe were the Pioneer days of California. According to some writers—as they now and then loom up, in banquet, press, or periodical—the Pioneers of California were the counterparts of brigands, a vagabondish set, devoid of education, social refinement, or any of the higher virtues, a class which never held sacred anything moral, religious, or manly. From some of these writers one would infer that, with the great mass of the population, dissipation, gambling, debauchery, and murder were then the pleasures and occupation of both days and nights. Among these scavengers of romance comes Prentice Mulford, who, to the toast of the "Forty-niners," before the Bullion Club of New York, could find no higher thoughts than appear in the lines which head this article.

The Forty-niners! What a flood of memories rises at the sentiment! And yet how low the ideas of such a man and writer as Prentice Mulford—a man possessed of a knowledge of the past, and of higher sensibilities—he, to wallow only in the gutters of thought in responding to such a toast, is surprising to one familiar with his writings, and ever an admirer. If such sentiments (better clothed as they would be) had emanated from "Mark Twain," one could "consider the source"—a fountain from which ever flows pure humor, and let it pass; but such a response from a more serious writer, aping wit, makes one think these universal slanders against the Pioneer days are given forth as petrified facts. It is time these romances were checked, and their authors branded as libelers of the heroes of the heroic age of California; and it is time that the survivors of those brilliant days should step forward in their defense, to save, in history the good name of the Pioneer—that our children and our children's children may not be considered the descendants of a debauched and abandoned race. To this end, it is the duty of every Pioneer to attack every romancer who endeavors to lower the status of the early days of California. It is not Prentice Mulford alone, but many, too many others. Almost countless vile romances and libels on the past have I seen published from time to time, not only in our own but in European journals and periodicals. A few more years, and all the Pioneers will have passed over the river. Many now lie among the golden sands that allured them hither. Let us hope that these low libels may cease, and that, instead, the brighter, higher, nobler history of a brilliant era may illuminate the literary brain to truthfully enlighten the present of the glittering past. For the future, let the writer of the present cast no unmerited blot upon the grand army of adventurers who covered these western shores with the best brain, nerve, and muscle of the civilized globe; and who brought with them—as a whole—vigor, refinement, education, morality, religion, charity, justice, and manhood; and who first laid the foundations of our Christian societies, public libraries, and homes for the destitute.

All phases of pioneer life passed before the writer's eyes. He saw it from the mountain to the sea; the saloon, the miner's camp, the giddy gambler's revel, the counting-room, the merchant's and the banker's home; saw mule-loads of gold, revealed in its abundance till gold lost its value; saw all the lavish splendor of wealth, business, and pleasure—and knows whereof he speaks. When you contrast then and now, you find that the pioneer days were days of thrift, honor, industry, charity, and brotherly love. The Pioneer days, the debased, dissipated, sinful, and "unchristian" ones of California! If they are to be derided, good God! what should we say of the present? The Pioneer days were those of honesty, self-reliance, manhood. Then laws were made that were laws—not moulded by gold—not laws to shield the rich and punish the poor; but laws to be obeyed by all alike. One line was the statute-book—"Beware of evil doing, for the punishment is sure, swift, and just." There were bad men in those days, but, compared with the masses, they were the exception. The marked evil of the Pioneer days was gambling—by gamblers, open, above board, independent gambling; not, as now, behind the wicket doors of secret chambers. This admitted, you have the worst of the Pioneer days, and yet tens of thousands never bet a dollar; their occupation was higher, and their education and thoughts forbade it. And here let me ask how compares the present, on the score of drinking and gambling, with the past? On the score of honesty, what would be the fate of a few men who would undertake to travel from the mountains to the valley with mules loaded with gold dust? Stop, ye scribblers of the present generation; ye who so love wild, blood-thirsty, and dissipated romances; drop the past, look into the present for your low humor and heroes of combat, murder, debauchery, fiery vengeance, ruin by gambling, and reckless suicides. Enjoy the fruits of the Pioneers' planting—the highways and byways of their clearing; regale yourselves under their vines and fig-trees; sniff the perfume of the orange grove and the rose they watered; but let rest unslandered, in peace and honor, the ashes of the dead.

SATURDAY, MAY 1, 1880.

Those of our readers interested in music will find on the fifth page of this issue a popular and breezy selection from the opera of the ROYAL MIDDY. Hereafter the ARGONAUT will publish each week a page of music, prepared by a competent musician, and made up of operatic selections, original compositions, and the best and brightest things to be had in the musical line. A page of new music every week for ten cents.

The city has had its wonder, and the press its sensation. A scandalous political quarrel has culminated in a tragedy. The feud between the Rev. Isaac S. Kallloch and Charles de Young has resulted in the death of the latter—murdered in his own business office, in cold deliberation, by the son of the former. Eight months ago the Rev. Isaac S. Kallloch had, from his pulpit, uttered the most terrible scandal against the mother of Charles de Young, and Mr. de Young endeavored to murder him. He did not quite succeed. The community divided in opinion somewhat as to the manner of the attempted assassination; there was here and there an expression of dissent. The Sand-lot element looked upon their leader as a martyr; but the general and better class of the community, except for its lawlessness, thought the act a natural one, and would not have much regretted that it had had a fatal termination. Mr. de Young had not been tried, and, had his trial come on, it is not probable that he would ever have been convicted. We do not express an opinion, we only state a fact, when we say that Kallloch the preacher had committed a crime for which the unwritten common law of the country justifies a son in demanding and taking life. It was low and brutal. It was inexcusable in the meanest politician; it was devilish as coming from one who pretends to be a minister of the gospel. Kallloch had recovered; been elected Mayor; had appointed his son—also a Baptist clergyman—to be his clerk; his negro servant had been placed upon the municipal pay-roll, and eight months passed by. It was supposed that the vendetta had been ended. Charles de Young had been about most of the time; his journal had not been especially severe upon the Mayor—not more severe or personal than Kallloch's conduct just fled; against any other member of the family (as we remember) nothing was said; against any lady of the family, nothing; against this son who committed the murder (as we remember) nothing; when, without cause, provocation, or justification, without notice, having no personal quarrel with Charles de Young, this son, aged some thirty years, steals suddenly upon him and deliberately murders him. Of the mystery of the house in Geary Street, the strange and secret interviews between father, son, and colored servant, and whether there was a conspiracy to murder, we know nothing and express no opinion. Of the guilt of the Rev. I. M. Kallloch, the son, we can not entertain a doubt. It was murder, by lying in wait with deliberate intent to commit a crime. There is no common law that he can invoke. He was not his father's avenger by the most generous interpretation of the most liberal code of retributive vengeance. He was not called upon to vindicate his father, for his father was capable of vindicating himself—in his pulpit, on the forum, and through the columns of a journal he controlled. Had his father been old, or absent, or ill, and had there been a fresh provocation—had there been cause for sudden passion—there might have been found some palliation or excuse for the killing. But, without such new provocation, and after eight months, to go fresh from the father's presence to this deliberate murder, presents a case for which we find no excuse. It was not this man's quarrel. There was no chivalry in it. It was a brutal, cowardly, and deliberate murder. The Sacramento Record-Union, usually deliberate and usually expressing opinions entitled to consideration, and presumably beyond the influence of business rivalry, says "it is quite impossible to regard this case as an ordinary murder would be regarded." We commend this journal to a review of its past writings, and ask it, as it values its reputation as one that lays down rules for the conduct of men in their relations in life, to answer upon what theory it takes this case out of that of the most vulgar crime. There was no "blood feud" between these men—Charles de Young and I. M. Kallloch; the quarrel had passed; the elder Kallloch had triumphed in an election, and had recovered from his wounds; this I. M. Kallloch comes in from out the shadow of an event long passed, and, while Charles de Young is indicted and is awaiting his trial, goes and murders him. That Mr. Charles de Young had given fresh provocation, and added new fuel to the fire by causing the pamphlet to be distributed, there is, so far, no proof. The Record-Union assumes the fact, and builds an argument upon it that justifies the murder.

So much for the murderer; now for the murdered: Charles de Young was not a remarkable man, nor in any distinguishing sense did he differ from the ordinary business person who seeks to make money in the publication of a newspaper. He possessed the usual enterprise, industry, vigor, push, and persistence, some administrative talent, and very great energy, but not more than might have been expected in a young, healthy, and ambitious man, who had by his unaided exertions come from poverty to the control of a leading journal. That his newspaper was a success and leading, was attributable as much to the result of accident and the conditions surrounding it as to anything Mr. Charles de Young did for it. Charles de Young was not a journalist in any sense of the word. He never wrote a line for his paper, and he only controlled the policy of the paper to the end that it might reflect his personal feelings and make money. He was the business manager and brain of money-making machinery, and not even successful in that. Had he left the Chronicle to the control of his brother three years ago, the paper would have been more prosperous, respectable, and influential than it was at the time of his death. He was an opinionated, obstinate person, who could not be controlled by friends—one of those whose pride hinders them from ever seeming to take advice. He was courageous to the last degree, and always confident that his course and his opinions were correct. He had an ambition to make the Chronicle a powerful journal. He had no conception of such a thing as an able and honorable and—because able and honorable—an influential journal. He would trample down every consideration of right, he would violate every principle of honor, and he despised as weakness every such sentiment as personal friendship—if these things stood in the way of his newspaper. He was heartless, ungrateful, altogether unsympathetic in his malice, and in his pursuit of an enemy was as cold-blooded and unforgiving as an Indian. He was an uneducated but not an ignorant man. He was prospering, but it was that kind of prosperity that, with a powerful journal, would have made him a terror in the community. He lived for the accomplishment of one single object, and that was the Chronicle; to make it powerful and feared was his sole idea. Its success had turned his head; and when it seemed to him that the Chronicle had achieved a victory in the adoption of the new Constitution, he became drunk with his sense of power. In his vanity and his weakness he was intoxicated with the absurd conviction that he was great, and his journal was powerful to control political parties. The succeeding election demonstrated his error, and it sank deep into his heart. He became moody and embittered. The vile scandal of Kallloch came upon him at an unhappy moment, and wounded him where he was most tender—for while he respected or considered no other man's mother, he loved his own with a love that was worship. The election of Kallloch, the election of a Republican Governor, the realization that his dream of a great and powerful journal was not yet to be consummated, the serious blow struck at its business by the merchants, the wasting away of its financial resources—all tended to embitter him against the community in which he lived. He took the side of misrule and disorder; in the interest of his paper he would have crucified society. He made the wretched Kearney, and helped unmake him. He warmed into political life the very mob that hooted over his dead body. He sowed the wind to reap the whirlwind. He was the contriver of his own ruin. His was a brief, unhappy, quarrelsome life. At war with all the world save his own family circle, to which he was warmly attached, an unprofitable struggle has been his entire existence. His life was marred by an insane ambition to build up a journal that should become a power and a terror. He pigeon-holed men's frailties, catalogued their mistakes, their follies, and their crimes, that he might have power over them. He employed detectives and shadowed men, for his was the ambition to become a terror to his enemies, and he wished no friends. If he had lived, his would have been a lonely and unloved existence. If he had succeeded in making a great and powerful journal, it would have been a moral monster, a juggernaut; it would have flourished at the cost of all that is good, or kindly, or human in the community where it existed. It was fate that he should die like a rat in a hole, as he did. He was not a great man, nor a good man, nor a great journalist, and his death is not an irreparable loss.

What is a great journal? There are none in America, and there are scores of them in Europe. A great journal must, as its first requisite, possess thorough and absolute independence. This implies large financial resources, and as all journals are published for money, it implies such a universal and general support that it may afford to disregard any particular interest. It must be under the direction of one comprehensive, generous-minded, and able man, who, by circumstances, is entirely independent of his surroundings, and who by his self-discipline has been brought to the performance of his duty, and who finds in the performance of that duty a higher reward than in any selfish ambition. There is no journal in San Francisco, nor in California, nor in America, that has attained this position. The New York Herald is growing toward it, and if, when the present James Gordon Bennett shall die, the proper man shall be found to direct the enterprise, it may be a great journal—and by great we mean not only in wealth and circulation, but in influence and power for good. We recall no journal in America—none in California, and certainly none in San Francisco—that at all approaches this idea. The curse of journalism lies in the personnel of the proprietary control. One is ambitious, wants office, place, or power; one is revengeful; one is a drunken idiot; one is an ignorant, self-opinionated, obstinate ass; one is a conceited, shallow-minded puppy, and tries to edit his own paper; another journal is owned by a capitalist, a Wall Street king, a railroad corporation, a bank, or a political ring; another is the slave of some political party, and is bound to some party leader, or compelled to do the bidding of some one in power—and all are mercenary. The editor of a journal who must consult its owner, or look into its till before he can venture to express an opinion upon any popular topic, is necessarily a coward and a slave. He is a chained galley-slave that must row with some real or invisible fiend at the helm. We only know of one journal in San Francisco that dares give honest expression to its opinions, and that is only a weekly. It must be a dreadful life, this trimming to suit the mob—bad enough for the politician, but there are times when the demagogue can hide himself and let the storm pass over. But the manager of a daily paper must stand up and face the tempest. He may oppose it like the stalwart oak, and break; or, like the willow, bend and drag himself in the mud. The managers of the Call and Chronicle have proved to us curious and instructive studies. Both have debased themselves to win the favor of the slums. Both have borne the banner of the Sand-lot—each in rivalry with the other to lick the brogans that have kicked both of them. The mob was the other day shouting for the Chronicle, cheering as it passed its doors, busy-ing itself to increase its circulation, and sending out committees to make domiciliary visits in its interests; and again the fickle monster purred its nasty breath upon the Call, and cursed the Chronicle, and howled at it, and would have torn its editor to pieces. And when poor Charles de Young was dead and cold, the cowardly and inhuman monster yelled and hooted as it followed the body to the Morgue. And if to-morrow the other editor should die, he would be borne out feet foremost through a crowd holding its nose in silence—the silence of utter contempt for the moral cowardice that dares not utter an honest opinion in fear of pecuniary loss. The quarrel between these two journals has been a disastrous one to the community in which they have been published. They have unloosed the evil genii they have no power to control; they have stirred evil passions they can not subdue. The personal feuds between Mr. Pickering and Mr. de Young have been utterly disgraceful, and the contest and rivalry have been utterly contemptible. The result has cost the community, in loss of business, depreciation of values, and destruction of confidence, many millions more than body, soul, type, and material of both concerns are worth. The Chronicle will survive the death of its senior proprietor. It will improve in character, and will increase in business. Charles de Young's mistakes and follies, and his crimes, will be forgotten, but surviving these memories will survive the recollection of his personal bravery, his fearless independence, his resolute self-will, and his energy of character. From this death we prophesy an improved and elevated tone to San Francisco journalism; and the Chronicle, chastened by the death of its proprietor, will lead in this direction. We presume the Kallochs, father and son, will no longer dare to blaspheme God by endeavoring to preach his word. From any one else than this cheek-hardened hypocrite we should expect a resignation of his office. The Irish agitators at work breaking stone; the Democracy taught a valuable lesson; public opinion, aroused to its rights and to an appreciation of the dangers of unchecked agitation, will now assert itself, and let us hope we have passed from out the darkness of a nasty night into the brightness and the peacefulness of a better day.

It will be remembered that when the "agitation" first began there were three prominent names connected with it—Knight, Wellock, and Kearney. Knight was the brains of the organization. At an early period of the movement we made his acquaintance, and were impressed with his honesty of purpose, and the sincerity of his desire to work out reforms within the law. He was compelled to withdraw from association with Kearney. Wellock subsequently subsided. Kearney drew around him other, and meaner, and more desperate men. Demagogues gathered around him, and the result of his and their agitation has gone into history. The following résumé of the whole affair is from the pen of Mr. Knight:

THE TEMPEST ON THE SAND-LOT.

The San Francisco Sand-lot excitement was a perfect storm, a tempest, a whirlwind of ignorance and brutality. It has subsided as suddenly as it arose. The bubble did but need pricking to let the whole of it to the ground. It is now dead, and will soon be buried out of sight. At first it had some semblance of right. An impending crisis of hard times was upon us. Thousands of families were sinking into penury by reason of Chinese cheap labor. Our boys and girls were superseded. They were eating away the substance of their parents, and doing nothing, and had no chance to do anything. Wherever they went the ubiquitous Chinaman was there before them. Land monopoly and some other causes gave weight to many just complaints. The great procession of workmen in 1878 was a calm declaration of the people in favor of sterling reform. It embodied thousands of honest, intelligent, and patriotic workmen, who thus expressed their desire to have a better government—not to destroy all government. The demands of the new party, as published, were pronounced by most of the press to be moderate, reasonable, and just. But this calm breeze soon became a whirlwind of passion and ignorance. It picked up the loose stubble of idleness, crime, and revolution. At its apex was seen a coarse, brawling ruffian, without either education, manners, honesty, humanity, truth, or patriotism. Denis Kearney became the guiding star. Then indeed did it become a destructive simoon. It gathered nothing but dust, ashes, straw, mere noisy rabble, save here and there a discarded waif or stray, destitute of principle, and moved only by the most corrupt and scheming selfishness. Intelligence and patriotism fell away from it. Most of the first leaders, who were earnest, honest, decent, sensible, and manly, found it impossible to "boom" in the train of a false demagogue, who had not the wit to disguise his vulgar ambition or the manners to make it tolerable. They fell away, and they carried with them the balance-wheel; and then, indeed, did it become a column of fire and blood, threatening to engulf our city in one vast sea of fire, murder, and robbery. Two other characters now appeared on the scene, bowing down in abject submission to the hideous god of the Sand-lot, and giving him their aid to keep up the vast whirlwind of confusion and crime, for their own private ends. A journalist, on the ragged edge of the worst kind of sensational and meretricious editorship, lent his pen and his paper to magnify the buffoon who led the Sand-lot bosts, and glorify the vast column of trash and mischief calling themselves his followers. He was already an outlaw from all decent society; a utter disregard of truth and right had long characterized his career; and more than once had he essayed to do murder. Then the pulpit, also, sent its recruit. A soiled dove of the church, driven from place to place by his follies, if not his crimes; a stranger to us; pursued by rumors of lust, bankruptcy, and falsehood; another man on the ragged edge of doubt and suspicion, undertook to mend his falling fortunes by joining the rabble rout. They succeeded. They crammed down the people's throats the new Constitution—the journalist, because it would be a victory for his paper; the preacher, because, as he said himself, "it would knock things hellward." Then came the denouement. They quarreled over the spoils. The preacher and the editor got into deadly feud. They were both rather "high-strung villains." No vulgar methods would do them. Murder was the least crime they could soil their hands with; was the only medicine that could give them sweet sleep. The editor took the first shot. A miss; but well intended, and enough to put him to his defense for life. The preacher had a son—a duplicate. He laid down his missal and his white necktie, and played the mock hero, too. And now the end is most appropriate. The journalist died with his boots on—

"Not quite a felon, yet but half a knight."

The preacher's other self is in the prison cell—but for no vulgar crime; his honor is appeased, his courage is assured; his future will not be utterly ignoble. As for the preacher himself, he is our Mayor. "God save the mark!" But Beecher himself was never more near the ragged edge of dismal apprehension. As to the vulgar villain, Kearney, true to his ignoble instincts, he accepts the House of Correction and its striped robes. He could rise no higher. Picking was right when he said Kearney only meant "mud"—to wade knee-deep in mud—when he said blood. Yes, his blood is mud indeed. To buy a gun, to be a general, to arm the tigers, to boast of fifty thousand followers, to threaten death to "all midnight robbers and daylight thieves," to obey the order of no court, to defy the armies of the "Living God" Uncle Sam, and then accept a low, vulgar, pitiful six months at hard labor, is the "unkindest cut of all." It shows the cur, the low, mean, despicable dog, the coward, the fraud. It out-Herods Herod. It is Bombast FuriOSO below stairs. Had he the soul of a toad he would have done something to merit a noble fate. But the stream can not rise above the fountain.

Last week the spirit of prophecy was on the Argonaut. After giving a careful summary of the exact results in the States that had held Republican delegations up to date, we went further, and predicted that Grant would not get the solid South delegations, as claimed by the third-term advocates. We also stated that Maryland would be against Grant, and that Georgia and Louisiana would not instruct for Grant. The conventions of the past week have fulfilled these prophecies in every particular. Maryland carries a solid delegation for Blaine, so does West Virginia; while Georgia sends twelve delegates for Blaine, eight for Sherman, and two for Grant. The loss of so large a State as Georgia makes a big hole in Grant's "Solid South," and the breach is widened still more by the action of Maryland and West Virginia in declaring against Grant. In Louisiana, two sets of delegates have been elected: one white, the other black. The white delegation is for Sherman; the negro delegates for Grant. It is believed that the white delegation will be admitted to the Chicago Convention, as its credentials are the most regular. Since our last issue not a single Northern State has declared for Grant. Illinois is the great battle-field just now between Blaine and Grant; but so far Blaine is ahead nearly two to one, and we do not believe Grant can ever overtake the plumed Senator from Maine in the prairie State. Five Illinois County Conventions were held on Tuesday last, from which Blaine received twenty-nine votes to Grant's nineteen. The Ohio State Convention, held on Wednesday last, resulted in an almost solid delegation for John Sherman; Blaine will get a few votes out of the forty-four, probably six or eight; Grant none. His name was hissed in the Convention, but the demonstration was promptly suppressed. Thus the native State of the hero of the third term repudiates him. In New Hampshire W. E. Chandler telegraphs that "Grant has been driven from the field." The New York Herald recently placed New Jersey as in the list of Grant States, whereupon an indignant leading Republican from that State writes to the Herald—"Don't do that again. Grant couldn't carry a single county in New Jersey." Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, and Colorado are overwhelmingly for Blaine. State Conventions in all of these States will be held during the next two weeks. California spoke on Thursday, and unanimously against Grant and "Black and Tan," and in favor of Blaine, "first, last, and all the time." These straws show to a moral certainty that Grant is as good as defeated. The Chicago nominee will be either Blaine of Maine, Washburne, or a "dark horse."

The New York Nation draws a parallel in the politics of France, England, and the United States, as illustrated in the recent political events of the respective countries. The friends of "moral order," in France, appealed to the people for the election of Marshal MacMahon to be President of France because he was a man of "courage and loyalty," a "strong man," and a "soldier," upon whom the country might rely. He was not a man of any especial ideas, nor did he represent any particular policy of government. He was simply a hero and a strong man, and the embodiment of resistance to disorder, misrule, and Communism. In England, Lord Beaconsfield was put forth by the "Jingoes," or "Tories," as the "strong man," as the embodiment of an opposition to the Russian scare-crow, the Home-rule skeleton, and the Radical rat in the closet. It was not exactly explained how the new peer was to mould the constitution or warp the policy of England in any new direction; but he stood for conservatism, for government, for order, for the queen and royal family; he was the "strong man." So, in the United States, General Grant has become the figure-head of power, and is put forth as the "strong man" demanded by the exigency of the times—as though we had fallen upon such a crisis as in Rome used to demand a dictator or proconsul, clothed with extraordinary power. We hear of Grant as the "strong man" demanded for the public safety, necessary to save the republic from some imaginary peril—a sort of figure in the corn-field to keep off predatory crows—a stuffed image with swinging arms to drive away the blackbirds from the corn. If, in reply, it is suggested that we fear a man of power, a military man, "a strong man," it is at once explained that he is only a rag man, a stuffed figure, boneless, powerless, lifeless, and no one of us good, loyal Northern men need be frightened, as he is only intended to keep the Democratic crows and the Southern blackbirds from coming into the official field or picking up our kernels of corn. It looks very much as though farmers Conkling, Cameron, and Logan, with their hired men, would succeed in giving us this scare-crow candidate. Whether he will carry terror to the Democratic Richmonds remains to be seen. Marshal MacMahon was beaten in France; the Earl of Beaconsfield was beaten in England; and it is more than likely that this stuffed figure of a military "strong man" will not become a third time President of the United States.

There is too much freedom in the United States of America. Freedom that passes beyond the restraints of law becomes license, and is dangerous. Freedom of the elective franchise, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom to bear arms, are all abused in our country, and when unrestrained and abused become the worst of evils. Anarchy is worse than tyranny; license is more dangerous than oppression. Naturalization laws must be abolished; the elective privilege must be limited to the intelligent and the law-abiding. The freedom of the press must be restricted, the freedom of speech must be limited, and the right to bear arms controlled. Our country is hastening to an anarchy that imperils life, liberty, property, society, order, law, government. The only remedy is through the ballot-box, by an appeal to the intelligence, patriotism, and self-interest of the people. It must not be a party or a class appeal. It can not come by a union of any order or interest of society that does not embrace the good and wise of all nationalities, all religions, and all conditions. An American party based upon the accident of birth would be a failure; an organization that admitted race, color, or religious prejudice would only precipitate the dangers we fear and the evils we dread. To organize any party now is impossible. The Presidential issue is upon us. There can be no change till after the Presidential election, and it may not be expected that either the Republican or the Democratic party will have the courage to declare any new issues. This contest will be fought over old and unimportant ones. Such questions as involve Southern policy, finance, Chinese immigration, the tendency to military power and centralization, questions of tariff, corporations, etc., will be discussed. But the time is not distant when the questions we suggest will demand attention and receive it. Their importance will become so manifest, and the people will become so earnest in clamoring for their recognition, that the national parties will be compelled to give them attention. If the two great parties do not do so, there will come from the people another great national American party—composed as we have suggested—that will sweep the country with the power of a tornado. The non-extension of slavery was one of those vital issues that came from the people. Politicians tried and for a long time endeavored to repress it, and by temporizing to put off to a more distant day the decision whether freedom was sectional. The Whig party had not the courage of its conditions, and it was destroyed. The Democratic party allied itself to the slave institution, and the dead carcass still drags it down. The Republican party had the courage, the nerve, the intelligence, to grapple with the question, and the result was the abolition of slavery, and the constitutional declaration that all men are free. The Republican party will not have the courage of its convictions. The Democratic party is allied to the ignorant and vicious of the foreign element, and will go on and down with this debauched and drunken old alien of across the seas upon its bent and aching back; and from the people, from the intelligent foreign-born, the patriotic native-born, the courageous of all classes, there will arise another party—a party of principle. Its leaders will be Garrisons and Greeleys—men who want no office—and its rank and file will be heroes who fight from patriotism and not for spoils. The stronghold of this party will be in the South. Northern statesmen will be the first to dare the declaration that the naturalization laws must be repealed; but Southern statesmen and politicians will be among the foremost to grasp the idea, and the Southern States will become the first battle-fields of this conflict. Let no man doubt that this contest is coming, and let no man doubt its issue. It is not coming as a war of races. It is not coming as an ecclesiastical war. It is not to proscribe any nationality or any religion, but it is to declare the broad principle that the jewel of the elective privilege is too precious to be cast to the swine of ignorance and crime, whether native-born or foreign-born. The privilege of voting to the native-born must be limited. The right of voting to foreigners must not be extended. The freedom of the press, the trial by jury, freedom of speech, the right to bear arms, the right to disobey the laws, must all be defined, and brought within the restrictions of intelligent legislation.

The sensibilities of the Christian world have been recently most sincerely shocked by the startling news from Burmah, that its king has sought to appease the wrath of the devil by sacrificing—that is, burying alive—seven hundred men, women, and children. Of this number, it is said, one-half were—and most appropriately—priests. It is probable that the whole story is a lie, started at Mandelay by some enterprising press reporter, given to Reuter, sent to the London Telegraph, dispatched thence to the New York Herald, and thence by the Associated News Company as a press dispatch to San Francisco. It will be illustrated in London, Paris, Vienna, and New York, and will go into history as evidence, proof, and illustration that burying priests, men, women, and children alive is not a good way to appease the wrath of the devil. And yet we are not quite convinced that King Theebau's manner of appeasing the devil's indignation and placating his satanic majesty's wrath is not as good as our Christian mode. Without reviving the orthodox way of "giving the devil his due," and recalling the deaths of martyrs; the horrors of the inquisition; the burnings and tortures of rack, and boot, and thumb-screw; the holy wars, with their hecatombs of dead; recalling the more recent American history of drowning witches; remembering those early doctrines, taught in boyhood days, of infant damnation, of paving hell with babies' skulls, of saving only the elect from eternal torture in actual fire, and of foreordination and predestination as the only chance of escaping the divine law that for our good would give us the hot sulphur bath of eternal flame—we are not quite certain that our Christian manner of dealing with the devil is any very great improvement on that of King Theebau. We are entirely reconciled to his burying alive as many priests as he pleases. The world is too full of priests, and the more the devil gets the better we are pleased. Of course, we refer to certain kinds of priests, for priests are like deacons—there are good deacons and bad deacons, there are good priests and bad priests; but a bad priest's is worse than any other kind of badness, because to ordinary crimes he adds the crime of hypocrisy, which is the meanest and most contemptible of all the human vices. King Theebau, undoubtedly, by diligent hunting through the temples of Burmah, could easily find three hundred and fifty priests whose early and prompt burial would be good for the country and its people. Even in Christian America it would be an easy task to gather up three hundred and fifty preachers as a holocaust to the devil, whose prompt dispatch to hell would keep the devil busy for a time; and if it did not bring him to terms and fully appease his infernal wrath, it would at least do the country great good. Besides, what are preachers for except to fight battles with the devil? They are like soldiers—they enlist expecting to fight, and calculating the chances that they may fall in battle; so if the priest in Burmah or Brooklyn, in Mandelay or the Metropolitan Temple, can do the world better service and better appease the devil's wrath by an early death, then why not cremate them or bury them alive? We reserve ourselves upon this question, and ask a suspension of public opinion until King Theebau can be heard from.

They are troubled with a ghost in Charlestown. This ghost must be the spirit of a very bad man who prefers to stay in Arizona rather than go to the jail to take its chances.

MARY SHEA.

[The following beautiful and true story is told by W. Steuart Trench, agent of the Marquis of Lansdowne, and manager of his estate of Kenmare. It was from this estate that in less than four years forty-six hundred pauper emigrants were sent to America after the potato famine. No good person can regret that such immigrants as Eugene and his bride Mary Shea were aided to our shores. If Eugene and his wife are now in California we may be sure that they are good citizens, and have not spent their Sabbath-days upon the Sand-lot blaspheming God that their homes were made in this land of liberty and plenty.]

The writer, after describing the anxious crowds that thronged about his office for permission to emigrate, and after relating how he was compelled to guard his grounds from intrusion upon his hours of relaxation and leisure, says:]

I was walking one evening in those private pleasure-grounds after a day of heavy labor in the office, when I thought I perceived a pair of bright eyes watching me through the leaves of some holly bushes with which the wood abounds. I stopped immediately, and asked who was there.

"Oh, indeed, your honor, it's only me; and I know it's against the rules of the office to come here. But sure wasn't I waiting at the office-door all day, and they wouldn't let me in, because they said I was well able to hold out still, and wasn't nigh so weak as many of the creatures that was there. And that was true enough; but then they didn't know that I had ten long miles to go home before night; and so, as some said your honor was a good man, though some said not, I thought I would just chance in for once, and maybe your honor would find time to speak to a poor desolate orphan like me, even though it is against the rules."

"The desolate orphan," who now came forward and exhibited not merely her bright eyes but her full form to my view, was somewhat singular in her appearance. She had but little of the original Celt in her features. Her beauty was purely Spanish, of which I have seen many perfect specimens in Tuosist and around Kenmare: large soft eyes, with beautiful dark downy eyelashes, the mouth well formed, and cheek of classic mould; while the figure, perfect in its symmetry, is erect and active, and exhibits a lightness of step and grace of motion which can rarely be attained but by constant practice in walking over the mountains. The form which now stood before me was a beautiful specimen of this perfect Spanish type. She was clean and neat in her person, though her clothes were of the coarsest kind. Her gown, made of light gray flannel or frieze, manufactured in the mountains where she lived, was crossed upon her bosom and extended up to her neck. Her hair, as black as jet, was neatly parted on her forehead, and hung in careless folds down her back. She had neither shoes nor stockings, and her dress did not come down to within seven or eight inches of her feet. She wore no shawl, which is common in the district, about her neck. She held her head as erect as a startled fawn. Her hands were clasped in an attitude of wild supplication, and the symmetry of her form was enhanced by the unusual addition of a leather strap buckled around her waist, which, though neither new nor ornamental in itself, had the effect of showing off her naturally beautiful figure to the best advantage.

The moment she appeared from behind the holly-bush, she commenced her oration. And, talking with a volubility and amount of action which it would be impossible to describe, her features became animated and the blood mounted to her cheeks. I have rarely seen so beautiful and natural a girl. I think she knew she was a beauty, and had "chanced" a little of the success of her visit upon that score, as well as upon my "goodness;" but there was no vanity or coquetry in her manner—she was perfectly natural and simple, and, as regards beauty, so intelligent a girl as she was could not possibly look at her reflection in one of her own dark mountain lakes, and not see that she was different from her neighbors.

She had watched my countenance with the quickness of an Irish peasant during the whole time she was speaking; and, in fact, I felt certain that she had prolonged her statement for that sole purpose, in order to form an estimate of her success, or vary her line of advance according as circumstances revealed themselves. I saw this perfectly at the time; but my interest in her vivacious courage was so great, and my admiration of her beauty so impossible to conceal, that she saw in a moment, though I had not spoken a word, that she had won her point.

"Ah! well I knew your honor had a good and kind heart within you," said she, coming forward with graceful animation, and under cover of her well-turned flattery. "And now, maybe I'd never have another opportunity, and oh! just listen to me till I tell you what I have to say, for mine is a sore, sore sorrow."

In a moment her whole countenance, almost her form, had changed. Her courage—some of which she had evidently derived from her beauty—seemed to have departed. Tears filled her eyes as she looked down upon the ground, and even her form seemed to lose many inches of its height. I could scarcely have thought that the same human being was before me, as she now stood, about to tell her tale of sorrow.

"What is your name?" I asked, "and where do you live?"

"Mary Shea is my name," said she, "that is my maiden name; and, indeed, for that matter I am not married yet."

"Married!" I exclaimed, "why you seem scarcely seventeen years of age."

"True for you," she replied, "you guessed it very nigh, as I am only seventeen next Shrove-tide."

"And what is your case? what do you want me to do?"

"I'll tell your honor that," replied she, resuming in a moment a portion of her previous animation. "What I want your honor to do is, to put down Eugene's name in the books, as tenant for the little place I have up in the mountain."

"And who is Eugene? and how came you to have a little place of your own, and you so young as you are?"

"I'll tell your honor all about it," she replied; "the way of it all was this; and again in a moment her countenance changed, her eyelids drooped, her form seemed to lose its height, and with a little hesitation as to where she should begin, she commenced her tale of woe."

"The way of it all was this: your honor was not here in the 'hungry year' (a term frequently used among the peasants to describe the famine), but them was terrible times. Only a little slip of a girl then—and sure for that matter not much more this minute. But my father had a little place up in the mountains, the same as what I was now talking about. Well, you see, he was an old man, and my mother was sickly, and they had no other child but me, and the place was very small, and when the potatoes blackened, sure they had no one but God to look to. 'Father,' says I, 'I fear ye'll die, and mother, too, if ye don't get something to eat.' 'True for ye, child,' says father, 'but where are we to get it? The great God has rotted the potatoes in the ground, and what other support had we all? and sure the neighbors are as bad off as we are.' Mother said nothing; she looked at father and me, she kissed me once or twice, as if to wish me good-bye; and when I got up in the morning I found her sitting in her clothes beside the fire, quite dead and stiff—not a month after the potatoes had blackened."

"Well, ye see, we lived far up in the mountains, and no meal or anything could be got there, except what I brought myself—and it was ten long miles from Kenmare. 'But still,' says I, 'I won't let father die if I can help it.' So we had a few hives of honey which the gentlemen liked, because the bees made it all in the heather; and I used to slip over to Kenmare, now and then, with a hive, and bring back a little meal to father—we had no cow, as the place was too small to rear one. And I won't tell your honor a lie when I say that sorra ha'porth we had to live on, except just the few hives of honey; and I knew when they were out, and I had no money to buy meal, we might just lie down and die. However, I said nothing to father about this, for I was only a slip of a girl; but I thought of it for all that."

"Well, sure enough, after a time the honey was all sold, and I smothered the last bee I had—though in troth I was sorry to do so, as I had reared them myself, and I think they knew me, as they never once stung me, though I used to sit close to the hive watching them. However, I knew well it was better for them to die than father, so I had to smother them; and I went down to Kenmare with a sorrowful heart, and got 15s. for the hive. Well, with that I fed father and myself for another weary month; and when the meal was out, father says to me: 'Mary dear, it's no use striving any longer against the hunger. I can't stand it. I'm weak and faint, and not able to go out to the public works, and I might as well die in the house as on the roads; and now mind, Mary dear, when I die, bury me beside your mother in the garden, and don't be making any noise about it—calling a wake or a funeral, for all has enough to do these hard times for themselves.' 'Oh, father dear, don't talk that way,' says I; 'I'll just go out and see if I can't get something that will keep the life in ye yet.' So father said nothing, but just lay down on the bed, as if to wait till I came home. Well, I had some strength and spirit in me yet. And as Eugene and I had known each other since we were little children, I thought I would just go to him and see if he could help me. But when I went to his house he was far away on the public works. So I had no more heart nor strength to go any farther, and I had enough to do to get home. But, oh! sorrow came heavy on me then; for when I called on father as I came in to ask him if God had sent him any food he did not answer; and when I came to his bed, and put my hand upon his forehead, I found that he was dead and cold, and I was left alone in the world."

Here the poor girl's voice failed; and, commencing to weep bitterly, she turned her head away. I found the tears rising in my own eyes too, but, endeavoring to turn her thoughts from this sad scene, I said:

"You have mentioned Eugene once or twice. Who is Eugene?" She dried her eyes in a moment; and, resuming the natural vivacity of her manner, she called aloud to some one who was evidently near at hand:

"Eugene! where are you, Eugene? I wouldn't wonder if he was here this minute!"

And, truly enough, he was; for, slowly emerging from the same holly bush where I had observed the young damsel's eyes in the first instance, came a tall, good-looking youth, clean and fair, with a cheek as smooth and free from beard as a woman's. He was about nineteen or twenty years of age, and as bashful as a youth detected under such circumstances—though she had evidently hid him there herself—could be.

"Don't be afeared, Eugene," cried the damsel; "don't be afeared. The gentleman isn't angry. Come and spake to him this minute. He is shy, your honor," said she, turning to me, in a conciliatory voice, as if excusing and patronizing her lover, over whom she evidently considered she had a great advantage in facility of speech and general knowledge of the world; "he is shy, and doesn't know how to spake to a gentleman, and I hope you'll excuse him; but he is a good, kind boy for all that, and well able to become a tenant for the little place, if you will only put his name in the book."

"Well, but," I urged, "if I put his name down in the book, he will be the tenant and not you; and how would that answer your purpose?"

"Oh, sure, your honor, it would be all the same; we would get married at once, and we would have the little place between us, as I feel lonesome in it all by myself."

"How large is the place?" inquired I.

"Well, for that matter, it is big enough," she replied; "but indeed it is not good for much, as it's able to feed nothing but the bees. And, troth, I don't know where they find anything to gather except in autumn, when the blossom comes upon the hether."

"What is the value of the place?" asked I.

"Well, indeed, it is not much. The late agent said it was good value, little cabin and all, for 7s. 6d. a year, and the rent was never raised since, and we made a few perches of potato-garden near the house."

"And so you and Eugene really want to marry and set up house upon a place only worth 7s. 6d. a year, cabin, mountain land, garden, and all?"

"Well, indeed, your honor, I don't see what better we could do. You see, Eugene and I have known each other a long time now, and all the neighbors knows we loves each other very much—and why wouldn't I love him, poor boy, when it was himself that saved my life?"

"How did he save your life?" I asked.

"Well, you see, I was telling you all about it," she resumed, "when you asked for Eugene, and I had to present him to your honor. But, sure enough, it was Eugene, and no one else, that saved my life, that night I was telling you of, when father died. I found him cold and stiff in the bed when I came home; and I had nothing in the house myself—no meal, nor bread, nor potatoes, not a ha'porth; so I just sat down on the bedside near him, and—God forgive me!—I prayed that He would take me, too; for I was helpless and sorrowful, and weak and down-hearted, with the hunger. And then I began to cry; and I thought of mother, how she had died, and how father was dead, and no one to bury him. 'And,' thinks I, 'if I die, too, the cabin will make a decent little grave over us all, and no one will know anything about it!' So I was crying on, thinking of all these things, and wondering how it all came about, when I heard a footstep at the door, and I guessed at once it was Eugene's. So he never said a word to me at first, but he sat himself down beside me. And after a little, he says: 'What is it, Mary dear?' 'Oh, Eugene,' says I, 'mother is dead, and now father is dead: there he is before you, and I'm going to die, too, for I'm broken-hearted, and have nothing to eat.' 'Eat this,' said Eugene, and he pulled an elegant loaf out of his pocket. 'I guessed ye came up to look for me to-day; and when I came home from the works, and mother gave me my supper, I just put it in my pocket, as I wasn't hungry myself, and came off with it to you. So eat it, Mary dear; for I couldn't eat it if a basketful of bread was before me!' Well, I knew the poor boy had stinted himself to give it to me; but I was well nigh gone, so I just gave him a loving look, and says I, 'Eugene, dear, I know well how it is; but I'll eat for all that for your sake, and for fear I'd die before your face.' And so I did. 'And now, Mary,' says he, 'come with me, and mother will take care of you for a bit; and in the morning I'll come out myself and bury father for you.' And so he did—the brave boy that he is, shy as he looks before your honor now. And we dug the grave between us, and put father into it, just as he was—for we had no coffin; where would we get one that year?—and laid him beside mother. And when the great day comes, sure they'll both rise together as well as if they were in a coffin of gold!"

Again she began to weep; but it was of short continuance this time.

"And now, won't you put Eugene's name in the book? and we'll go live there again, for it's hard to keep him away, and he is always pressing me to go with him to the priest. And we have put a new coat of thatch upon the little cabin, and maybe God would be good to us, and the bees would thrive, and the hungry year may never come on us again."

It was hard to resist such an appeal—especially when so easy an act would make a young and attached couple happy. But when I reflected upon the prospects in life upon which they were about to marry—nothing but a few acres of worthless heather, the cabin and all the land attached worth only 7s. 6d. a year, and fit for nothing but to feed bees—I felt that in granting her request I was only perpetuating the very system which had killed her father and mother; and, if extended now again, could not possibly lead to anything but the utmost want and misery. To think of this noble youth, and innocent and lovely maiden—such a handsome, loving couple as they were—squating on this miserable plot of irclaimable mountain side! I could not bear to think of it, so I resolved, if I could, to save them from so unworthy a fate.

"Well, Mary, I have heard all you have to say, and I would gladly do anything in my power to serve you and Eugene, but I can't bear the thought of a handsome girl like you, and a fine, manly boy like him, settling down for life on this miserable patch on the side of a barren mountain. I am thinking it would be far better to try your fortune in America together, and go out like the other immigrants, so many of whom were pressing to get their names down to-day."

Mary was silent for a little. At last she said:

"Well, your honor, I often thought it would be better, sure enough, to try our fortune in America than to try and settle on that small patch of barren land where my little place is; but I couldn't bear to think of going out on charity as a pauper. I never yet got poor relief from the work-house; and I wouldn't wish to go to America with the likes of the immigrants your honor is now sending out."

"I understand your scruples," I replied, "so I will propose another plan. What do you think if Eugene were to go out first—just for one year—and see whether the country would suit you and him? Let him return at the end of the year; and, if he does not like America, then I will put his name in the books as tenant for your own little place, or probably I shall be able to give you and him a better farm by that time."

"I would be loth to part with him for a whole long year," said Mary, looking lovingly upon the bashful Eugene; "but still, I think it might be the best way after all; for no doubt it is a poor place to settle on. But Eugene has no money to go with, and I have little or none to help him, and he could not go without that."

"He shall not fail for the want of funds; I will lend him the money for his voyage. If he return rich, he will repay me; if not, why it can't be helped."

"Your honor is very good," replied she, looking mournfully at Eugene; "but what will I do without him? and where will I go while he is away?"

"You can stay at mother's, dear, while I am away," broke in Eugene, who seemed suddenly to awake to an energy he had not before exhibited. "You well know she always loved you as a daughter, and she will care for you for my sake as well as for your own."

"I believe your honor is right," said Mary, turning to me; "let him go and try his fortune for one year; but mind," she added, as she looked toward the lad, "mind, Eugene, you must swear to me on the book you will come back—rich or poor, I don't care which—within the one year."

"I will swear it to you freely," replied Eugene, who seemed suddenly to find his tongue and all his other energies at the prospect of such an opening.

"And will your honor promise, on the word of a gentleman, to give us back the little place, or get us another better one when he returns, if he won't take me out with him again?" asked Mary, with an appealing look.

"Indeed I will; I faithfully promise it, if I am alive and here."

"Well, then, let it be so," said the weeping Mary; "and now the sooner the better. When will your honor give him the money that he may go at once?"

"To-morrow morning. He shall also have a new suit of clothes, as fast as the tailor can make them, and I have no doubt he will get into immediate employment."

Mary looked at her intended husband, and at once perceived that a man's energy and courage had suddenly risen within him. He was no longer a sheepish boy, patronized and brought forward by her; and he took upon himself the unaccustomed task of comforting and patronizing her.

"Mary dear, don't fret; as sure as the sun is in the heaven, I'll come back; I know I will, and this will be the last parting we will ever have. The gentleman has advised us for our good. The barren lot on the mountain side is no place for the likes of you and me to settle. I'll go seek my fortune in America; and, please God, I'll surely succeed; and then I'll come back for my own darlin', and take her out along with me. For God's sake, master, let us be quick, for I dar'n't rest, or think of leaving Mary, or maybe I couldn't go at all."

Mary threw her arms about Eugene's neck, and, utterly regardless of my presence, sobbed and wept like a child. Her patronizing air was utterly gone, and she addressed him as a lover who had proved himself worthy of her affections.

"Eugene," said she, "I know well I need not fear for your love if you were ten thousand miles away. You have proved it too often for me to doubt it for a moment now. Go, and God be with you: but—mind you come back within the year, whether ye be rich or whether ye be poor—if rich, ye will be welcome, and if poor, ye will then be doubly welcome to your own darlin' Mary. Never forget that!"

She then turned to me, and, holding out her hand as a countess might have done, she continued:

"Thank your honor much for your kindness. I'll never forget it, either in this world or the next."

In a few days Eugene appeared before me, clad in a new and comfortable suit.

I gave him his passage-money, and a couple of pounds over, that he might be able to go up the country and look for employment at once. He thanked me in a manly, open way, and departed.

My time and attention were so much occupied with the onerous duties in which I was then engaged, that though I often thought of Mary and her lover, yet I never had an opportunity of making special inquiries about her; but one day she sought me again as I was walking in the same grounds; and, coming up to me with a countenance beaming with pleasure, she showed me a letter from Eugene. It was not long, nor what most people would call interesting; but he told her he was in full employment with a good and kind man, that he had already saved £7 out of his earnings, and he hoped, before very long, to come back and claim his prize, and carry his darling Mary off to a far home he was then preparing for her. This was about six or seven months after he left; and she had remained sometimes in her "own little place," as she called it, and sometimes with his mother, ever since.

About five months after the last interview I was walking alone along the sea-shore at Kenmare, when I was again waylaid by the handsome Spanish beauty; but this time she was accompanied by a young man. She looked grave, though happy, as she walked lovingly by his side, and her patronizing ways had altogether departed from her. I looked carefully at the young man. He was tall and strong; his beard was massive, and reached almost to his chest; his face was handsome, but sunburnt and weather-beaten; and his whole appearance was as little like her lover Eugene as it was possible for it to be.

I stood still as the pair approached me, looking intently from one to the other. Mary and the man came quite close up to me, and as neither of them addressed me, I was the first to speak.

"How is this, Mary?" said I, "and who is this man who accompanies you? You surely do not mean to say you have cast off Eugene, and taken up with another man?"

Mary leaped nearly a foot from the ground as I said so. "I knew your honor wouldn't know him!" cried she, in a sudden ecstasy of joy. "Why this is Eugene himself! Sure didn't he deceive me, when he first came into the cabin, and why would your honor know him! Look at him now, and tell me if he is not grown a real man in earnest. Turn round, Eugene, and show yourself;" and assuming her old patronizing way for a moment, she turned him round and round for me to look at and admire, while he submitted with a loving, tender look of admiration at his bride.

"And this is indeed Eugene come back," I exclaimed; "and such a fine, manly-looking fellow, too. I hope you have prospered, Eugene, and that you will now take out Mary to a new and happy home far better and richer than her little place on the barren mountain."

Eugene was about to reply, when Mary leaped up and caught him round the neck with her arms.

"Oh, Eugene," cried she, almost in hysterics between joy and anxiety, "take me away with you soon; oh, take me away. We can not go too soon to please me!"

Then, turning rapidly to me, she said, in a joyous and altered voice:

"He has got a fine place of his own now, and twenty acres of good land, and a grand wooden house, in which he says I can live as comfortable as any lady. Oh, Eugene, darling," cried she, turning to him again, "take me away, take me away, and let us go to our new home, and never know sorrow or hunger more!"

She burst into tears, and clinging to his neck, kissed him over and over again, till he gently took her in his arms and placed her sitting—still sobbing like a child—on a bank of grass close by.

"Sir," said he, "I have to thank you for your kindness. I have brought back with me the money you lent me, and I am now ready to repay you. I have a neat place to bring Mary to, and all reasonable comforts for her. I could have made it better had I waited another year; but I promised in your presence not to let more than one year pass without returning—whether I came rich or poor. I have come back according to my promise. If not rich, at least with enough to give her plenty to eat, and a warm, comfortable home; and I hope soon to make it better. To-morrow we go to Cork; we are to be married there. The next day we sail for the West. May God bless you, sir! I will never forget your kindness." And he gave me his passage-money.

Mary sat listening while he spoke, sobbing and crying all the while. He lifted her gently up. She seized my hand and kissed it, covering it with her tears. Then suddenly smiling, while the large drops trembled in her eyes, she gave me one grateful and happy look, and left the sea-shore with her lover.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

Antony in Arms.

Lo, we are side by side! One dark arm furls
Around me like a serpent, warm and bare;
The other, lifted mid a gleam of pearls,
Holds a full golden goblet in the air.
Her face is shining through her cloudy curls
With light that makes me drunken unaware,
And, with my chin upon my breast, I smile
Upon her beauty, darkening the while.

And through the chamber curtains, backward rolled
By spicy winds that fan my fevered head,
I see a sandy flat slope, yellow as pale gold,
To the brown banks of Nilus, wrinkling red
In the slow sunset; and my eyes behold
The west, low down beyond the river's bed,
Grow sullen, ribbed by many a brazen bar,
Under the white smile of the Cypran star.

A bitter Roman vision floated black
Before me, in my dizzy brain's despoise;
The Roman armor bristles on my back,
My swelling nostrils drink the flames of fight;
But then—she smiles upon me! And I lack
The warrior will that frowns on love's delight,
And, passionately proud and desolate,
I smile to answer to the joy I hate.

Joy coming uninvoked, asleep, awake,
Makes sunshine on the grave of buried powers;
Ofttimes I wholly loathe her for the sake
Of manhood slipped away in easeful hours;
But from her lips mild words and kisses break,
Till I am like a runn mock with flowers;
I think of Honor's face, then turn to hers—
Dark, like the splendid shame that she confers.

Lo, how her dark arms hold me! I am bound
By the soft touch of fingers light as leaves;
I drag my face aside, but at the sound
Of her low voice I turn—and she perceives
The cloud of Rome upon my face—and round
My neck she twines her odoriferous arms, and grives
Shedding upon a heart as soft as tears
Tears 'tis a hero's task to kiss away.

And then she loosens from me, trembling still
Like a bright, throbbing robe, and bids me go—
When pearly tears her drooping eyelids fill,
And her swart beauty whitens unto snow;
And, lost to use of life and hope and will,
I gaze upon her with a warrior's woe,
And turn, and watch her sidelong, in annoy—
Then snatch her to me, flushed with shame and joy.

Once more, O Rome, I would be son of thine!
This constant prayer my chained soul ever saith:
I thirst for honorable end; I pine
Not thus to kiss away my mortal breath;
But comfort such as this may not be mine—
I can not even die a Roman death:
I seek a Roman's grave, a Roman's rest—
But, dying, I would die upon her breast!—Robert Buchanan.

The Jolly Old Pedagogue.

'Twas a jolly old pedagogue, long ago,
Tall and slender, and sallow and dry;
His form was bent, and his gait was slow;
His long, thin hair was as white as snow;
But a wonderful twinkle shone in his eye,
And he sung every night as he went to bed:
"Let us be happy down here below;
The living should live, though the dead be dead,"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He taught his scholars the rule of three,
Writing and reading, and history, too;
He took the little ones on his knee,
For a kind old heart in his breast had he,
And the wants of the littlest child he knew;
"Learn while you're young," he often said,
"There's much to enjoy down here below;
Life for the living, and rest for the dead!"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

With stupidest boys he was kind and cool,
Speaking only in gentlest tones;
The rod was hardly known in his school;
Whipping to him was a barbarous rule,
And too hard work for his poor old bones.
Besides, it was painful, he sometimes said,
"We should make life pleasant down here below;
The living need charity more than the dead,"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He lived in the house by the hawthorne lane,
With roses and woodbine over the door;
His rooms were quiet, and neat, and plain,
But a spirit of comfort there held reign,
And made him forget he was old and poor.
"I need so little," he often said,
"And my friends and relatives here below
Won't litigate over me when I am dead,"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

But the pleasantest times that he had, of all,
Were the sociable hours he used to pass
With his chair tipped back to a neighbor's wall,
Making an unceremonious call,
Over a pipe and a friendly glass.
This was the finest pleasure, he said,
Of the many he tasted here below;
"Who has no cronies had better be dead!"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

Then the jolly old pedagogue's wrinkled face
Melted all over in sunny smiles;
He stirred his glass with an old-school grace,
Chucked and sipped and prattled apace,
Till the house grew merry from cellar to tiles.
"I'm a pretty old man," he gently said,
"I have lingered long while here below;
But my heart is fresh, if my youth is fled!"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He smoked his pipe in the balmy air
Every night when the sun went down,
While the soft wind played in his silvery hair,
Leaving its tender kisses there.
On the jolly old pedagogue's jolly old crown;
And feeling the kisses, he smiled, and said:
"Twas a glorious world down here below!
Why wait for happiness till we are dead?"
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He sat at the door, one midsummer night,
After the sun had sunk in the west,
And the lingering beams of golden light
Made his kindly old face look warm and bright,
While the odoriferous night-whispered "Rest!"
Gently, gently he bowed his head.
There were angels waiting for him, I know;
He was sure of happiness, living or dead,
This jolly old pedagogue, long ago!—George Arnold.

CONCERNING ALASKA AND ITS INTERESTS.

When, through the instrumentality of Mr. Secretary Seward, our Government entered into and consummated negotiations for the purchase of the Territory of Alaska, it was undoubtedly with the intention of giving its people a government and its Indian tribes protection. It is odd, and to us an enigma, why there has been no organization of a territorial government for this our most recently acquired possession. It is an anomaly. We believe there is no other portion of our country where there is not some semblance of law and some appearance of authority. It would seem as though it was most desirable that a country so large in extent, so abounding in valuable property, and possessing so large a population as twenty-seven thousand souls, with forests, fisheries, mines, and fur stations, capable of further development, ought to be provided with some form of administration. In conversation, some time since, with Mr. John Muir—who has traveled so extensively through the Alaskan possessions, and who knows more than any other living man of its capacities and people, and whom we believe to be entirely disinterested and unselfish in his opinions—he expressed his surprise that a government had not been organized there. We asked Mr. Muir, at that time, to give us a memorandum of facts, that we might be better informed in reference to the Alaska purchase. He gave us in pencil memorandum the following data, which we hereby lay before our readers, reserving to ourselves the privilege of future comment:

Here are a few facts and suggestions relating to civil government in Alaska, promised you more than a month ago. The delay in furnishing them was caused by my absence from the city.

The inhabitants of Alaska, as nearly as I can guess, are:

Indians belonging to the Thinket family, in southeastern Alaska, about.....	5,000
Alutics, of the Aleutian and adjacent islands and shores.....	7,000
"Stick Indians" and Esquimaux, of the interior and Arctic Coast, about.....	13,000
Half-breeds.....	1,500
Whites, perhaps about.....	500

The whites are engaged in mining, fishing, trading, and raising vegetables; and, without exception, as far as I have observed, want and demand civil government. The Esquimaux and "Stick Indians" seldom make themselves heard or felt in any way among the whites. The Alutics and Thinkets live in villages substantially built, and subsist mainly on fish and seals. Many of them speak English and Russian, some have schools and churches, and all, in general terms, are willing to work for the whites at fair wages, and eager to learn and take on civilization. The Thinkets, in particular, in point of intelligence, conduct, and all that depends on moral development, are greatly superior to any other Indians I have seen. They compare favorably with the uneducated classes of any country in Europe. They would gladly submit to rigid law that, without reference to treaties, would place them on the same footing as the whites. They say: "You have broken up our government and extinguished it, therefore give us yours." In quarrels that arise among themselves, they in many cases go to Captain Beardslee, of the James-town, to the collector of customs or his deputies, or to the missionaries, to have them settled, and can hardly be made to understand that the whites in Alaska are themselves without law. The chiefs and head men of the Stikine tribe, at Fort Wrangel, waited upon Mr. Young, the Presbyterian missionary stationed there, and begged him to write out a code of laws, promising to abide by them and enforce them in their tribe. Their disappointment was great on being told that neither he nor any other man in the territory had the power to comply with their request.

A case, representative of many, occurred at Fort Wrangel last December, which came under my own observation. A drunken Indian killed his wife. The friends of the murdered woman applied to the deputy collector of customs, demanding that the criminal be punished. He told them that he had no power to act in the matter, but would report the case to Captain Beardslee at Sitka. Beardslee also declined having anything to do with it. After weeks of waiting the chiefs held a council over the affair, and requested Mr. Young, their missionary, to preside. But he, reminding them that he was only a missionary, advised them to take the law into their own hands. They finally decided to hang the criminal; but he, with five or six of his friends, entrenched himself in a strong block-house, and resisted arrest. When I left the village, in December, the two parties were shooting at each other, and the difficulty seemed to bid fair to grow into a general civil war, endangering the lives and property of the whites as well as their own. In a word, anarchy prevails, where firm government would maintain order at the cheapest rate imaginable. I never before saw Indians so easily made amenable to law, so easily controlled by whites, so eager to be taught; and I am confident that, with anything like fair play and the instruction they crave, they would make good, self-supporting citizens.

Since the withdrawal of the military the country has had no protection worthy of the name. Its management has been turned over to the Treasury Department. What the authority of the collector of customs and his deputies amounts to I do not know. They certainly do not know themselves.

The old wooden sail-ship the James-town lies at anchor before Sitka, and affords some protection to that one town only. She can not thread the narrow and intricate channels of the Alexander Archipelago, on the shores of which most of the Indian villages are located, and the commander can do nothing more in the way of punishing offenders than to send the few that come within his reach to Oregon to be tried. One good steam gunboat with suitable steam launches and well provided in every way, whose commander was a justice of the peace, with power to try minor cases, would be sufficient at present to ensure order throughout the whole of southeastern Alaska. Another should cruise about Conalaska.

There is no system of land records in the territory, and no law whereby complete titles to real estate may be acquired. Claims of pre-emption and settlement are not only without the sanction of law, but in direct violation of the provisions of the laws of Congress applicable to the public domain secured to the United States by any treaty with a foreign nation. A man dying in Alaska is unable to dispose of his property by will.

The natural wealth of the country has been greatly under-estimated, or rather under-guessed, for nothing like a serious and comprehensive effort has ever been made to learn the truth concerning it.

Were a civil government provided, and the whole country thrown open to settlement, and the ordinary inducements offered to immigrants, its real value would soon be made manifest. As it is, in spite of all discouragements, its mines and fisheries are being developed to a considerable extent, and the white population is constantly increasing.

The responsibilities assumed by the United States in the cession treaty are clearly defined as to the Russians. Quoting from article third: "The inhabitants of the ceded territory, according to their choice, reserving their natural allegiance, may return to Russia within three years, but if they should prefer to remain in the ceded territory, they, with the exception of the uncivilized native tribes, shall be admitted to all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion."

I do not know a single State or Territory in all our country where workers may more easily gain a good, independent livelihood. Pity 'tis our entire Workingman's party could not be headed Alaska-ward.

Truly yours,

JOHN MUIR.

A loin of mutton was on the table, and the gentleman opposite took the carver in his hand. "Shall I cut it saddle-wise?" quoth he. "You had better cut it butch-wise," replied his neighbor, "for then we shall all have a bit in our mouths."

BALDWIN THEATRE.—Having had recent occasion to indicate the character of a play by its likeness to some work of Mr. Wilkie Collins, the inwardness of New Men and Old Acres will perhaps be apprehended if we say it is—Mr. Anthony Trollope. The people of the play are of the sort who tub and assume fresh underwear, read their Times, provide aged females with flannel petticoats, pray after the ritual in that case provided, are born in wedlock, marry temperately, and die in the odor of the Church of England. Acquaintanceship with them is a gentle exhilaration, rather than an excitement; it may stimulate, but will inebriate never. It leaves upon the palate no flavor as of acetous fermentation; in the mental digestive apparatus no qualms of goneness; in the moral sense, no katzenjammer. Drink as recklessly as we may of this British tap, we are safe from all deliriums that lurk in Gallic absinthes. The penalties attending on such excesses have been sufficiently preached and sung.

What are the joys that wine can give like those it takes away? When slight intoxication yields to drunkenness the sway? 'Tis not that youth's smooth cheek its blush surrenders to the nose—for youth's smooth, frozen cheek of this, our period, has retained never a blush to surrender.

For my own part, I like the sort of fellow-creatures who figure in New Men and Old Acres. I like that "Lillian" girl, for example—awfully nice girl; and it must be no end jollier to have such a girl smuggling up to you than to achever des succès among Frenchwomen from here to the Ile de Bourbon. I like "Lady Matilda;" tremendous old humbug—regular brazen image of aggressive virtue; but militant virtue is the right thing when it's in the right place, and the right place is the maternal bosom wherein daughters yet shelter. I like—no, I'd like to be "Brown," of Liverpool, for "Brown" is wealthy and still young. Fanny one's self wealthy, young, English, and at home; a whole island-full of Lillians and Ethels, Constances and Mauds, just going for you; and you—you enacting the famous animal distracted betwixt rival bundles of hay. I like "Bunters"—after they are full blown. "Bunter" owning acres—going in for greenhouses, spinning his money for the sake of the spin; this, I take it, is an invigorating and delightful spectacle. Both extremes of worldly fortune are picturesque, but each must be at the actual extremity. Mere indigence and its threadbare garb are alike offensive; but the fluttering rags of a tatterdemalion are alluring. So, merely opulent vulgarity is a bore, and its air of gentility oppressive; but lavish vulgarity, pouring out pactolian streams, gushing and copious—its very font of auric irrigation—is an inspiring object. Its incarnation in the persons of a "Bunter" and spouse awaken an interest of no uncordial kind, that may easily quicken, in the case of a Miss Bunter, into disinterested affection. I like "Bertie Fitzurse"—decorative and duteous. The loveliness of humankind would be the poorer lacking "Fitzurses," even as that of the Quadrumania would be the poorer lacking its high-tinted genus, Cynocephalus. The species "Fitzurse" contributes to excite and avails to appease an aspiring spirit in "Fanny Bunter;" and after they twain are made one flesh, the Fitzurse place is a doocid pleasant, hospitable, delightful place to visit, and Fitz and Fanny are among the most charming people on any fellow's list of acquaintance.

In just glancing at the people who figure in this play, each is recognized as a type. We know in advance the relations they will bear to one another—the sort of love-making that will ensue between "Lillian" and a Mr. Brown who is so very well to do; and that between a Fitzurse who stands next to the title and "Fanny Bunter." We anticipate the part "Lady Matilda" will take in these manoeuvres—"wegar man-twaph," as Wilder hath it. We know the fascinating figure "Mrs. Bunter" will make—though we could scarcely have known in advance how pun-gently Mrs. Saunders would play it. We know that we are to see

Even beneath a "Bunter's" brim A simple Bishop shown in him, but we also know that that Bishop in the body is superlative as a "Bunter" of the mind. And, keeping before our mental vision those other types already mentioned, it is enough by way of criticism to add here, that the Baldwin people made an effort to realize them, and that Miss Stanhope, at least, succeeded. I fancy that many of us would like to see Miss Carey in "Lillian." Mr. Jennings played to admiration a German mineralogy-sharp.

One of the designs submitted for the proposed monument to Adam, at Elmira, had a deep indentation in the head. An explanation being demanded, the conscientious artist said that it was all right; it represented a wound Adam received when he fell.

END MEN AT LOGGERHEADS.

The Duel between Billy Emerson and Billy Rice.

Haverly's United Mastodon Minstrels, now performing at Niblo's Garden, numbers two-score performers, selected from every branch of the profession. Their astute manager, Mr. J. H. Haverly, organized the company for the purpose of affording harmless amusement to the public, and he has considered himself doubly repaid for his energy and enterprise when he nightly glances over his box-office sheet and the smiling faces of his audiences. But while he was endeavoring to furnish comedy to his patrons, two of his stars were rehearsing a scene that was intended to culminate in a realistic tragedy. In other words, Billy Rice and Billy Emerson, two of his best-known performers, had quarreled, and it was rumored that they had determined on a duel to settle the matter. There had been no tangible story told as to the date and origin of the trouble, but vague hints were thrown out that it culminated after the show on Wednesday night. Last evening a Star reporter was admitted to Mr. Billy Rice's dressing-room after the performance. The obese comedian was in dishabille; that is, he had nothing on except a pair of shoes. He was rubbing himself vigorously with a Turkish towel, and while he talked he punctuated his utterances by wiping corks of exclamation points out of his eyes and huge periods of the same substance from his ears. The reporter modestly explained his mission. "Certainly I wanted satisfaction," Rice vociferated. "Would you have me a toad, to feed upon the vapors of a duodecimo? Even a dog will bark when his dignity is trampled upon."

"But you haven't explained the origin of the trouble," mildly insinuated the reporter. "True, true, I had forgotten that; but time with all its—oh, sit down—I didn't want this printed—but your reporters have ears like an elephant. Recline yourself in yon easy chair," pointing to a tin bucket with an edge like a cross-cut saw.

"You and Mr. Emerson had a quarrel?" "Something of that kind, I believe, occurred between us, but we have clasped hands over the what-do-you-call-it, and we are now as loving brothers." "The reason of it was—"

"Now, if you want to tell the story, pitch in. But as I was there when it happened, probably you'll take my version of it."

Thus admonished the reporter subsided, and the fat disciple of Momus proceeded: "Since I've been connected with this party I have been on the tambourine end, and I wanted to stay there, because the summer's coming on and the work's easy, and—well, if you're clever you can guess the rest. I ain't bad if I am fat; and I ain't so fat after all, for I don't average more than two hundred and fifteen pounds when in actual eating condition. Outside of that you ought to see me beat a bass drum."

"But how about the duel, Mr. Rice?"

"No interruptions, please. As I was about to say, Billy Emerson was engaged, and he joined the party. He wanted to go on the tambourine end; and if he did, of course I would be compelled to go on the bone end. I thought it rather hard that a man of my build should be made the bony part of the first part, and I objected. Billy insisted, and showed his contract, which stipulated that he was to twirl a tambourine in the show. There was too much work in prospect for me, and I made up my mind, if Billy Emerson displaced me, that I would kind of ventilate my feelings, as it were. Well, Wednesday night I got up here [the dressing-room] ahead of Emerson. You must know that we both dress in the same room. I had read of the trouble of the prime donne at the Academy of Music, and, feeling that I had as much cause to 'kick' as they had, I concluded to follow their example. I struck the centre of the room, and stretched a piece of rope over it. Over this I slung a shawl, thus making two compartments of it; took the inside myself, and turned down the lights in Emerson's half, so that I could not witness his mortification when he made the discovery. When he came up stairs, if you'd been here, you'd thought you was in a cuss-factory in full operation. We exchanged compliments, and then Emerson demanded satisfaction."

"I was willing to accommodate him, but didn't want to take a mean advantage. If I fell on him I would have squashed him as flat as a pair of tights. If I hit him I would have divorced him from the world, and if I breathed on him he would have vanished like frost on a window-pane. His honor was wounded, and he demanded blood to heal his pain. We then agreed to fight with swords in some retired spot near the city."

"Are you an expert swordsman?"

"Well, I should expostulate! My brother-in-law was a sword-swallower, and I was raised in Brooklyn, on the same block with a man who manufactured any number of the original Sword of Bunker Hill."

"Did you really intend to fight him?"

"I am a man of peace, and I was only too anxious to administer consolation to my brother. The preliminaries were arranged, and Ed. Kayne, our preliminary, consented to draw my will and act as my second. Coaches were engaged, and it was arranged to leave town on Thursday night, after the show. Four of the boys were to go in Emerson's hack, and four in mine. I sized up the party, and calculated what it would cost to start them off. Forty cents would have been sufficient capital for eight beers on ordinary occasions, but the gang imagined that they were going to a funeral, and they had lost their appetite for everything except high-priced liquors. A two-dollar note wouldn't flutter a minute on a bar in front of that crowd. Well, when it came time to start, the funeral didn't move. Emerson and I were in the dressing-room, and the chief-mourners and pall-bearers were waiting outside of the theatre. Emerson was sharpening a sword on his side of the partition, and I was writing a farewell letter to my tailor on my side. Billy, you know, is a tall, slim fellow; and he peeked over the division between us, and he said, kind of gently: "Billy, have you said your ante-mortem devotions? If not, you had better; for I can't help filling you full of sword-holes. You're too fat, Billy, to keep out of my way. I am sorry for you, but you have brought this upon yourself."

"Mr. Emerson," said I, "your threats can not unnerve me. I will meet you on the field, which will be the cemetery of either one of us, with the firmness of a man fighting for his rights."

"Billy," said he, "let's take a parting drink together; it may be the last that we'll enjoy together in this life."

"Are you going to swear off?" said I.

"Mr. Rice," said he, "are you aware that in an hour from now you and I will be engaged in mortal combat?"

"I was about to ask forgiveness for my forgetfulness when all of a sudden the partition was broken down, and Emerson and I fell on each other's breasts and wept. We settled everything then and there; I tore up my will for shaving-paper, and Billy Emerson broke up his swords into toothpicks. We have been friends ever since, but it was awful rough on the boys. Poor fellows, they don't get much recreation, and it seemed rather hard that we deprived them of an opportunity of going to a respectable funeral."

Mr. Emerson's side of the story could not be learned, as he had departed previous to the reporter's visit.

Mr. E. M. Kayne was found in his dressing-room. He is six feet tall, and of superb physique. He was powdering his face and neck with camphorated chalk previous to robbing for the street. In a deep, musical bass voice, which has evoked the plaudits of the multitudes, he replied to the reporter's questions:

"Base menial of a mighty power," said he, "I am an offspring of chivalry and a champion of the oppressed. I was consulted in this affair of honor, and I was willing to act as the friend of either, but fate cast me as the second of Mr. Rice. Judgment has vanquished passion, and friendship rules supreme. Wouldst learn more? Then be seated." Previous experience in Mr. Rice's room had taught the reporter a lesson, and he spurned the cigar box which Mr. Kayne had offered him as a substitute for a divan. He bade the gentleman good-night, groped his way down the ill-lighted stairway, stumbled through heaps of diseased scenery, and made his way across the stage out into the murky night, satisfied that he had the origin and ending of the Rice-Emerson duel.—*N. Father Ollivier, of the Dominican order in Paris, recently offered to wager a certain sum of money that the present government in France would not last until 1890. M. Sarcey, the Paris journalist, took him up; but Father Ollivier declined then to make the wager, giving three excuses for his refusal—first, that the so-called wager was a mere rhetorical flourish, such as is excusable in a preacher, and is never taken in earnest by his hearers; secondly, that he never intended to predict that the French Republic would not endure ten years longer, but merely that the government of M. de Freycinet would not last until 1890; thirdly, that the strict rules of the Dominican order prohibit him from betting. M. Sarcey is reported as saying that such a reply is all he wanted, as it suffices to show what degree of credit may be placed in the bragging rhetoric of political preachers.

Once in a while a cold-blooded critic, who doesn't know how to dance, looks into a ball-room and studies the salutary panorama in an unsympathetic spirit. Such a one has described how it struck him in the Saturday Review: "One man waltzes with his head in the air, and much the expression of a dog when he is howling at the sound of music. Another has a bend in the middle, which looks as uncomfortable as it is ungraceful. One genuflects at every turn, and slides out one of his feet as if to trip up rival dancers. An even more dangerous performer works his left hand up and down as if it were a pump-handle. A tall man, with a top-heavy kind of stoop, leans over his partner like a great hen taking a chicken under her wings. One man holds his partner as if he were afraid she would slip from his grasp, while another looks as he wished he were rid of his bargain."

Senator Hamstrung, of the Limekiln Club, arose to a question of privilege. He said he had been called a liar by Cod Liver Scott, another local member, and wanted a new by-law to the effect that any member calling another a liar should be fined one dollar for the first fifty times, and fifty cents for each subsequent repetition. "Spoke dat man who calls you a liar offers to come befo' de club an' prove it?" queried the president. "But he can't prove it, sah." "Why not?" "Kase he can't, sah. Does de president of dis club believe dat I would lie?" "De president only decides sich qeshuns when de vote am a tie," was the evasive answer. "Gem'len, dwell in peace. Spoke gently to each odcir. You may hev de house full of dollar-store jewelry an' silver-handled forks, but if harmony am not wid you your clothes won't fit an' your bacon won't relish. Let us now recherche to our homes."

A little fellow was out-riding with his father the other day, when, noting the name of a street, he asked if it was named after Mr. B—, a well-known politician.

"By no means," said the parent; "it was not named after him, but after his father, who was very popular, and very much esteemed."

The boy said nothing, so his father, who thought he saw a chance to preach a little sermon, continued: "It's very apt to be so. A boy has a father whom everybody loves and respects for his good qualities and abilities, but in too many cases the boy doesn't amount to anything."

Said the boy, after a pause: "Your father was very much esteemed, wasn't he?"

The Princess de Lusignan lives in a beautiful old house adjoining that occupied by Victor Hugo, both buildings belonging to the family of the ancient kings of Cyprus. The gardens are contiguous, and the poet often leaves his work to enjoy the sweet voice of his neighbor, who is a delightful amateur singer. Victor Hugo and the princess have long been acquainted. On the day of the centenary of Hernani he wrote her this picturesque letter: "Wednesday, 25th February. Between our two ages, madame, there is room for a cinquantenaire of Hernani. My eighty years present their compliments to your thirty years, and my old lips kiss your young hands. VICTOR HUGO."

Two Eastern boys recently gave their mother a terrible shock. They got her religious paper out of the mail, slipped it from the wrapper, and substituted a copy of the Police Gazette. When the poor mother first opened it, without her specs, she thought it was a Christmas number; and when in a better light the joke dawned upon her, she bared her long and strong right arm, and put the imprint of a shingle where it actually made Rome howl.

Victor Hugo's wife and two little children, George and Jeanne, were recently in a box of a theatre when his play, Hernani, was reproduced on the anniversary of his birthday. The master himself was too modest to be present. In the last act, at the death of "Hernani," the emotion of the children became uncontrollable. Little Jeanne sobbed, and was so disturbed, so pale, so trembling, that her mother thought it prudent to withdraw her to a retired corner of the box.

THE GATHERING OF THE FOOLS.

A Sermon by Robert the Good, alias Burdette.

DEARLY BELOVED FOOLS: One year has passed away, and according to appointment we meet once more to celebrate the natal day of our patron saint. I am glad that I am spared to be with you on this foolish and happy occasion, and it pleases my heart to see that you have improved the time, and are now greater fools than ever. For this, let us rejoice.

I, too, am more of a fool than I was a year ago. And I am therefore, as you also are, just so much happier. Dear, gentle fools, what care we, on this bright and smiling April day, who gets the nomination at Chicago or Cincinnati? What care we who will be President? And, in fact, nobody knows who will be President save myself alone. And I will not tell. Why should I destroy all the interest which wise men feel in the election and the canvass, by giving away the result?

I met a wise man on the highway. Haggard was his face and blood-shot his eyes, his hair was disheveled, and there was upon his face the expression of woe that fools never wear.

And he told me he had bought Northwestern at 110, and had just sold at 108½.

But I wot not what he meant, because I was a fool. And again I met in the assembly of the wise men two wise men, and their wisdom looked out of their faces. And they shouted at each other with an exceedingly great shout, in the assembly of the sages, and one of them smiled and said unto me privately:

"He is a lame duck, for I have just unloaded upon him a block of Iron Mountain at 65½, and lo! it will not be 37 before morning?"

But I wist not what it was that he had done, for I was a fool, and fools have no understanding concerning these things. Verily, we neither "unload," nor are we "unloaded" upon. Wherefore, dearly beloved, are we happy.

There came unto me in the train, brethren, a man of exceedingly grave countenance, and wise of aspect, and his lips dropped wisdom. And, as he spake, one said unto me: "Lo, and he knoweth it all." And I marvelled greatly at his wisdom; but I held my peace, as becometh fools in the presence of wise men. And the wise man held his hat before me and smiled, and said unto me:

"Vote, please."

And I understood him not, but hesitated in my speech, and said that of a verity I gave nothing to beggars who were able to travel.

And he was wroth, and said:

"Vote for President, please."

And I said: "President who?"

And the wise man spake hastily and with great wisdom, and said:

"Anybody; vote for your candidate for President."

And I asked him: "President of what?"

The wise man said: "Of the United States. How long have you lived in this country?"

Truly, I told him the years of my pilgrimage were rising thirty-six, by the measure of time, but by the fullness of the fun I had had, they were even one hundred and seventy scant.

"Well," the wise man said, "vote for President; Grant, Blaine, Sherman, Washburne, or Garfield, or Edmunds—whichever you prefer."

I asked him how often I should vote.

And he said: "Once only."

I answered him: "But would the first time count?"

And he waxed angry and said: "You are a fool."

And greatly I marvelled how he found it out, for it was even so.

Dearly beloved, I have seen the wise man rising early and sitting up late, and gathering unto himself wealth, that his children's lawyers might divide it among themselves. I have seen him marching down the street, with cheers upon his lips, a torch glaring above his head, and kerosene oil trickling down the back of his Sunday coat, that a man might be elected President who would give the foreign mission to the neighbor who marched not, neither lifted his voice, but sat on his porch and laughed to scorn they who marched by. I have seen the wise man bend his strength to the handle of the grindstone, and circulate it with the muscles of his arms and the strength of his back and the sweat of his brow, until that the axe was sharpened into the keenness of the razor's edge, and he that held it struck off with it the wise man's head. I have seen the wise man gather his friends in his house and feed them sumptuously, so that when they were gone away, they wondered one to another, "how they could afford it," and told unto each other gossip concerning the wise man and the wife of his wisdom. I have seen the wise man cast down because it rained, and refusing to be comforted because it rained not. I have heard him "say things" because it snowed too much, and worse things because it snowed never at all. I have heard him "confound" the heat, and "plague on" the cold. I have seen him refuse to play because he had work that he could do; I have seen him decline the picnic when there was nothing to keep him from it but a set of books a little behind; I have cried unto him, "Dance with me," and he hath said, "Nay, I must sell a bill of goods." I have seen that he would rather work than play, and all his days were labor, and his nights were dreams of scheming, and there was no pleasure in the world that he desired save a long bank account, that he could not eat, neither could it sing unto him and make merry for him when he was sad. And I beheld these things, but I could not understand them, for I was a fool.

Wherefore, dearly beloved, as we have been fools in the past, let us strive to continue in our happiness and increase our folly. We are the happy ones of the earth. Sun rise and set, and we can stand it as long as the suns can, to all intents and purposes. Let us laugh. There is no fool so useless as the solemn fool. The owl that looks wise and never laughs is poorer than any fool among birds; any boy can catch an owl, but who can catch the garrulous jay asleep after daybreak? What animal among animals looketh so wise and affecteth so much solemn and ponderous wisdom as the ass? And yet the ass is not used as a synonym for intellectual culture. Oh, my brethren, as we must be fools, let us be merry fools, that the world may be brighter around us, and smile at our foolish coming.

For fear of disturbing the congregation, no collection will be taken up. Services will be held in this column as usual on next "All Fools' Day," to which the wise men are cordially invited. And now may the lightness of folly fill your hearts, and teach you to bear with the follies of your neighbors, and to pity the poor fools who fall by the wayside, even with the foolish pity of the good Samaritan who was a fool even as you are—without the pride of birth or the dignity of rank, without the worldly wisdom of the Levite or the scholarly learning of the clerical priest.

TAILINGS.

A young man went to see his darling Emma and hung her to his heart before the cheerful grate. Enter six-foot father, a man of few words and prompt action, with a strong dislike for young men. Not seeing very well in the dim light of the room the father asks—"Who's here?" Thinking to be laconically witty, the young man responded, "Em-I-grate." With unmistakable meaning the old gentleman yelled—"I'll give you two minutes to emigrate and shut the gate," and history has it that the young man made the time with a minute to spare.

The other day a boy in Burlington yelled so loud that he loosened all his hair at the roots, and when the frightened neighbors rushed in to see what the murder was about, they found he was only calling to another boy, standing just on the other side of a marble ring about six inches wide.

An Irishman remarked to his companion, on observing a lady pass: "Pat, did you ever see so thin a woman as that before?" "Thin!" replied the other. "Botherashen! I seen a woman as thin as two of her put together, so I have."

Professor—"Which is the more delicate of the senses?" "Sight," "The touch." "P.—Prove it." "S.—When you sit on a tack. You can't hear it; you can't see it; you can't taste it; you can't smell it; but it's there."

It was at the battle of Ivry. A courier came rushing into the presence of the Duke of Mayenne. "He is victorious," he gasped, falling to the ground with exhaustion. "Who?" "Navarre!" "What, Navarre!" This was undoubtedly the real origin of the phrase. A great deal may be learned by the intelligent study of history.

Said Doctor Blanche, the famous French expert in cases of insanity, to the jurors in a case recently tried in Paris: "In the prisoner's drunken moods he would grow sad and remorseful, and blame himself for maltreating his wife, as drunkards often do, gentlemen, as without doubt you yourselves know."

A few days ago a man was going through a train of cars with his hat in his hand, taking a Presidential vote; and while he was in another car somebody stole his valise and spring overcoat, and threw them out of the window.

Young Nickelpinch has evolved a long-winded puzzle, and has rigged up an answer to it: Why is a woman's switch in flames like a certain ancient musical instrument? Because a woman's switch in flames is a falsifier, and a falsifier is a liar, and lyre is an ancient musical instrument. Give the young man six months twice a year.

Jones defended a wretch accused of having murdered his father and mother. In the midst of his most eloquent pleading, the assassin, terribly bored, confessed his crime. The judge naturally believed the affair closed. "The accused has confessed," he said. "Your honor," answered the advocate, "the accused confesses, but who will believe a wretch like that. I do not confess!" And he continued his eloquent plea.

The following appears in the Allahabad Pioneer: "Wanted, a situation as snake-charmer in a serious family. N. B.—No objection to look after a camel."

"I would announce to the congregation that, probably by mistake, there was left at the meeting-house this morning a small cotton umbrella, much damaged by time and tear, and of an exceedingly pale blue color; in the place whereof was taken a very large black silk umbrella of great beauty. Blunders of this sort, my brethren, are getting a little too common."

The editor of a newspaper that has adopted phonetic spelling, in a measure, received a postal card from an old subscriber in the country, which read as follows: "I hav tuk your paper for leven yerres, but if you kant spel enny better than you have been doin fur the las to munths you may jes stoppit."

Dancers are informed that the "Liverpool lurch" and the "Boston dip" have been replaced by the "Boston grip" and the "South-Sea cuddle." We have often wondered why the graceful "South-Sea cuddle" didn't replace the "Boston dip" before.

A melancholy case of suicide: A naughty little boy, having been threatened with a whipping, hung his head.

Is there a person living who ever saw a case of ague, biliousness, nervousness, or neuralgia, or any disease of the stomach, liver, or kidneys, that Hop Bitters will not cure?

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French, or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

We used to flatter ourselves that nothing could exceed the purity of our drinking water. Professor Holden's report on the water at Newark ought to dispel this illusion. In his report published in the New York Herald of 17th March, 1880, he says: "The city wells, of which there are many, are often sources of poison to an extent that is not widely known." There are many Newarks in our country, and it is surprising and painful to see our people in many places drink water so full of impurities as to be opaque, and often quite muddy.

From the easy expectoration, increased respiratory power of the Lungs, and the removal of irritation, manifest from cessation of Cough and other alarming symptoms, after using Fellows's Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites, it is clear that the formation of tuberculous matter is not only stopped, but that already deposited is being carried away.

The Montreal Witness speaks of a small worm caught in a filter as "a curious object in the water we drink." "The water we drink?" Oh, come now; you're joking. Folks who drink water don't "have em" that way.

Or the Secret of Prolonging Life.

On the — day of November, 1870, I received a telegram calling me to the city of Stockton. The nature of the business demanding my attention made it imperative for me to be there early on the following morning; and, being unable to arrange my affairs in time to leave on the regular passenger train at four P. M., I was compelled to take the night freight from Alameda, leaving at nine P. M. and reaching Stockton about five A. M. The accommodations on this train were far from luxurious, travelers being the exception, and the caboose attached for the use of the employees their only choice. On this occasion there was but one other passenger—a man, tall, and of a commanding figure, with black hair, piercing black eyes, and rosy cheeks. His face was one to attract more than a passing glance, and my attention was drawn to him in spite of my efforts to avoid it. The night was clear and cold, and as the brakemen or conductor passed in and out of the car cold gusts of air poured in, making our quarters still more uncomfortable. Noticing that my fellow-passenger was without overcoat or wraps, and having both myself, I offered him my blanket, which he accepted after some remonstrance, and thanked me for it in such a hearty, gentlemanly manner, that I was more than assured that my conclusions were correct. Finding him not averse to conversation, we were soon on the most friendly terms. He proved to be what his looks indicated—a man of intellectual attainments. He told me the history of his life, and in such an earnest, impressive manner that I will never forget it. I will tell it as well as I can.

"My name," said he, "is Krumple Kudge; a curious name, undoubtedly—so ugly, in fact, that I sometimes think all my misfortunes and ill-luck are due to it, and I blame my parents for bestowing it upon me. At school, I never could write it well, and my teachers would hold my studied efforts before my school-mates as a specimen of careless penmanship. Writing was the only study I was deficient in, and I often thought that Mr. Pedagogue should have been grateful to me for that failing, as it formed a constant subject for his lectures on carelessness, with which he inevitably favored us before beginning the duties of the day. My parents were comfortably situated, and, as I was their only son, they desired to see in me a professional man, and urged me to diligently pursue my studies to that end. I did so readily, for I loved my dear father and mother, and to please them was my greatest happiness. I passed a very creditable examination, and was sent to college. I had chosen a medical course, having always had a desire to know more of the wonders of the human body, of which my school studies told me so little; just enough, indeed, to awaken in my mind wonder and awe that was at times terrifying. I overcame this, however, studied hard, and attended lectures regularly. There never was one who went through college and studied with more enthusiasm than I, laboring day and night, until my teachers warned me that my health would give way unless I took more rest. I laughed at them, scouting the idea that I, having youth and strength, mentally and physically, should not use to the utmost all the powers given me. But I repented my disregard of their advice when I broke down under my self-imposed tasks, and was compelled to return to my home to recuperate.

"It was during this necessary holiday that the great idea that has filled my life first entered my mind. It has constantly haunted me since, and I have been wedded to it as only a man with one aim and one thought can be wedded. I will tell you what this idea is: I believe that man—as he exists—is a subtle combination, having within himself the power to keep all his parts and functions in constant repair and forever youthful. Not to re-create a member after dismemberment, but to continue in existence each and every member in health and vigor for an infinite period. This was the thought that took possession of my being. To carry out and to discover the means of accomplishing this has been my life labor.

"My belief is, that as our bodies are made of known materials, supplied to the system through the stomach, and dispensed throughout the body by its system of internal canals, the arteries—each particular part taking what is necessary for its support as the life-giving current passes, and throwing off the waste, which is carried away by the veins and other outlets of the system—that by feeding the body, through the stomach, with material in proportion to the wastage of each particular part, that the process will continue forever; for does not man reproduce himself in a given length of time?—do not all his particles change? And if they are returned in the proportion that they waste, why should he perish? Man grows old because the functions of his body are not carried out as perfectly as in youth; they cease to act because they lose their strength; they lose their strength because they are not supported with the necessary material. Return the wastage, and man retains his youth forever!

"I have labored many years, in all parts of the world, ascertaining the wastage of the human body, and what that wastage consisted of; and I have this subject classified and arranged so that I can now dictate to man whether he shall live fifty or five hundred years. Look at me. I am seventy-five years old, and as fresh and rosy, strong and healthy, as I was at twenty. This proves the theory. But what has my life study brought me? Nothing! In San Francisco I have been among men who have means, laboring to get them interested in my discovery. They are incredulous. They do not believe that I am seventy-five years old, and are not willing to test the discovery themselves; for, say they, it takes too long. Oh, how often, when rebuffed by these cruel answers, have I almost given up, disheartened.

"You see me traveling on this train to take advantage of cheap fare. I am free to confess that my purse is not by any means plentiful. You are possibly interested to know why I leave the great money centre for the little inland town of Stockton. I will explain this to you. I have one dear friend who believes in this great discovery of mine; but, unfortunately, he has not the means with which to assist me. We have labored to get a joint-stock company to assist us, but in vain. Oh, how many bright dreams I have had of this company. I had even named it 'The Krumple Kudge Incorporation for the Maintenance of Human Life Infinitely (Limited).' But this is not telling you why I am going to Stockton. Well, my friend tells me that there is one gentleman who has heard of my discovery, and is willing to assist me in introducing it. He is one of the resident physicians at the Stockton Asylum for the Insane. I have not his name, my friend not having time to ascertain it for me before I left, but has promised to send it to me at Stockton. I explained my theory at the city hall, before leaving, to a committee of physicians, and they all agreed that the proper course for me to pursue was to see the party at Stockton. To-morrow brings me success! I am yet a boy! I shall always be a boy, and to-morrow I will toss up my hat and hurrah for joy like a boy. I know this man will not disappoint me. I know he will assist me, and then my cup of happiness will be full, full. I imagine myself seated in my little shop by vials and earthen pots, containing the material necessary for the recuperation of each portion of the body, labeled according to my formulas; children coming to me as they now go to the grocery stores, asking for this, that, or the other, to strengthen and repair some dilapidated member of the family—ha! ha! ha! Oh, but it makes me feel as if I had something yet to live for!"

It was midnight. The gray shadows of the night seemed to cast a dismal chill on everything. I was shivering, either with cold or fear. The whistle sounded, and the train came to a halt. The spires of the City of Sloughs peeped through the gray dawn, and it lifted a great weight from my mind. I have never seen my strange friend since, nor have I entered his little shop. I have never heard of him since. Did that committee to whom he explained his discovery commend him to the resident director? Is he there now? SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1880. J. T.

Two Small Advertisements.

Advertisement of a belle's stolen wardrobe in the year 1709 (from Leigh Hunt's The Town):

A black silk petticoat, with a red-and-white calico border; cherry-coloured stays, trimmed with blue and silver; a red-and-dove-coloured damask gown, flowered with large trees; a yellow satin apron, trimmed with white Persian; muslin head-cloths, with crow-foot edging; double ruffles, with fine edging; a black furbelowed scarf, and a spotted hood.

Advertisement of the same in the year 1880, as handed in by a lady correspondent:

A pair of chamois tights; a pair of No. 15 corsets; a tea-gown of pale canary, embroidered with tea-caddies, kettledrums, and slices of lemon; a scarlet satin and black-bowed skirt of party dress (waist invisible to the naked eye); a yard of frizzes, red; three puffs, do; one braid, do; a black braid (latter of no intrinsic worth, but valuable as a memento); a dozen gold-headed hairpins; a black leather belt, twelve inches in width; a pair of French slippers, with three-inch silver heels; a piece of crêpe-de-lisse ruffling; a rainbow-colored and spangled chenille fichu; a large hat, very much up on one side, and on the other answering the double purpose of beauty (!) and an effectual protection from curious eyes in one direction, at least.

FAC, M. P.

Some wild, wailing idiot of the night, under the Napa postmark, sends in the following regarding the third term. There is an insane asylum at Napa, we believe. But that does not affect the sense of the contribution, especially as it is in verse:

The brattle bug father sits in the sun,
Smoking his pipe the live-long day.
One wonders how he can find any fun
In life untwisted in just that way.

The brattle bug's wife is tall and thin—
So thin that her shadow is well nigh nil,
And she keeps a satchel to carry it in,
Which is "toted" about by her big son Bill.

And the brattle bug's wife is brittle as well
As thin and shadowless—most—and tall;
And the brattle paternal says he "can't tell
How awfully awful it is—at all!"

For fancy a husband who dare not hug
The wife of his bosom, for fear she might fly
Into forty million fragments of bug,
And a bit of his spouse p'rhaps put out his eye!

A very sensible fellow is Carl Manke—a murderer under sentence of death in Buffalo. Injudicious friends interfered, and he was reprieved. When the news was brought to him he said:

"If I am to be hung, I want to be at the time set down by the court. What authority has Governor Cornell to interfere with my case, and what business is it to him, any way? I do not want any postponement, and I never asked for any."

Now, that is the sort of fellow we like; and if he'll come to San Francisco we'll make him a professor at the House of Correction.

An owl's head carved in ivory, a ball of iridescent glass, a horn of a deer or rhinoceros, are the latest devices for parol knobs. Some of the sticks are carved in relief, with garlands of ivory leaves, or tiny oak leaves and acorns. If you can imagine anything more fanciful or more thoroughly artistic in the parol line, the manufacturers would be bappy to hear from you.

Apropos of the budding picnic season, we should like to know that some one had invented a new and improved picnic hat. The sort most affected is almost fatal to the complexion of a pretty girl who happens to be at all fair. Saunders says no nice girls go to public picnics. I think he must except some of those under church auspices. No?

The mysteries of a baby's toilet were altogether new to a little four-year-old, and he carefully watched the bathing and dressing of his little cousin. When the little powder-box was open, and the fluffy brush was about to be used underneath the baby's chin, he exclaimed, "Oh, aunty, let me see you salt her."

The fur-lined dolman is the thing in street wear at this transition moment of the year. It is rather not the thing to be seen in the street with the seal-skin sacque of two months ago.

The biggest dam in the country is in Maine; and don't you forget it when you strike a clothes-line in the back-yard at night.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

In the lobby of the Variétés they talk of a certain graceful actress—gifted, beautiful, but whose mouth is so immense that everybody, in speaking of her, says:

"What a misfortune!"

"Not much," says one of her comrades. "That mouth of hers is very handy—a good scheme. She can whisper in her own ear."

At a very mixed assembly a gentleman who has had previous dealings with the police sits down and says: "Who's for a little game? Gentlemen, I'm waiting for you."

"Come, come," says severely the lady of the house, who has a little table of her own, "you mustn't think you are in the forest of Bondy" (a famous resort for highwaymen).

"True," replies her guest; "there are no trees here, to be sure."

A physician who had been called to attend Fontenelle found the great author sipping coffee.

"My dear sir, do you expect medicine can cure you while you persist in drinking the infusion of that pernicious berry? Coffee, sir, is a slow poison!"

"I should say slow," replied Fontenelle, sipping away at his beverage. "I have within my own remembrance been drinking it, daily and freely, for over sixty years."

He lived to be a hundred years old.

Bismarck has always been represented in Kladderadatch, the Ulk, and other comic papers, with a bald, awful head, surmounted by three hairs, which will explain the following conversation in a Viennese restaurant:

"Hi, waiter! ho, waiter! I asked for Julianne, and here you've brought me Bismarck soup."

"Bismarck soup, sir! There's no Bismarck soup, sir, on the bill, sir!"

"Of course it is. Don't you see these three hairs on the top of it?"

The young Maurice, in a place of amusement scarcely comme il faut, is astonished to meet his father evidently enjoying himself. "Maurice, you here?" exclaims the papa, severely.

"Why not, papa?" says the young man, "of course it is highly respectable, since you are here."

In court the ownership of a well was disputed.

One of the counsel delivered himself of a plea of burning eloquence.

"It is really not worth so much trouble," said the judge. "It is only a question of water."

"Pardon me," replied the lawyer; "it is of the highest importance: both our clients are wine merchants."

Mademoiselle — has given her "protector" proofs of her infidelity. He quits the house, and swears that he never shall return.

He goes back, however, the next day.

He says to mademoiselle with an air of great tenderness: "When a woman loves as you love me, how can one ever leave her?"

* * * "Do you know the dénouement, madame?"

"No."

"They thrust the two lovers into a cave, and they die there."

"Of exhaustion?"

And here are the particulars of a social scandal:

One scene strange which has musted to have the consequences the most grave, is itself unrolled yesterday in an appartement situated to the third story of a house of the Rue Saint Martin, and occupied by the epouses H. These last were gone to the theatre, and not one reentered only toward midnight. At the moment where Monsieur H. himself couched he heard as a light noise in the chamber, then he saw an armoire itself open sweetly and itself close immediately. He ran toward this place and wished to open the door, but impossible.

"Some one in this armoire," said he to his dame.

Finally the door finished by to yield under his efforts, and he himself found in presence of one named Alfred, whom he had known in some circumstances that we will relate more low.

The latter held to the hand one revolver. Monsieur H. — him seized lively by one arm. One struggle itself engaged, and the arm tumbled to earth.

While that Monsieur H. — putted Alfred in the impossibility of to faire any movements, some neighbors pushed by the noise went to inform some agents who would conduct to the post this singular visitor.

Interrogated by the Commissioner of the Police, he responded that he was the lover of Madame H. — and as she refused to have relations with him he had resolved of himself to kill in her chamber and in her presence. He added, however, that he believed Monsieur H. — en voyage and that he hoped to find his beloved alone. In effect the husband was re-entered the day same at Paris, after some days of absence.

Alfred had in him possession one key of the appartement where he had coulted thus himself introduced without to awaken the attention of some neighbor.

That which there is of singular it is that the husband knew perfectly that his wife was the love of this man, and he has made to the commissioner of police this response typical:

"I have been forced of to accept this situation, for my wife menaced of me to quit if I putted obstacles to these relations."

It itself agitation now of to know if really Alfred had simply the intention of himself to suicide. That is few probable. Would he not more soon himself to revenge of the abandonment of his mistress in her assassinating? In attending that the light be made around this affair, which has produced one grand scandal in the quarter, Alfred has been written in the book of the goaler.

ANOTHER PHASE OF THE CHINESE QUESTION.

By Nathan the Essenian.

[For cold-blooded, inexorable logic, we commend to our readers the following communication of "Nathan the Essenian." It is strong meat for strong-minded men, this kind of writing. The time is coming when thinking men must look facts in the face. The Chinese question is getting beyond the depth of the superficial thinker. We commend this article to those of our readers who reflect.]

The Chinese question naturally possesses for the people of California an intenser interest than for the people of other States, where it is not, and for years to come can not be, realized as one of any practical and pressing importance. Still it is true that, far east of the mountains, many men who have never written or spoken a word upon the subject, have watched its development with great interest, and have read, with avidity and care, at least the substance of all that the Californians have said concerning it.

The views of the Argonaut are generally set forth with such incisiveness and fearlessness that I have read its clear, biting utterances upon this Chinese question with a peculiar interest.

In the March number of the Californian, under the caption, "Certain Phases of the Chinese Question," Mr. John F. Miller presents an article which, I think, will go far toward moulding public opinion upon the subject, by a pattern acceptable to Californians.

There does not seem to be any great room for controversy about the facts that are properly involved in it, but when I come "to add up" all that I could learn as to the principles at issue, the sum was so radically different from any Californian estimate that has come under my observation that your readers might, perhaps, think it worth while to compare my conclusions with those reached by yourself, and by contributors more immediately interested in the salient and practical points involved in it.

The sum of California opinions seems to be about as follows:

The Chinese are confirmed and hopeless pagans, who refuse to abandon their own idolatries, or to adopt ours.

They are foreigners who stubbornly refuse to become Americanized.

They are the offspring of countless generations of work-people, whose normal condition from time immemorial has been one of scant wages and hard work, without any future before them, until they have learned to thrive upon the minimum of the means of subsistence, so that the slaves of European and American civilization can not compete with them in any field of toil to which they can gain access.

They are intelligent enough to acquire quickly an unusual efficiency in almost any kind of labor, so that, unless the immigration of them be checked by law, they will ultimately supplant all other laborers.

They look upon all other people as barbarians, and are invincibly fixed in the belief that Chinese government, institutions, laws, customs, literature, religion, morals, and sociology are the perfection of human wisdom, not possible to be improved upon by the Yankees, the Irish, or the Dutch.

These are about the facts; and from these facts the conclusion is drawn that Chinese immigration adds nothing to American population, wealth, or industry, but is simply planting a hostile nation upon our continent, and bringing it into competition with our resident population; draining off to China all the surpluses produced by them, and inaugurating a strife for existence in which all of the elements of success are in favor of the alien race. It is insisted that the remedy for these evils must be sought in laws which prohibit immigration; to which end existing treaties must be abrogated, an American "policy of exclusion" inaugurated—all based upon a rather shadowy use of the words, "the right of self-preservation."

If the facts be admitted, the advocates of the anti-Chinese policy seem to take it for granted that there can be no division of sentiment upon the course which ought to be pursued, and seem to be impatient of any suggestion that Chinese immigration is not an unmixed evil.

Let us quote Mr. Miller:

In the long warfare of his race for the means of existence the physical character of the Chinaman has become adapted to the very smallest needs of human life, and with a capacity for the largest labor. He is a man of iron, whom neither heat nor cold seems to affect; of obtuse nerve, and of that machine-like quality which never tires. His range of food is the widest of all known animals—embracing as it does the whole vegetable kingdom, and including every beast of the earth and creeping thing, and all creatures of the sea, from the tiny shrimp to the giant leviathan of the deep. He can subsist on anything, and almost upon nothing. He has brought with him the Chinese science of sustaining human life, and he shows no disposition to lose it. The white man can not acquire it and does not want it. He could only get it by an experience such as the Chinese have gathered in the long ages of their history. This represents in some degree the advantages which the Chinese have over our race in the battle for the "survival of the fittest." When we reflect upon the time it has taken the Chinese to train their bodies down to their present state, in which they possess the capacity for labor and the power of endurance equal to that of the most stalwart races, at the same time possessing such a marvelous vital organism and digestive machinery that they are enabled to subsist on less than half the food necessary to sustain life in other men, we begin to see the impossibility of the American Caucasian ever coming to the Chinese standard in these respects; and when we think of what that training has cost—of the pinching hunger, ceaseless, grinding toil, the human misery, the unspeakable horrors of that long, doleful agony of the ages which has made the Chinese what they are—the mind shrinks from the contemplation of the possibility of such a fate for the Anglo-Saxon race on this continent.

If the facts alleged in this extract are correctly stated, it seems to me to be very clear that, instead of being an unmixed evil, Chinese immigration is really a social bonanza for every American who is in a position to buy labor without the necessity of laboring himself. Sharper competition between toilers for the means of subsistence means lower wages and larger advantages for the employer. The reduction of workingmen to slavery (no matter by what name it is called) is the aggrandizement of capital. Plato and Aristotle were, beyond all question, right when they taught that in a perfect government the slaves (laborers) ought to be purposely kept in ignorance, so as to prevent them from knowing or using their power, and be trained to love pleasures of the lowest, cheapest, and most beastly kinds, so that they might be incapable of self-respect, and of consequent self-reliance. For if government over the people is to be a permanent thing, "the education of the masses" and "manhood suffrage" will in the end prove to have been a national insanity. Kitchen "ladies," barn-yard "gentlemen," and "elegant and respectable" mechanics are a vast mistake. Certainly, the acquisition of cheap, skilful, patient, uncomplaining servants is a blessing to the rich and to the comparatively rich, and no one has any right to complain of Chinese immigration except those who labor, and who may suffer from the competition of such laborers. To those who are inclined to become eloquent about "the rights of labor," "the dignity of labor," and all that sort of utopianism, I have simply to suggest the merciless but undeniable truth that labor never had any rights, under any system of government, that legalized private property-rights except what its comparative scarcity enabled it to extort from capital. Labor is as much a commodity as a horse, or a mule, or a bushel of wheat, and it is worth just what it will bring—no more, no less. When labor is scarce and the demand for it great, the laborer is comparatively independent. When laborers become too plentiful, all talk of an increase of wages is merest bosh; the only remedy known to civilization is for the laborer to reduce his wants, as the Chinese have learned to do; and "the Chinaman buys his wife," not because the Chinese are naturally more devoid of chastity than we are, but because the "necessity that knows no law" can make sexualism itself a commodity. Labor has no "rights," no "dignity" about it. Labor is God's curse put upon mankind for sin; and Jesus is the only statesman that ever pointed out any means by which the masses of mankind can escape that curse.

Labor is worth what it will bring, and the value of it depends upon circumstances, like that of any other commodity. The interest of those who wish to buy it is to get the best and most reliable article at the cheapest rate; and hence the question of Chinese immigration is, in the very essence, of it, part and parcel of the great question of this age: the question of capital and labor. When, therefore, this Chinese question comes up for actual, final settlement, the money-power of the land will be found upon one side of it, and the laboring classes upon the other. Not only will Chinese immigration enable the railroad and factory bosses to mock the "strikes" of workingmen, but it will place labor, in every department of human life, in the hands of capital, gagged and bound. If capitalists are not yet fully awake to the importance of the agency placed in their hands for the utter subjugation of labor, the discussion of the question will open their eyes; and it does not require a prophet to foresee that they will have the cheapest slaves in the market. Upon this question Mr. Miller observes that "charity should begin at home," meaning (if it means anything) that capital ought to have charity enough to deny itself the great advantages of Chinese immigration out of regard for our home-workers; but Mr. Miller must be a very young and enthusiastic gentleman if he believes that Mammon ever was a god that had the weakness of compassion. Has he forgotten that the same godless power in 1869 withdrew from circulation a thousand millions of the people's money, demonetized silver, and went on with the "contraction of the currency," although it knew, before this crime was perpetrated, and while it was being done, that it meant the starvation of labor, and the ruin of all who were not "heeled" to meet the assassins of our national prosperity? The plea for these and all other infamies of the same kind was "honest money," a plea baptized by a hired ecclesiasticism; but the crime was done to enhance the relative value, the purchasing power, of gold. Why, then, should Mr. Miller doubt that some equally specious plea will be urged in favor of Chinese immigration, or that Yankee parsons will sanctify the pretense, as soon as the employers see that it is to their interest to use Chinese labor—as, for instance, when they discover that cheap lands worked by the Chinese are a better investment than Government bonds?

Chinese immigration, therefore, is not an evil thing to all of our people, even if it should degrade American labor and laborers. In answer to all the brilliant declamation I have seen concerning "the right of self-preservation," it may be sufficient to remark that there is no statute, constitution, or treaty which secures any such right. It is "the first law of nature," perhaps, and antedates all civilization and government. It means only that an individual or a nation possesses a natural right to do whatever is necessary, or whatever is believed to be necessary, for its own preservation; it is as true of one man or nation as of another. The Chinaman, therefore, is as fully endowed of this right as is the Yankee or the Dutchman; and war originates out of the fact that nations, tribes, states, communities are not always agreed upon the facts which are involved in the assertion of this right. If any unpleasantness should arise between the United States and China, it would be a war between four hundred millions of Chinese and forty or fifty millions of us; a war that would ultimately draw all Europe to our aid, and all Asia to the other side, until the Mississippi Valley would become the battle-ground of the human race, as (I think) John, on Patmos, prophesied, when he saw a vision of "a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon." The result of such a contest would, perhaps, depend upon the facility with which the Asiatics could reach our coasts.

I know a man who is now at work upon a little invention that (if it succeeds) would reduce the cost of transportation to nothing, and would multiply the capacities for it beyond any practical limitation; so that it would be easier to land Asia in the Bay of San Francisco than it would be if a half-dozen double-track railroads spanned the ocean.

The Chinese learn everything—war, perhaps, as quickly as anything else. The first duty of a soldier is obedience, and military genius is without doubt the very lowest possible development of which genius is capable.

These considerations lead me to wait for what China may have to say about the abrogation of the treaty, with a good deal of interest.

Upon "the policy of exclusion" it may be sufficient to remark that no argument can be made in favor of its application to the Chinese that can not be used in its favor against all immigration from densely populated countries. So far as such exclusion is a matter of principle rather than of expediency, it applies with equal force to Irish, English, French, German, and Chinese immigration; to prove which it is only necessary to refer to the "Native American literature" of a few years ago. (Did Brother Pixley ever make any "Know Nothing speeches"?) And further let it be observed that this is not a new policy at all. It was the settled law of the Chinese empire for centuries, and was not departed from until the "outside barbarians" left the Celestial kingdom no choice except between reciprocity treaties and open war. So that the advocates of the policy of exclusion are simply following in the footsteps of those illustrious patriots who built "the great wall." They are preaching a Chinese political economy, and in order to be thoroughly consistent, they should adopt the "pig-tail," and deny that Rev. xvi, 12, ever contained any prophecy.

Let us again quote from Mr. Miller, in reference to the fact of Chinese immigration:

Speaking of this event in the United States Senate, session of 1852, William H. Seward characterized it as "the reunion of the two civilizations, which, parting on the plains of Asia four thousand years ago, and traveling in opposite directions around the world, now meet again on the coasts and islands of the Pacific Ocean." He then adds: "Certainly no mere human event of equal dignity and importance has ever occurred on the earth." In this connection he made the prediction that this great event would be "followed by the equalization of the condition of society, and the restoration of the unity of the human family."

Mr. Seward spoke grandly; but if his heart and brain had been thoroughly imbued with profound reverence for Jesus Christ, not only as the Saviour of mankind in a spiritual sense, but also as their Saviour in a social and political sense, he could not have failed to behold a grander significance than he saw in Chinese immigration—a meaning which the few Essenians that are left in the world, although infinitely smaller officially and intellectually than he was, fully understand.

Let us see what is in it.

"The two civilizations which," according to Mr. Seward, "parted on the plains of Asia four thousand years ago, and traveled in opposite directions around the world" until they met at the Bay of San Francisco, were as different in the essential characteristics and nature of them then as they are now. The discussion of these differences presents a field for some magnificent writing if it were now necessary to enter upon it; but it may be sufficient upon this occasion to say that the differences were radical, not accidental, and existed in the very warp and woof of their whole moral and intellectual constitutions. Change, trial, experiment, a disposition to despise what is attained and press on toward "manifest destiny," was always the characteristic of one, while the other, in the language of Mr. Miller, "have remained changeless and unchangeable; as immutable in form, feature, and character as if they had been moulded like iron statues when made, and never 'of woman born'; as fixed in habit, method, and manner as if in their daily lives they were but executing some monstrous decree of fate.... Their modes of life are the same that they and their ancestors have for fifty centuries pursued, in their fierce struggle with nature for subsistence."

But in spite of the radical differences between these civilizations in language, literature, laws, customs, religion, and character—in all that constitutes civilization—they possessed one controlling idea in common, and the whole history of both has been only an interminable struggle to work out that idea into some legitimate, just, and enduring end; both, under all the vicissitudes of ages, have held unflinchingly to the truth of the dogma that government over the people as the conservator and guardian of private property-rights is the prime necessity of our civilization. It is safe to assert, in view of the history and character of the Chinese, and especially in view of their national permanency, that the civilization of China presents for the admiration and emulation of the perfectest possible development of the ernment and private property. Certainly it would be a difficult matter even to conceive of a nation so situated that the idea of government over the people as the guardian of private property-rights could work out its logical results under more favorable conditions than have actually existed in the Chinese empire. Obedience to the law, and swift, unerring punishment for the violation of it, is a thing as well established by long centuries of experience as is the course of nature in the physical world—a thing that they rely on just as they do upon the succession of the seasons or the flowing of the tides. Insurrections, rebellions, opposition to the law on the part of the people, is, and for countless centuries has been, unknown. If the times are hard, the Chinese endure—they do not rebel; if times become too hard, they lie down and quietly die. Notwithstanding occasional disagreements and even "wars" between their rulers, so far as the people are concerned, their gray and venerable law-and-order system has had "free course to run and be glorified" century after century. Throughout Christendom the perfect development of the idea of government over the people as the guardian of private rights has been prevented (or retarded) solely by the influence of Christianity; for Christianity was originally the emphatic and uncompromising denial of government over the people and of private property-rights involved in the doctrine of personal liberty, and responsibility, and of community of property, taught by Jesus as the essential basis of religion; and, although these truths were vastly modified by the influence of Constantine, enough of their pristine vigor remained, even after Christianity was subverted and ecclesiasticism substituted for it, to account for existing differences between the civilizations of Christendom and those of the Pagan world; and there is no other factor in human life that can account for them: for even in Greece and Rome the word "liberty" had no meaning for the masses of men, but only for their rulers. Slavery was the normal condition of the masses, and Jesus was the first who ever advocated liberty for all men. But no pagan nation ever had equal opportunity with China to reach a happy result from the basis of government over the people as the guardian of property-rights. It is, therefore, undeniably true that while modern European civilization presents the highest development of the science of government as modified by the influence of Christianity, China affords us the result of its very highest development unmodified by that influence. The Chinese themselves regard all Western nations as "barbarians;" they consider our "progress" and our boasted civilization as merely the effervescent joy of an adolescent nationality that has happened on amazing good luck; they think they know that our system and theories would not stand the strain that China has resisted for ages for even a summer's day; and they believe that by the time we "become of age," we will either reach a condition something like their own, or else one so much worse that we will sigh for the celestial blessings of Chinadom; hence, to them the idea of becoming "Americanized" is as repulsive as it would be to a Christian to consider the propriety of forsaking Christ and go to burning joss-sticks; and, beyond all doubt, the Chinese are right, if the idea of government over the people as the guardian of private property is to be a permanent thing on this continent.

Mr. Seward supposed that Chinese immigration "would be followed by the equalization of the condition of society, and the restoration of the unity of the human family." Why? Was he, also, an Essenian socially? Certainly, no such "equalization," or "unity," was ever visible through the inverted and begrimed telescope of political economy—the most shameless of all pretentious and cheeky pseudo-sciences. For both reason and experience demonstrate that "equalization" and "unity" are forever impossible so long as the law ordains the sacredness of private property-rights, and makes Mammon the only god whom men really worship. In the year 8 B. C. the census of Rome (then nearly eight hundred years old) showed a population of more than four millions, but the inequalities of social life were not less than they are in China now—nearly all of these four millions were slaves. In modern Europe there is no acknowledged tendency toward any such equalization except what may be traced directly to the influence of the teachings of Jesus in opposition to the claims of government. In our own new nationality are we not going with a frightful and unparalleled rapidity in the direction of establishing a normal condition of hopeless inequality based upon money only—undignified by any such vain but still attractive, shams as rank, or birth, or personal excellence?

Mr. Miller says:

The first fruits of this process of "the equalization of the condition of society" are now visible in California, and the public judgment is, that this equalization of condition and the "restoration of the unity of the human family," so far as it relates to the antipodean peoples who have here met, will be effected—if at all—at the expense of the life of Anglo-Saxon civilization. The two civilizations which have here met are of diverse elements and characteristics; each the result of evolution under contrarian conditions—the outgrowth of the centuries—and so radically antagonistic that any merging together or unity of them now seems impossible. Experience thus far indicates pretty clearly that the attempt will result in the displacement or extinction of one or the other. They can no more mix than oil and water—neither can absorb the other. They may exist side by side for a time, as they have endured here for nearly thirty years; for let it be understood that there is a small but growing province of China on the Pacific Coast; and that in the very heart of our metropolis there is the City of Canton in miniature, with its hideous gods, its opium dens, its slimy dungeons, and its concentrated nastiness.

But is it not true that all of the antagonisms and incompatibility, which undoubtedly exists between the races, grow mediately or immediately out of the idea of private property? Is it not true that if the only immigrants were wealthy Mongolians, out of whom much money could be made, the Californians would not object to the importation of millions of them? Does not the real difficulty consist in the fact that, having been reared up for ages under the perfectest human government that ever existed on earth, having carried "civilization" to its highest point, having exhausted all that there is in government over the people as the guardian of private property-rights, they know how to make money out of us, know how to drive our self-conceited, half-trained, high-priced workers out of every field of labor in which they can come into competition with each other; simply because viewed from every stand-point (except that of Jesus and the Essenians) they are infinitely our superiors—the foremost race upon

They are the shearers; our working-classes are the sheep; and it is a question of wool.

But if the idolatry of Mammon could be overthrown—if the idea of private property-rights and the curse of government over the people, which subsists only upon that idea, could be eradicated—if the communal title to all property (which Jesus ordained to be the basis of Christianity) could be instituted—the only effect of "cheap" Chinese labor would be to increase the common stock, to add to the general prosperity, to help to save the people—a system that would make pauperism impossible, unless the continent should become so crowded that no man could produce more than a subsistence for himself—a thing that is inconceivable.

If, therefore, Chinese immigration shall continue (and it will continue in spite of any legislation, State or national, that may temporarily impede it), the only salvation from a condition of absolute slavery to the money sharks possible for the masses of our people will be found in the absolute negation and subversion of all private property-rights, and the ordaining of a communal title to all property. For, if our present law-and-order system remains as a permanent thing, capital will utilize cheap Chinese labor just as certainly as experience proves anything. Every railroad and factory in the United States will be operated with that labor; the bulk of all agricultural products will be raised, garnered, and shipped by the same labor. For no consideration of patriotism, or of humanity, or of compassion for our own workmen, will ever restrain capital from aggrandizing itself by the employment of the best and cheapest labor that money can procure. The farmer, the mechanic, the railroad employee, or factory hand who believes anything to the contrary, is little better than an idiot. Capital would work you—all of you, Irish, Yankees, and Dutch—at Chinese wages, if it could, today. The only refuge left to labor in the United States is in the abrogation of laws sanctioning the private ownership of property, and in the ordination of the communal system, thus "to equalize the condition of society and restore the unity of the human family," by the agency of a democracy pure and simple, social and political, based upon the only possible foundation for a genuine democracy—community of property.

So taught Jesus Christ, and "there is no other name given under heaven or among men whereby we must be saved"—socially, politically, or eternally.

The Argonaut is manifestly very far at sea as to all of these questions which the providence of God is pushing upon us for solution. For months and months past it has connected together the words "respectability and property," "worth and property," "tax-payers and good citizens," and the whole catalogue of incantations contained in the cruel and lying vocabulary of Mammon, until a reader would really believe that the Argonaut teaches that virtue and respectability can not exist except upon the basis of cash, and that the only holy thing on earth is private property; and that it is, therefore, always ready to sneer at "the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man," because it is clear-sighted enough to perceive that, in the long run, the idea of justice to and liberty for all men is utterly and hopelessly antagonistic to the laws which recognize private property-rights. And yet, while the Argonaut flounders, hopeless and befogged, in a wilderness of doubt in which every human soul that attempts to reconcile impossibilities must of necessity lose itself, the truth is very plain, simple, and old. The truth is, that "ye can not worship God and Mammon," and ye need not try to do it. In other words, the truth is that liberty for the masses of mankind is impossible on the basis of private property-rights, which is Mammon-worship, and is possible only from the basis of an absolute democracy pure and simple, social and political, founded upon communism and faith. The social wars of the Roman Empire, the peasants' wars of Germany, the French Revolution, the civil war in America, and every other war waged in Christendom in which the people took an active part voluntarily, were simply—in the very essence of them—mere expressions of the necessary and irrepressible conflict between liberty for all men on the one hand and Mammon-worship on the other.

"The unity of the human race will be restored." If Asia should devote ten years to the acquisition of Western science, and then shake her skirts for conquest, Europe and America would simply be submerged. There would remain but one race upon earth. There are not less than a thousand names on the roster of the armies which recently decided the question whether a negro is a man, any one of whom is competent to carry out a contract with China and Hindostan to conquer Europe and America; and if Christendom shall maintain the idolatry of Mammon a half-century longer, some enterprising Yankee will doubtless undertake the job. Hoc erit in futu.

The following true story is also a pointed fable: "Crossing the Straits of Carquinez, as I returned from the State Convention, I witnessed a bloody and fatal encounter between a seal and a sturgeon. For several seconds I observed the churning of the waters, indicating the commotion below; then there came to the surface, his eyes all aglow with the passion of his contest, a seal, holding in his embrace an immense sturgeon—the sturgeon struggling, squirming, and lashing his tail for dear life. Again and again they came to the surface, still engaged in the deadly contest. At length, with a superlative effort, the seal threw himself above the water, tossing the sturgeon above him, and then caught the fish by the middle between his open jaws and bit him in two. Then, as I take it, the seal went down to the quiet enjoyment of his breakfast. To my mind this settles the question, 'Do seals eat fish?' and it illustrates the fact that big fish eat big fish as well as little ones. The same trait holds good in human nature. When big men and rich men and big corporations and politicians, strong in power, find no little men to eat, they feed upon each other, even if they have to fight for it."

The Paris correspondent of the Courrier des Etats-Unis states that Lucy Hooper and her book, Under the Tricolor, have been fiercely attacked by the Parisian, the American journal there. The article was very violent, and so spicy, that twenty-four hours after its appearance not a copy was to be had for love or money. It so enraged Mr. Hooper that he started out on the war-path, intending to horsewhip the Parisian man, but was prevented by his friends. In short, between the book and the article, the tempest in the American teapot is something terrible.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

In the absence of the head of the household, the nurse furnishes the census-taker with the information he desires.

"My master," she says, "is an idiot."

"Completely?"

"Completely. Not of the violent kind, but harmless. His wife is eighty-two years old. Only one child, a son aged thirty-five. No, he can neither read nor write."

"Thank you, mademoiselle."

"Do not mention it, sir."

"Catherine," says the butler, when the official has departed, "where do you expect to go to when you die? You know master belongs to the Academy, and missus is only thirty, and their boy is at the infant-school."

"I know it; but I'll teach them to sack a lady for having a few habitual discrepancies in the marketing account. Avenged! Ha! ha!"

"Gentlemen, gentlemen," cries the bereaved man, sternly, "you forget yourselves. Respect my sorrow."

Madame A—, discovering that her new cook's marketing accounts are not like Cæsar's wife, delivers a powerful allocation to the domestic.

"Have pity upon me, madame," cries the servant, "and have patience. I have not been long in Paris, madame, but give me another chance and you'll see if I don't improve—see if you can detect me!"

A mother tried to console her child, who cried bitterly.

"Why, John, what is the matter?"

"Mamma" (crying still louder), "yesterday I fell down and hurt myself."

"But that was yesterday; why do you cry to-day?"

"Why, don't you remember?—you wasn't home yesterday."

At the recent sensational trial at Paris of the actress, Mademoiselle Bière, accused of shooting her lover when he deserted her, Daubray, the actor, was asked his opinion.

"I think," he said, with due solemnity, "that if I were one of the jurors I would acquit her, and if I were her lover I would quit her, too."

La jolie parfumeuse offers a bottle of her 'fume to a customer.

"No, thanks," replied the customer, "perfumes or odors of any kind give me a headache."

"But this perfume is warranted not to have any smell about it at all, at all; if it has your money will be returned!"

"Beastly weather, this! If there is anything I hate it is cold and rainy weather."

"Oh, I'm more philosophical than you. I'm easily satisfied—I can put up with any sort of weather so long as it's fine."

Some of the new clocks on the Place de l'Opera instead of one face only, have three.

"Why three?" Madame Guibollard asked her husband.

Responded Guibollard: "It is in case three people should be passing at the same moment, each could see what time it was."

Local item from Le Temps:

"How many of times have we not protested with all our confrères against the pace excessive, insensate, given to their horses by the butchers and the milkers! At all instant we must enregister the accidents, by times mortals, caused on the way public by the rapidity of the course of these vehiclers."

"Yesterday one terrible lesson had been inflicted to a butcher who, in descending the Boulevard Ornano with his wife and his child, had launched his horse at the great gallop."

"Wishing to avoid a carriage in station near the sidewalk, the named A— drew brusquely upon the rein left, which broke himself."

"The horse as soon carried away swooped right on the tramway of the Bastille to Saint-Ouen. A—, losing the head, precipitated himself from the vehicle and broke himself the right leg. His vehicle at the same instant was shattering himself against the tramway, at the grand terror of the voyagers."

"Strong happily, Madame A— and her child, whom we hastened ourselves to reaise, have not had but the contusions without any gravity."

(NOTE.—Next time the named A— will know enough to do what his confrère American would have done under similar circumstances, and when he sees a hack drawn up by the sidewalk drive to take off a wheel instead of drawing brusquely on the rein off.)

OUR OWN POETS.

Hilda.

I.

A drooping line, with linen laden,
Suspended 'tween the apple-trees,
The early work of rustic maiden.
Hung swaying in the morning breeze.
The leaves from fragile blossoms, flying
Like downy snow-flakes through the air,
Settled upon her bosom, lying,
And quivered on her raven hair.
They sprinkled all the green lawn over;
They blushed on garments white and fine;
They flitted o'er the bed of clover,
Breathing sweet incense 'neath the line.

II.

Plump as a Hebe, graceful, sprightly,
Was Hilda—ever blithesome, gay,
Her wondrous beauty shone more brightly
Costumed in simple garb of gray.
Her soft brown eyes were coyly glancing
Beneath their silken fringes deep—
In fitful play, her charms enhancing,
As if awaking Love from sleep.
'Twas thus she stood, that summer morning,
With dimpled arms all white and bare;
Her needle-work the line adorning—
Those mystic garments, wrought with care.

III.

"These are my treasures," she was saying,
"They are not many, to be sure"—
Her little store the while displaying—
"Not many, for I'm very poor;
And we must work both late and early,
Edgar and I—that is, if we—"
From cheek to brow of lustre pearly
The rosy blush played warm and free.
She paused, her raven tresses shaking,
And all their fragrant leaflets shed;
Her song the echoes sweet awaking,
As o'er the homeward path she sped.

IV.

Edgar was there. He, too, was blushing;
They had been childish lovers long.
While she her beating heart was hushing,
He nursed a deep and bitter wrong.
"Hilda!" he cried—his voice would tremble
In spite of all his manly skill—
"Hilda, 'tis useless to dissemble,
For I have come to know you well.
They tell me you have sold your beauty
To that unprincipled Roy Dean.
Hilda, be mine the sacred duty
Your life from his false vows to screen.

V.

"A country lad, with not much learning,
But I've a heart that's good and true.
Hilda, for you 'tis ever yearning—
Yearning for love and life with you.
Tell me, oh, tell me! can you sever
The bonds our infancy entwined—
Our plighted childhood's vows forever?
Speak, Hilda! have you changed your mind?"
Beside the maiden he was sitting,
And she was splashing in the spray
Of foam, her fingers idly flitting;
Her brown eyes gazing far away.

VI.

Roy Dean has lands and high position;
His wife a social queen will be.
Wed him, and better your condition,
And from this life of toil be free."
Whispered the tempter; Edgar, waiting,
Observed the conflict going on;
He cried: "Love should not be debating—
Farewell, Miss Hilda!" and was gone.
Ah, then her heart grew sad and dreary—
Gone were the rainbows from the foam;
She left her work—her heart was weary—
Among the apple-trees to roam.

VII.

She propped the line up—higher, higher—
To where the wayward west wind blew,
Then paused, her vestments to admire—
Those snowy shapes—in better view.
The cotton cord, home-spun and slender,
Removed from shelter 'neath the trees,
Alas! soon proved by far too tender,
And broke beneath the stronger breeze.
Then Hilda saw Roy Dean advancing
On his fine horse, whose flying feet
With reckless speed were proudly prancing,
Brushing the dew from grasses sweet.

VIII.

He checked his steed, the careless rider;
Surprise was pictured on his face.
Then he dismounted close beside her,
And greeted her with haughty grace:
"Ah, upon honor, dear Miss Hilda,
You surely don't pretend to say
That you were washing? You bewilder
All the nice things I came to say.
Leave menial work—I come to offer
A life of pleasure, free from toil,
Rich jewels, dresses, wealth, I proffer,
Where your young hands may never soil.

IX.

"'Tis far away—a mansion splendid;
We will in secret bliss abide.
These vulgar scenes forgotten, ended,
With me, your lover, by your side."
Trembling she stood, that rustic maiden,
And virgin blushes veiled her face;
Her arms with dragged linen laden—
She knew not why, but felt disgrace.
Then her pure lips began to quiver,
And blinding tears suffused her eyes;
From him she shrank back with a shiver,
He gazed at her in mute surprise.

X.

While he was nearer still advancing,
Her loveliness had quelled his pride;
Her coy reserve made her entrancing—
"Hilda! my love, my own!" he cried,
His words her maiden fear arousing,

She fled—as flies the hunted deer
Startled while on the mountain browsing
By cunning sportsman creeping near.
Hilda ran on, she knew not whither—
O'er brook and meadow, lawn and dale;
Like lily bruised and left to wither,
Her heart grew cold, her face turned pale.

XI.

Edgar she met when running madly,
With hair disheveled—wild with shame.
"Hilda," he said, quite coldly, sadly,
As if by force he spoke her name—
"Hilda, what means this agitation?
What means your frightened, pallid face?"
She answered him in explanation:
"O Edgar, I am in disgrace!"
"Disgrace! Oh, no—explain your meaning,
While my poor heart can bear the blow—
While I with struggle deep am weaning
My thoughts from love I may not know."

XII.

Then, her warm blushes all returning,
She quickly to his bosom flew,
And whispered, "I, too, am yearning,
Yearning for love and life with you."
Clasped in his arms, she felt no danger.
"And why this fright?" she, laughing, said;
"I thought Roy Dean a wicked stranger,
And from his side in haste I fled."
Roy Dean had raced the broad fields over,
When lo! this picture met his view:
Hilda beside her rustic lover,
Who won where he would vainly sue.

To Fate.

Foolish Fate, you've come too late;
I've emptied every cup of bliss!
Every pleasure has been mine—
Wealth-bought music, wit, and wine,
Flattering friends and lover's kiss.

Long before you reached my door,
I was tired of song and glee,
Of the sparkling wines I quaffed,
Of the lips that always laughed,
Long before you came to me.

House and lands were goblin hands
That clothed my soul with bitterness.
Wealth perplexed me night and day.
Ah, foolish Fate! you sought to slay,
And saved my soul with storm and stress.

Do your worst! My life was cursed
With too much prosperity.
Sweet it seems to stand alone,
Where all the sands with wrecks are strewn,
Defying Fate to punish me.

The breakers roar upon the shore,
And gulls fly in before the gale;
The sun and storm to me are one.
I have no need of storm nor sun—
No lands to plow, no fruits to fail.

In Blossom Time.

We never thought that such a flower
Was meant for earth,
And when she came we hailed it as
An angel's birth.
An angel, from our arms she slipped
To stardward climb,
'Twas long ago, this sad farewell,
In blossom time.

Now through some star she downward looks,
We upward gaze,
With her the spring of heaven, with us
The autumn haze;
She prays for us, we try to catch
The song she sings,
Perhaps, amid the night, we hear
Her rustling wings.

But hope dies not, 'tis heaven's own flower,
Secure from blight.
The sun hides not away his face,
Soon comes the light.
Each year when spring-bells, pure and sweet,
Ring out their chime,
We feel that we shall meet her in God's blossom time.

Disguised.

When I looked first on sorrow, in affright
I backward shrank, the figure seemed so dread,
Slow-stepping toward me, with low-banded head,
And sable garments, like embodied Night.
I saw no line of beauty, and no grace
In shrouded form, or bowed and veiled face.
One terrified, unwilling look sufficed.
With lifted hands I screened my troubled sight,
And cried "Begone!"
But sorrow came more near,
Wiped my wet eyes, and whispered "Do not fear,
Together we must journey to the end.
I came disguised—but drop my mantle here—
Behold me, and believe me, now, thy friend."
Again I looked, and lo! I saw 'twas Christ.

Life's Triumph.

Each life has one grand day—the clouds may lie
Along the hills, and storm-winds fiercely blow;
The great red sun shine like a thing of woe,
And death's sad skeleton stalk grimly by;
Yet none of these, no matter how they try,
Can shroud the perfect triumph we shall know,
Or dim the glory that some star will show,
Set far away in depths of purple sky.
Sweet love may bring to us this day supreme,
Or it may thrill our souls through art or song,
Or meet us where red battle surges foam;
Hope's stranded wrecks the barren coasts may gleam,
And weeks and months rush past, a sombre throng,
But some time, somewhere, it will surely come.

THOS. S. COLLIER.

A GREAT PUBLIC NEED.

The energetic and public-spirited Mr. Alden—in the pages of the New York Times—voices the popular demand as follows: The other day a young man committed suicide in a way that reflected the utmost credit upon his ingenuity. He constructed a guillotine with the help of an axe and a pair of joists, and set it up in his father's barn. The axe was suspended by a rope, at the end of which was hung a watering-pot full of water, and the escape of the water through the spout was so arranged as to release the axe at the end of five minutes. When the machine was in readiness, the young man placed his head under the axe and held a handkerchief saturated with ether to his mouth. At the end of five minutes the axe promptly fell, and neatly cut off his head while he was in a state of total insensibility from the effects of the ether. It will readily be conceded that this able young man invented by far the best method of suicide that has ever been used. To kill one's self while under the influence of an anæsthetic has been the ideal of the inventive suicide, but hitherto it has been thought to be impossible. We now know how to die at pleasure while in the dreamless sleep of ether, and the inventor of the self-acting guillotine deserves to be regarded as a great public benefactor. There is, however, one serious difficulty in the way of the general use of the new guillotine. It will be very difficult to set up the machine without discovery. Of course, no gentleman would use it in the house, where the carpet and the floor would be stained with blood, and very few persons have access to convenient barns. The guillotine is also a rather expensive affair, and will be beyond the reach of penniless men. Its use will, therefore, be confined to men of means and leisure, who can set it up in the barn or the cellar without attracting the observation of impertinent people. We may fairly hope that the merit of this new invention and the difficulties which will inevitably prevent it from being brought into general use will call the attention of the charitable and scientific public to a great public want. At present there are virtually no facilities for pleasant suicide. Of course, a man can shoot, hang, drown, or poison himself, but these crude processes are unworthy of a scientific age. Besides, society has a right to demand that our streams shall not be contaminated with corpses, and boarding-house-keepers feel justly indignant when rude persons blow out their brains, to the detriment of the furniture, or take poison, and thereby require unwarrantable, even if temporary, attention, for which they do not pay. It is not too much to say that a man who is not a householder can not at present commit suicide without putting both himself and many other people to pain and annoyance. We have a large quantity of charitable societies of more or less merit, but they all owe their origin to the influence of Christianity. Now that Christianity has been definitely exploded, we require new societies to meet the changed conditions of life. We need particularly a society for the Assistance of Suicides. Such a society would build a commodious asylum—or rather station-house—from which persons could take their departure from life. We can fancy such a house fitted up with a score of self-acting guillotines, ready for the use of all applicants. The suicide, on entering the house, would be supplied with pen, ink, and paper, with which to write his farewell letter. He would be required to register his name, birthplace, age, and, if he so desired, the cause of his weariness of life, and he would then be shown to the operating room, where he would be supplied with ether and assigned to a comfortable guillotine. His body would be regarded as a perquisite of the society, and would be disposed of in the medical market for the benefit of the society's fund. With such a society in prosperous operation there would be an end of coarse and painful suicides, and the means of quietly, comfortably, and decently quitting life would be at the disposal of the poorest member of the community. Dead bodies would no longer be found floating in rivers, and the thrifty landlord would no longer be subjected to the outrage of having his carpet spoiled by a rude and impertinent suicide. The painlessness of the self-acting guillotine, with its accompanying ether bottle, would tempt hundreds of timid persons to take their own lives, and would thus place a valuable check upon the overgrowth of population. Why should we not have such a society? Life is to many persons a painful and wearisome affair, and now that we have been taught that there is neither God nor immortality, why should we not encourage the unhappy to escape from life? Agnosticism is incomplete as a system of immorals unless it inculcates the right of suicide. When we have become convinced that death is the end, that there is no future life, and no God to punish self-murder, what can we do that is wiser and better than to cut short our stay in an uncomfortable world? There are thousands of men and women who find existence a curse, and who are of no possible benefit to their fellow-men. Let us give them the means of painless death, and so benefit both them and ourselves.

I could not, writes a lady, love a man a little, just a little, my superior. I should detest my equal—I should despise my inferior; although I conceive an assemblage of qualities in a man of no great strength of mind that could win my regard; and, perhaps, if I were called upon to cherish and protect him, I might cultivate a certain degree for him—a kind of motherly sentiment. I have thought it all over a hundred times. But the man for me to love is vastly my superior, not so much in accomplishment, nor even in intellect, but in irresistible force of character; a man who will compel my spirit to bend its knee to his; who will command my soul to stand still, and shine on him, as Joshua commanded the sun; who can trample my will to the dust beneath the tread of his irresistible and indomitable energy, and fixity, and courage. I require he should make me worship and fear him; and that, instead of guiding and protecting me, he should master me. I want that he should conquer the domain of my soul, add it to his own, and then generously divide the sovereignty between us.

An Englishman of an inquiring mind writes to ask why it is that Americans always wear tall hats when going on or off ocean steamers, and rarely wear them on shore, either at home or in Europe? He offers as a probable solution of the problem the suggestion that the hat-box has no room in these shores, and that an American's only mode of wearing a tall hat is to wear it on his head.

OPEN LETTER TO THE BOARD OF EDUCATION.

It is a strangely curious fact, gentlemen, that now for these many years the impression has prevailed in this community that the Board of Education was the seat of ignorance. Its history has seemed to demonstrate, also, that ignorance and crime go hand in hand. The impression has prevailed that the members of the Board of Education have been a bad lot; that they lacked learning and integrity, and were indifferent to the rules of honorable conduct usually supposed to govern gentlemen and officials in their intercourse with society. Somehow—and that appears altogether strange—it has been generally believed that the personnel of the Educational Department was exceedingly low, and to this fact was largely attributed the social and business scandals that have invaded the School Department. The Department of Free Public Schools is either a very contemptible and criminal thing, or else it has been very unfortunate. The impression has gone abroad that it has been corrupt—we say has been—from top to bottom; ignorance, scheming and dishonest selfishness in its legislative body; demoralization among teachers; idleness among carpenters; careless indifference among janitors; dishonest speculation in contracts for purchasing school lots, for erecting buildings, for furnishing supplies, and for providing school-books. In a word, it has been believed that School Directors have plotted for their elections in order that they might have an opportunity to steal; and that education has always been a secondary consideration.

The fact is, and you know, and we all know, that the presence of an honest, educated, and cultured gentleman in the Board of Education of the City and County of San Francisco has been a rare and noticeable exception. Great extravagance has characterized every expenditure, while the kind of education that has been provided is as ridiculous and absurd as it is extravagant and useless. This kind of Board has drawn around it a corrupt and characterless lobby, and the impression has prevailed that a school-book syndicate have bought and sold State and county Superintendents and county and city School Directors. We need not recall to mind the Payot-Fitzgerald scandal; the sale of questions, the fraud of school-lot purchases, the scandalous intrigues, the long book war, the nasty practices and exposures in the Sacramento lobby, for to write the history of what is bad, extravagant, profligate, and mean concerning the School Department is to write its history with a few honorable names, and a precious few clean pages left out.

All this time, remember, we have been speaking of past boards, past history, past transactions. Now let us come down to your board, and, without reflecting in the least degree upon the fitness of the individuals composing it, without questioning your integrity, your learning, your respectability, let us see to what extent you have contributed to the elevation or reformation of what was confessedly a very contemptible department of our city government. We believe that Mr. President Stone, Mr. Director Ewing, Mr. Director Thompson, and Mr. Director Galloway are honest, honorable, competent men. There may be another, but our lamp went out, leaving us in doubt as to the eight individuals who compose the majority of this board, and it is to these eight persons, and to Mr. John W. Taylor, Superintendent of the City and County of San Francisco, and to Mr. Frederick M. Campbell, Superintendent of the State, that we direct this article of earnest investigation. We demand, in the interest of 35,000 pupils in this city, and of ever so many thousand more in the State, and of all the tax-payers of city, county, and State, whether you belong to us who have elected you, or whether you belong to a Cincinnati book firm because they have bought and paid for you? We do not say that you have been bought, or that you have sold yourselves. We do not hint at any such suggestion. We do not know that such a thing as a school-book syndicate exists in the United States, but we do know that our scholars are not getting the best and cheapest books, and that we tax-payers are being bled for all sorts of extravagances, and all sorts of profligate expenditures in educational matters. We believe you are building school-houses at extravagant rates. We think your conduct at your last meeting, in closing a contract for school-books without examination, and at extravagant prices, and by a compact vote of eight to three (Galloway being absent), indicates either that there is carelessness and indifference in the administration of your office, or rank and open corruption. Your conduct on Monday night was a simple outrage upon all the proprieties and decencies of official life. You violated all the ethics of business. You stamped yourselves with the brand of suspicion, and it is burned in upon you. You awarded the control for supplying our San Francisco schools with McGuffey's Readers, printed by Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., of Cincinnati, at the regular retail price of $2.50 per set for all supplies from date, including the supply for first introduction.

This means a change of readers. The readers now in use resemble the new ones only in title. The change is as complete and entire as though you had adopted Appleton's or Bancroft's, and you knew it; and to assume that they are the same readers is a bold, transparent, audacious fraud. The publishers of the readers advertise them in the Pacific School and Home Journal for $1.52 per set for first supply, and yet you awarded a contract for 66 2/3 per cent. above their advertised and regular price. Other and equally desirable books were offered at less prices, and you did not even examine the bids. You did not even go through the form of reference to a committee to find out the character of the readers or the prices. Whence this open defiance of even the proprieties of business decency?

How about the Monteith Geographies? This contract was awarded to the publishers of Monteith's series for first and subsequent supplies at $2.25. The resolution received the usual vote, and yet the publishers openly advertise to furnish a first supply at $1.35, and at much lower rates when an old geography is to be given up. Was it not a dead give-away for you to award a contract for first supplies at 66 2/3 per cent. above the publishers' advertised rates of the same books? Why were 5,000 school children, who annually purchase a new geography in consequence of promotions, required to pay 90 cents more for the series than the publishers ask elsewhere for the same books? Who profits by the $3,000 of paid out in the year 1880 in excess of advertised rates? Perhaps Mr. Van Schaick can answer; perhaps he and his seven associates can satisfactorily explain why, when equally good geographies were offered at lower prices, that the proposition was not even considered.

And how about the grammars? This award was also made to the publishers of McGuffey's Readers—involving, as it did, an entire change of books—the contract being at the regular retail prices of the publishers. Why, in the interest of parents, did you not demand and secure the well-known and advertised prices for a first supply? If you must persist in changing grammars—discarding one, and a most excellent and popular book, adopted within two years—why did you not at least bargain for as favorable terms as is conceded to smaller cities and country districts? Why was it necessary for you to make a complete change of text-books, as you did—with the exception of arithmetics, copy-books, music, readers, and spellers—unless you have some sinister and dishonest purpose, by means whereof you or somebody else expect to make money? Why was no exchange or introduction price given on readers and geographies to the City and County of San Francisco when the publishers of these books notoriously advertise such reduction of prices?

This difference, as we are informed, amounts to not less than $100,000 for four years' supply. Times are hard, money is scarce, and it is not desirable to impose any additional burdens upon parents; it seems to us—and will so seem until you explain your conduct—that these parents are being audaciously robbed by you in the interest of a foreign book-ring through unscrupulous agents in this city. It looks to us as though this whole nasty bargain was being pushed through for coin. We think we know that a syndicate or book-ring exists, and we believe that every book you have adopted belongs to this syndicate. We believe every dollar paid by parents in this city pays an extravagant and unnecessary profit to these foreign booksellers, and what we demand to know is how it happens—whether you are working in this interest for love, or whether you are working for coin, and if for coin, how much? Let us talk business together. Perhaps we can compromise by giving you a salary. It might be cheaper in the long run. Perhaps we had better increase your advantages or extend your term of office. Perhaps we might make some favorable arrangement with Mr. Fred. Campbell, so as to relieve him from such constant attendance on the Oakland Board of Education. Perhaps we can break up this Eastern book-ring, and relieve ourselves from paying tribute forever to this voracious book-fiend, and from the exactions of say 25 to 40 per cent. more than is paid in any other city in the United States for the same books. We are curious to know by what singular and capricious accident it happened that the readers, geographies, arithmetics, grammars, spellers, United States history, and physiology adopted on Monday night, all come from this particular brotherhood of Eastern publishers? How does it happen that this business was all cut and dried and ready to be rushed through your board with such unanimity, and that you refused even to postpone, or refer, or examine, or allow anybody else to inquire into the cost or character of the books you imposed upon our schools for four years? To us it seems as though this whole thing covered up a cold, premeditated robbery, by means of which the parents and guardians of our school pupils have been swindled out of more than a hundred thousand dollars. Why is it that members of your board openly stated that they were opposed to the change of text-books, on the ground of expense, and yet they changed everything except arithmetic, copy-books, music readers, and spellers? The following changes were made: McGuffey's Readers, Monteith's Geographies, Smith's Drawing, Swinton's Grammar, and Hutchinson's Physiology.

In this discussion we have not considered the interest of Bancroft & Co., nor the home authors who have been ignored in this recent contract. We have not recalled the fact that the grammar teachers have not been consulted; nor written what we know about book-politics in this State, and especially in this city; about the book-vendors that have figured in nominating conventions; and we have not undertaken to disclose the half we know about the bribery, intrigue, and secret conspiracy that has been going on in and about this book war. That may come when the fight gets interesting. In the meantime, here are a few interesting facts and figures. Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co. have an advertisement of prices in the Pacific Home and School Journal, and it reads as follows:

	Exchange.	Introduction.
McGuffey's Revised First Eclectic Reader....	10	12
McGuffey's Revised Second Eclectic Reader....	15	20
McGuffey's Revised Third Eclectic Reader....	20	30
McGuffey's Revised Fourth Eclectic Reader....	25	35
McGuffey's Revised Fifth Eclectic Reader....	40	55

"McGuffey's New Eclectic Readers," as heretofore published, will be continued in publication.

Parties ordering will please specify if they wish McGuffey's Revised Readers.

VAN ANTWERP, BRAGG & CO., Publishers,
Cincinnati and New York.

The contract entered into was for these full retail prices:

9,744 Pupils First Readers, at 20 cents.....	$1,948 80
3,943 " Second " " 35 "	1,380 05
3,686 " Third " " 50 "	1,843 00
6,242 " Fourth " " 60 "	4,345 20
3,956 " Fifth " " 85 "	3,202 60

Total cost.....$12,719 65

In view of the fact that the publishers of these readers publicly advertise that their prices for introduction are very different from the prices which these books were adopted at, we give the advertised figures and reckon cost of change—supposing there were no books in use good enough to go on with. The following are the rates and cost as advertised:

9,744 Pupils First Readers, at 12 cents.....	$1,169 28
3,943 " Second " " 20 "	788 60
3,686 " Third " " 30 "	1,105 80
6,242 " Fourth " " 35 "	2,184 70
3,956 " Fifth " " 55 "	2,175 80

Total cost in this business.....$7,424 18

But as there is a full set of readers now in use, the exchange price publicly advertised should be taken:

9,744 Pupils First Readers, at 10 cents.....	$ 974 40
3,943 " Second " " 15 "	591 48
3,686 " Third " " 20 "	737 20
6,242 " Fourth " " 25 "	1,560 50
3,956 " Fifth " " 40 "	1,582 40

Why did the board accept a proposal that cost $12,719.65, when the very highest advertised price is $7,424.18, and the lowest $5,445.95? The difference is trifling—only $7,273.70.

Some books that were submitted for consideration were never opened, never examined, and never read by any member of the board. We name "Our World" Geography, a new and excellent publication, Dalton's Physiology, and Hotter's Arithmetic. Books were adopted and contracts entered into for publications that were never examined or inquired into in any particular. But the following table shows the utter infamy of this entire proceeding. By its perusal every parent or guardian who is compelled to purchase one of these books can estimate the exact amount he has been swindled, and at the next election he can come in and help the Argonaut work a reform in reference to our whole common-school system. The table shows some of the books adopted and those rejected, the * marking the books accepted and their prices:

These are a few—a very few—of the questions we have to propound; but they are sufficient for the present. Will any first class in deliberate villainy please step forward and answer?

INQUIRER.

The Workingman's party that so woefully miscarried in this city and State had—and perhaps we ought to say has—in it the elements of usefulness and national strength. America is a nation of workmen, and only here and there is the man of fortune who is not still in the harness. We have in reality no leisure class; no retired, estated gentlemen living upon their inheritance. Very few men who have acquired a fortune by their own exertions can retire. Such business habits are formed as makes leisure or idleness impossible. A Workingman's party, properly organized, would embrace the greater share of the best people of the community, and would very sharply define the line between good and bad citizens. A Workingman's party that endeavors to drive from it all who do not work with their hands will be an utter failure. This will exclude both brains and property. Brains, moderate wealth, and labor are natural allies. Retired millionaires and tramps represent the two extremes of society against which the great middle class must always guard itself. An American party would necessarily be a Workingman's party.

General Loris Melikoff took a novel, ingenious, and diverting method of conveying to the Czar the intelligence of Mladetzky's attack on his—Melikoff's—life. As soon as the would-be assassin had been arrested and conveyed to prison the dictator drove to the Winter Palace and craved an audience of his sovereign, whom he had quitted but two hours earlier. As he entered the reception-chamber his majesty, surprised at his request for a second interview, greeted him with, "Well, Melikoff, what fresh tidings do you bring?" "I come, sire, to accuse myself of a misdeed, and at the same time to solicit your majesty's pardon." "What has happened?" "I have committed a highly blamable action. In a word, I have boxed a man's ears in the public street." "Is that, then, so grave an offense?" "That depends, sire, to a certain extent, upon how your majesty may please to take it. The only excuse I have to offer is, that the man had fired at me, which circumstance it is also my duty to report to your majesty."

The May number of the North American contains six papers, three political, two critical, and one moral—the last being the most interesting paper in the number, and entitled "The Religion of all Sensible Men," by Leslie Stephens. Judge J. S. Black hits the "third term" another hard blow; George Ticknor Curtis continues his interesting article on "McClellan's Last Service to the Republic"; and the other papers—which we have not read carefully—are, superficially considered, good.

The political outlook indicates a close and severely contested struggle at Chicago, between the friends of General Grant and Senator Blaine, with enough delegates who want neither of them to make it possible that both may be defeated. It seems unprofitable to speculate upon or to prophesy the result. Within the next week we may be able to forecast the outcome with some certainty. The indications as between Grant and Blaine seem to favor the nomination of Blaine.

The extraordinary naturalness of the French artificial flowers and plants lately imported for house-decorating purposes completely reconciles one to the idea of their not "really growing." A branch of nasturtiums drooping from a corner bracket, and pots of variegated tulips placed in a window where it would be impossible to keep real flowers alive, is a happy thought that need not conflict with a love of fragrance or of nature's perishing bloom.

There is a conflict between Republicans in the formation of a club in the Twelfth District. We judge from the following names alone that the organization they represent is not a genuine one: John Finnigan, chairman; T. F. Dorgan, temporary secretary; Owen Thorn, P. McGovern, M. Sullivan, Thomas McCanby, and A. Kronberg, committee on permanent organization. Are there no Americans in that ward?

THE INNER MAN.

"A good dinner lubricates business."—BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON.

The following is a libel upon the cookery of "home," and a true bill against "eating places":

At first the chicken stuffed and roasted brown,
With apple-sauce and fixings all complete.
And then the fricassée, all covered o'er
With thickened butter, poured with lavish hand
To hide the bones. And then what may be left
Is done up into pies, with pasty tops
Just fitted to the dish. Last course of all
Of this eventful bird is chicken soup—
The general leavings and the scrapings-up
Of wings, legs, tails, necks, bones, and everything.

M. Gaëtan Delaunay (says a writer in the Hour) has addressed to the French Academy a most wise and curious memoir, and of this memoir the most remarkable chapter is on gluttony. The author says many sensible things, but, to my mind, he has forgotten the most important fact, and that is, that in our day gluttony no longer exists. It is a buried vice. At the commencement of the century gluttony ruled the world. In France, up to 1830, everything was arranged and disarranged by dinners. Now, as there is no carnival because there is no Lent, there are no jolly feasters because we dine every day. We make no fuss over game and truffles, because there are game and truffles everywhere and all the time. It is the railroads which have killed the amiable vice of gluttony. The whole world places its products on the stalls of the Paris markets, and easy possession is death to desire. Besides, it is difficult, in our active life, to practice gluttony. They used to dine at noon, had three hours for dinner, seven hours for digestion, and then they went to bed. But you would have to be very rich to do that sort of thing to-day. And the rich are never hungry; or, if they are, they haven't any teeth. Nobody in our time cares about eating, except those who can not satisfy their desires. There is, of course, a class of people who know how to eat, but they are neither gluttons nor connoisseurs; they are simply people with a refined respect for their stomachs. M. Gaëtan Delaunay tells us that, among artists, "musicians, who are the least intelligent, are the greatest gluttons." This will probably please Ambroise Thomas, Verdi, Massé, Delibes, and Offenbach. But this is still funnier: "Tenors are greater gluttons than baritones." O Nicolini, Villaret, Salomon, Bertini! Will you not answer? On the dramatic stage, the gentlemen who play the lovers eat the most; and painters eat more than sculptors. Among women, dressmakers have immense appetites. He classifies gluttons in this way:

- | | |
|------------------------|------------------------------------|
| 1. Prelates and curés. | 5. Government officials generally. |
| 2. Diplomates. | 6. Bankers. |
| 3. Judges. | 7. Idlers, landlords. |
| 4. Aldermen. | 8. Artists and literary people. |

Why has our author omitted lawyers? Is it through fear or prudence?

The German drink "bowle" is prepared in several ways, according to the season. In principle it is a simple mixture of wine and some aromatic herb of seasonable fruit, and sweetened to taste, which is sometimes further improved by a slice of orange. Some people add champagne, others, more economically, some effervescing water, additions which are not always improvements. It is best to dissolve the sugar in a little water, and pour it upon the herb or fruit in a suitable receptacle, and then add a light (still) Rhenish or Moselle wine; the latter is preferable. An agreeable variation may be made by using some red wine, perhaps one bottle in four or five. This mixture should stand covered until the taste has become pleasantly noticeable, and then in some cases the substance used should be removed to avoid the bitter flavor which comes later. The quantities required can only be learned by experience. The favorite German bowle is the Maibowle, made of Maikraut or Waldmeister. Strawberries, apricots, peaches, pineapples, crushed or sliced, make delicious drinks. Celery is also used, but the writer has never tried it. There are also numerous "essences" and "extracts" in common use, which make one independent of the seasons, but they only indifferently take the place of fresh fruit, with perhaps the exception of the essence of pineapple, which is not bad.

There's not in the wide world so tempting a sweet
As that Trifle where custard and macaroons meet;
Oh! the last long sweet-tooth from its file must depart
Ere the love of that Trifle shall fly from my heart.

The Hotel Mail prints the following communication from a hotel-keeper in Boston: A gentleman ordered a room here for his sick sister, who would require on her arrival a little lunch, and the following is what she ordered and ate: Tomato soup, fried fillet of sole, boiled beef tongue, roast turkey, cranberry sauce, escalloped oysters, boiled potatoes, boiled cabbage, plain lettuce salad, chicken salad, mince pie, cranberry pie, ice-cream, eggs, and milk. The "sick sister" is still alive.

Mince pie, like masonry, arouses curiosity from the mystery attaching to it. Its popularity shall never wane until faith is lost in sight.

- Calf's-Head Soup.
Fried Trout.
Broiled Beefsteak. Potato Croquettes.
Green Peas. Celery, White Sauce.
Roast Beef.
French Artichoke Salad.
Orange Ice, Fancy Cakes, Apples, Pears, and Bananas.

TO MAKE CALF'S-HEAD SOUP.—One calf's head, properly cleaned, one lemon, one tablespoonful butter, two tablespoonfuls of browned flour. Season with salt, pepper, marjoram, thyme, and a very little cloves, one glass of wine, and force-meat balls. Boil the head until tender (the feet may be used with the head), take out the bones, cut the meat into small pieces. Boil the brains in a cloth, and when cold chop them and add to the soup; also the lemon cut into small pieces, and the seasoning. Boil one hour, and just before serving put in the force-meat balls, butter, flour, and wine.

To make Orange Ice, see No. LXXIX.

The Children's Hospital.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE ARGONAUT: On March 24th, 1875, a charitable institution, known as the "Pacific Dispensary and Hospital for Women and Children," was incorporated in this city by a board of lady managers, and was to be conducted by women physicians. A free dispensary was then opened, where over two hundred women and children were treated monthly, and a few women and children were received as patients. As an outgrowth of this came the necessity for opening a hospital where sick and crippled children could have good nursing and surgical and medical treatment; there being no place whatever in the city for this unfortunate class. The hospital was opened on Oak and Franklin Streets, February 1, 1879. As the institution was free to children, and its support from the public precarious, it was decided to take a limited number of women as paying patients.

On January 1st of this year the hospital was removed to Mission and Twenty-second Streets. The building and locality are admirably adapted to the work; the former being sunny and airy, and the latter very accessible. The corps of women physicians are thoroughly educated in their profession, and are assisted by a consulting board of able male physicians. We have now fully established the only Children's Hospital on the Pacific Coast, incorporated and wisely managed in every detail, medical and financial. As we have no State or city appropriation, and as our dependence upon monthly donations is precarious, the time has now come when the lady managers are compelled to ask assistance of those who are able, and who we believe are willing, to aid this highly deserving charity.

Will not some one or number of persons come to our immediate aid, in large or small contributions, or permanently endow our institution and place it where we can be sure of a certain income? If not, then the time has come when we must close our doors for want of means, and send these poor little sick and crippled children to their homes, where they must suffer for the care which we can give them. It is impossible in this short article to go into the details of the work accomplished during the past year. The medical reports of the attending physicians show many successful surgical operations and cures effected, especially upon the many children who have been cared for at the hospital and sent away well and happy. The past month no new patients have been received, as our low state of funds has prevented our assuming any new responsibilities; and unless we can be assisted before June 1st, we feel that we must close the hospital. Very respectfully,

MRS. A. L. STONE, President Children's Hospital.

[We commend the above communication to our charitably disposed. The appeal is an urgent one, and the following names of the lady directors is an ample guarantee of an honest disposition of funds entrusted to their dispensation: Mrs. A. L. Stone, Mrs. S. A. Raymond, Mrs. Thomas Brown, Mrs. W. T. Wallace, Mrs. Henry Stanwood, Mrs. H. M. Gray, Mrs. O. W. Easton, Mrs. Irving M. Scott, Miss Kate R. Stone, Mrs. L. L. Baker, Mrs. C. B. Williams, Mrs. Judge Burke.—ED.]

Miss Modesty Asserts Herself.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—For so all who wish to gain favor or notice from you address you. Having been an in-"constant reader" ever since you first passed through my hands to be distributed gratis by messenger boys throughout the city, I have felt a growing desire to write something, too. But conceit foiled by timidity, the desire to see if I could say anything that would sound well in print, and the fear that anything I might write would only contribute to your waste-basket, are the feelings which, succeeding each other, impel me at one time to grasp the pencil hopefully and then to lay it down doubtfully. Always having had so profound a respect for writers and writings, it seemed to me that nothing short of perfection could ever "pass muster;" but of late, seeing so much nonsense and so many trashy-sounding articles accepted by you from my more fortunate sisters, my vanity has returned with redoubled force, whispering: "Surely, in so commonplace a strain as they write, you, too, may win recognition." The trouble is, that, unlike these ladies, I belong to a class of women (if one exists) that must style itself "self-made," or "self-educated," which fact is enough to stagger one's confidence in her own abilities even if she were fortunate enough to be possessed of any—ability or confidence. Still, when I notice the off-hand, easy way your society and dramatic critics have of "slinging" their opinions around—speaking of rainy weather as "beastly," and so forth—I think I could do nearly as well as that if I tried; and when I hear them running down each other's appearance in sarcastic and vindictive tones, I think I could do a great deal better than that and not half try. This "pot-calling-kettle-black" style of one young lady, who begins by defending a good cause, and ends by telling the person who presumed to "sit upon" her bed of "rose-buds" that she "guesses her hair must be getting thin," is rather unadvisable to my thinking. I would defend "Buttercup's" cause, also, did I not think her fully capable of taking care of her own argument. I once tried running down the brie-a-brac and fancy-needle-work craze, but was snubbed in the outset "because why"; I did not like to tell who I was. Well, is it not bad enough to be scolded and told to keep quiet—as I expect to be the Argonaut—without having you call me by name right "afore folks"?
SAN FRANCISCO, April 27, 1880. MISS TWADDLE.

"J. C." writes as follows:

Mr. Ben. C. Truman, in the Argonaut of May 1st, is of the impression that "fired out" is a Californianism. He is respectfully referred to Shakespeare's Sonnet 144. The concluding line is: "Till my bad angel fire my good one out."

Everything that money can do (and what can it not accomplish?), supplemented by enterprise and intelligence, is being brought to bear to make Monterey the first watering-place of the world. Not the first alone of America; but the determination is to make it as attractive as any pleasure-resort either in Europe or America. There is no place upon the Atlantic coast that is at all comparable in natural beauty and attractiveness with the Crescent of Monterey. We have seen most of the pleasure-resorts of Europe—Biarritz, in France; San Sebastian, in Spain; together with the more popular and thronged resorts upon the French and English coasts, and we know of none so really attractive in point of climate, and in the temperature of the waters, and the romantic surroundings of the country, as Monterey. We have never seen the place on any ocean shore where the shadow of the pine is thrown upon the sea; where, beneath the shade of evergreen trees, one can sit on a grassy bank and dangle his feet over sea-blue ocean pools. The Central and Southern Railroad people, with unlimited money resources, have determined to make this the place that every tourist to this side of the continent must visit, and that every resident upon the coast will find it a pleasure to frequent.

The Empress Eugenie's famous pearl necklace is now the property of one of the richest women in Europe—Countess Henckel. The empress had the pearls sold in London. One of her ladies, accompanied by two friends of the imperial widow, carried them to an English jeweler, who bought them and disposed of them to the Countess Henckel for 300,000 francs. This lady had some of the pearls, less beautiful than the others, removed, and added two other rows—one, which came from the jewels sold by the Queen of Naples; the other from the necklace of the Virgin of Atocha, sold by a great Spanish personage. At present the set of pearls belonging to the countess, earrings and brooch included, is worth 800,000 or 900,000 francs. It is said to be the finest set of pearls in the world.

She had a pretty diploma, tied with a pink ribbon, from one of our best young ladies' colleges. In conversation with a daring and courageous young man, after he had detailed the dangers and delights of riding on a locomotive, she completely upset his opinion of independent education of the sexes by inquiring, "How do they steer locomotives, anyhow?"

Patti is a good-natured, motherly sort of a person. When she goes out to dinner parties with Nicolini, as happened the other day in Paris, she takes his sons along, too. If the diva accepts an invitation, it is always with the understanding that the Nicolini family are included, which must be very embarrassing to the hostess, unless she believes in the love me, love my dog, principles of society.

Roman society is indebted to the Misses Jordan—two ladies from New York—for the introduction of what is a novelty, viz., afternoon dances. These ladies issued cards for a reception from four till seven. After an hour or so of pleasant converse the guests were all surprised by the notes of a waltz. It required but a moment to realize the situation, and then the crowded company of English, Americans, and Italians went whirling around in the dance.

The Tribune advises women to learn house-painting, among other light employments, and says it is not as hard work as that done exclusively by women who scrub and clean after the painting is over. There are two insurmountable objections, however, which the writer, being a man, has overlooked. One is getting up on a ladder, and the other the smell of the paint. If a woman can be found who isn't afraid of both, why, she isn't a woman, that's all.

A young bachelor sheriff was called upon to serve an attachment against a beautiful young widow. He accordingly called upon her, and said: "Madame, I have an attachment for you." The widow blushed, and said his attachment was reciprocated. "You don't understand me; you must proceed to court." "I know it is leap-year, sir, but I prefer you to do the courting." "Mrs. P., this is no time for trifling; the justice is waiting." "The justice is? Why, I prefer a parson."

The highest circles of the Viennese nobility were much distressed some years ago by the marriage of a young countess with her own footman. Under the storm of virtuous indignation the noble lady retired, with her plebeian husband, to the shades of private life, and lived with remarkable happiness at one of her country seats. This lady has recently died, and the English papers, in referring to her death, comment upon the horribly vulgar name of the coachman husband, the plebeian Kammel, without a word of remark upon the fact that the very aristocratic name which she so ignominiously disgraced was—Hardegg, of Grussbach!

The new Parisian beauty is Madame Gautherot, a perfect constellation of loveliness, according to gushing correspondents. She is twenty-four—beauties are always twenty-four—and a "statue by Canova transmitted into flesh and blood and bone and muscle, dressed by Felix, and coiffed by his assistant, Emile." The splendor of her beauty knocks over the English idols, and throws the Paris painters into ecstasies of rapture; one of them calls her a "Pauline Bonaparte resuscitated," with the exception of having perfect ears, a feature which the fair sister of Napoleon did not possess. Of course, as Madame Gautherot is an acknowledged beauty, the critical people declare she is a waxen image, without soul or animation, and try to throw cold water on the furor she inspires wherever she appears. Mrs. Gautherot is to poison her, but the English channel inter-

AT A DIZZY HEIGHT.

Translated for the Argonaut from the German.

CHAPTER I.

"Reflect upon it, Gustave, there remains for you just one hour and a half till time to return," said Mr. Wachlitz to me. "Do you believe it can be done?"

"I am quite sure," I answered, confidently. "In that time I could make the distance comfortably on foot, and all the easier on horseback. I will not let you wait, you may be convinced."

Saying this, I crossed the threshold of a glass door standing wide open, and approached a pair who promenaded in the pleasure-grounds of the villa. One person of the pair was a young, charming, and—in my eyes at least—beautiful woman. She was the oldest child and the only daughter of the already-mentioned Mr. Wachlitz, a manufacturer, who, through active industry, had risen to great wealth, and in three days she was to be married to me.

I, for my part, was a young man of good family, in my twenty-second year, with property in my own right, and entirely devoted to my bride. That this affection was mutual I knew, and therefore, on this summer afternoon, life to come showed itself to me on its most promising and radiant side. Indeed, I felt myself so extraordinarily fortunate that I wanted to break out in loud exultation, and had to constrain myself to a measured gait along the broad graveled way, instead of running, or in my rapture, without further ceremony, flying away over the green sward.

While I approached, my beloved bride came swiftly toward me, and after some words about other subjects, she advised the greatest caution in regard to an adventure in which I was about to take part, and of which I will at once give the details. I assured her in return that there was no peril whatever connected with it, and we parted after a tender farewell.

At the glass-door the coachman already waited with my saddled horse. When I mounted, and threw back a glance at my bride, I saw her again near her companion, who at my approach had stayed back a little. This companion was Mr. Robert Hasselmann, some thirty-five years old, of good appearance and pleasant manners, a nephew of Mr. Wachlitz, and but recently returned from America.

That this gentleman fostered not exactly friendly feelings toward my modest self I knew too well, although he had not addressed an uncivil word to me, and I could divine the cause of his aversion. He also loved Clara Wachlitz, I was persuaded of it, though he had not declared himself to her; and though Clara, when I disclosed to her my convictions, laughed at them and characterized them as fancies, her raillery could not, however, weaken my convictions, and I felt a certain pity for the poor man since I was his more fortunate rival, and even then entertained no vestige of jealousy when I knew him to be alone in the society of my bride.

At the moment when I was about to ride away I heard my name called, and turning I saw Clara's brother, a handsome boy of some twelve years, hurrying breathless from the house to me.

"Mr. Horst," he called, hastily, as he reached me, "mamma wishes you to bring her a bottle of chloroform from the apothecary; and please don't forget my twine, will you? Just as strong as you can get, because my kite is so large, you know. You bring me three balls alike. You will please not forget?"

"Surely I will not forget it, Charlie," I answered, laughing; "twine and chloroform, two important commissions, I will not forget them. Adieu, my boy."

Upon that I turned my horse into the road, and rode in a lively trot to the town. The chief motive for this ride was a visit to the clergyman who was to perform the sacred ceremony of our marriage, to arrange with him about a change in the wedding hour. On my way back I should, by appointment, meet Mr. Wachlitz and his nephew, at a great new manufactory which the former had undertaken. One portion of this new building was already finished, namely, a colossal chimney—the largest in the country far and wide. Of this chimney, a real master-piece of his art, Mr. Wachlitz was excessively proud, and withal he had given the inducement for the concerting of an indeed somewhat singular adventure. The upper part of the chimney was built by means of balance-work, by which the material was, with a running crane, carried up outside; but the masons were hoisted up the inside, and those two workmen who had finished the upper part could not tell enough of the wonderful prospect which the top of the chimney allowed. They asserted that this view afforded not only the beautiful panorama of the town and its environs, but one could see from above—what seemed almost impossible—the ten-hours-distant mountain chain, and quite plainly recognize the farm-houses on the terraces. Through this Mr. Wachlitz was made so interested that he was going to let himself be hoisted up, and I also, like Mr. Hasselmann, had a lively longing to take part in this bold ascension. The mounting was made on a small board seat, like those used in mining-shafts, brought to the top of the chimney by means of a pulley which was set in motion by a strong windlass below.

After I had attended to my business in town, and bought chloroform and twine, I set out on my return, and came yet some minutes before the time appointed to the place of our rendezvous. Here I gave my horse to one of Mr. Wachlitz's men present, and stepped toward the underground entrance of the chimney, in whose neighborhood I remarked Mr. Hasselmann. It seemed to me that he looked very pale as he politely came toward me, and informed me that Mr. Wachlitz had shortly before been called by a telegram to the bedside of his brother, who was professor in the nine-hours-distant university-town. Probably this gentleman was dangerously ill, and, full of apprehension, Mr. and Mrs. Wachlitz departed at once. Yet, before he left, Mr. Wachlitz had expressed the wish that we might not, on that account, give up our project of mounting to the top of the chimney, and Mr. Hasselmann expressed the hope that I, even without my future father-in-law, would accompany him, as he would very gladly enjoy the wonderful prospect, and later would have no opportunity to do so, on account of his—as I knew—impending departure from the villa.

Young and adventurous as I was, I had already rejoiced at the execution of our project; and, although somewhat set back that I could not do this in the society of my future father-in-law, I saw no real grounds for refusing Mr. Hasselmann's proposal. Accordingly, I gave my consent, and we both went down in the wide chimney-space. Here a half-dozen men waited, ready to set in motion the crooked handle of the windlass, and some minutes later we were free in the air, poising and vibrating, hoisted up the narrowing chimney. Reaching the top, I was the first to leave the seat, yet Mr. Hasselmann was quickly again by my side. The chimney-top was fully two feet thick, had a small parapet half as high, and furnished a safe footing. I had a strong head and did not expect to feel dizzy, but, as I now looked down from the fearful height, a peculiar feeling of insecurity seized me.

"Will you not go round here?" said my companion, after we had stood some moments near each other where we had stepped up.

"Oh, certainly," I replied, with an inward shudder under an assumed mask of boldness; and, with Mr. Hasselmann at my heels, I began the round. The short distance was half-way traveled over, when my companion laid his hand on my arm and hindered my steps.

"We have an excellent prospect—have we not?" said he, while at his touch a feeling of dread thrilled through my nerves. "Yonder, to the right, you see the Wachlitz villa—don't you see it?"

"Of course I see it, quite plainly," I returned, clearing my throat to hide the nervous unrest which I felt.

"Very glad to have persuaded you to the enjoyment of this view," Hasselmann went on in a most singular tone, while he at the same time seized my arm more firmly. "But is it not a terrible height—is it not? I hope it does not make you dizzy?"

"Not at all," I answered, with constrained countenance, but with a decided feeling that I perceptibly trembled as I looked down the deep-sinking wall of smooth stone.

"And yet there is but a step between us and death," he continued, with a derisive smile. "Ah, see there—I believe that I there quote a poet! You did not expect that of me—eh?"

"Oh, any one can quote a poet, you know," I answered, with a faint attempt to give myself consequence. "But you let go my arm, Hasselmann—you hurt me."

"I hurt you—really? Ha! ha! Then I must certainly beg your pardon." He laughed; and upon that he strengthened the convulsive pressure of his fingers instead of lessening it. "I would not hurt you for the world—oh, no! But now, Mr. Gustave Horst, when you have looked enough at the scenery, I must claim your attention a moment. I have a notion to ask you a question which you will perhaps find exceedingly strange and out of place. I am no vain man, that I know, and yet it would be pleasant to me to know your opinion in regard to my personal appearance. Would you, for example, feel justified if you described me as a well-grown, powerful man?"

While I reflected that he was nearly six feet high, broad-shouldered, thick-set, and very muscular, I could but recognize this description as correct, and said so to him.

"Should you be yet in doubt about it," he went on, in the same peculiar tone, "oblige me by a test of these muscles." Upon that he stretched out for my inspection an arm that could have felled an ox—strong and firm as an iron bar.

"I am convinced of your muscular power and strong physical development, Mr. Hasselmann," said I, with an appearance of calmness and cheerfulness that was to me a decided failure. "And now," I continued, "I think, with your permission, it is better to go down again."

"But not now, my nice little bantam-cock," was the terrible answer. "I regret to detain you, believe me, but I must still trouble you with one other question. Suppose that I and you, dear friend, had a combat on the top of this chimney, and that either of us tried to throw the other, which of us would, in your opinion, have the best chance of succeeding with this intention?"

I gathered together all my manhood and undertook to avoid an answer to this question, while I affected to think that the fall was not to be considered because we both entertained so little hostile feeling toward each other that he could not have a desire to injure me.

"Look at me," said he, with strong emphasis, and quite different from his mode of speaking hitherto, "look at me, Mr. Gustave Horst, and see if I entertain no hostile feeling toward you."

I looked at him, and my heart stopped. I perceived in the face of this man who still always held my arm clasped with an iron grip, such an expression of hate and malignity as I had thought possible for no human being, until now. When my eyes sank before the awful look of his, he laughed.

"You have read your answer, as I see," said he. "And now you obey! Sit on the edge just there where you stand, observe what I do as closely as you please, but you dare take one single step to hinder it, then, true as I live, I will throw you down under there!"

This threat was, I felt and saw, no idle one; the man who made it towered above me for more than a head, and had at least double as much power as I. Resistance would thus be fruitless, and therefore I obeyed his orders, and every joint trembled as I sat down. He approached the machinery on which was fastened the wooden seat with which we had mounted, bent himself over the edge of the chimney, removed first of all the chain from two tall, strong standards with hooks, and hurled it clattering in the deep. A cry of horror from the men standing below followed this deed, and rose hoarse and discordant up to us, and I even, myself bending over, answered this cry with one heart-rending shriek for help, but the men of course could not help, and with faintness and despair I saw them vanish in the vaulted over-entrance to the chimney, to preserve themselves from danger, for Robert Hasselmann now removed the wooden seat even from the hooks and flung it over the precipice.

CHAPTER II.

After Hasselmann had performed this murderous and suicidal deed, he straightened himself up again and sat opposite me on the parapet, so that the chimney-opening was between us. A long while we stared silently at each other, then he broke out in wild laughter.

"You appear moved, dear sir," said he, "and yet I can scarcely believe that you have already seized the full meaning of what you have seen. Your power of comprehension is, if I do not wrong you, somewhat limited. I will therefore make our position completely clear to you. You and I, we are alone on this chimney-top, and this is, according to human judgment, exactly the same as if we were already in our graves. Neither of us will again tread the earth there with his feet, for since, as you perhaps observed, all connection with them which they comprehend is cut off, we could only reach them through a spring from this pinnacle, and for that I believe neither of us has any desire. Without doubt, efforts for our rescue will be made; they can, however, be only of such a nature that one can easily make them impossible, and I will make them impossible. My own life is, as I assure you, for me completely worthless. I have brought you here to die, and indeed of a slow death aggravated through mental torments. This luck I have long yearned for, and surely it would not be allowed now that I should be deprived of it!"

"O man, man!" I screamed, in pangs of death, "are you really a human being, or but a devil in man's form?"

"A most melodramatic question, upon my word," he sneered. "Nevertheless, I will, with my customary good breeding, try to answer it. I am, as I believe, precious boy, a man, and yet, to tell the truth, I am brought to my present behavior through feelings which one usually ascribes to the devil—through craft, hate, jealousy, and despair. Yes, Mr. Gustave Horst, I hate you, and have hated you since the first hour of our acquaintance. Your death was determined on by me, with a certain piquant spice of pleasure, long before this plan to secure it arose to me. You have, as I have already observed, no especially lively understanding, but possibly it has been so far moved through a sudden shock as to make it intelligible to you that it was I who sent the telegram, or had it sent, which hindered Mr. Wachlitz from accompanying us to this elevated spot and matchless view, and my knowledge reaches so far I can give you the consolation that he will find Professor Wachlitz in perfectly good health."

"Oh, can such wickedness be suffered?" I groaned, my hands uplifted in ardent entreaty to heaven. "Shall this monster really be allowed to reach his devilish aim?"

"Is not the selfishness of the human heart singular?" my tormentor continued, contemplating me while he sought to give himself an appearance of spiritual superiority. "This individual believes, dares to suppose, that my behavior is the worst in the world. This individual in question has, of course, read of the painful death of thousands of his fellow-men through famine, pestilence, and war, of the slow languishing of the famished Indian, or the underground weaver, or the Christian martyr in Turkey, and of other rude evils of mankind; but the worst rudeness and evil is that which takes pains to free the world of his presence, to quench the weak little spark of his life, when he has also the consolation of seeing his foe go down at the same time with him! Truly, a singular proof of selfishness. Fie, fie, young man! I am ashamed of you!"

With these words, and with scorn on his lips, Hasselmann turned his face from me and sunk into silence.

Meanwhile, at the foot of the chimney there was assembled a crowd, which, in great excitement and with lively gestures, shouted confusedly. I could not understand their words, but I could gather from their movements that they wanted to encourage me, and that they thought Mr. Hasselmann the cause of our melancholy plight, and without doubt crazy. And persuaded that, judging thus of the state of affairs, they would try everything possible for my rescue, hope again moved in my breast. It is impossible, I thought, that I can be torn in so terrible a way from life, from the happiness of youth; I who loved and was beloved—that only a few hours before, full of rapture, had thought myself the luckiest of mortals. No, it would be too unnatural. This conviction came more and more before me as I observed with closest attention the proceedings at the foot of the chimney, and remarked that some of those present started for town, while others hastened by a foot-path in the direction of the Wachlitz villa.

I tried to imagine what expedient could be resorted to which could be employed in my rescue, when my cruel foe again addressed me:

"I hope, dear friend, that you do not yield to childish hopes," said he. "The fools down there, who probably take me to be mad, imagine possible ways in which they can succeed in bringing you with whole skin on terra firma. But you yourself, and I, we know better. By the way, it surprises me that you have not yet been eager to learn how you have incurred my enmity—a further proof, I fear, of imperfect brain development. But you shall learn, if you will please to give me your attention. I will relate to you in a few words the story of my life: Having become an orphan at a very early age, I was brought up by an unmarried aunt, who, as I think, was not especially prepossessed in favor of children. Anyway, she did not show her affection to me so that she awoke love in me; and in my twenty-eighth year I knew not yet what it was to love any human being and be passionately beloved. At this age I made my relative, Mr. Wachlitz, my first visit, and saw his daughter, who at that time was some fifteen years old. This maiden I learned to love, as they say—to cherish, so ardently that I spent on her the whole affection of a wild, passionate nature. But I was poor, and her father was rich. I would not destroy all my hopes with one blow then. Therefore I started without delay for the new world, with the iron purpose of acquiring wealth. Of my American life I say nothing to you—I fear to remove your ideas of virtue and sensibility with one rough shock. It is enough for you to know that during the seven years of my American life I was sometimes gold-digger, sometimes backwoodsman, sometimes trader. During this whole time I learned, through Clara's maid, to whom I regularly made presents, everything that concerned her young lady; gained, also, at times a lock of her hair and her picture. And through this maid—false jade!—I was continually assured that Clara had no love-affair yet. So, full of hope, I collected treasure, and prayed night and day no other prayer than that my darling might be saved for me. At last I came back, with the wealth of a million, to lay myself and all that was mine at her feet. I loved her with a love of which you, beardless boy, have no conception, and that, in comparison to yours, is like a tossing ocean beside a milk-bowl, or a burning forest by a lucifer-match."

"And what did I find when, with anticipations of bliss, I again reached Clara's family mansion? I found her for whose sake I had conquered incredible toil and privation, betrothed to and on the point of marrying a wooden-headed, aristocratic callow-bird, six months younger than she even; and what was yet worse, I found that she loved the simpleton beyond everything!

"Do you wonder now, Mr. Gustave Horst, that I resolved to hinder your marriage? Do you wonder that I felt for you a deadly hatred? Do you wonder that my life having become fruitless is of no more worth to me than an autumn withered leaf?"

"Oh, Hasselmann, you do me great, great wrong!" I cried, when he ceased to speak, for his story, and the painful expression of his face while he told it, had caused me deep emotion. "But you err when you hold your love superior to mine. On the contrary, it is inferior, for I tell you, man, that if Clara had loved you I would not have moved a finger to injure you, and that before I had so torn her heart as it must be torn by a knowledge of what has happened, I would rather have freely suffered the awful death that you would decree me, but I hope to God will be spared me!"

"Do you really hope it? Well, we will wait for it. I imagine your confidence will soon abate. Meanwhile, keep your whining pity for yourself. Do not speak a word more to me so long as I do not address you!"

"I will not do it," I declared, as my pity again gave place to the horror with which I had before regarded him, and while I turned my face from this detestable companion, I awaited in my menacing plight further developments.

In certainly a very short time, but one that seemed to me an eternity, a great crowd of men had collected down round the chimney, from whose midst I suddenly saw a kite mount. It slowly uplifted itself in the air, higher and higher, through a fortunate wind in the right direction, and a skillful guiding hand, floating along to the chimney. The aim of this object I very soon defined, but Hasselmann seemed, to my most extreme wonder, not at all to mind this experiment. He had, by means of a hunter's match, lighted a cigar, and, smoking, looked with calmness into the distance.

At last the kite reached the same height with us, and, through a dexterous movement of the man who steered it, flew at my feet. I stretched out my hand and seized it. A thrill of joy ran through my breast when I held the twine which hung on the kite, for now, if only hanging by a thread, a connection was established between us and those who stood ready for our rescue. Yet my pleasure could be only of short duration. By stealth looking toward Hasselmann, I drew hastily on the string, to which in any case a rescue-rope was fastened, eager, if it was really possible, that he should not see what happened.

He quietly smoked for some moments more, without noticing or wanting to notice anything; then knocked the ashes from his cigar, placed it again in his mouth, slowly opened a pen-knife, and with satirical politeness, "Allow me," he grasped after the string. In the greatest danger of slipping from my seat, I sought to hinder his evident malice, but in vain. He cut through the thread, and with a devilish smile drew back in his previous position. From below resounded a clamor of curses so loud and violent that I believed my foe must tremble. But no, his assumed or real countenance did not change for a moment.

With what longing, with what deep entreaties to God in my soul, with what mad impatience, I waited now further, and observed the increasing crowd as they confusedly ran, guessed, gesticulated, shouted up, called, and yet could do nothing! With what unspeakable pain I remarked then, in the least crowded neighborhood of the tangle of men, a figure which, by the instinct of love, I would have known among a larger gathering, and at a greater distance. Clara stood with upstretched arms upon a ruined house, as if she would thus diminish the gulf that separated us, and from her actions I could infer the grief of her soul.

Hasselmann also remarked her, for I heard him groaning, and saw the pained expression of his face as he furtively looked toward me. I could also perceive in him that her aspect in no wise weakened his heartless resolve.

After long torture the evening twilight fell, yet I saw how a man went up to Clara and locked her in his arms, from which I supposed that it was her father returned from the journey he was deceived into taking; then they were withdrawn from my eyes by the veil of darkness.

Of the awful night that now followed I will not wait to tell. During its interminably long hours I and my dreadful comrade, each sleepless, sat opposite, and by the gleam of the torches which glaringly lighted the foot of the chimney we could distinguish the forms of many people, who also stayed on the spot during the night. In the gray morning the throng of men became larger than the day before, and again efforts were made through mounting kites to play into my hands a rope of deliverance, but each of these efforts was frustrated by my strong adversary. Then attempts at rescue of another kind were undertaken and were just as useless, because cooperation on our side was wanting. All hope of being saved died, once for all, in my breast. There remained nothing left to me but the resolve to bear my fate with manly firmness, and I only entreated of God that he would alleviate Clara's sorrow. How much she suffered could not escape me, as I saw her nearly the whole day long standing in one place by the side of her parent.

Finally, as the day already began to decline, I turned my gaze from her, and while I observed the crowd I perceived there a new agitation, the cause of which was unknown to me. It did not escape me that Hasselmann likewise remarked it, for he laid away his cigar after he had smoked almost the whole day without cessation since day-break, and I heard him murmur:

"What will they undertake now?"

These were the first words which he had spoken on this day, and they were scarcely over his lips when he jumped up, because a gun-shot whizzed past him, and even grazed his ear. The shot was fired behind him by a workman in the new factory-building.

"Ah! so that is what is meant," said he, quickly resuming his calm countenance again. "That we can prevent. Dear comrade, I see it is necessary for me to seek shelter under your wing. They will now shoot no more from down there."

Sitting by me he began again to smoke, and even offered me a cigar.

"You had better take one," he said, surlily, as I with disgust refused the weed. "Smoke is a good preservative against hunger, and I dare say that you feel devilish hungry."

I was, indeed, not in the least hungry, but for many hours a fearful thirst had tormented me, and, since the thought came to me that a strong secretion of saliva would give relief if I chewed the point of my handkerchief, I groped in my pocket. But instead of seizing the handkerchief my hand felt another object, cold and round, and in a moment my heart mounted into my throat. Yet I took pains to seem unmoved, although the blood in sudden tumult shot through my veins, and I had to turn my face from my enemy that some of the expression of new hope in it should not be visible to him. But he fell back in his gloomy, brooding reserve, which he had maintained the whole day, and did not once look toward me.

So slowly for us the hours moved on, and the second night spread itself over our terrible situation. Now Robert Hasselmann spoke again.

"Horst," said he, in the same resolute tone that he had hitherto maintained, but without the expression of hate and scorn, "Horst, I am tired of the story, and think you have now suffered enough. Your hair has, as I have seen, become completely gray; I will, therefore, sooner than I intended, put an end to your torture and mine. Early in the morning, as soon as the gaping crowd has gathered in sufficient numbers to give the exhibition of our airy flight the necessary flavor, we will, with each other, make a spring into their arms. The last night of my existence I think I will pass in sleep, and for this purpose will draw back to the other side of our pleasure-castle. Yet do not deceive yourself with the hope that is disclosed to me in your quickened breathing. I am a light sleeper, that has been accustomed, from fear of murderous Indians, or yet worse evil, to sleep with one eye open; and at the slightest touch—yes, even motion—of yours, I shall surely awake."

If I ever in my life most fervently have prayed, it was on this frightful night, when I saw Robert Hasselmann prepare himself to slumber in a crooked position on the small parapet, with one arm under his head.

Far below flickered the burning torches and lanterns, and from the distance the clang of voices was audible; but more precious to me than all music sounded the mighty snoring of Hasselmann. And now with the utmost caution I crept toward my enemy's head, at each movement halting to listen if he was yet fast asleep.

At last I was quite near, and he was not awake. I drew from my pocket the bottle of chloroform which I had brought with me from town for Mrs. Wachlitz, moistened my handkerchief well with the fluid, and held it before Hasselmann's mouth. His breath came quicker. I held the handkerchief closer, and his breathing became imperceptible. I touched him, and he did not move. I grew bolder, and shook him without his awaking.

By means of the three balls of twine which I bought for Charlie Wachlitz, and of whose real use I had had so little idea, I bound him now, hand and foot, as fast as possible. When this was done, and my foe was still always motionless, I went back to my first place, and, with impatience, awaited the gray of day. Then I stood up high, so that those standing under could plainly perceive my figure without the company of Hasselmann's. I had the satisfaction of seeing that they recognized me; and yet once more I saw in the early summer morning a white-winged safety-boat floating up to me.

Still my dreadful foe always slept; he slept while I seized the kite, and, with feverish haste, drew to me the cord hanging to it; he slept as I, with growing excitement, drew up first a slight, and afterward a stronger, rope fastened to it, and let it down the interior of the chimney; he slept while I drew up the stout chain that now followed, at the end of which was secured a horizontal bar of iron; and he also slept yet when I put my feet over the iron bar for a seat, and, feeling that the chain was firmly held below, grasped it with both hands and let myself slip over the edge of the chimney. If he then still remained sleeping, troubled me no more as I, with closed eyes and thankful heart, felt myself slowly let down the smooth side of the chimney, deeper, deeper, till I at last touched the earth with my feet, saw round me a sea of faces, heard a confusion of cheers and congratulations—upon which I sank in a faint.

When, from the severe fever which followed the swoon and lasted many weeks, I came again to consciousness, I found myself nursed in the sleeping-room which I was accustomed to use at the Wachlitz villa, and Clara, pale and haggard, anxiously watching by my side. My nervous system was so shaken by that frightful occurrence that for a long time every one was strictly forbidden to mention it in my presence. But by and by, when I insisted on learning more of Hasselmann's fate, it was told me that on the morning of my rescue, after they had vainly waited some hours for a movement from Hasselmann, a courageous mason was drawn to the top of the chimney in the same way through which I was let down, and Hasselmann, bound hand and foot, was found dead! Thus was he, through me, by means of the chloroform, unwittingly killed. They had the machinery with pulleys again secured, and so brought down the corpse of the unfortunate man.

Six months later saw my wedding with Clara, only I was no more the cheerful, fresh youth of before that fearful adventure, but a gray-headed, prematurely aged man. Yet Clara loves me, spite of the color of my hair, and the healing hand of time has removed the consequences of that mental shock, so that I again rejoice in ruddy health.

EMMA FRANCES DAWSON.

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1880.

At a London private fancy ball even the servants and the band were in costume. "Mrs. Brasseys' three little girls were dressed as kittens, with dead kittens on their heads, and two boys as Cupids, with nothing on but blue scarfs and wreaths of pink roses. It was the correct thing for the married ladies to wear their petticoats quite up to the knees. One went as Gold—a mass of coins, and gold shoes with about three inches of heel. Her husband appeared as a butcher; another man as a monkey, and very horrible he looked with a tail that flew about as he danced."

"Oh, mister!" said an old lady, after a bicycle had passed her, "just now I seed a wagon-wheel runnin' away with a man. You kin believe it or not. I wouldn't if I hadn't seed it myself."

INTAGLIOS.

IF.

If life were never bitter,
And love were always sweet,
Then who would care to borrow
A moral from to-morrow—
If Thames would always glitter,
And joy would ne'er retreat—
If life were never bitter,
And love were always sweet.

If care were not the waiter
Behind a fellow's chair,
When easy-going sinners
Sit down to Richmond dinners,
And life's sweet stream flows straighter—
By Jove! it would be rare,
If care were not the waiter
Behind a fellow's chair.

If wit were always radiant,
And wine were always iced,
And bores were kicked out straightway
Through a convenient gateway;
Then down the year's long gradient
'Twere sad to be enticed,
If wit were always radiant,
And wine were always iced.—Mortimer Collins.

Never Again.

There are gains for all our losses,
There are balm for all our pain;
But when youth, the dream, departs,
It takes something from our hearts,
And it never comes again.

We are wiser and are better
Under nanhood's sterner reign;
Still we feel that something sweet
Followed youth with flying feet,
And will never come again.

Something beautiful is vanished,
And we sigh for it in vain;
We behold it everywhere
On the earth and in the air,
But it never comes again. —R. H. Stoddard.

Verses in my Old Age.

Come, from the ends of the world,
Winds of the air or sky,
Wherever the thunder is hurl'd,
Wherever the lightnings fly!
Come with the bird in your bosom,
Linnet and lark that soars;
Come with the sweet spring blossom,
And the sun from southern shores.

I hate the snake winter that creepeth,
And poisons the buds of May;
I shout to the sun who sleepeth,
And pray him awake to-day.
For the world is in want of his power
To vanquish the rebel storm.
All wait for his golden hour—
Man, and beast, and worm.

Not only the seasons falling
Forsake their natural tone,
But age drops onward, sailing,
And is lost in the seas unknown.
No wisdom redeemeth his sorrow,
For thought and strength are fled;
No hope enlightens to-morrow,
And the past, so loved, is dead.
—Bryan Waller Proctor.

Carpe Diem.

To-day I can not choose but share
The indolence of earth and air;
In listless languor lying,
I see, like thistle-flowers that sail
Adown some bazed autumnal vale,
The bours to Lethe flying.

The sand-glass twinkles in the sun;
Unchanged its ceaseless course is run
Through ever changeable weathers.
"Time flies," its motto. 'Tis no crime,
I think, to pluck the wings of Time,
And sleep upon his feathers!

The Brave at Home.

The maid who binds her warrior's sash,
With smile that well her pain dissembles,
The while beneath her drooping lash
One starry tear-drop hangs and trembles,
Though heaven alone records the tear,
And fame shall never know her story,
Her heart has shed a drop as dear
As e'er bedewed the field of glory.

The wife who girds her husband's sword
Mid little ones who weep and wonder,
And bravely speaks the cheering word,
What though her heart be rent asunder,
Doomed nightly in her dreams to hate,
The bolts of death around him rattle,
Hath shed as sacred blood as e'er
Was poured upon the field of battle!

The mother who conceals her grief
While to her heart her son she presses,
Then breathes a few brave words and brief,
Kissing the patriot brow she blesses,
With no one but the secret God
To know the pain that weighs upon her,
Sheds holy blood as e'er the sod
Received on Freedom's field of honor.

The White Rose.

White Rose, are you tired of staying in one place?
Do you ever wish to see the wild-flowers face to face?
Do you know the woodbines, and the big, brown-crested reeds?
Do you wonder how they live so friendly with the weeds?
Have you any work to do when you've finished growing?
Shall you teach your little buds pretty ways of blowing?

Do you ever go to sleep? Once I woke by night,
And looked out of the window, and there you stood, moon-white:
Moon-white in a mist of darkness, with never a word to say,
But you seemed to move a little, and then I ran away.
I should have felt no wonder, after I hid my head,
If I had found you standing, moon-white, beside my bed.

White Rose, do you love me? I only wish you'd say:
I would work hard to please you, if I but knew the way.
It seems hard to be loving, and not a sign to see
But the silence and the sweetness for all as well as me.
I think you nearly perfect, in spite of all your scorns;
But, White Rose, if I were you, I wouldn't be those thorns!

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1880.

The proceedings of the recent State Convention were, in the main, characterized by dignity. Its president was Senator Baker, of Santa Clara. Its personnel was, in large majority, composed of intelligent, earnest, and enthusiastic Republicans. Its result—the delegation to Chicago—undoubtedly reflects the sentiments of the party in this State. It was clearly apparent among delegates, and in the general atmosphere that surrounded the Convention, that Mr. Blaine was its first choice. It was equally clear, but not expressed by resolution, that Mr. Washburne was the second choice of the Convention. It was also apparent that the party would be thoroughly loyal to any candidate nominated—except to General Grant; and, if the party allegiance falters here, it is not out of disrespect for him personally, not because the Republican party does not admire him. Republicans are grateful to him; they appreciate his services to the nation; but they are restive under the lash of the tyrants of the party; they are indignant that men of intelligence and patriotism are compelled to submit to the insolent dictation of self-imposed party leaders. We, here in California, have drained to the dregs this bitter cup, and we know what it is to be trampled under the feet of ignoble and vulgar party thieves. We know that in this State the Republican leadership has rested with low-born and ignorant men. We know that unscrupulous men, wanting honors, have struck hands with mercenary wretches, wanting coin; that senators and members of Congress have thrown the mantle of their official protection over mint and Mare Island stealings, and that political copartnerships have been formed between business men, furnishing brains and money, and Republican party rascals, furnishing cheek and opportunity and protection. We resent the fact that Conkling runs New York, Cameron Pennsylvania, and Logan Illinois. We are not unmindful that carpet-bag thieves invaded the South land, stealing from blacks and whites alike, and that all this rascality found a greater indulgence—we will not say countenance—under General Grant than under any previous administration. The four years of President Hayes have been a step upward, away from this carpet-bag and Federal ring demoralization, and we would not return to it. As we, in California, want no more Sargent, Gorham, Carr & Co., in ours, so we sympathize with Republicans in other States, and feel like aiding them to get rid of this hydra-headed monster that may only be killed by striking off the central head that hides itself in the Lernean bog at Washington. For ten years, honest, independent, and able men have been discountenanced in the politics of this State; not an honor to be given to the best gentleman in the party, if he did not go fawning, hat in hand, to Bill Carr; not an office to be disposed of, that the best and most deserving worker must not ask for as a suppliant to Bill Carr; not a pound of merchandise for public use, that must not pay tribute to some bandit upon the political highway. We are tired of it; we chafe under it. And because this class of party freebooters have, all over the land, concentrated upon General Grant for their chief, and because General Grant is so anxious and so willing to lead these political knaves, we distrust him. The recent State Convention has given emphasis in this direction by casting its vote and giving its instructions for Mr. Blaine. It was an able and representative assemblage of the best class of the rank and file of the Republican party of a Republican State. It was composed, in a majority, of men who want no office, and who are Republicans because they are patriotic, and because they think the Republican party represents the intelligence, the property, the progress, and the moral sentiment of the nation.

We have begun to cleanse the Augean stables in this State by turning through them the rivers of political reform; and only one nasty corner yet remaining, and that is the City and County of San Francisco. The delegation from San Francisco grows worse and more contemptible each succeeding year; gentlemen dropping out one by one; old Republicans wearied of the dirty work, tired of the unending labor of fighting the slums, losing heart and losing hope; county committees and ward organizations steadily growing down like the tail of a dog, and steadily gaining in power to wag the dog, till now the great, ponderous, unwieldy San Francisco delegation, composed of about one-third gentlemen to two-thirds loafers, makes its pilgrimage to Sacramento when a convention is called, sits through its deliberations without power or influence, regarded with suspicion by country delegates—who are always looking to it for some mean and dirty work, and are never disappointed—a delegation having no recognized leader, no honest purpose, and whose highest pleasure it is to have its ponderous roll called upon every question, that each of its obscure members may enjoy the poor privilege of hearing how his name sounds. The state of San Francisco politics is very low when it is caucused in the house of Dan Bigley, and when a gentleman desirous of attending a State Convention is compelled to "see Jimmy Dyer."

Another evil of increasing magnitude is that local prejudices and local interests are growing and strengthening. It was indicated in the debate and vote that prevented the election of delegates at large, in order that each district might gain a member. It was a failure—all departures from honest business are failures. It is a small and narrow jealousy that will not recognize party talent or party service because they are not found within the limits of Plumas County, or within the political jurisdiction that can send Senator Cheney to Congress. If Gladstone, living in England, can go into the heart of Midlothian to fight the "Bold Buccleugh" upon his ancestral acres, and thus represent a Scottish constituency in Parliament; or if Gambetta may be President of the Chamber of Deputies of France from Bordeaux, where he does not live—why may not a broader and more generous policy be introduced into California politics than one which will condemn to private life every gentleman of San Francisco unless he is fortunate enough to be the friend of Dan Bigley, or can secure an early opportunity to "see Jimmy Dyer"? Thanks to the gentlemen of the Fourth Congressional District, that they were generous enough to relieve the writer of this article from the mortification of being defeated by a species of (San Francisco) politics that he admits himself unable to cope with. It is an act worthy of imitation, and if the generous politics of such men as Charles Felton, of San Mateo, and J. P. Stearns, of Santa Barbara, could be introduced into California, it would give hundreds of the best men of the State encouragement to fight the political loafers and ward bummers that have obtained such complete mastery in the city of San Francisco, and bring them back to an active participation in party affairs. Let us make the effort when in the next State Convention we come to choose a State Central Committee. There is a nasty intrigue on foot which we are watching, by aid of the country delegates in the next convention, which we will defeat—that is, if we get a proxy from Calaveras.

The Convention was a success in its broader purpose. It was composed, as we have said—in a large majority—of honest men. In the endorsement of Senator Blaine and the Hon. Newton Booth—in declaring by special resolution that "Black and Tan" should be whistled home from the National Committee, that he may no longer bark and show his teeth in snarling spite at better men; in the declaration of principles, and in the passage of instructions to its delegates; in refusing to carry out a conspiracy against the present State Central Committee—it did well. The instructions may seem, to the non-reflecting, over strong, "iron-clad and copper-fastened," but it will be remembered that four years ago, under similar conditions, twelve delegates were sent to Cincinnati for Blaine, and that six of them fell down under the whispering seductions of a cluster of party snakes that can no longer charm, but only hiss—a little gang whose venom enables them to rattle their tails, but prevents them from striking their fangs, because their fangs are drawn. Four years ago these blackguards had the power to strut and steal; at State conventions they rode in open barouches; had headquarters, and outside strikers; they declared their determination to rule the party or ruin it, and arrogantly proclaimed that if the party was not strong enough to bear them it must sink; they made convention officers, drafted resolutions, appointed State central committees; they divided the Federal patronage; they robbed the government and plundered the treasury; they furnished supplies to Mare Island, and made purchases for army, navy, and civil service; they stole and divided; they plundered and grew rich. But the jaws of the penitentiary opened so wide, and the warden stalked so near, that they have skulked out of sight. They are not all dead yet. Tom Shannon shelters some of them in the custom house, cunning Mr. Coey keeps his protecting wing over some, and Mr. Dodge allows a few to hide in the cellars of the mint. Mr. Blanchard pops up in Convention from El Dorado, and Mr. McKenna from Solano, and Mr. McFarland from Sacramento, and "Charley" still comes from Yuba. Still they plot and wriggle like angle-worms cut in two by a farmer's spade. They must be cut in pieces again and again, wherever found, and as often as found, till Blaine or some honest man is elected President, whose highest virtue does not consist in the fact that he is staunch and loyal to his friends when his friends are thieves.

This Convention was conspicuous for the absence of Federal officials. Sargent was not there, did not preside, and did not dare to offer himself to preside—as was the programme that did not carry. Mr. William B. Carr was not sitting at the head of the San Francisco delegation, and was not on the Committee on Resolutions. The Convention was respectable, and Blanchard of El Dorado did not preside. Let us keep it so, and, while it may be impossible to utterly suppress that kind of lower political animal that will live after being cut in two, and will wriggle its tail after its head is crushed, we are still making progress. Let us hope that we may reform even the politics of San Francisco, and, in time, be able to secure delegates to a State convention outside a caucus at the house of Dan Bigley, or without being compelled to "see Jimmy Dyer." And let us hope that the gentlemen of the interior will keep at home their poor, fat-witted, unconscious country cats, who allow themselves—through ignorance—to handle the hot chestnuts for the thieving political monkeys of San Francisco. The following persons were elected delegates to the National Convention: J. C. Wilmerding, Alexander Sharon, and Samuel Mosgrove, San Francisco; Socrates Huff, Alameda; J. K. Doak, Stockton; Creed Haymond, Sacramento; E. A. Davis, Marysville; Joseph Russ, Eureka; H. T. Fairbanks, Petaluma; John Mansfield, Los Angeles; D. S. Payne, San Jose; Frank M. Pixley, San Francisco. The following were named as alternates: From the First District (San Francisco)—G. A. Fisher, C. Mason Kinne, and F. J. French; Second District—J. A. Benson, James Foster, and J. R. Johns; Third District—John G. Scott, F. A. Leach, and S. G. Hilborn; Fourth District—William Smith, Charles Shannon, and J. P. Stearns.

It looks a little as though the grip of the political octopus that holds in its folds the Republican rank and file of Pennsylvania was relaxing; that the coil was loosening and so unwinding that a few Blaine delegates might get out from its embrace. It seems to be a most shameful thing that in the two great States of New York and Pennsylvania there should be invoked the iron rule of a bare majority, and that by these States, in conspiracy with Southern States that will cast no Republican electoral vote, the wishes of an intelligent majority should be ignored. This is machine politics with a vengeance. It may win in convention, but it can not win before the people. Mr. Senator Conkling was sent as a delegate from Utica to the New York State Convention by one majority. He carried the State for Grant by twelve majority. Cameron carried the State of Pennsylvania by personal appeals, promises of office, and trick. This kind of politics is disgraceful; and, so long as it rules, so long as there is no honor on the part of leaders, there is nothing to bind the rank and file in loyalty to the party. If General Grant becomes the Republican candidate for President by open and honest work, clearly indicating that he is the choice of the Republicans, and this choice is fairly expressed in National Convention, after free discussion and opportunity for deliberation by delegates who have been honestly chosen, then it will become the duty—perhaps—of all Republicans to support him. Then party leaders may appeal to rules of party discipline with great propriety. Then the argument would be, and we feel its force: "Your judgment has been overruled; your opinions have been weighed, and the better opinion rests with the majority; you owe it to the party, and to patriotism, to give up your personal feelings, your personal opinions, and your convictions—even of duty—in the presence of opinions honestly entertained and fairly expressed by a party majority in national council." But if this National Convention be packed; if delegations are bullied by men having patronage to dispense, honors to award, and emoluments to distribute; if the machine becomes a juggernaut, to ride over and crush out all individual opinion—then the individual will be not only not bound by its decrees, but will be, in self respect, compelled to resent it—to bolt the party, to refuse to support General Grant, and at liberty to vote for a third candidate or for the Democratic nominee. This rule will govern us; and we invoke the principle in politics that governs in equity: "Fraud vitiates all contracts." There is no code of honor governing social or business life that ought not to prevail in politics. The man who will intrigue, or lie, or cheat, or overreach, or suppress a fact, or suggest a falsehood in politics, will do the same thing in his social, or business, or religious associations. We sincerely hope General Grant will not be nominated by the Republican Convention at Chicago. Our personal preference is for E. B. Washburne. But if it is true that Mr. Washburne's personal devotion to General Grant is greater than to the country; and if it is true, as reported by the Associated Press, that "he is out of patience with zealous friends," we shall not further annoy him with the persecution of zealous admiration. In fact, we are not hero-worshippers. We do not believe in indispensable men. We do not think the world moves, or was created, or that the nation lives for any one man; nor that the universe will collapse, or the nation die, or the Union be dissolved, if General Grant should settle down permanently at Galena, and Mr. Washburne should not become President.

As the Chinese question is one of peculiar interest to this coast, and will necessarily become a matter of prominent discussion in the coming Presidential campaign, we hope some of our people will formulate resolutions upon the subject for the Chicago Convention. We shall be glad to receive suggestions in this matter, which we shall have an opportunity to lay before the Committee on Resolutions of the Republican Convention, and to follow them there for discussion. This committee will be composed of the ablest men of the Republican party, and as it is so clearly apparent that our three Pacific States will give their electoral votes to the party that takes the strongest ground and offers the most speedy and practical remedy for the evil of Chinese immigration, we may hope to pledge both the great parties to a policy of restriction. These resolutions should be moderate, should be strongly expressed, should be within the law, and should be pushed with all the nerve and all the eloquence of our three delegations before the convention.

California has another important question that may be properly, by resolution or otherwise, be brought to the notice of both National Conventions. Our wine and raisin interests, the industries embraced in the word "viticulture," are, by reason of our climate and the breadth of our vine lands, destined to become most important; more important, we believe, than the gold or grain products of our State, and in time more vast and profitable than the cereal or cotton crops of the United States. We commend to the gentlemen who compose the commission recently appointed by the Governor, to give this question their attention, and let us secure such a recognition of our wine interests as to make hostile legislation in the wine interests of France impossible.

We know who is to be the next Governor of California. The present incumbent holds for three years. He will not desire a reelection. He will prefer to retire to private life, as he finds that business affairs are more congenial than political, and that he is better fitted to adorn the private than the public station. This new candidate for official position is an American, and will stand upon the new platform, that would restrain foreign immigration and abolish all naturalization laws. He is from one of the interior counties. He is a gentleman, under the best definition of that comprehensive term. He is both educated and intelligent. He is a thoroughbred. He is a wealthy, clear-headed, honest-minded, resolute, brave man. He is in sympathy with labor and laborers, and it is an honest, manly sentiment, without hypocrisy or affectation. He has had a large experience in public affairs. His political, social, and business reputation is unstained. He will be nominated by country delegates, in spite of the intrigues of our city politicians, whom he will not stoop to conciliate. He will be elected by the votes of that class of citizens—native and foreign-born—who are intelligent, patriotic, law-abiding, and order-loving, and who think that this country can be better governed by this class of men—born upon the soil—than by ignorant and vicious aliens, led by selfish, intriguing, and unprincipled native-born demagogues. We are not at liberty to announce the name of this gentleman in print, as the subject has never been mentioned to him; but we shall feel entirely free to disclose his name in confidence to any inquiring and respectable citizen who may feel interested in knowing who is to be the next Governor of California.

The world moves. Let us see! Three years ago San Francisco was the prosperous city of the nation. California had not experienced the hard times that came to the East as a reaction from the flush times of war. We had hoped to have passed along without feeling the pressure. But stock speculations, a dry season, and Chinese immigration made our poorest laborers feel the pressure of pinching times. The great majority of our laboring class had savings-bank deposits, and could have survived one hard winter. The Chronicle, the Call, Kearney, and Kallach undertook, for personal and pecuniary and ambitious reasons, to incite an agitation, that upon its wave they might be advanced. Kallach could talk, and would be Mayor. Kearney could talk, and would make money. The Chronicle was enterprising, and would increase its circulation. The Call was mercenary, and wanted small advertisements. The agitation was had, and for two years our city has been kept upon the brink of insurrection. Kearney has blasphemed God upon the Sand-lot. Kallach has howled from his pulpit like a mad and drunken dervish. The Chronicle and Call have quarreled and struggled in rival sensations, and contended each with the other to give false importance to the insane ravings of a worthless Irish cartman and an hypocritical Baptist preacher. Now let us look around us and observe the present attitude of the parties to this agitation. Kearney is in stripes, breaking stones. Charles de Young has been murdered. I. M. Kal-loch is in prison, awaiting trial; deserving to be hung, and looking to imprisonment for life as an undeserved favor. I. S. Kallach, dishonored and disgraced, is under trial for impeachment, preferred by twelve Supervisors, with an almost unanimous public sentiment favoring his removal from an office in which he has most criminally conducted himself. The poor have been made poorer. Labor that was scarce has become more scarce. Industries have been arrested, and property depreciated in value.

The impeachment of the Mayor presents the question to our people as a practical one. The chief magistrate of a city is held to another and a stricter responsibility than a private citizen. Words that from the mouth of Kearney or any of his ignorant and unprincipled Irish might be endured, have another significance when uttered by the Mayor. Kallach the Baptist, like him who proclaimed the coming of the Messiah, might have come bare-headed and bare-footed, in camel's-hair raiment, with a girdle about his loins, and howled his mad and crazy indictment against this community, and none would have heeded his incendiary utterances. But as Mayor, as one clothed with authority, he became dangerous; he is dangerous, and he must be suppressed. In self-defense, in defense of life and property, in security of the present and protection for the future, we must defend ourselves against the two Isaacs—father and son. They are dangerous. One kills, and the other endeavors, we think, to incite riot; both have revenge and hatred in their hearts, and we are afraid of them. If such a man as Isaac S. Kallach can become Mayor, and remain Mayor, and if there is no law to punish murder, and to restrain incendiary utterances by a magistrate, then, indeed, have we fallen upon evil times. We sincerely hope that the Reverend Isaac may be deprived of his official position and returned to private life.

The treatment of the colored cadet at West Point has drawn the attention of the nation to that somewhat exclusive and expensive national establishment of military instruction. The colored man and the colored boy seem to be great stumbling blocks in the way of our social and political advancement. There can be no doubt of the fact that the "superior" white boys have treated poor Whittaker with great contempt. They have tabooed him, placed him in Coventry, refused to have social intercourse with him, and, in the thousand and one mysterious ways so well known to boys, have made the young dark gentleman feel that he belongs to a proscribed and inferior race. There was only one way that he could have overcome the difficulties of his position, and perhaps he did not have the physical strength and moral nerve to make the attempt. If he could have selected from his enemies the bully of the opposition, and thrashed him, he could have commanded the respect of his fellows. There is only one thing school-boys thoroughly admire, and that is the pluck that can thrash its way through all opposition. Among the democracy of boys the best pugilist is the best gentleman. Boys are, as a rule, tyrants, bullies, and cowards in school. They are not unlike coyotes; they fight in packs. Their color prejudices they take from home, and we fancy that the West Point cadet of to-day is not the cadet of twenty-five years ago. The institution used to be an aristocratic one. Gentlemen's sons used to frequent it. But now we fancy that most of the young heroes come from the primary-election and corner-grocery influence. There was a time when to have been a graduate of West Point was—and properly so—presumptive evidence that the graduate was a gentleman. There was a time when to be an officer in the army opened him an entrance to the best society. There was culture and good breeding, high honor and untarnished reputation, among the "gentlemen of the army." There was refinement, elegance, charming deportment among the "ladies of the army." From West Point came many of our best men in civil life, bearing the obligation to return when the nation demanded their services. Now it seems as though there was a pressure of politicians bearing upon the military college that gives it cadets who are socially a good deal off color, and turns out graduates that are just a shade outside of gentlemen. Perhaps this accounts for the fact that, in all this school, there was no pupil so well bred, and so well born, and so well assured of his own social position that he dared to become the champion and protector of this friendless, lone colored boy. In chivalry times it would not have been so. When this academy fails to produce gentlemen as well as soldiers, it will be time that it was abolished, and the money expended to teach this kind of young Americans how to carry a hod and mix mortar with a hoe.

After several months' trial, without really valuable results that might not be obtained otherwise, the social experiment of shooting people who sing Pinafore airs ought to be abandoned. It is not, of course, a question involving anybody's ideas of right and wrong, but one of public expediency. One of its disadvantages is that the aim is commonly bad—probably from the excitement of sudden wrath and impatience—and unless by chance the bullet penetrates that part of the singer which the musical critics of the press would loosely call his organ, no permanent good is accomplished, for habit is strong, and a man who sings Pinafore airs will continue to sing them through as much of this life as remains to him, and may possibly interrupt the choir at his funeral. It is hoped, therefore, that the instance which occurred the other day in the parlor of a respectable family at Richmond, Virginia, may be the last that we shall have to record. We shall all die soon enough, and the shooting of a Pinafore singer is, anyhow, not fair to the gallows foreshadowed in his horoscope.

Mr. James O'Meara, of the Evening Examiner, at some obscure Democratic club meeting, indulged himself in a eulogistic, or at least exculpatory, harangue in the interest of the elder Kallach, and thinks he ought not to be impeached. Now this is, of course, blarney for the Democracy, as it is not at all natural for a person of Mr. O'Meara's name to feel bad over the impeachment of a Republican. If the Democracy desires to swallow the Kallachs—father and son—we hope it will be allowed to do so, and we further hope that the act of deglutition will choke the Democracy. So we advise Mr. O'Meara to pin the ears of the Kallachs nicely back, and gulp them down. For every Kallach the Democracy can digest, the Republican party will secure an hundred Democratic gentlemen.

In the Berkeley Quarterly for April we find an excellent article from Mr. Samuel Williams, one of the editors of the San Francisco Evening Bulletin, entitled "The Government of Large Cities," from which we print the following table showing the relative proportion of the native and foreign-born citizens, together with an extract illustrating the evils of this foreign element. When Mr. Williams comes to summarize his remedies for the evils he so graphically describes, he strangely omits to suggest the only practicable one—viz., to repeal our naturalization laws, and by affirmative enactments to prevent paupers and criminals from being exiled from other lands to the United States. The following figures are from the census of 1870:

"This foreign element represents not the best, but, in a large measure, the worst element of the population of European cities. Ignorant of our language, ignorant of our social usages, ignorant of the spirit of our laws, ignorant of the very alphabet of freedom; brutalized by centuries, nay, by eras of oppression; to whom liberty is the synonym of license; tainted with the vicious heresies of agrarianism; accepting as gospel the infamous dogma of Proudhon that 'property is robbery,' they are a source of imminent and perpetual danger. Led on by reckless adventurers of their own nationality, their lowest passions appealed to, they are often sufficiently powerful numerically, not only to control elections, but to dictate the policy and patronage of the local government. With such materials to work upon, the political spoilsman is not slow to seize his opportunity. The large city becomes the paradise of the demagogue and the public robber. The facilities for stealing are almost boundless. Municipal government becomes but another name for spoliation. The ward politician becomes the mouth-piece of the slums; the favorite candidate is the express image and embodiment of the will of the mob. The taint of corruption spreads like a hideous leprosy over every department of municipal legislation. The fountains of public life become poisoned at their source. The election is a cruel mockery of decency. Fraud is king, and Perjury presides at the polls. Illegal naturalization, false registration, false certificates, ballot-box stuffing, doctoring of returns, corrupting of inspectors, are not infrequent practices. The injunction to 'vote early and vote often' is religiously obeyed. There is nothing sacred, nothing really final in the proclamation of a canvassing board. The fact of one having received the largest number of votes is no sure evidence of his being entitled to the office!" Good sentiment and bold utterance, Mr. Williams. We enlist you for the fight.

We have heard of a very curious circumstance, occurring at the last regular meeting of the Board of Education, in the adoption by the board of the McGuffey school-books. If the incident is true as we heard it, then this board contains more than the usual proportion of rascals incident to such bodies. We are impressed with the conviction that the board contains three honest men—President Stone, Mr. Eaton, and Mr. Thompson. If there is another we will be obliged if some disinterested and reliable person will give us his name, in order that we may do him justice. We give our own feelings by putting his name in print.

PHILOPENA.

There was a beautiful princess who had a great fondness for almonds, and ate them constantly, but nothing would induce her to marry, and in order to rid herself of her suitors, of whom there were a great number, she invented the following device: To every prince who sought her hand she presented the half of a double almond, while she ate the other half, and said: "If your lordship can succeed in getting me to take anything from your hands before I say the words, 'I remember,' then I am ready to become your bride. But if, on the contrary, you receive anything from me without thinking to speak these words, then you must agree to have your hair shaven entirely off your head, and leave the kingdom."

This, however, was an artful stratagem, for, according to the court custom, no one dared to hand anything directly to the princess, but first to the court lady, who then offered it to her. But if, on the other hand, the princess should desire to give or to take anything, who could refuse her? So it was useless for her suitors to make the trial, for when they seemed likely to be successful, and had diverted the princess so that she was about to take something from them, the court lady always stepped between and spoiled the best-laid plan.

When the princess wished to dispose of one of them, she would appear so charming and encouraging to him that he would be entirely fascinated, and when he sat at her feet, overcome with joy, then she would seize upon anything near her, as though by accident—"Take this as a remembrance of me!" and when he had it in his hands, before he could think or speak the necessary words, there would spring out at him from it perhaps a frog, or a hornet, or a bat, and so startle him that he would forget the words. Then, upon the spot, he was shaven, and away with him. This went on for some years, and in all the palaces of the other kingdoms the princes wore wigs. Thus it came to be the custom from that time.

Finally, it happened that a foreign prince came upon some peculiar business, and by accident saw the almond princess. He thought her very beautiful, and at once perceived the stratagem. A friendly little gray man had given him an apple that once a year he was privileged to smell, and then there came into his mind a very wise idea, and he had become much renowned on account of his deep wisdom. So with the scent from it came this warning:

"If thou wouldst win in the game of giving and taking, under no circumstances must thou either give or take anything."

So he had his hands bound in his belt, and went with his marshal to the palace, and asked to be allowed to eat his almond. The princess was secretly pleased with him, and immediately handed him an almond, which his marshal took and placed in his mouth.

The princess inquired what this meant, and, moreover, why he constantly carried his hands in his girdle.

He replied that at his court the custom was even more strongly enforced than at hers, and he dare not give or take anything with his hands—at the most with only his head or feet.

Then the princess laughed and said: "In this case we will never be able to have our little game together."

He sighed and answered:

"Not unless you will be pleased to take something from my boots."

"That can never happen!" exclaimed the whole court.

"Why have you come hither," exclaimed the princess, angrily, "when you have such stupid customs?"

"Because you are so beautiful!" replied the prince. "And if I can not win you, I may, at least, have the pleasure of seeing you."

"On the other hand, I have no similar gratification," said she.

So the prince remained at the palace, and he pleased her more and more. But when the humor seized her, she tried in every manner to persuade him to take his hands from his girdle and receive something from her. She also entertained him charmingly, and frequently offered him flowers, bon-bons, and trinkets, and finally her bracelets, but not once did he forget and stretch out his hand to take them, for the pressure of the girdle reminded him in time. So he would nod to his marshal, and he received them, saying:

"We remember."

Then the princess would become impatient, and exclaim: "My handkerchief has fallen! Can your lordship pick it up for me?"

Whereupon the prince would fasten his slipper into it and wave it carelessly, while the princess would have to bend and remove it from his foot, angrily saying:

"I remember."

Thus a year passed away, and the princess said to herself: "This can not remain so. It must be settled in one way or the other."

She said to the prince:

"I have one of the finest gardens in the world. I will show your lordship over it to-day."

The prince smelt of his apple, and, as they entered the garden, said:

"It is very beautiful here, and, in order that we may walk near each other in peace, and not be disturbed by the desire to try our game, we beg you, my lady, that for this one hour you will take upon you the custom of my court, and let your hands also be fastened. Then we will be safe from each other's art, and there will be nothing to annoy us."

So they went on alone together, with their hands fastened in their girdles. The birds sang, the sun shone warmly, and from the trees the red cherries hung so low that they brushed their cheeks as they passed.

The princess saw them, and exclaimed: "What a pity!" "Necessity knows no law," said the prince, and he broke one of the cherries with his teeth from a branch and offered it to the princess from his mouth.

The princess could not do otherwise than receive it from his mouth, and her face was brought close to his. So, when she had the cherry between her lips, and a kiss from him besides, she was not able to say that instant, "I remember."

Then he cried, joyfully, "Good morning, much-beloved one!" and drew his hands from his girdle and embraced her.

And they spent the rest of their lives together in perfect peace and quietness.

The Rainy Day.

The day is cold, and dark, and dreary;
It rains, and the wind is never weary;
The vine still clings to the mouldering wall,
But at every gust the dead leaves fall,
And the day is dark and dreary.

My life is cold, and dark, and dreary;
It rains, and the wind is never weary;
My thoughts still cling to the mouldering past,
But the hopes of youth fall thick in the blast,
And the days are dark and dreary.

Be still, sad heart, and cease repining;
Behind the clouds is the sun still shining;
Thy fate is the common fate of all—
Into each life some rain must fall,
Some days are dark and dreary.

The Portrait.

Midnight past! Not a trace of sound
Through the silent house but the wind at his prayers,
I sat by the dying fire, and thought
Of the dear dead woman up-stairs.

A night of tears, for the gusty rain
Had ceased, but the eaves were dripping yet;
And the moon looked forth as though in pain,
With her face all white and wet.

Nobody with me my watch to keep
But the friend of my bosom, the man I love;
And grief had sent him fast to sleep
In the chamber up above.

Nobody else, in the country place
All round, that knew of my loss beside,
But the good young priest with the Raphael face,
Who confessed her when she died.

That good young priest is of gentle nerve,
And my grief had moved him beyond control,
For his lips grew white, as I could observe,
When he speeded her parting soul.

I sat by the dreary hearth alone;
I thought of the pleasant days of yore;
I said, "The staff of my life is gone,
The woman I loved is no more."

"On her cold, dead bosom my portrait lies,
Which next to her heart she used to wear—
Haunting it o'er with her tender eyes
When my own face was not there."

"It is set all around with rubies-red,
And pearls which a Peri might have kept;
For each ruby there my heart hath bled,
For each pearl my eyes have wept."

And I said, "The thing is precious to me;
They will bury her soon in the church-yard clay;
It lies on her heart, and lost must be
If I do not take it away."

I lighted my lamp at the dying flame,
And crept up the stairs that creaked for fright,
Till into the chamber of death I came,
Where she lay all in white.

The moon shone over her winding-sheet;
There stark she lay on her carved bed;
Seven burning tapers about her feet,
And seven about her head.

As I stretched my hand I held my breath;
I turned as I drew the curtains apart;
I dared not look on the face of death:
I knew where to find her heart.

I thought at first as my touch fell there
It had warmed that heart to life, with love;
For the thing I touched was warm, I swear,
And I could feel it move.

'Twas the hand of a man that was moving slow
O'er the heart of the dead—from the other side—
And at once the sweat broke over my brow,
"Who is robbing the corpse?" I cried.

Opposite me, by the tapers' light,
The friend of my bosom, the man I loved,
Stood over the corpse and all as white,
And neither of us moved.

"What do you here, my friend?" The man
Looked first at me and then at the dead.
"There is a portrait here," he began—
"There is. It is mine," I said.

Said the friend of my bosom, "Yours no doubt
The portrait was till a month ago,
When this suffering angel took that out,
And placed mine there, I know."

"This woman, she loved me well," said I.
"A month ago," said my friend to me.
"And in your throat," I groaned, "you lie!"
He answered, "Let us see."

"Enough!" I said, "let the dead decide;
And whosoever the portrait prove,
His shall it be, when the cause is tried—
Where death is arraigned by love."

We found the portrait there, in its place,
We opened it by the tapers' shine,
The gems were all unchanged; the face
Was—neither his nor mine.

"One nail drives out another at last!
The face of the portrait there," I cried,
"Is our friend's the Raphael-faced young priest,
Who confessed her when she died."

The setting is all of rubies red,
And pearls which a Peri might have kept;
For each ruby there my heart hath bled,
For each pearl my eyes have wept.

THE CARPET AND THE STAIR-ROD.

"And now how do you feel?" said the Carpet to the Stair-rod, one morning after a large ball.

"I am completely overcome," answered that luminary. "When I think over last night, with its crush and crash, its costly dresses and its dress coats, its supper and sorrows, I am lost in shame to think of all the sin and waste that passed."

"Oh!" said the Carpet, "that was nothing; when I was at Mrs. Alfred's—my first owner, who failed recently—we used to have twice as expensive entertainments as that last night—larger crowd, bigger supper, more music—everything on a grander scale. You soon get used to it."

"Oh, yes," said the Stair-rod; "get used to it; so we may to anything—in time; but what can clean from our souls the memory of riotous hours spent in drinking and ribald laughter? What Jordan can wash us clean? What Lethe bring forgetfulness of vicious hours?"

"By Jove! you're getting poetical," cried the Carpet, laughing; "what have hours-or vice to do with a ball given by Mrs. Oliphant?"

"Just this," answered the Stair-rod: "Last night, as, flushed by wine and excitement, four young men passed over me, I heard them making arrangements to meet at the club, and places still worse, when the ball was over."

"Well, they would go there anyhow," said the Carpet.

"No! from what I gathered, two were innocent of anything of the kind, but, half intoxicated, they consented, on the solicitations of their seniors in vice."

"We can not stop it?" said the Stair-rod.

"It seems not," said the Carpet.

"But what a crash there was here," said the Stair-rod; "how beautiful the ladies looked in their brilliant ball-dresses, and how like waiters the men. There were the Misses Shortledge. Did you notice the richness of the lace about them? I heard a lady say that their father was financially embarrassed. It will be hard for the poor girls if they have to go to work, after having been brought up to a life of luxury."

"So it will," replied the Carpet. "Did you notice how thin Mr. Gimson is getting?—how the lines show on his face? I am afraid he is dissipating a great deal. He staggered last night as he came through the hall, on leaving."

"You know," said the Stair-rod, "how particular our mistress is about temperance matters?—what an enthusiast in regard to her sons refraining from drink? Well, the other day, when the pastor called, she stopped him near me, and entered into a discussion with him as to the merits and demerits of alcoholic stimulants. When Francis Murphy was here she went to hear him regularly every week, yet notwithstanding her advocacy of temperance, and because last night was the marriage of her daughter, she gave free license in regard to wine and intoxicating liquors, and the consequence was she had a grand debauch in her own house. Five or six of her guests were as drunk as lords last night. Where is the use of blaming men for getting drunk, when ladies who profess to be strict temperance advocates allow such things beneath their own roofs?"

"Yes," said the Carpet, "there were some pretty drunken ones here last night. You know the pretty Mrs. Barto, who has been married only six months? Well, last night, Mr. Brownwell succeeded in getting quite under the influence of liquor, and then by some means brought her out here. He was just drunk enough to make a perfect fool of himself. After spooning in a drunken way for some time, he at last said: 'Of course I love (hic) you (hic). I love you like anything (hic), my love. Wh-why didn't we mee' fore—we—I mean 'fore you marri', eh (hic), my love?' Some one heard it, and it was soon all around among the men. It will be the talk of the town, I expect."

"Well," said the Stair-rod, "one bad spill of ice cream occurred near me. That clumsy Mr. Heart was handing Miss Juvin an ice, when some one knocked against him, and it was spilt on her ball-dress. Of course she said it was of no consequence; but I heard her say to her sister afterward, in an almost heart-broken voice, that it ruined the only decent ball-dress she had, and she would not be able to get another this season. So it was all the evening—some jealousy or angry feeling everywhere."

"It seems to me," said the Carpet, "that you are looking at things in a rather gloomy light."

"Ah!" answered the Stair-rod, "we are teaching a moral."

—Jean Pierre.

A young lady went to a drug store, recently, and had a prescription made up.

"How much?" inquired the lady.

"Fifty cents," said the clerk.

"But I have only forty-five cents with me," replied the customer; "can't you let me have it for that?"

"No, ma'am," said the clerk, "but you can pay me the five cents when you come in again."

"But suppose I were to die?" said the lady, jocularly.

"Well, it wouldn't be a very great loss," was the smiling response.

And immediately the innocent clerk gathered from the indignant flash on the lady's face that he had been misunderstood; and, before he could assure her that it was the little balance and not her that would be no great loss, she had bounced out at a go-as-you-please gait, and was beyond the sound of his voice.

Some one writing from Rome says of the Italian trous-seaux: "They excel in beauty of embroidery anything of the kind to be seen in Paris. I have seen chemisettes which it took four years to embroider." The same writer observes that the betrothed in Italy are never left alone for one moment. They must not even sit side by side in company, and a third person must always take part in their conversation. When out for a walk, they must not go arm in arm. As for a kiss, not even the tips of the nails may be touched until after the Church and State have firmly bound together the poor lovers. This severity is no compliment to Italy. On the contrary, it is mistrust carried to excess, and the young people rebel against it. Still, when they become fathers and mothers they perpetuate the custom. It may be that this extreme reserve before marriage engenders that after-marriage liberty which, in its turn, becomes a matter of wonder to more prosaic nations.

. Dal Segno.

"Have you seen Bandmann as 'Narcisse'?" "Have you seen Freeman as 'Dom Januario'?" Yes, to be sure. It is one's duty to keep up with the dramatic times; to have seen Fechter as "Hamlet" or "Ruy Blas," Ristori as "Elizabeth" or "Judith," Janauschek as "Lady Dedlock" or "Medea," Modjeska as "Adrienne" or "Ophelia," Von Stammwitz, or Cotelley, or any of the others in anything you like.

How fast the little swells! What a liking they have taken to our strong, sonorous English, these foreigners of the stage. I had almost said Germans, for do you not observe that they are almost all of them from "Vaterland"? True, Ristori's native tongue is "the soft, bastard Latin," and Modjeska has abandoned the thick and guttural Polish. But for the rest, they are all Germans, widely speaking. Not a Frenchman among them, for your true Frenchman is more conservative than the sturdiest John Bull that ever obstinately planted his British legs to sustain one of the old customs. I wonder even that the people of the Comédie Française ever consented to cross the awful Channel and play to the foggy, benighted English. But "The jingling of the guinea helps the hurt that honor feels," and we have fallen upon times when it is necessary to get a great many guineas together to make anything like a respectable jingle.

Talk of the luxury of the times of Louis Quinze! The very name of Pompadour is suggestive of everything that is rich and luxurious—pink and blue and gold, high-heeled and powdered; in short, of everything that is elegantly impracticable. No one revels in splendor like these queens of the gutter come to power, for they are living out their dreams. Dreaming, you know, is like kissing—

"If it wasna plenty,
Puir folk wadna get it."

And while they are about it they may as well dream a big one. It is the only staple that is cheap. We have all heard calico-clad ragamuffins speak, with shining, dilated eyes, of the gorgeousness of royal purple velvet, and diamond buttons, and rich, creamy white satin; and who knows that the little beggar may not realize her dream one day? The little Jeannette sitting upon her father's threshold, with a pleasing background of calves' liver, beef suet, saddles of lamb, and sides of beef, may have imagined all the wondrous richness which came to her as "La Pompadour." Of its attendant infamy her innocent soul could then know nothing; for, alas! we all realize our dreams some time, somehow, but they never come out just right. The occasion, or the manner, or the time of the fulfillment is sure to be wrong. There is always a "15" hlock in the puzzle that will not fit into the right place.

Do you not think that the Marquise de Pompadour herself would open her great eyes at the toilets of today? When the red curtain swung aside, the other night at Baldwin's, to reveal a brilliant court scene, I thought how luxurious has the stage become when nothing will satisfy but such rich settings. And yet something of the sheen was gone from the gold; something of the glitter from the stage; much, indeed, of the prettiness from the Pompadour combination—a daring combination in those days, too—of pink and blue; for the tide of taste has set toward oriental luxury, and I was fresh from the sight of a glittering array of fashionable women in full calling paraphernalia. What stuffs, and patterns, and styles! An Indian "begum" herself surely never flashed before her bowing attendants with a greater wealth of silver and gold threads, and palm leaves, and oriental scrolls. The reproaches of Du Barri and the general animadversions upon the extravagance of Pompadour had a half-ironical sound.

As for "Narcisse" himself—ab, "Narcisse," to return to the foreigners. They are all welcome to the stage ranks, for they bring not only a better training, but there is always a bizarrie about them which makes them attractive to the commonplace, self-contained mortal of Anglo-Saxon lineage. It is a trite saying that all their passions and emotions are nearer the surface than ours. They burn in sheets of flame rather than smoulder in living coils. As their expression does not come from the inner depths of a nature, it has not far to go. It is always there, ready at any moment to fling off any accumulation of any amount of sentiment of any kind—joy, hope, despair, love, hate, grief, or mirth—with an abandon as impossible to imitate as it would be absurd to cultivate. Can you imagine an Englishman or American playing "Narcisse" like Bandmann, or "Dom Januario" like Max Freeman? In two vastly different ways they would be taken for a pair of howling lunatics, and promptly put out of harm's way.

Bandmann is almost a great actor. He has a commanding presence, which is much, and one with a good grace to the fact that his fine physique harmonizes not well with the rags and precarious dining facilities of the vagabond "Narcisse." A lean and hungry vagabond is not interesting, and if the court favorite and pretty "Dorine Quinault" are to go about fainting at sight of him, and falling absurdly deep in love with him, it is just as well he should be presentable looking. Judged by all the canons of modern art, Mr. Bandmann over-acts. He is stormy, impetuous, and has a high-pitched style of declamation. It is something to which we are quite unused since they have made us acquainted with the realistic, in which a man bites his lips, utters two or three cold, cutting sentences in a voice of unnatural calm, and quietly leaves you to guess the rest. This is very high art, and it is very natural, and all that sort of thing, but perhaps it is just as well to come in contact with one of these whirlwind natures now and then. They lift you off your feet, and stir your blood. There are so many things we all want to do that we do not dare to do, and when we find some one who does do that which our own shamefacedness prevents our doing, we all take a silent inward satisfaction. That is the trouble. Our satisfactions are all too inward. These foreign actors, whom we admire and wonder at a little, bring it all out.

Bandmann flashes from one mood into another with a suddenness which startles you, and he understands the moods, for his hate is vivid, his love tender, and his scorn for the powerful Pompadour something almost majestic. True, he has an equal scorn for all the rules of punctuation, and will not even commit himself to a rhetorical pause. But what is a comma or a period here and there, in a hurst of passion-freighted words? He calls up memories of Fechter repeatedly, though it is impossible to place a likeness; but Bandmann, though he is not so thorough an artist, is an actor who will be more pleasing to the multitude. Indeed, this is but mild criticism of his art, for Fechter, peculiar and disagreeable as he was, was the master of it.

Bandmann's is just a trifle too evident, for he never so loses himself but that he can give a stage direction. It appeared almost unnecessary, too, for the pretty play was so beautifully mounted, and apparently so thoroughly rehearsed, that it moved as smoothly as on a fifth night. As for Bandmann, he stirred a cold and sluggish audience to call him repeatedly before the curtain. This is something of a conquest in these times, when theatre-goers wear such a blasé expression that it makes one tired to look at them.

But then Bandmann speaks good English, and that seems to be the main idea when people go to see a foreign actor. True, he still struggles with the unconquerable "z" sound of "s"; but in the main it is pure and fluent, until he gets into one of his tempests. Then how the "r's" roll and the "s's" splutter and the vowels grow long! But I like it—do not you? What English-speaking actor could rattle off "Sacramento," "San Francisco," etc., quite as Max Freeman does it in the Royal Middy? In point of fact, I can hardly imagine an English actor giving full force to "Dom Januario" at all. Did you ever see anything quite so—well, so Brazilian? We do not find that sort of people this side of the Tropic of Cancer. Freeman overacts it, do you say? Of course he does, most absurdly; and yet what nonsense it would be to play to the life. As for the Royal Middy, when people ask you how you like it, picture it to yourself without Max Freeman and Emelie Melville. Put whom you like in their places, and I fancy the Royal Middy would not run six weeks in San Francisco. True, it has been a success in New York; but Catherine Lewis is the only woman ever born outside of France who understood the genius of opera bouffe, and she has made a bouffe part of "Fanchette."

The Royal Middy is in its sixth week, and it is a musical extravaganza, yet no one has been known to pick up any of its music. Indeed, last week, when the Argonaut published one of its gems, people who had seen the Middy repeatedly went about asking each other what part of the opera it came in. As a bit of pageantry, the Royal Middy is something fine. What with its court dresses, its odd game of chess—though the average duration of human life does not warrant a game of chess as stage entertainment—and its waving silken banners (with the duties on silks sixty per cent. too) it was a sight to fill the eye.

That's a nice-looking lot of middies, too, though a Brazilian middy seems rather quiet. But the life and the fun and the melody (save the mark, "Dom Januario") all lie with Max Freeman and Miss Emelie Melville. Ah! I had forgotten "Mungo." No one ever saw this actor take a part that he did not try to do something with it, but who ever saw him make a bit before? Really I believe it would have detracted something from "Dom Januario" had he been left without such a "Mungo."

People tell you that the Royal Middy grows on you with frequent seeing, and so many have tried the experiment that it must be true. It has rather a nice little plot, too, of the orthodox opera kind, and these German writers like to give their heroines "breaches parter." We do not often see Emelie Melville in such parts, but the abundance of material in a Portuguese middy's uniform is not only eminently becoming, but eminently decorous. Hence possibly the exception. Emelie Melville is singularly pleasing on the stage, and as "Fanchette" has a trifle more spice than the willful "Josephine" she is by just that much a more delightful young woman on the stage.

And we are to have the Pirates of Penzance next week. Truly we are not far behind the age. And we shall all go to see it, and ask each other "do you like it as well as Pinafore?" till that, too, will become a question which will involve the same direful consequences as a quotation from Pinafore. Heaven forbid that the Pirates become too popular, for with Mr. Gilbert's peculiar facility for dropping on conversational weaknesses, he will have found a new set of phrases for the Pirates which we must not quote. It is rather hard, is it not, that our ordinary talk should become slang simply from frequent quoting from a libretto, and that our conversation should thus be headed off by guide-posts of warning. This is the beginning of the end, as Wilkie Collins would say. If Gilbert continues to write librettos he will consume the entire vocabulary, and a nation will perforce be stricken dumb. BETSY B.

Chicago Fashion and Theatrical Gossip.

Knowing the many friends Chicago has among the readers of the ARGONAUT, the temptation to send a letter is too vigorous to be overcome. Shopping has reached its highest pinnacle. "Opening day" brought hundreds of people from the country and small towns to both see and purchase the beautiful goods so artistically arranged in the different stores. Field & Leightner, and Gossage, the principal retail dry goods houses here, are filled with costly and elegant goods, both made and unmade. I was shown some exquisite dresses—a bridal trousseau—at Field & Leightner's; one for evening, made in light blue and flesh tints, with a white lace scarf round the hips with chenille and silk embroidery; the waist the Peronese Cuirass, so fashionable now. There were lovely morning dresses in soft tints and white, with a bewilderment of fine lace and bows of ribbon. A visit to some of the leading millinery stores soon satisfied me that Chicago held the front rank in this line. Balenburger has the finest assortment of flowers and feathers to be found in any city, and his bonnets are simply marvels of art and loveliness. Purple and yellow flowers are in great demand this spring—marigolds, sunflowers, and roses; but, as usual, there is a preference for soft crushed roses without foliage. Lace is much used, both in black and white, for trimming of bonnets, and a Spanish lace scarf long enough to tie under the chin is all the ornament to be found upon some of the most stylish hats. Parasols are rather large, and in the most fanciful cashmere colors and designs, and have borderings of lace, both black and white, with flowers in all colors on the lower part of the lace. I can not say I admire them. Most too loud for my taste.

Theatricals are flourishing mightily, and all the houses have been doing good business for the past few weeks. At Haverly's, this week, we have The Tourist in a Pullman Palace Car—an altogether absurd and jolly performance. The play makes no pretensions to a plot. It is simply a succession of funny incidents, repartee, songs, and dances, together with new and original "catches," which keep the audience in roars of laughter. Among the tourists are Mestayer and Long, of the California, and it seems quite like old times to be listening to Mestayer's awfully awful slang, as well as Long's personation of the "Frenchman."

At McVicker's, they are having Fun on the Bristol. The entertainment embraces a little of everything, from the inspiring strains of "Flewey-Flewey," (by Billy Courtwright, of course), and "The Babies in our Block," to selections from operas. There are eleven people in the company, and during a portion of the performance these people personate some forty characters, all clever in their way.

At Hooley's, Kate Claxton is doing the new and startling play of The Two Orphans. The Palmer House is fire-proof, and Kate is stopping at the Tremont, so myself and baggage are safe for the time. I dare not trust myself to write of the weather we have had for the past month. It tires me to think of the many times it has rained, and the thunder and lightning and wind-storms we have had. More of this, perhaps, when the sun shines. M.

The Princess Metternich is a clever actress. The Sunday night that the news of the Crown Prince's betrothal came to Vienna, she was just about to go on the stage erected in her own palace for private theatricals, to sing a ballad adapted to her part, and ending with the refrain: "To that we'll all say burrah." On she went, according to Octavia Hensel, but not a word of the original song did she sing. With her charming talent for improvisation she made up some pretty verses announcing the engagement of Prince Rudolf to the lovely young Princess Stephanie of Belgium; and when the refrain came more than one voice joined in the "burrah!"

"Died in Europe; "died in Denver;" and so on is the news received by friends at home daily, when in most cases an early use of Hop Bitters would have saved the occasion for such sad news.

Mrs. Pearson, late President of Woman's Christian Temperance Union, has opened a temperance restaurant at 63 1/2 Clay Street, where she will be pleased to see her friends and all those wishing a good lunch for five cents. A large variety of articles not found at other temperance restaurants will be supplied to patrons at above prices. Business men will find no place more convenient or pleasant. Ladies out shopping will be cordially received. Be sure to call.

From hundreds of reported cases where patients have increased in weight from five to forty pounds while using Fellows' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites, no doubts remain of its powerful action on the organs of nutrition.

FOUR ENGLISH WEDDINGS.

At the marriage of Miss Beatrice Quain, daughter of the well-known Dr. Quain, to Mr. George Rose (says London Truth) the eight bridesmaids were all dressed alike, in white Indian muslin, trimmed with lace, and sashes of yellow silk tied behind, and had large bunches of real daffodils on the one side of the bodice and in the bats, which were of the same material as the dresses, and each carried a very large bouquet of the same flowers. The bride's dress was white satin, with a long, square train, and had no trimming but a large bunch of orange-blossoms on the front of the skirt and another on the side of the bodice. The plain tulle veil, which fell to the ground on all sides, was fastened with diamond pins, which form part of the set given by her mother. At the marriage of Miss Helen Houldsworth, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Houldsworth, of Coltness, with Sir Robert Lighton, Bart., of Brockhampton, Herefordshire, St. Mary Abbot's, Kensington, was most profusely and beautifully decorated with white flowers, all of which was sent up from Coltness. The bride's dress was of white duchesse satin, trimmed with old lace. Her veil was of tulle, fastened on with diamond stars. The orange-blossoms which formed her wreath were very tastefully arranged among the diamonds. The eight bridesmaids wore pink silk broché dresses, the skirts being trimmed with soft muslin and lace of a creamy tint, and their hats were of cream lace with pink azaleas. They carried beautiful bouquets of white and pink flowers, and as has been frequently the case lately, real flowers were given to the guests instead of the artificial acorns and orange-blossoms of which the wedding favors have so long consisted. On the occasion of this pretty, flower-decked wedding, the flowers were all white—lilies of the valley, gardenias, and camellias. On the same day, at St. Paul's Church, Knightsbridge, Miss Evelyn Hay, eldest daughter of Colonel the Hon. Charles and Mrs. Hay, was married to Sir Robert Drummond Moncreiffe, Bart. (Scots Guards). The bride wore ivory duchesse satin, with veil and flounces of Brussels lace, the former being fastened on with diamond stars, the gift of the Earl of Dudley, the bridegroom's brother-in-law. Four of the bridesmaids were grown-up, and four were children, among them Lady Edith Ward, who has inherited much of her mother's loveliness. The dresses were pale blue silk and cashmere, with Louis Treize jackets or broché, in which gray was the predominant color. The elder bridesmaids wore blue velvet toques, the children blue Rubens hats with feathers. Each carried a bunch of lilies of the valley and mignonette. The Countess of Dudley wore an exquisite dress of silver-gray satin, with small, close bonnet of the same, and a cape of silvery network with deep, hanging fringe, and tied on with a large knot of white satin ribbon. The Marchioness of Abergavenny wore dark olive velvet. The bride's mother wore pale mauve satin with heliotrope velvet and Brussels lace. At the marriage of Miss Hugban to Major Houghton, late of the Ninety-sixth Regiment, at St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, the bride, whose mother was a daughter of the late Duke of St. Albans, and whose elder sisters are Lady John Manners and Lady Brydges Henniker, wore a dress of cream-colored satin richly trimmed with Brussels lace. The six bridesmaids were all children and were very prettily dressed in Pompadour style, with mob-caps and muslin fichus. The skirts of the dresses were sky-blue and the paniers flowered cream-colored sateen. They each carried a basket of spring flowers. The bride was given away by her brother-in-law, Lord John Manners. Lady John Manners wore a dress of a deep rich shade of violet silk-trimmed with Brussels lace. Among the prettiest of the dresses was that of Lady Riddell, dark-blue velvet with cream-colored satin gathered down the front, with fine lace fastened on with gold braid; and that of Mrs. Graham Hutchinson, of ruby velvet with sleeves puffed on the shoulders. Cascades of old lace were arranged on the shoulders. The hat was also of ruby velvet.

Notice had been posted in all the public places (says a Spanish paper) that on a certain day the bull called "El Moro" would be introduced into the arena, and that, when he should have been goaded to the utmost fury, a young girl would appear and reduce the animal to quiet subjection. The people of Cadiz had heard of El Moro as the most magnificent bull ever brought to the city; and it soon became known that the girl thus advertised was a peasant girl of Espara, who had petted the bull and fed and cared for it during the years of its growth. On the appointed day the vast amphitheatre was filled with an anxious, eager crowd. The bulls had been killed and dragged away, and then the flourish of trumpets announced the coming of the hero of the day. With a deep, terrific roar, El Moro entered upon the scene. He was truly magnificent—a bovine monarch; black and glossy, with eyes of fire, dilating nostrils, and wicked-looking horns.

The picadores attacked him warily; hurled their banderillos (small, dart-like javelins, ornamented with ribbons, and intended to goad and infuriate). The bull had killed three horses off-hand, and had received eight banderillos in his neck and shoulders, when, upon a given signal, the picadores and matadores suddenly withdrew, leaving the infuriated beast alone in his wild paroxysms of wrath. Presently a soft musical note, like the piping of a lark, was heard, and directly afterward a girl, not more than fifteen years of age, with the tasteful garb of an Andalusian peasant, and with a pretty face, sprang lightly into the arena, approaching the bull fearlessly, at the same time calling out his name: "Moro! Moro! Ya voy!" At the first sound of the sweet voice the animal ceased his fury and turned toward the place whence it came; and when she saw the girl he plainly manifested pleasure. She came to his head and put forth her hand, which he licked with his tongue. Then she sang a low sweet song, at the same time caressing the animal on the forehead; and while she sang, the suffering monarch knelt at her feet. Then she stooped and gently removed the cruel banderillos; after which, with her arms around El Moro's neck, she led him toward the gate of the toril.

They say Agnes Herndon's kiss isn't to be compared with Emma Abbott's kiss. It isn't the genuine ring about it. It lacks the divine afflatus. Abbott's kiss reminds one of the gurgle of maple sap out of the nozzle of a five-gallon demijohn. Herndon's kiss sounds like the explosion of a paper peanut bag.

A man met the actor Garrick, whom he called "my dear fellow." "But I do not know you, my dear sir," said Garrick. "Nevertheless, we have played in the same piece together." "I do not remember. What part did you play?" "Not remember! Why I played the cock in Hamlet."

A POET OF PHANTASY.

The presence in this city of the distinguished German poet, Frederick Von Bodenstedt, is an event in the literary growth of San Francisco. Although Mr. Bodenstedt's verse has been written chiefly in German—and his poetry and lectures are therefore of more immediate interest to his fellow-countrymen—yet he has been for so long a time a considerable figure in the world of letters, that we have a right, as Americans, to welcome him, as a poet. Many readers of the Argonaut will remember that Mr. Bodenstedt made the first complete German translation of Shakespeare's Sonnets. We reproduce the following bits of his verse, translated by a Mr. d'Esterre, of New York:

Sayings in Rhyme.

Who would of all admired be,
Will find she pleases none;
Who would of all desired be,
Will ne'er be sought by one.

When with metaphors sweet our poets' strains
Are so very redundant,
We must be pardoned who say that their brains
Are not superabundant.

Who ne'er o'er caution's narrow bounds did rise,
And, even when his youth is passed away,
Knows nothing he would fain undo, unsay,
He ne'er was foolish—neither ever wise.

As the harvests of the year but thrive
When changing sun and rain they've had,
So human beings here but thrive
When changing loss and gain they've had.

Woman's will bears contradiction—
If a man ye lie and ware—
But she will not take conviction,
Logic women can not hear;
For them only three conclusions:
Kisses, tears, and love-effusions.

Thine own heart study thou, and then
Thou'lt understand thy fellow-men;
But if thou wouldst thine own self see,
Thou must remove thyself from thee.

Who by himself himself would judge,
Let him remember this:
He doth as little know himself,
As he himself can kiss.

Love Songs.

Not with the angels in azure skies,
Not with the roses on earth that rise,
Nay, not with the light of suns o'erhead
Compare I Zuleikha, mine own sweet maid.
For the hosoms of angels are void of love,
And roses but rear their thorns above,
Whilst the sun at night succumbs to shade;
Not one of them equals mine own sweet maid.
Far as the universe doth lie,
Naught like Zuleikha meets mine eye—
Fair, thornless, surrounded by love's sweet breath,
Only herself she likeneth.

Down in the vast, deep ocean
The sun his beams doth throw,
Till every wavelet trembles
Beneath their ruddy glow.
How likeliest thou those sunbeams
Upon my song's wild sea!
They glitter all and tremble,
Reflecting only thee!

A life devoid of love is like a spring
Buried in sand, of life bereft and motion,
For that it, wandering, never found the ocean
Wherein all founts their waters seek to fling.

SYDNEY, March 24, 1880.

MARK SHELDON, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—
Dear Sir: Your letter of February 10 came duly to hand. I was glad to hear that your business in San Francisco was so much improved. I think you should consider that I have been reasonably successful, considering the surrounding circumstances. I have been here nine months and sold over 1,500 Davis machines since I landed, and have obtained the first prize and only first, and have a retail trade started here in Sydney of over 100 machines per month. The country is not the richest, and has a small population, and the competition in sewing machines is very sharp.

The "Davis" gets 1st prize.
The "Singer" gets 2d prize.
The "Wanzer" gets 3d prize.
The "Wheeler & Wilson" No. 8 gets 4th prize.

There are about twenty other kinds from Germany and Great Britain that the judges did not consider worthy of mention. The Singer sent out their crack operator from London, who had been with them there and in New York for years. The Wheeler & Wilson sent their best, who has been with them fifteen years. Last week I secured a customer for New Zealand, and sold him 175 machines in first order, and have the cash in bank now for them. The fair closes April 20, and then I leave here for Switzerland and Russia. Yours truly, F. J. NEWTON, Traveling for the Davis Sewing Machine Company.

ANOTHER RAMBLE IN SLANG LAND.

In Butler's "Hudibras" may be found "wrong sow by the ear," "two strings to his bow," "smell a rat," "main chance," "moon is made of green cheese," "he knew what's what," "gray mare will prove the better horse," "devil take the hindmost." "By hook or crook" is from Beaumont and Fletcher; "golden mean," Horace; "facts are stubborn things," Smollett; "enough is as good as a feast," Bickerstaff; "every tub must stand on its own bottom," Bunyan; "let the world slide," Shakespeare; "bail, fellow, well met!" Tom Brown; "love me little, love me long," Marlowe; "watered stock," Daniel Drew; "more the merrier," Beaumont and Fletcher; "no love lost between us," Goldsmith; "through thick and thin," Spenser; "tell the truth and shame the devil," Shakespeare; "but me no buts," Fielding; "my two papers, both daily," Forney; "turn over a new leaf," Middleton; "in the twinkling of an eye," New Testament; "absent in body, but present in spirit," same; "lay dead in his harness," Old Testament; "hope deferred maketh the heart sick," same; "there is death in the pot," same; "man of blood" (meaning David), same; "Fight it out on this line if it takes all summer," General Grant; "let us have peace," same; "I'll be your Moses," Andy Johnson; "the man at the other end of the avenue" (meaning President Johnson), Thad. Stevens; "Cadmean victory," Herod; "He's a lame duck" (alluding to Colonel Forney), Andy Johnson; "head-quarters in the saddle," General Pope; "leave no stone unturned," Euripides; "Shoo fly!" (to Cox), Ben Butler; "where the shoe pinches," Plutarch; "let no guilty man escape," Grant; "the sinews of war," Æschines; "die in the last ditch," William, Prince of Orange (a saying used a great deal by prominent Confederates during the late war, and especially by those whose valor was in words, not deeds); "the eye of Delaware is upon you," Senator Saulsbury; "let the Union slide," N. P. Banks; "let our erring sisters (the seceding States) depart in peace," Greeley; "put your trust in God, my boys, and keep your powder dry," Oliver Cromwell; "the guard dies, but never surrenders," Cambronne; "nest-biding," Beecher; "on the ragged edge," same; "gone where the woodbine twineth," Jim Fisk; "forty, winks," Christopher North; "a bemusing himself with beer," G. A. Sala's "Gaslight and Daylight"; "the almighty dollar," Washington Irving; "if any man attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot" (or words to that effect), General John A. Dix; "We'll send them (the enemy) to hell across lots," Brigham Young.

"Everything is lovely and the goose hangs high" is a Philadelphia expression, and came out during the war. "How we apples swim," and you "can't make a whistle out of a pig's tail" are "as old as the hills." Two of our daily papers, in their editorials on Friday last, made use of the term "true inwardness." In London and New York a bank president is known as "old money-bags"; the nabobs of the Massachusetts capital are recognized as "the solid men of Boston." Thirty-five years ago the restaurants of New York advertised oyster-stews on "the Canal-Street plan." The insufferable "hass" of a life-insurance solicitor is eclipsed by the "monumental cheek" of the lightning-rod agent. "Awfully good" luck is sometimes slanged "nigger luck," and "4-11-44" is the "washwoman's gig," or lucky combination in "policy-playing." "Getting skunked" is fully understood by all whist-players, as are the terms "blind" and "straddle," in that most fascinating of all games (especially if one "holds good hands" and is frequently "seen"), draw poker. "Grass widow" is derived from "grace widow," or a widow by grace of the law. "Bellman's New Dictionary of London Slang" says: "Grass widow—an unmarried mother, or a deserted mistress. In the United States during the years 1849-50 the term was applied to those wives in the States whose husbands went to California."

Our "late unpleasantness" was the source of a large number of smart, cant, and slang expressions, many of which are too good to be lost. Mr. Lincoln characterized the first shot fired upon Fort Sumpter as the "opening of the ball"; Ben Butler designated the slaves that came within the Federal lines, or who were captured, as "contraband of war"; during the first year of the Rebellion, the newspaper correspondents obtained a good deal of information from either the "reliable gentleman" or the "intelligent contraband"; the darkey was often alluded to as an "unbleached American"; after the Emancipation Proclamation our sable brother was spoken of as an "American citizen of African descent"; exciting news of battles not fought and victories not won was received by "grapevine telegraph"; the New York Tribune for nearly a year had an article every few days entitled "on to Richmond"; "we'll hang Jeff Davis on a sour apple-tree," and "John Brown's body lies mouldering in the grave" were chanted nightly round many a Union camp-fire for four long years. "All quiet on the Potomac" met the dissatisfied eye day after day until the national heart grew sad. What a magnificent panorama that struggle was to be sure—the "stars and stripes" on the one side, and the "bonnie blue flag" on the other; the "blue and the gray" raining shot and shell upon each other, until "the bottom fell out of the Southern Confederacy." What grand characters there were in that "irrepressible conflict" on both sides!—"old Pap Thomas," who never lost a battle, and who opened the record of Western victories at Mill Spring, in the fall of '61, and annihilated the intrepid Hood at Nashville three years afterward; "Unconditional Surrender Grant" and his incomparable achievements; "Phil Sheridan's Ride" and "Crazy Sherman" "Marching through Georgia"; "Old Rosey" distinguishing himself at Corinth, Iuka, and Stone River, and "Fighting Joe Hooker" pounding away before Richmond. Lee and his gallant battalions "holding the gates of the rebel capital," and that long, lean, old Union hag, "Barbara Freitchie," flaunting the star-spangled banner in the very teeth of one of the most illustrious soldiers of modern times, "Stonewall Jackson." How the "Johnny Rebs" "skedaddled" upon some occasions, and how they succeeded in "gobbling" vast stores of our "hard tack" and "commisary whisky," and in "bagging" whole brigades of "Yankees"; and how their "guerrillas" "raided" upon our "lines of transportation," and how we fed the "Union refugees," and got swindled by "bounty jumpers," and laughed at by "copperheads," who were afterward taken "out of the home guards."

Any and many a time the "butternuts" came down upon "Lincoln hirelings" with a "rebel yell" to the music of "Dixie"; but the "Northern mudsills" "pitched in red hot," and "the colored troops fought nobly." Who will forget the exploits of Orpheus C. Kerr's "Mackerelville brigade"? or Petroleum V. Nasby's felicitous descriptions of Little Mac's "masterly inactivity"? or that matchless display of patriotism of Artemus Ward, who was perfectly "willing to sacrifice all his wife's relations"? And although we now "shake hands across the bloody chasm," it is difficult to forget the "dead line" at Andersonville, or the "tobacco warehouse" at Richmond. And we smile, occasionally, as we think of "Big Bethel Butler" and his "Dutch Gap canal," Bob Toombs's "Bunker Hill slave roll-call," the remnant of the expiring Confederacy "in petticoats," Isham G. Harris "escaping from Nashville astride a bucking donkey," and "Bull Run Russell" in a lively go-as-you-please scamper from Manassas to Washington. While all of this was going on, Oakes Ames was cunningly placing his "Credit Mobilier" stock "where it would do the most good," "shoddy contractors" became rich, and their wives, or their "brevet wives," "did Yurup," "quartermasters" "feathered their nests," and "pa struck ile" in Pennsylvania. In those days, "When the cruel war is over," and "Who will care for mother now?" were favorite songs.

The war closed, Lincoln was assassinated, and Andrew Johnson, the "Andrew Jackson of the war" (so called by Colonel Forney at the commencement of hostilities), and as true a patriot as ever drew the breath of life, became President. Inspired by the words of Abraham Lincoln at Richmond, "with malice toward none, and with charity for all," Andrew Johnson inaugurated a policy of peace and conciliation. But the "Radicals" made war upon "my policy," and came near impeaching "His Accidency," as Andy was derisively called, and his trip to Chicago for the purpose of participating in the ceremonies attending the laying of the cornerstone of a monument to Stephen A. Douglas was termed the "swing around the circle." At this juncture the "carpet-baggers" and "scalawags" got possession of the South, and "whooped it up lively for the old flag and appropriations." Andy's term expired in 1869, and the "Sphinx" succeeded him. For eight years there was a carnival of "ku-klux-klan-ism," "illicit distilleries," and "moonshiners' raids" throughout the South, and "Tweedism" ("what are you going to do about it?"), "whisky rings," and "cadetship" and "trading-post sales" in the North. Then came the "back-pay," or "salary grab," and then the "Centennial fever" and "third term" discussion, and the talk about "Cæsarism." And, although the "bloody shirt" was manipulated with consummate skill by the "stalwarts," thanks to the "shot-gun policy" of the "solid South," there came a "Democratic tidal wave," bearing upon its crest "Hamburg Butler" and the "nineteen rebel brigadiers," with here and there an occasional skeleton from a "Bourbon graveyard" in the North.

The Americanisms which grew out of the Presidential campaign of 1876 were numerous and significant. It was Tilden, with his "barl o' money," on one side, and Rutherford B. Hayes, the "dark horse" of the Cincinnati Convention, on the other. Owing to a system of "bulldozing" in several of the Southern States "Uncle Sammy" was undoubtedly elected, but he was "counted out" by the "returning boards," and the pilgrimage of the "visiting statesmen," and the efforts of the "nephew of his uncle" (Pelton) to "steal a vote from Oregon," made no inroads in favor of the "sage of Grammercy Park." Not all the machinations and shekels of "CIPHER ALLEY" could keep the case from an "electoral tribunal," which decided in favor of Mr. Hayes by a vote of "eight to seven." There are four men who will never forget that "fraudulent" decision so long as they live—Rutherford B. Hayes, Samuel J. Tilden, Charles A. Dana, and Charles Francis Adams.

There are some Americanisms—chiefly political cant terms—that have had their day. Among these are "Hindoos," a name given to the Native American party in 1856, on account of Daniel Ullman—a candidate for the Presidency—having been charged with having been a native of Calcutta; and "Know Nothings," a name given to the same party in 1853; "Hunkers," a nickname applied to a portion of the New York Democracy some forty years ago, and intended to indicate that those to whom it was given had an appetite for a hunk of the spoils; "Abolitionists," a name given to anti-slavery men; "Fire-eaters," applied to extreme Southern proslavery men; "Doughfaces," applied to Northern men of extreme Southern proclivities; "Locofocos," a nickname of a wing of the New York Democracy, originating in 1834 from an incident at a meeting in Tammany Hall, New York, during which one faction turned out the gaslight and the other faction continued the meeting by the light of locofoco matches; "Barnburners," a term once given to a progressive section of the Democratic party; "Black Republicans," applied to the Republican party; "nigger worshippers," also applied to the anti-slavery party; "Underground Railroad," upon which no trains have run since Abraham Lincoln proclaimed freedom to the American slave. This proclamation also left no vestige of "Mason and Dixon's Line," or of the "Missouri Compromise," and little is ever heard of the "Border States." "Kitchen Cabinet," a name sportively given to Amos Kendall and Francis P. Blair by the opponents of Jackson's administration; "Dark and Bloody Ground," a term applied to Kentucky in the early history of that State. "Brother Jonathan" and "Uncle Sam" are popular collective names given to the people of the United States; "Expunging Resolution," a resolution introduced in the Senate by Thomas H. Benton, on the 26th of December, 1836 (see Congressional Globe); "Salt River," an imaginary stream up which defeated parties are supposed to take passage; "Young America," a popular collective name for "our boys." J. G. Holland says: "What we call Young America is made up of about equal parts of irreverence, conceit, and that popular moral quality familiarly known as 'brass.'" "Omnibus Bill" was a term given to an act introduced in the Senate by Henry Clay on the 29th of January, 1850, the most important stipulations of which were those providing for the admission of California into the Union with its anti-slavery Constitution, the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, etc.

In conclusion, the statement may be made that all professions and all trades, as well as all times and all places, have had, still have, and will continue to have, their slang, and cant terms and expressions. Even the minister in the pulpit is denominated a "white-choker" or a "Bible-pounder"; indeed, a minister is credited with first making use of language called "gammy"—Andrew Cant, a fanatical Scotch preacher; although the word cant was probably derived from chant, the whine of the north of England Gypsies, or tramps, as they were generally called in early days. Two-thirds of the cant or slang in use originated with English tramps and thieves, and English writers; one-sixth has its source in Lingua Franca, or Bastard Italian, with modern Greek, German, French, Turkish, and Spanish ingredients (nearly all of the seaport towns on the Mediterranean have complete slang or cant languages, as do the thieves and Gypsies of London); the remaining sixth part of slang in use has originated in America and other parts of the world not enumerated above. I am aware that the word cant is generally applied to the fixed lingos used antecedent to the introduction of the word "slang," which, in contradistinction to the word "cant," is more modern and evanescent. Beside, real cant was at first a language invented for purposes of secrecy, while slang is the jolly offspring of circumstance, situation, or felicitous thought. For instance, among the London tramps three hundred years ago the cant term for money was "lowe," and the English Gypsies of to-day use the same term; but the slang terms for money number over three hundred, such as "tin," "ready," "wherewith," "brads," "vagrant shekels," etc.; a horse is a "prad" in cant, and in slang a "rag," a "plug," a "rattler," a "two-forty," etc.; a handkerchief is always a "billy" or a "fogle" in cant, but it is a "wipe," a "rag," a "bandanna," etc., to-day in slang, and it may be called a "table-cloth" to-morrow, just as we sometimes term a very small napkin a "postage-stamp." In the old Gypsy tongue a "rig" serves for what we slang "frolie" or "spree." At the present time, however, all of the different kinds of cant and slang have become huddled together, and, as I have shown above (and cited authorities in many instances that are accessible, and may be consulted), the greater portion of the slang in use to-day in America may be traced to the thieves and tramps and university students of Great Britain, or to poetical and canting works of hundreds of years ago. Therefore I have used the two words as synonyms, and claim that I do so properly.

I have heretofore stated that the dispenser of pulpit doctrines is called a "Bible-pounder," the lawyer is called a "land-shark," a "limb of the law," etc.; a physician, a "pill-box," the surgeon, a "saw-bones;" an editor, a "scribbler;" the mechanics and tradesmen all have their slang; so also have the army and the navy, and the universities all over the world. The newspapers daily use more or less literary or journalistic slang. There are some two hundred slang theatrical words, such as "sal" for salary, "ben" for benefit, and the like. Next to money, drunkenness has the most slang terms, appropriate—or at least applied—to all stages, from the "eye-opener" in the morning until the midnight episode of "taking him home on a shutter"—nearly three hundred in all. Next comes the storekeeper, with his two hundred terms; and then follow the sailors, the base-ball players, the bankers, and the "bulls" and "bears," et hoc genus omne. Only a few days ago I heard a conductor of a Market Street car say to the driver: "I got burned with a Sacramento"—meaning that he had taken a Sacramento street-car ticket, which, of course, was a loss.

The most delightful slang expression of the past two years has been the "Hardly ever" from "Pinafore." For fear the reader has not heard it, I will present it: The captain (one Corcoran) declares, in a song, that he is "never, never sick at sea;" and the crew jeeringly inquire: "What, never?" and Corcoran, thinking that he had better stick to the lie he had just uttered—with perceptible embarrassment, however—ejaculates, with unmistakable emphasis: "No, never!" Determined to shame their superior officer into telling the truth, the crew again interrogate him with "What, never?" When the "right good captain" equivocally replies, "Hard—" [It is the physician's opinion that the discharge that killed the author of the above description of the stale and stereotyped "Pinafore" joke must have been projected from a large, old-fashioned, double-barreled shot-gun, and that any one of the thirteen buck-shot that entered his body must have produced wounds that would have proved fatal. The funeral takes place from the morgue, and friends of the deceased are invited to attend.] BEN C. TRUMAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1880.

At last Zola and his naturalistic followers have an organ. It is called La Revue Moderne et Naturaliste, and aims to represent "the most advanced ideas in art and literature." The principal contributors are announced in the following order: Emile Zola, Alphonse Daudet, Gustave Flaubert, Edmond de Goncourt, Nadar, Huysmans, and a number of nobodies. Zola, of course, every one has heard of. He is a comet upon the literary sky at which the world is still gazing. It is difficult to understand Daudet's appearance in the list. His books have not seemed to incline toward realism. However, he is a Persian in politics as well as literature, and sets his face always toward the rising sun. But Flaubert's name need excite no surprise. He was a naturalist when Zola was a boy. His famous romance, Madame Bovary, published in 1857, was so strong that its author was proceeded against by the State under the statute against obscene literature. The trial, however, resulted in an acquittal. The book, which is very powerfully written, describes the gradual fall of a village physician's wife—from a chaste and happy matron to the lowest depths of female degradation. Flaubert lingers lovingly over this creature, scalpel in hand like an enthusiastic surgeon over a cadaver. The book is one which the average French mother takes great care to keep out of her daughter's way, and equally good care to read herself. It would be unkind to say that the average daughter invariably reads it, too, when she gets a chance—it shall therefore remain unsaid. Edmond de Goncourt is the only surviving brother of the two famous literary partners—"Les Frères Goncourt." Their books were always written in conjunction, until the death of Jules, which took place in 1870. Of late years Edmond has gone over formally to the Zola camp. The remaining writers are for the most part obscure. Huysmans has acquired some little notoriety through his books being prohibited in Belgium as obscene. There are now three reviews in Paris, and the ancient and conservative Revue des Deux Mondes will be obliged to stir its literary stumps.

Tennyson smokes American navy plug tobacco. And we suppose—we haven't seen it in print, but we just infer—that Mrs. Tennyson sleeps with a clothes-pin on her nose.

A TRIP TO THE GREAT GEYSERS.

Two weeks ago, while listlessly lounging at the club, there was put into my hands a letter which reminded me of a promise long since made, but by no manner of means forgotten. It was from the young bachelor proprietor of the Geyser Springs Hotel, and read as follows:

DEAR —: Shall expect you boys next Saturday without fail. The country is green and gorgeous. The hotel is empty, but the larder is full. There is game on the hills, fish in the streams, and sunshine over all. Shake business and the city for a few days. Come up and be my guests. FORSYTH.

Responsive to this cheerful and breezy summons, six of us made preparations to "shake business and the city," and be this rash man's "guests." Six small but beautifully battered satchels were hurriedly packed, and one Friday afternoon the whole half-dozen of us sauntered on to the forward deck of the Donahue boat, like a select section of Boston tourists. The trip up the bay was delightful. It was an afternoon of inspiration. The atmosphere was like wine. The hills that encompassed the water about had clear-cut outlines and green ridges running down to dance with their own reflections in the shore ripples. Angel Island was a mound of velvet. Red Rock, and the twin islands just above San Rafael, radiated the gentle heat. Around San Pablo Point, a half-dozen square-proved freight schooners lay becalmed, and beyond the white houses of the town stood at the edge of what seemed a lifeless lagoon. When the boat swung from the broad bay into the mouth of Petaluma Creek the beauty of the surroundings increased. The hills came closer; the grades of green were better defined. The dark color of the clustering oaks, the lighter shade of the sedge-grass, the delicate tint of the waving wheat, were wonderfully contrasted as the Donahue wound her tortuous way to the landing. By five o'clock we were comfortably seated in the cars for a fifty-six-mile ride up the Santa Rosa and Russian River valleys, the garden spots of California, and in this, the spring-time, presenting a series of landscapes not to be duplicated in the world. Trim little valleys, level as lawns, spattered with shapely oaks, like English parks; on either side rounded hills plush-upholstered by their curving crests, and over all a sky as blue as the Neapolitan bay. A few miles from the landing a stop is made at Petaluma, thence a swift rush to thriving little Santa Rosa—the city of the roses. Here we leave most of our passengers; but the glory of the ride, it seems, has just begun. The graded green of the lower valley gradually begins to be interspersed with patches of red and white as the orchards flash by; the apple, and pear, and peach trees actually seeming to curtsy to us in their brand-new calico gowns. Beside the track the golden poppies were folding for the sunset hour, and the other wild flowers, blending their colors in the swiftness of our flight, trailed out behind like great strips of carpet on either side the glistening rails. On the right, Mount St. Helena and the Geyser Peak stood straight and tall; on the left, long lines of grape-vines in nicely laid out vineyards were hurrying by. Then came Healdsburg, with a crowd of chattering girls at the depot to meet and greet expected friends; then twilight, followed by a rapidly narrowing pathway between the shadow hills; then darkness and Cloverdale, the terminus of the North Coast road. In a long "bus," with seats on either side, we are whirled away from the depot through the one broad and quiet street to the cosy little brick hotel, with eucalyptus trees round about, an enclosed piazza, and a log fireplace in the office. Here, after a chat through the telephone with the Geysers, twenty miles away, we sit down to a dinner that has real hunger for its sauce, and if the hot biscuits did breed a night-mare or two, it was the eater's own fault. A good night's rest in clean and comfortable beds, in commodious rooms, and then the early morning and a glimpse of Cloverdale. A village of roses embowered in the lap of the hills—for here the valley ends and the mountains begin to rise. Eight o'clock, and Kennedy, the proprietor of the stage line, with a four-in-hand, reins up in front of the hotel, and we are off for the Geysers. It is a special conveyance, all our own; the rest of the passengers—two city chaps, and a snub-nosed girl and her chaperon, from Michigan—having been bundled off in a wagon an hour earlier. Only a half mile from the hotel we get a splendid view of the natural park in which Cloverdale is located—a regular amphitheatre of hills about a perfect garden. While admiring this sweetly bucolic scene, the grand perspective, and the overhanging cumulus clouds, there is a sharp crack from Kennedy's whip, and from the rise of a hill we drop from above Cloverdale to the bottom of another garden-spot—Oak Valley—and swing across it to the bridge that spans the Russian River. Beyond the river a mill; and by the mill a cottage; and on the cottage porch a couple of girls, who flirt their handkerchiefs desperately, and throw kisses in exchange till the stage is out of sight. Beside the road, beyond the cottage and the mill and the flirting girls, a band of Gypsies camped beside the road, on their way to Clear Lake. Of course we stop, but not to have our fortunes told, for the palm of the boss seeress has been crossed with the party's gold before; but to get one long look at a nineteen-year-old girl, standing beside one of the wagons, with eyes deeper than a mountain pool, a foot and ankle that asserted themselves even in the homely brown stocking, and a form that swelled out from the shabby dress with never a corset-bone to break its faultless symmetry. Then straight in our pathway stood "Profile Rock"—the old man of the mountain—and where is the mountain that has not its old man?—keeping guard and looking down on the narrow path that admits to Sulphur Cañon. Here the roadway is blown from the solid rock, and far below the water roars through a boulder-choked channel. Beyond, the valley widens a bit, the slopes on either side are beautifully wooded, and the creek gurgles quietly and peacefully along. Every inch of the road is interesting. An old deserted saw-mill beside the stream; precipitous but grassy slopes, with sheep following one behind the other in long lines on the winding trails, moving like toys pulled by an invisible string; here and there mountain lilacs tossing their purple plumage high; a ford at the junction of Squaw with Sulphur Creek; deserted quicksilver mines, with their smelting furnaces and tramways and gaping drift-holes in the hill-side. We take it very leisurely, stopping every now and then to make a sketch, or have Ken-brace—the trunks grown together as one, with the light and dark green and wholly different foliage lovingly interlaced above; a marriage, not of convenience, but of necessity, of these two trees; no chance for a quarrel or a divorce—a clear case of clinging together till Death or the woodman's axe do them part. From here there was a lively rattle down grade of the coach, a sweep of the leaders about the sharp curves, a breathless look down the steep embankment; a clinging to the seat with the grip of desperation; and then, when the hill-sides began to brown, and the smell of sulphur became more and more apparent, and the driver and his horses and the stage and everything seemed possessed with the very devil, we suddenly—after three short and delightful hours on the road—broke out of the bushes on a dead run and dropped right down on the hotel at an angle of say forty-five degrees, and there, sweet and smiling and suave, stood our host to receive us. Greetings, liquid and verbal, passed; and then, having been shown to our cool and comfortable quarters, Forsyth had a proposition to make: "Now, boys, the correct thing after your ride is a steam bath and a plunge; lunch to follow." As guests, of course, we were agreeable. If it was "the correct thing" to be cooked at the beginning of the visit, we had nothing to say, but meekly followed the leader, who, loaded with towels, struck down into the cañon directly across from the house; and by a beautiful little foliage-covered trail, and a rustic bridge across the stream, conducted us into the natural steam bath-house. It is natural—that is, the steam is. The house itself is a wooden structure, built upon a foundation of logs, at the very edge of the creek. Back of it, and underneath, and all around, there is the atmosphere of a hundred Chinese laundries, and the smell of at least three thousand ripe eggs. Inside, the house is partitioned off into male and female departments, with similar accommodations for each. Under the bath-house is a jet of steam, that bursts out of the ground just reeking with sulphur and iron and all the sweet-smelling minerals in the bowels of the earth. Over this jet a half-hogshead has been placed, and, by means of a wooden spout, the steam is conveyed to what may be called the "perspiration parlor." Shedding our clothes, we investigated this apartment. It was a sulphur-stained room, with a nedy explain a point. At Eagle Rock we stopped to bask in the sun; and a short distance further on we stood beneath the shade of an oak and a fir tree locked in each other's embrace—little room looked, and felt, and smelt, like a miniature hell, with Forsyth in the box office. Having become accustomed to this temperature, he smiled at the settee against the wall and a few chairs with raw-hide bottoms. Forsyth showed us the steam spout, and the adjustable valve, and how when the valve was pushed in the steam would crawl under the floor, and climb over the back of the innocent-looking settee, and flay you alive. Then, having explained things, and invited us to take seats without cushions or anything, he proceeded to give us a practical illustration. He pushed the valve, and while the conversation went on the steam began to transact business. It came up the spout, and crawled in under the floor, and came out under and over the back of the settee just as had been described, and it made things very tropical. In less than five minutes that while the six of us smothered in the sulphur. The skin rolled off in flakes as we frantically caressed our ribs. Every pore was open and howling with the heat. Finally, when the perspiration was pouring beautifully, and we were yelling for forks to try ourselves and see if we were not done. Stoddard broke up the séance by fainting. We dragged him under the tepid shower in the next room, and he recovered. Then, red as lobsters, we went through the rest of the performance—with a slight suspicion, however, that we were getting more than the regulation dose. The tepid showers were delightful. The water came direct from the warm springs in the bank, and, tempered with minerals, was as soft and soothing as oil. From the warm showers we filed down a steep flight of stairs and took a plunge into a large tank of sulphur water as clear as crystal, and also toned by the hot springs to a degree suited to the steaming body of the plunger. Here we lay off to cool, as it were, and then, passing under the cool showers, were ready for the divans, or lounges, arranged after the manner of the Turkish baths. Amid the curling smoke of cigarettes we pronounced this natural bath very good. Fresh from God's Hammam, we felt like boiled angels. The skin was as soft as silk; the liver fluttered with joy; there was a tingling sensation along the spine; and, finally, there succeeded a sleep that tangled up the whole splendid sensation. An hour afterward we lunched in a tastefully arranged little dining-room, with square tables like those at the Palace Hotel, and all the comforts and conveniences, including ebony cherubs in claw-hammer coat-tails to pass around the provender. In the late afternoon, the sky being somewhat overcast, "Koch," the guide, thought it a good time to see the "Great Geysers." From the hotel piazza they did not look "great" in any sense of the word. In fact, all we could see was a constant steam-cloud, drifting up and away from a rusty brown streak on the hill-side. But the place turned out to be infernally interesting. The approach is very deceptive. A winding trail from the hotel leads down

Sulphur Creek—cool and clear; and over a rustic bridge a series of steps on the opposite bank you come to the mouth of Geyser Cañon, where Pluton Creek tumbles along its hot and sulphur blue-green water, as the first intimation of the toil and trouble and cauldron bubble further up the narrow and smoking way. Across and back again, in and out, over and around rocks and under laurel bushes the narrow trail leads into the great laundry. First, we step up to the "Devil's Office"—but not to settle, as many of us will have to do some day; but pass through "Proserpine's Grotto" to sit in the "Devil's Kitchen." The "Devil's Kitchen" is more than or although the old fel be principally hell is a cross between range and a steam and there in the shelv springs and basins, blubbering, and only rot-haired Eastern in order to transform the whole ravine into a savory soup-house. Just outside the "Devil's Kitchen" is the "Devil's Inkstand," and the "Devil's Punch-bowl," and "Geyser Smoke-stack," and "Witches' Cauldron," and "Devil's Canopy," and the "Safety Valve," and the "Steamboat Spring," and the "Devil's Pulpit," and the devil knows what else. These things have been so often described that it is a crime to do it again. Suffice it to say, that there is a cañon filled with fretting steam, and boiling water, and spongy, mineral-streaked ground, that smokes like the ruins of a recently-burned city. Commotion everywhere. Water hot enough to boil eggs harder than Pharaoh's heart. Steam that puffs and blows and shrieks and wheezes and climbs up your trousers-legs, and takes all the starch out of the Boston school-ma'am's underskirts, and brings the bandoline out of the New York girl's hair, and turns the bismuth powder on the San Francisco belle blacker than her bang. It is as though the devil had upset here his entire apothecary shop and then turned on the hydrant. Leaving the cañon, we come suddenly on the "Post-office," and the "Lovers' Retreat," and the "Lovers' Leap," and the "Lava Beds"—where they probably laid the lover out after his leap—and the "Indian Sweat-bath," where the natives in early days used to parboil their old rheumatic bucks, fricassee the wrinkled squaws, and beautify the complexion of their dusky maidens. While pitching pebbles into the nozzle of the Devil's Teakettle, "Koch" told us of all sorts of wonderful springs—the iron spring, the hot acid spring, the eye-water spring, the lemonade spring, and a dozen other springs—but none of them half as interesting or nimble as the "Rix spring," when he saw what he took for "a bear reaching for a leaf." This was a practical joke played on the boys by Forsyth and Kennedy, and it came very near breaking up the party entirely. A bear skin had been stuffed and placed on the hill-side, and by strings cleverly contrived and worked from behind a tree the fraud was made to go through bear motions to the life. One look was enough for everybody, the guide included, and the boys beat the lovers' retreat all to pieces in their frantic endeavors to shake the dust of that hillside from off their flying feet. The bear adventure wound up the first day to everybody's satisfaction. The next morning we succeeded in getting "Teddy" and the hunter, and a chap who cried "wolf" the day before, out on a hunting expedition; and before they returned a "property" deer, beautifully stuffed and artistically placed, was located near their trail, and we had the exquisite and uproarious pleasure from our ambush of seeing them pump their Winchester empty on the dummy before our yells betrayed the nature of the game. And so the days went by, and the jokes multiplied, and everybody was unbending and having a royal good time. There were excursions up the Foss road; fishing and hunting trips; looking-glass séances with the monkey in the snug little terraced yard at the back of the house; steam baths every day; early morning strolls on the back piazza—when all the guests were gone—in all the freedom of a cigarette, a pair of Chinese slippers, a night-shirt, and the sunshine; and one morning, after an exciting game of whist the night before around the old fire-place, the good housekeeper found five able-bodied men in Harry Brady's bed with their boots on. Then there were attempts made to paint the barn red and black, to Eastlake the hen-house, and embellish the wagon-shed. Price, the photographer, was also responsible for considerable mischief done with his camera, in one way and another; and there was an exciting time generally. But this, it must be remembered, was in honor of the beginning of the season, and such outrageous doings have ceased. For the Geysers Hotel is really getting to be a place of popular resort, and has a season of its own, and all that sort of thing. And Mr. Forsyth has been doing a deal to make it popular. He has utterly transformed the place. From a miserable roadside inn he has evolved, by energy, taste, and the outlay of considerable money, a summer resort that in many of its features can not be approached on this coast. For instance, the natural steam-sulphur baths, and the showers and plunge, for the beautifying of the complexion, and the

"KOCH," THE GUIDE.

clearing of the system and the skin, can not be too strongly dwelt upon. Nowhere else in the world, probably, is there a better blood-purifier for the bilious, or a more effectual rival of cosmetics. The touch of these waters is a renewal of youth. Besides these steam baths, direct from nature's laboratory, and tempered to a nicety—beyond the cunning hand of man to imitate—there has been built on the creek, a few hundred yards below the steam baths, a dam, that forms a swimming pool of gradually-deepening water, and where, on summer afternoons, men and women and children, under the shade of the oaks and the madronas, can literally soak their souls away. The water is deep enough for the expert swimmer, shallow enough for a four-year-old child, and safe for all. Last summer this feature of the Geysers was a great attraction, and the hotel was so full during July and August that people were sleeping in the bath-bouses and on the billiard-tables. The hotel building is not at all modern in its structure, but is roomy and airy. There are broad piazzas on which the room doors all open; and Mrs. Sberwood, the jewel of a housekeeper, sees that everything is as neat and clean and sweet as a daisy. The table is as good as the market can make it; and, in their season, there is fish, and bear meat, and venison. So, for a country retreat, away out of sight and out of mind of everybody, where one can lounge about in comfortable clothes, and swing in a hammock 'neath the sheltered piazzas' shade, and listen to the soothing evening song of the water from the bank of the ever-murmuring stream, and be steamed into health and happiness and a clear complexion, and float about on a sultry afternoon in a pool as healthful and refreshing as that of Si-loam's, with an equally "shady rill," I could recommend no better place for reasonable recreation, absolute re-creation, and perfect rest, than the Geysers. Instead of fashion, there is freedom; instead of expense, economy; instead of watering-place luxury, country comfort. During the day you can drone and dream, and at night sit in an easy-chair and gossip, or watch on the great silhouette of the mountains across the cañon the wind weaving steam embroidery from out the "Witches' Cauldron," and even see the old girls themselves shaking their skirts in the sky as the trees on the sharply-outlined crest show for an instant through the fleecy, drifting, ghostly white. These steam jets and clouds are a fascinating study. They are as capricious as the material of which they are composed. In the early morning they roll and tumble and hand-spring all over the neighboring gulches, and in solid columns shoot up high from the sputtering and fretful ravine. As the sun comes up they gradually writhe and retreat within themselves, as the warm atmosphere dries the vapor into nothingness. Moonlight nights there are regular revels on the steep hill-side—which, by the way, stands almost straight up like a picture on the wall, or a flat of painted scenery. Over this troop through the white lunar light all the big and the little witches; and the large and small imps, and, in fact, the whole devilish population of this Plutonian paradise. The white-capped cooks from the "Devil's Kitchen" waltz with the invisible but gay young girls from "Prosperine's Grotto," near the "Steamboat Springs," to the music of the "Safety Valve," the clerks from the "Devil's Office" are holding "high jinks" around the "Devil's Punch-bowl," and rolling loose rock into the "Devil's Inkstand;" there is a grand walk round of mythical mothers-in-law, and spirituelle old maids about the "cauldron;" the hoodlums from the "lava beds" have knocked the lid off of the "Devil's Teakettle;" there is a ghostly row in front of the "Devil's Post-office;" goblins damned are punching each other's heads under the "Devil's Canopy," in a dispute over the possession of the "Devil's Armchair;" and in the "Devil's Pulpit" stands the old man himself, wrapped in his sulphurous cloak, calmly contemplative of the scene, and asking himself that oft-recurring question: "When will the rest of this world be mine?" Peace, patience, old man, it is simply a question of time. But from imaginative to serious talk once more. Snugly situated for the summer months at the Geysers, you are, though completely isolated from the city, still within its call. Telephone lines run from the hotel to both Cloverdale and Calistoga. From here the tick of the telegraph is at your disposal, or a letter dictated through the telephone will be mailed in the early morning, reaching the city long before noon. When the season fairly commences—by the time this letter is published—trains will run via Donahue and Cloverdale, so that the Geysers can be reached the same afternoon, the cañon visited, and a departure taken the next morning if need be. This, however, is tourist time. When you go, let it be in this the most gorgeous spring-time that California has ever known, and stay long enough to leisurely take everything in. You will find that it will not cost you half so much as it is worth. You will find in the green and growing landscape a scene that will delight beyond any possible description; in the atmosphere an exhilaration that your sluggish blood has not known for many a day; in Kennedy a careful whip, and an entertaining fellow on the stage-ride; in William Forsyth a royal host; and in the whole experience something to stow away in a sunny and pleasant corner of your memory. So say we all—the six of us. We were splendidly entertained and courteously treated from the beginning to the end of the delightful trip. We were wine, and dined, and driven about, and cared for, as guests in the country seldom are. And when we sat in the coach, and waved our adieux, and swore by the "Devil's Punch-bowl," and his "Pulpit," and his royal robe of steam, that we would all drop down on him again (provided he continued our friend Forsyth's lease), and that, in our four days' stay, we had literally had in his dominion a monkey and a parrot time, and that we were ever so much obliged to him, we could almost hear the hoarse voice of the old chap howl across the smoking gulch: "Boys, don't mention it." And but for extenuating circumstances we would be parboiled if we ever did.

THE DIVAN.

OUR OWN POETS.

To Ianthé.

Alone I stand; on either hand
A straying pathway lies,
And one doth lead, by dewy mead
And branching fern, to Paradise.
The other drear, by ghastly mere
And tangled tairn and rocky lea,
Seeks shores unknown, where oceans moan
An exile's saddest dirge for me.
Though wild and drear the forest near,
And deep and dolorous the night,
No beacon gleams, no planet beams,
To guide my faltering feet aright.
Yet she is there, in Eden fair,
And round her soft winds hover;
Ah, will she hate—or will she wait
For me, her wandering lover?

When on Life's ocean borne away
From dreaming Childhood's peaceful shore,
We care not then to longer stay,
Nor grieve that we'll return no more.
But swells the heart with gay delight,
And Hope's frail pinions mount on high
When Manhood's clime, at length in sight,
Looms up to greet Youth's longing eye.

Too soon sweet Fancy's dreams dispelled,
And Hope, poor flutterer, drooping low,
The heart that once so gaily swelled
In tears has quenched its ardent glow;
And yearning Memory turns to where,
Far, far behind that peaceful shore,
In beauty shines—so calm, so fair—
Blest Childhood! lost forever more.

OMNIUM GATHERUM.

Baby and I.

Under the trees in the bloom of the clover,
Under the mellowing light of the sky,
Under the songs of the birds singing over,
Merrily playing are Baby and I.

Baby and I, in the gleams of the sunlight
Dancing adown through the leaves of the trees,
Gilding the butterfly's wing in his noon flight,
Warming the perfumes that float in the breeze.

Romping at will in the odoriferous verdure,
Catching at bright-winged insects that pass,
Clapping in glee at the antics of Rover,
Crushing the daisies that hide in the grass.

Gayest of all in the revels of Nature,
Wildly abandoned to frolic and fun,
Joyous as larks when they soar in the morning,
Peaceful as sleep when the labors are done.

Lovers, in truth—let the smile not come o'er thee—
Not such an ill-mated couple are we:
Though I am forty, and crow's-feet have tracked me,
Scarcely the dimples of twenty months shew.

Still in the youth of the heart that she gives me,
Drawing me close to her innocent side,
I am her lover, and she is my sweetheart—
Ruthie, my darling, my baby, my pride!

ST. HELENA, May, 1880.

CHARLES A. GARDNER.

Chémise Joe.

Above our heads the noonday sun was standing,
Blasting the tule with its scorching heat;
Before us was the little town, Knight's Landing,
The Sacramento rippling at its feet.

A something seemed to hide at our approaching—
The driver slackened his speed, and, pointing low,
Said: "Yonder, mid the underbrush, is crouching
The wild man of Colusa, Chémise Joe."

"And who is he?" quoth I. Dale Houx made answer:
"You must be strange in these parts not to know—
Why, all the State has heard about that man, sir;
They call him 'Chaparral' or 'Chémise Joe.'"

"His only roof is the broad arch of heaven;
He never wears of his solitude,
And only when by pangs of hunger driven
He seeks some shepherd's hut, and begs for food."

I asked: "Why shuns he thus man's happy dwelling
To live in misery and care alone?"
Dale Houx replied: "Indeed, there is no telling—
Perhaps he has some reason of his own."

Said I: "Perhaps he seeks, by prayer and fasting,
The expiation of unshriven sins."
The driver spoke, on me a keen eye casting:
"It may have been, sir, that his wife had twins."

Then I: "Perhaps in rage he struck a brother,
Or missed a fortune by some legal flaw,
Or in his early childhood lost a mother."
Said Houx: "Perhaps he found a mother-in-law."

"Perhaps his heart, with some sweet face delighted,
Its tendrils tangled amid golden locks,
To find at last its love was not requited,"
Said Houx: "Perhaps he busted up in stocks."

Said I: "Perhaps the friendship that he trusted
When came misfortune's hour was found to fail."
Said Houx: "It may have been he up and dusted, Leaving behind his bondsmen for his bail."

"Perhaps," said I, "unto the god Apollo
He tunes his lyre—one of the poet craft."
Said Houx: "It somehow seems to me to follow
A poet always is a little daft."

Perceiving that the driver only needed
A word of mine to give his fancy play,
I did not make reply, so we proceeded
In silence on our long and sultry way.

And when we reached the town, our journey's ending,
Said I: "You must be thirsty—let us drink."
The driver, from his seat with speed descending,
Grasping my hand, and with a merry wink

Made answer thus: "Why, you are talking reason.
I do not drink; but, seeing it is you,
And irrigation's right in this dry season,
Well, stranger, now I don't mind if I do."

TISWELL ALLRIGHT.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

In the church of St. Germain d'Auxerrois, opposite the Louvre, near the basin of holy water may be seen this printed notice to worshippers:

"Remember that this is the house of God. Do not spit here; spit in your handkerchief."

Judge—"How comes it that you dared break into this gentleman's house in the dead of night?"

Prisoner—"Why, judge, the other time you reproached me for stealing in broad day. Am I not to be allowed to work at all?"

Landlady—"I fear, Brigitte, that these two herrings are scarcely sufficient for the whole seven of us."

Brigitte—"Oui, madame. I thought so, too, and so I added the heads of those we had yesterday."

"My learned brother," says the court kindly but significantly to a young lawyer who is about to sum up his first case, "my learned brother will observe that it is near dinner-time, and that brevity is the soul of summing up."

"May it please your honor, I will not long detain you. I am right; my learned friend opposite is wrong; you are a good judge."

Judgment in his client's favor, with costs.

"Mon Dieu!" cried an enthusiastic mother, "I am so fond of children that if I had never had any of my own I would hire out as wet nurse to somebody else's!"

Madame B.'s husband finds Madame C. extremely charming. Therefore Madame B. detests her dear friend with all her heart.

"She has arms like matches and feet like gunboats," she said yesterday.

"Possibly," said the husband, "but such eyes! And besides, she has teeth that would delight—"

"A dentist!" said Madame B., finishing the sentence.

"Your concierge is very impertinent," said a visitor to a celebrated actress, "you ought to discharge him."

"I have often wished to do so," said the beauty, "but I dare not. I have a suspicion that he is my father."

Radical eloquence from the pen of M. de Cormenin in the Almanach Populaire of forty years ago:

"What is a budget? A book which crystalizes the tears and sweat of the people into gold, a book which fringes with silk and gold the mantles of the ministers, which feeds their champing steeds, which strews their boudoirs with luxurious cushions, and spangles the costumes of ambassadors!"

Local item from Le Temps:

"Some malefactors are introduced themselves during the before-last night in the Market Saint-Honoré, in escalading the grating; and have, to give themselves passage, practiced an opening above this grating in breaking fine panes in glass which close this space. After having endowed themselves of a knife deposited on the stall of a butcher, they are gone, in serving themselves of this knife as of a pincer, to force the drawers of several negotiators of the market. In outside of the money which they have found, the malefactors have taken a few everywhere of the comestibles of all species."

The following conversation, taken down on the spot in short-hand, gives powerful proof of the logical force of the feminine intelligence.

"Cecile, what has your husband done to you that you hate him so? Is he miserly?"

"Not in the least. He loads me with gifts."

"Do you think him ugly?"

"You know that he is a handsome fellow."

"Is he not sufficiently intelligent?"

"He is even intellectual."

"Is he unfaithful?"

"Oh! as to that, I can swear he never thought of deceiving me."

"Then he beats you?"

"He beat me! Why, he is a lamb!"

"Then why?"

"Then why? (With energy) why, because I hate him!"

A contribution was taken up at the Académie Française. The result was found to fall short a twenty-franc gold piece. One of the members, on account of his well-known stinginess, was suspected of not having contributed, but he declared to have done so. The one who took up the contribution said:

"I did not see him put in the box, but I believe that he did do so."

M. de Fontenelle finished the discussion by saying:

"I saw him contribute, but I do not believe it."

The marchands de vins never omit to put in their windows a huge placard bearing in large letters:

"Natural wine."

But a merchant of Batignolles has done better than his fellow dealers. Thinking, probably, that the epithet "Natural" might injure the character of his stock, he has put upon his placard:

"Legitimate wines."

An inebriate is conducted to the station.

"Who are you?"

"Don't know."

"Answer properly, or you will be punished."

"Eh bien! Go to the corner of the Rue des Martyrs and see if there is a chestnut-seller there. If there is one, the devil only knows who I am."

Madame, who is of great embonpoint, asks her husband in what character she shall attend the masque de. "As a captive balloon," he said. "How must I dress?" "Simply by tying a string to your and the brute."

Whoever informed the Chronicle that McGuffey's Revised Readers were advertised at $1.52 for a continuous supply at retail, such as the city has contracted for, was misinformed.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 13, 1880.

The moral of these brief lines is plain :
 'Tis better to die than live on in sin ;
 And the man who revels in words profane
 Weaves him a zebra suit for his skin.

It is our opinion that the Supreme Court will find some hole through which Kearney may crawl out to liberty. I will prove itself a very ungrateful tribunal if it does not.

P. S.—We got out our Diogenes lamp, and after looking through the Board of Education for honest men, found three or four more, to whom we give the benefit of the doubt.

THE BULLETIN AND SPRING VALLEY.

There is one thing about the Evening Bulletin that commands our admiration. Whenever it gets wrong, it stays wrong with a pertinacity and an obstinate consistency that is altogether wonderful. Nothing changes it. Argument has no influence upon it; new facts, new developments, and new lights are never permitted to drive it from the position once deliberately taken. It never backs out, or crawls out, or explains, or qualifies any statement that it makes. If it calls the horse sixteen feet high through a typographical error, it maintains the fact; and the horse grows from hands to feet, and feet to yards, and yards to miles, and miles to leagues, so long as anybody undertakes to question its statement or challenge the truth of its assertion. The Bulletin has a war with the Spring Valley Water Company. It is, of course, a naval engagement. Its prowess is as unquestioned as that of any ship at Trafalgar, or at the battle of Lake Erie. Its editor has chained himself to the mainmast, like Farragut, when he passed the thundering forts in Mobile Bay, and if some great crushing broadside of indisputable facts should blow out the brains of its editor, the man would not die, and the Bulletin would sail triumphantly on. The best illustration of this most admirable trait of the Bulletin is this same war with the Spring Valley Water Works Company. It began years ago—ever so many long years ago. Combatants on the Spring Valley side have died, been buried, and long forgotten. Old stockholders have gone to glory up the golden ladder. Old engineers have passed in their chips. Presidents, directors, secretaries, and clerks have joined the innumerable caravan, and passed on to the unseen country that lies beyond the grave. Tunnels have been run, mountains bored, the Calaveras cow pasture purchased, new square miles of catchment added, new machinery procured, new reservoirs built, new bonds issued, millions expended in improvements, millions and hundreds of millions of gallons of water added to the supply; and still the Evening Bulletin fires at the company its same old blunderbuss, wadded with the same old arguments, charged with the same chain-shot of exploded facts, makes the same noisy explosion, hits nobody with its scattering fire of illogical conclusions, and is really impressed that the war is still going on, because it hears the sound of its own artillery, and feels the recoil of its own guns.

The Bulletin has maintained all through this long warfare, and properly, that the company was, by the terms of its contract, "compelled to furnish, to the extent of its means, free of charge, all water necessary for watering streets, public squares and parks, for flushing sewers, and for all like purposes beneficial to the public, and in aid of the health and good government of the people of the city and county." This was the law under the old Constitution; this was the decision of the Supreme Court, and the decision has not been reversed. But the Constitution has been changed by the adoption of a new one; and the opinion of the court—which was in effect but an obiter dictum of its judges—is not the law which now governs this case. But the Bulletin has said it was the law, and what the Bulletin says stands—in its own columns—as irrepealable as the laws of the Medes and Persians. The horse is sixteen leagues high, and the Bulletin will never take off a hair. That the newly-adopted Constitution has changed the law governing the water supply between the company and its consumers the Bulletin well knows—because it discussed the matter when the proposition was under consideration in the Convention. It declared then, as it has always declared, that the influence of the company was at work in the Convention. After the organic law was submitted, and while pending before the people, the Bulletin, and the small hind-wheel of its bicycle—the Call—continuously wrote about and warned the people not to vote for it, because it abrogated the contract of free water. We quote from an article of May 3, 1879:

It—the new Constitution—deprives the city of the free water which she now enjoys, under the decision of the Supreme Court, for the extinguishment of fires, flushing the sewers, and watering the parks, for which at least $200,000 per annum would be charged—if there were no bar in the way, as the law now is under the old Constitution.

And the little ever-faithful echo, edited from another chair in the same room, wrote and printed as follows:

Now, we have free water for flushing sewers, supplying public institutions, for sprinkling the parks and squares, and for the use of the fire department in suppressing conflagration. The adoption of the new Constitution will change all this, and the city will have to pay not less than $200,000 per annum for what they now receive without cost. On this point there can be no dispute.

The italics are the Call's—"On this point there can be no dispute." One would think there could be no dispute; and there is none among lawyers, or courts, or men of intelligence. It is settled—settled by the new Constitution; the highest law, the organic law; to which all courts must bend, and all citizens, except editors, heed and obey. It is settled by the attorney of the Board of Supervisors, in an official opinion furnished the board, and upon its request: "That the city is liable, under the new Constitution, to pay for the use of water furnished by the company for all municipal purposes." This is not only the law as settled by the Constitution, and interpreted by honest and intelligent officials, but it is right. It takes the burden of water supply—in part—from off the people, and places it—in part—where it belongs—upon property. It protects the eighteen thousand consumers—in part—from paying for the insurance of property they do not own, for sprinkling streets and parks upon which they do not drive, for flushing sewers they do not use, and the consumption of water that gives them no benefit. It places the burden in part where it does most properly belong, by taxing the great stores and warehouses, where millions of property find protection from fires. It taxes the unimproved property held for speculative purposes by the unenterprising and the absentee. It equalizes the burden of an indispensable commodity, demanded for the health, comfort, and protection of all property and all residents, by equalizing the tax between individual consumers and property. The whole condition of the law has changed by the adoption of the new Constitution, and the Bulletin knows it; but it does not seem to realize that in the war between it and the water company the company has had as new recruits to its side of the fight the eighteen thousand persons who have heretofore borne all this expense of water supply; but who now, under the new law, and a new interpretation, and a new contract of water rates by the Board of Supervisors, will get rid of just half their water tax. The company will get no greater revenue, because the Board of Supervisors is charged with the duty of so fixing water-rates that the amount received by the company will only pay a fair interest, repairs and operating expenses upon the real value of the property. But the Bulletin will still fight on. The water company is the only great monopoly that it has not made terms with. It is bound to blow its melodious horn if it never catches another fish. Like Brown, the night-horn worker, it continues because it has a taste for the business.

It was a bad and vicious system that left all these water burdens upon private consumers. The contract, in its workings, discriminated in favor of property against persons, and of the rich and absent against those living and toiling in the city. Had the Bulletin regarded the interest of the people, and not been blinded by a prejudice against the Spring Valley corporation, it would have advocated the repeal of the law and the modification of the contract; and now that the law has been changed, it should accept, so that consumers may be relieved of a part of this unjust burden. The Bulletin gives itself away when it says "there has been no legal opinion that it is aware of that declares that the new Constitution repeals the contract," because the Bulletin printed in extenso the full legal opinion of City Attorney Murphy, declaring that the new Constitution did repeal the contract, and did compel the municipal government to pay for water used by it.

The reason sensible people take their daily newspaper as they would their daily ipecac—viz., with loathing—is not due to the materials composing the dose, but to the manner of its compounding. News is, in itself, a thing of life and color—enjoyable as a butterfly or a humming-bird. The fearless news monger pursues and captures, crushes and mangles it, and serves up a mutilated, unsightly carcass. There is no need of these barbarities. The comment is dull and ungainly. The items can be caught lightly as they fly, and offered in all their native grace. For example, let us pick up one of the daily papers lying at our feet and distill it. One page—nine solid columns of small type—yields essential drops as follows:

"SPORTING.—Some cricket ill cricketed; view it not with a cricket eye.—Some she-walkers walking a walk; some spectators, mostly beasts.—Some base-ball basely balled; but then they've nothing else to do, poor things.—On Sunday blows the sinful wind, and some yacht-racing is the deplorable result.

"SCIENCE.—Meeting of the California Academy of Fossils; Professor Byle Owl described two new bugs, and Mr. Kempfernickel an epigastric worm. Meeting of the California Microscopical Society; the treasurer exhibited the balance in his hands under a powerful binocular, and several members thought it was resolved, others contended it was only dissolved.—Meeting of the California Medical Society; the language used was like an old-time "glasses round"—viz., hot and strong and sweet and plenty. Physician, heel thyself.

"TELEGRAPHIC.—Mexican war veterans give Grant a ball. Ave Cesar—Morituri saltant!"

There! Now there are seven entire daily columns. Two more completed the page under the head "Commercial," and the remaining three pages of the sheet could be put into a single paragraph of this department, viz:

"MARKETS.—Suicides show more animation, while divorces appear to languish; burglaries are quiet; forgery of all grades is extremely dull, though rather more is doing in robberies from the person.—Births continue steady; deaths quiet; marriages favor the buyer.—Picnics are coming forward in bad condition; church socials remain dear.—Homicides are momentarily neglected; perjuries find less favor; libels are dull, but not quotably lower.—In statutory brands of staple iniquity a seasonable activity prevails, and full lines of assorted cheats have changed hands on a slightly lower basis."

There you are—terse, comprehensive, veracious, and complete. The only item omitted is one by cable giving some scandal about the Czar, which would be calculated to embitter social intercourse in circles where the Argonaut is read.

The Californian is no longer a baby in arms. It has attained the dignity of six numbers, and is wearing the short clothes of a completed volume. Typographically the June number—just out—maintains the excellence of the numbers preceding it. The table of contents before us is full of promise, which a hasty, haphazard reading seems to confirm. The initial paper, Ferdinand de Lesseps on "The Inter-oceanic Canal and Geographical Congress," has been interestingly translated by Miss Sallie R. Heath. Joaquin Miller has a long, good, dialect poem, in which the good lines—the "deucedly good" lines—are not choked to death by commonplaces. "Pourquoi" concludes his "Notable Autographs" by treating us to some dainty notes from a great many of the best modern writers. Josiah Royce discusses "Shelly and the Revolution" in a way that students will think delightful—though, to the average reader, the paper will be considered the mental equivalent of pig-lead. Miss Sadie E. Anderson and Miss Milcent W. Shinn contribute very pretty poems. "Sand" is finished, ending well. "Art and Artists" and "Books Received" have been added to the departments.

There are two classes of people for whom we have an unlimited contempt. The cheeky adventurer, who lives upon politics, and who is a politician by profession; who makes small politics his business; who lives and labors, sleeps and dreams, to accomplish political results, the ends and aims of which are to secure for himself an office, a place to live upon the earnings of other people; the ward politician, the municipal and county place-seeker, the hanger-on and expectant of Federal positions, the ring thieves and contractors at Washington, and all over the land. Then there is another class, more dangerous and more criminal, and that is composed of men of wealth, of large occupations, business men, and others, who give no attention to public affairs, never vote, affect to despise politicians, go to the Cliff House on election day, and whose only idea of the duty and responsibility of American citizenship is to grumble when things go wrong and swear at high taxation. Every American citizen should be a politician in the sense that he should never shrink from the performance of his political duties.

THE INNER MAN.

Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney is not only a clever writer, but an excellent practical housekeeper. She is quoted as relating that late one night, feeling a little troubled for fear the proportions in an Indian pudding in her cook-book were not exactly right, she came down stairs, built a fire, and made and baked an experimental pudding while the rest of the family were asleep.

Of all ye toothsome Vittells and Drinke
In ye goode Newe England states,
Ye Beste of ym all is ye Husewife's Pye
Yt Shee of ye Pumpkynne makes;
All yellow as Golde
Yt has grown Olde,
And of Flavor, so Riche and Rayre,
None other Meate
Yt Manne doth Eate
Wyth ye Pumpkynne can Compare,

Ye flakee Crustee, welle Scalloped rounde—
Ye Worke of ye Fayre Mayd's hand—
Doth show Itself about ye Edge;
A Cryse and Luscious Band;
When Itt I see
I laugheth mee
And I am lyke to Crye:
"Hurrah for ye Fruit!
Hurrah for ye Cooke!
And Hurrah for ye Pumpkynne Pye!"

Of course, when a young wife makes her first mince-pie the husband eats it and tries to look pleased, and says: "It's delicious, my own darling," and thinks he's being kind to the dear girl, when she'd a heap rather he'd not touch it than to see him writhe and roll on the floor all night, and have him mistake her for animals, and have him cry: "Oh, call off that dog with six tails! Take away those hogs with fiery eyes! Let me get away from that bear with four mouths! Oh!!!" A girl doesn't like to be mistaken for such things.

"Do you know how to make a salad?" said the celebrated Dr. Dash, to the not less noted Baron Blank. "No, sir," replied the latter. "Then you are a fool," said the former. The writer does not go quite so far as the vigorous writer and thinker and bon vivant above quoted; but this charming late spring weather—"charming" is used advisedly—makes the subject of salad appeal with almost irresistible winsomeness to the healthy adult mind. One remembers Pierre Blot's rather free translation of this paragraph from Voltaire:

A warmer temperature exacts more refreshing nourishment, and there is something horrible in philosophizing over the disgusting habit of stuffing ourselves with beef, while the robins are flirting on the lawn, and the lettuce is crisping by the hedge-rows.

Some one who evidently knows what he is writing about has this to say on the salad subject:

To many of us, who have passed through the winter regimen, the coming of the salad is the great event. Your hot-house salad, even your Southern salad, both quite edible, are wanting in that pleasant crispness, that delicate savor, which a natural salad—one grown in the open air—possesses. There are ignorant people—to be pitied—who, fortunate in the possession of the first salad of the season, absolutely destroy its tender delicacy by putting mustard on it. A taste must be singularly depraved that would dare to do a thing of this kind. It is an English abomination, and should be decried. You will find mustard regularly prescribed in many English books which are in vogue. There is no right method of dressing lettuce save with oil, vinegar, salt, and pepper; even the spring onion, the ciboule, is to be discarded; and not an egg, either hard-boiled or soft, should be used. The true French method, in its manner of progression, is as follows: The lettuce leaves should be dry. You will see, at certain hours in Paris streets, salads placed in wired baskets, to which a gentle centrifugal motion is imparted by hand by some careful menagers. Another way is to use a napkin, and, after shaking out the salad carefully, to dry it leaf by leaf. But both these processes require rapidity of motion, for a wilted salad is a miserable thing. For dressing, the salad should be pulled, leaf by leaf, from its central core, leaving, however, the centre. First, in a wooden spoon, mix salt and pepper, which scatter over the salad. The oil is next in order, with a careful turning over of the salad; and, lastly, comes the vinegar. There is a philosophical progression in all this. The leaves being first imbued with the oil, in a measure protects the green, tender tissues from the corrosive effects of the acetic acid. Salad should not be penetrated with the dressing; it is only the outside which should receive a varnish of the oil and vinegar. As to the final process, what the French call to fatiguer the salad—the exact translation of this verb, which means to "tire out" the salad, leads to many sad errors. If the green leaves are tossed about, and the tender white vessels containing the juices of the salad are broken, you have a flat and insipid thing—you taste the dressing and not the salad. It requires a light hand with a thoughtful mind to do it. "A lettuce, when it is panachee," says Brillat-Savarin, "is truly a salad of distinction." There is in a lettuce-salad a subtle juice, slightly soporific, the gentlest of anodynes, well known to chemists, which, as a leading authority says, "brings repose of temper and philosophic thought."

French dishes are not essential to happiness, and a certain education is necessary to appreciate works of art in that line. Bulwer Lytton gives in Pelham a lesson which ought to come home to a great many people. He tells how Pelham carries about with him a little case containing a knife, a fork, and a spoon, of peculiar construction—the knife blunted and the spoon very shallow, in order to prevent gobbling. "It is a most unhappy failing, for one often hurries over in one minute what ought to afford the fullest delight for five. It is indeed a vice which deadens enjoyment as well as abbreviates it."

CXXVIII.—Sunday, May 16.—Bill of Fare for Eight Persons.

"DOGWOOD BITTERS."

It must be conceded by any fair mind that the negroes after the abolition of slavery conducted themselves with wonderful moderation; for it was natural to expect that a people liberated suddenly as they were, elevated without preparation as they were to a position of comparative power, would abuse their novel privileges and seek expression for the feelings of resentment sought to be inculcated by the low and vicious class of politicians who now came down to deceive and defraud them. But, as a rule, this was not the case. Despite party differences and the struggle for political power, there was very little personal bad feeling or individual hostility between the blacks and Southern whites, and instances of impertinent or offensive conduct on the part of the former were very unusual. In the exceptional cases it is worthy of note that the actors or instigators were almost always females—generally girls or young women. Of this class were those who brushed rudely against white persons, affecting ignorance of their whereabouts; who defiantly took possession of the inner portion of the sidewalk, right or left; who strapped lace veils across their dusky noses and twirled their parasols against ladies' hats; who grazed people's toes with their baby-carriages and entangled ladies' skirts in their wheels; who were the perpetrators of almost all the annoyances and impertinences to which weaker parties, such as ladies and very old persons, were subject.

One day, about two years after "the surrender," there stood on the sidewalk of a large town in Virginia a negro school-girl, swinging her satchel, twirling on her heel, and tossing her head, coqueting airily with a mulatto boy about her own age. Running parallel with the sidewalk was a fence, on the opposite side of which, unobserved by (or, as she would more significantly have expressed it, "onbeknownst to") the girl, and not ten feet from her, were her father and brother at work in a gentleman's garden. The spaces between the boards composing the fence were quite broad enough for ordinary purposes of observation, and the old man, her father, was evidently aware of the sidewalk flirtation, but had so far said nothing, digging savagely away with eloquent vigor; but her brother had suspended operations, and was leaning on his spade, wriggling in convulsions of silent laughter. An outburst would have attracted his sister's attention and put an end to his fun; besides, it was a question how the old man would view interference when he did not himself interfere; and to any one who had to deal with the old man—or rather with whom that old man had to deal—this question was one to be considered.

Presently there came walking slowly and feebly down the street an old lady whose countenance bore the traces of sorrow as well as of years. The hair was parted plainly on her forehead, and the pale face was framed in crape. The grave dignity of her manner was toned down and softened by a smile. Ah, no, it was only the suggestion of a smile, the reflection of a sun that had shone, the soft light that sometimes lingers though the sun be gone down.

The windows of the house she had just left were now always closed, and the ivy that had used to creep against the wall trailed its tendrils undisturbed across the shutters. In that house two beds remained from day to day neatly made, as they had been three years before; towels hung on the rack, and all things remained in readiness for "the boys." But only a mother's foot ever crossed the threshold of that dark and silent chamber—only a mother's sobs ever broke the stillness of that cold and desolate room; for the lady who had marched away to the sound of life and drum that bright May morning had never come home again.

As Mrs. Darring approached the rest of our dramatis personæ, the girl, with a loud laugh and an elaborate air of not seeing her, swung her satchel round and struck the old lady a sharp blow on the breast.

The dead hands of her boys must have been lifted in the grave at this affront to their mother; but they were powerless, and she powerless as they.

"Didn't go to h't' you," said the girl, carelessly, to Mrs. Darring.—"An' so, Mr. Simpkins, you excuse me of bein' a flirt? Which I'm sho' I isn't any mo' of a flirt 'an you is."

The boy was embarrassed, and made no response.

Mrs. Darring had stopped, and a deep flush was on her cheek, but she only asked, gravely and quietly: "Isn't this Adam Darring's daughter?"

"We sco'ns to be Darrin's. Mr. Addum Lefridge is my pa, if dat's what you mean," replied the girl, saucily.

"Caroline, I—"

"My name's Carrie."

"I do not think your father," continued Mrs. Darring, ignoring the interruption—"whether he calls himself Leftwich now, or Darring—would allow one of his children to insult his old mistress. I am sorry for his sake as well as my own."

Mrs. Darring passed on, and the girl, tossing her head, said scornfully to her companion: "She don't 'peer to ha' had a good meal o' vittles sence pa stopped wu'kin' for her. Friday is my birfday: I think I'll ax her up to dinner."

They walked off together.

Old Adam had ceased to dig, and was glaring after them in a quiver of rage. The son had ceased to laugh, and stood in dismay, looking at his father. Suddenly the old man grasped his spade with both hands and shook it in the face of the boy: "Did you hear dat nigger?"

Dave retreated, without attempt at valor: "Lemme 'lone, daddy: I ain't toch ole mis'."

Again advancing on him, spade in hand, the old man reiterated: "I ax you ef you heerd dat nigger?"

"Course I heerd her: I ain't deaf, is I?"

Dave put out his hand, warding off the offensive weapon; but for the third time it was shaken in his face and planted against his unparticipating nose: "I ax you ef you seed what dat nigger gal done?"

"Course I seed her: I ain't blin', is I?"

The old man let fall his spade and drew forth a huge pocket-knife, which induced Dave to display a still greater expanse of white feather, for he retreated precipitately into a newly-made-hot-bed, and there floundered in the obscurity which it sometimes comes even to honest men to covet.

The old man sought a hedge of osage-orange trees, and his perturbed spirit seemed to find repose as he regarded the branches in their beauty of stoutness and supple strength.

Dave's head and hands, like those of a terrapin from its shell presently protruded slowly and cautiously above the frame of the hot-bed, but disappeared with abnormal celerity as his ear was saluted by the whizz of one of those beautiful branches, which his father had cut and trimmed and was now trying on the empty air. Feeling that he was not the right man, nor, if he read the signs of the times correctly, in the right place, Dave concluded to let his father and the air have it out together; so, emulating the Arab, he "silently stole away," without even waiting "to fold his tent"—i. e., to put on his coat. In other words, he embraced the first opportunity to go home to dinner, without soliciting the pleasure of his father's society.

He found "Carrie" already there. As soon as he saw her, "Oh, my po' back!" he exclaimed, with a wriggle and grimace. "What motter wid yo' back?" asked his mother, placing before him a plate of smoking-hot pork and beans.

He balanced it on his knees, and, breaking in halves a huge pone of corn bread, remarked, solemnly: "Up at de house ole mis' use to giv' thanks for what dey wuz 'bout to 'ceive; an' I feels miteley like it on settin' down to dinner to-day—for what I ain't gwine to 'ceive. Oh, my po' back!" he repeated, with a second wriggle which almost upset the plate on his knee, and, shaking his head solemnly, he fixed his eyes on his sister: "Lor! Lor! Knowin' what I does, if I was in dat gal's shoes, dem shoes would be de yudder side o' Candler's Mountain, or movin' dat way miteley lively."

"Carline," said her mother, uneasily, "what dat fool nigger talkin' 'bout?"

"Her name ain't Carline," said Dave: "it's Carrie (oh, my po' back!), an' Mr. Addum Lefridge is her pa."

The girl gave a startled glance, but he fixed his eyes on his plate, and, wagging his head from side to side, continued like one in a reverie: "I nuvvur would ha' 'greed to bein' a gal o' no kin', under no sukumstances, white nor black; but de way I wouldn't 'gree to bein' a cert'n black gal to-day ain't nothin' to nobody but me and Mr. Addum Lefridge."

"What you talkin' 'bout, Dave?" asked his mother, planting herself before him with her knuckles on her hips.

Dave got up, drew his yellow cotton shirt-sleeve across his mouth, and hitched up his "galluses." "I use to hear Mas' Jim," said he, "laffin' 'bout—

'Tickleback Tickmouse is my name,
Lunnun is my nation,
Inghun' is my dwellin'-place—

an' sump'n else, I forgot what; but ef I was Kyarline, gwine to prepar' a piece o' po'try for digzaminashun uv de fus' class in joggerfy—ef daddy was gwine to be dar, an' I knowed what was good for me—I would holler out:

Kyarline Darrin' is my name,
Nigger is my station;
Lynchbug' is my dwellin'-place—

And ef I dar' to talk 'bout Lefridge, an' hit ole mis' on de bres', an' be gen'ly impident, wid daddy lookin' out o' a hole in de fence, I'd ketch dammashun, 'stid o' Lunnun nation. Dar come daddy now. Tell him I gwine back to Mr. Pollard's, whar we was at wu'k dis mornin'—me an' Mr. Addum Lefridge, Carrie's pa. Oh, my po' back!" And, with the Parthian arrow of a grimace at his sister, Dave disappeared over the back fence.

"Gre't Jimminy, Carline! Sho'ly you ain't been fool 'nuf to a-toch Mis' Darrin', so yo' pa could find it out?" said her mother, in a hurried undertone, as she saw the old man coming down street with an armful of osage-orange switches.

"I ain't toch her to h't' her," said the girl, sullenly.

"My Lor! Don't you know yo' pa better'n dat? It's time you wuz a-knowin' him. You jes' git him on one o' his rampages, an' you won't want to know him no better."

Apparently indifferent to the cultivation of her father's acquaintance, Caroline caught up her hat, and was about vanishing through the front door when the old man entered: "Stop dar! Whar you gwine?"

"I'm goin' back to school, pa," endeavoring to pass him.

He caught her by the shoulder and spun her like a teetotum half-way across the room. "Shet up, now, 'bout pa! Which you kin call that sassy little nigger barber 'Mister'—'cos he ain't no sassier, an' ain't half as much of a nigger as you is—but don't try to cum yo' joggerfy an' rifumtik over me! I'll par de skin offen yo' from yo' head to yo' heels."

"Lor, Addum," remonstrated his wife, "what makes you ac' so to'ds de chile?"

"Marriar," said he—"Marriar, not a hour ago I seed dat imp o' Satan hit we all's ole mis' on de bres' wid her dog-gone—"

"I was jes' swingin' my satchel, an' she walked up 'g'inst it herself, pa."

Old Adam caught and shook her violently. "I clar, 'fo' Gord, if you says 'pa' to me ag'in, I'll maul de brains clean outen you!"

"I know she ain't meant no harm by what she done," said the wife.

"She hit my ole mis' on de bres', I tell you!—a ole lady which, ef she warn't my ole mis', is still a ole lady knee-deep in de grave, an' nobody to look arter her or keer whedder she's in de grave or outen it. I can't forget—an' I ain't gwine to 'peer to forget—how dat ole lady took keer o' me an' mine for forty year. We warn't nuvvur col', an' we warn't nuvvur hongry, an' we warn't nuvvur wantin' for a kin' word. I knows it, an' you knows it. Some niggers might ha' been 'bused 'yarnt what dey 'zarved, but 'twarn't me, an' 'twarn't you, an' 'twarn't none o' we all's chillun; an' when it 'peered like I was dead, an' dey was 'bout to shroud me for de cool-in'-bo'd, ole mis' she cried like one uv de chillun."

"Cos you was as goods an' chattered," said his wife.

"Dat's so!" deposed Carrie, briskly.

He gave her a box on the ear that came very near taking the head off her shoulders. Then he turned to his wife, and, shaking his knobby cane in her face, said sternly: "Don't you dar to say dat ag'in! Ole mis' could ha' loss twenty niggers like me an' nuvvur missed 'em. Don't you dar to say it ag'in! You heer?"

Old Adam had always maintained his exclusive right to sport a certain article of apparel supposed to indicate supremacy in the domestic circle (and spoken of in the plural); so, after a gaze so prolonged and stern that it must have tried Maria's nerves exceedingly, he slowly lowered his cane and resumed, his chin trembling and his voice growing husky: "No, I goes a squar' out o' my way rudder'n look at dat house an' think 'bout ole mis' an' dem boys, which I done a heap o' de bringin' uv 'em up mysef. De house—which it use to 'peer like it would fairly bus' open wid good times—how it look now? All shet up an' dark an' col'. Look in dem parlors, which ole mis' use to have 'em full o' comp'ny—to keep de boys at home, she say. Whar de comp'ny? whar de boys? whar de laffin' an' talkin' an' de singin', an' de niggers comin' in an' out wid 'freshments, an' ole mis' givin' me sump'n to drink out in de pantry, 'cas she say, 'Addum musn' be no better'n his young marsters'? Open dem do's, I say! What you see? what you heer? De flutes is shet up in deir cases, an' de fiddle-strings is some on 'em rusty an' some on 'em broke; an' black shadders is all 'roun' de rooms, an' it's so quiet dat a rat runnin' 'cross de flo' would skeer you wid his fuss. Whar de comp'ny wid deir bar' nakes an' white shoes, catin' up ole mis's supshun? Dancin' somewhar else, forgittin' all 'bout ole mis'. Whar de boys? Out in de graveyard. Whar de mis'? Dyin'—dyin' uv a broke heart—dyin' wid a kin' word for eberybody, an' glad to go—dyin' 'cos she sick an' po' an' lonesome, an' dunno how to live 'dout sumbody to take keer on her an' stan' 'tween her an' miz'ry. Whar de niggers? Dar's one o' de black houn's," said he, his voice vibrating with anger—"dar's one uv 'em; an' sho' as Gord A'mighty spar's me she's got to pay for what she's done to-day."

"Carline ain't nothin' but a chile, Addum; she don't know no better."

Adam looked fixedly at her for a moment or two, or, as it appeared to her, for the next half hour. "Gimme my dinner," said he, at length.

This was an unlooked-for development of humor, and his wife hastened to gratify it.

"Carline," said she, presently, "you better go on to school, honey."

"Ef Kyarline know what's good for her, she better set whar she is."

Caroline appeared to know what was good for her.

With great deliberation and no further notice of Caroline he proceeded to dispatch the pork and beans set before him, then turned to his wife: "Marriar, is you gwine to uphol' dat gal in 'havior sech as dis'?"

"I said she warn't nothin' but a chile, Addum."

"She warn't nothin' but a chile, an' warn't no use to nobody, when ole mis' had her to take keer on; but she ain't no chile now."

"She didn't mean no harm; she didn't know no better."

"Hukkum you ain't larnt her no better?"

"Why ain't you done it yo'self?" retorted his wife.

Adam's smile was grim, and so suggestive of the tuition to be expected of him, that his wife hastened to say: "I don't see no gre't harm in what de chile done; she didn't go to hit Mis' Darrin'."

"She done it a-pu'pose," said he, doggedly; "I seed it mysef."

"An' 'twarn't no harm sayin' her name was Lefridge. It jes' shows de ambitions dar's in her to take anudder name. Dat what make her de gal she is."

"Is dat correc'?" He turned and looked curiously at his daughter, discomposing her greatly. "I nuvvur knowed befo' how she come to be de gal she wuz. I'se wondered miteley how a gal o' mine should ha' come to be dat kin' o' a gal. So it's de ambitions? Dat's a fac'. What would a nigger be ef 'twarn't for ambitions? He wouldn't nuvvur git 'bu'v' hissef, he wouldn't nuvvur be no better'n de white folks—which de sword is done leveled 'em down to him—ef 'twarn't for ambitions!"

The negro, as we have had frequent occasion to remark, is surpassingly superficial, and, though intensely emotional, supremely unreliable in his emotions.

Old Uncle Adam was evidently very much impressed by what his wife had said. He took a short pipe from his pantaloons pocket and commenced smoking, leaning forward with one elbow on his knee and his chin in the palm of his hand, his eyes on the kettle of pot-liquor from which he had fared sumptuously. At length, after a pause which seemed interminable to his companions, he raised his eyebrows, and with a slight drooping of the corners of his mouth, which gave him quite a depressed and pitiful air, he turned to his wife. "Marriar," said he, "de ole man is miteley sot in his ways, an' it's miteley hard gittin' outen 'em, but he ain't 'bu'v' tryin'. He nuvvur knowed befo' what 'twas dat make his chile, his onliest gal-chile, de gal she wuz. De ole man called it to hissef sassiness an' impidence; he didn't know 'twas ambitions. Dar comes in de ole man's ign'unce; he ain't been to school, you know. An' he didn't know you had de ambitions, too, Marriar. Ef he had, he would ha' acted diff'unt, 'cos de ole man cert'n'y do want to do right far ez he knows how. But sence he been settin' here, gwine roun' in his min' what you an' de chile ez said, he sees, like de writin' on de wall, dat he ain't done his duty to'ds na'y one of you. An' he feels de ambitions wu'kin' in him like hops in a keg o' beer. He feels he ain't done what he orter, an' he gwine take de back track an' make up for it, ef he kin, an' fur as he kin."

"Yes," responded his wife, briskly; "which I ortiz said you would come roun' some day an' show dem white folks dey ain't no better'n we is."

He made no reply, but, turning with a benign smile to Caroline, held out his hand. "Come here, darter—come to pa."

With hesitation born of experience she reluctantly drew near, and he placed her on his knee, with an arm over her shoulder, the pipe immediately under her nose, to the imminent danger and disgust of that classic organ.

This feat of tenderness, being abnormal and unusual, was somewhat awkwardly accomplished by the old man, and greatly embarrassed his daughter, who was also physically disquieted by being sentimentally trotted on his rather angular knee.

"So you wants to have a little birfday, my dear?" he asked.

"Yes, sir," said she, with unaccustomed diffidence.

"An' you would like to ax yo' little nig—yo' little kully-headed barber—wouldn't you?" he further inquired, executing here a trot of such vigor that it was necessarily and providentially brief. "An', my dear, you is no doubt correc' 'bout dat ole white lady; I don't 'spect she's had a good meal o' vittles for two year. She's done fell off to skin an' bone, an' she don't look like she's got de strenk to walk a squar'. I makes no manner o' doubt you could git her to yo' birfday dinner. 'Peers to me de ambitions of a young cullud lady would like dat miteley; so ef you would keer 'bout doin' of it I ingages to git her."

"Addum," exclaimed his wife, standing before him (as Voltaire said of himself and a young lady) like a point of admiration—"Addum, you cert'n'y is combin' out de kinks!"

"Yes, Marriar," said he; and his eyebrows rose higher, and the corners of his mouth fell lower, and he looked more pitiful than ever. "I was a ole man when I married you, and I didn't know 'bout ambitions, but I ain't too old to larn. I larn't a heap jes' now by yo' and Kyarli—yo' an' Carrie's talk. An' I'll do you bofe de justice to say I b'leeve you is made our little darter the gal she is. So, ez I was sayin', ef you all wants de ole white lady to de birfday dinner—"

"I, for one, cert'n'y does," said his wife, thinking how fine a tale it would be to tell.

"Den I ingages to git her. An', my darter," he continued, rising from his chair without the slightest intimation of any such intention on his part, at the imminent risk of landing Caroline (submerging her, we should say) in the kettle of pot-liquor—"an', my darter, don't get up no po' white dinner. I feels de ambitions crawlin' all 'bout me. Ef you wants ennything, jes' come an' ax pa."

The next day Caroline called upon him for money, and met with the encouraging response: "Cert'n'y, my darter, cert'n'y. Whatever you needs, jes' come an' ax pa."

Thus emboldened, she and her mother added considerably to the intended luxuries of the table, but met no rebuff. The old wallet was always forthcoming, and, slowly fumbling through it, the old man always "ponied up" the required amount.

The only thing they dared not ask was whether Mrs. Darring was coming.

"Ax him," whispered Mrs. "Lefridge," nudging her daughter with her elbow as old Adam was about leaving for work the day before that proposed for the dinner—"ax him."

"I'm 'fred to ax him," said Caroline.

"What's de matter, my dear?" and he looked so benevolent that his wife ventured to reply:

"Jes' sump'n de chile wants to know."

"All she got to do is to come and ax pa," said the old man, pausing on the threshold.

Then—first discreetly placing between them the distance and the barrier of the table—Caroline put her query, and her parent made reply: "Yes, my darter—ef she's well 'nuf. An' ef you wants enny mo' white folks invited, jes' come an' ax pa."

The day came; the table was spread. Dinner was to be at two; at one Adam and Dave came home.

"Now," said the old man to his wife—"now, you git off dem cloze an' git in dat bed in de yudder room. An', Dave, you go up to my ole mis', and tell her de cramp is takin' de excedence wid Marriar, an' ef she'll come down here an' see ef she ken he'p de nigger, ole Addum will be eberlassin' thankful."

Dave thrust his tongue in his cheek, and with a wink at his sister, disappeared.

"Git in dat bed an' draw up wid de cramp till I signerfies to you to draw out ag'in."

"Lor, Addum! I ain't gwine—"

But for some reason she immediately changed her mind, and when Dave returned was in bed, looking so very foolish and uncomfortable that that youth could not restrain his mirth, and felt constrained to retreat to the pig-sty in the back-yard.

As soon as her slender stock of strength would allow, Mrs. Darring came: "How do you do, Adam?"

"Po' an' piert, Mis' 'Lizar—po' an' piert, marm, like a shad in shaller water."

"What seems to be the matter with Maria?" asked his old mistress as she went in.

"Marriar 'peers to be mo' easier jes' now, thankey, Mis' 'Lizar; but seems to me some good strong mustard wouldn't do her no harm; she's sho' to draw up ag'in pres'n'y."

"We will make the plaster, then," said Mrs. Darring, kindly, "but perhaps she will not need it. I hope not, for I think it a very severe remedy."

"Marriar do cert'n'y need sewere o' some kin', Mis' 'Lizar," said he; "it's mos' time to draw up now. Git de mustard, Kyarline, to make dat plaster, which she is made a many a one befo' for me, an' Marriar, too, when we was sick."

Obedient the instinct of self-preservation, Caroline produced the mustard with an alacrity secretly resented by her mother, and Mrs. Darring spread the plaster; but Maria evincing no intention whatever to "draw up," old Adam placed his hand beneath the patchwork quilt with the tender inquiry: "Is yo' feets col', Marriar?"

"Oh, Lordy! oh, Lordy!" yelled his wife.

"You see it's takin' her ag'in, Mis' 'Lizar," said he. His hand was still beneath the patchwork quilt, and his face was full of benevolent anxiety. "Mis' 'Lizar, it do 'peer to me, marm, dat de plaster better go on."

Mrs. Darring assented, for Maria was writhing with pain, and (the "first law of nature" still asserting itself) with Caroline's unqualified approbation the plaster was placed in position.

At this moment Dave's head appeared in the doorway. "Mr. Simpkins an' a variety of frien's has arrove," said he sotto voce to his sister. "Comp'ny come," he translated to his father.

"Marriar better be quiet now, Mis' 'Lizar, which I'm sho' we dunno how to thank you for comin', marm. Keep on dat ar plaster, Marriar, till I sez take it off," added the old man as Mrs. Darring prepared to leave.

"She need not keep it on long, Adam; it will blister her. I think you were unnecessarily alarmed this time; you see she is in no pain now."

"No, marm," said he with an air which needed no translation for Maria; "but she will be ef she take dat plaster offen her till I sez so."

On the way out they passed through the "dining-room," where several of Caroline's friends were assembled, prominent among them Mr. Simpkins.

"Dis is we all's ole mis'," said Adam, with a wave of the hand not to be misunderstood. They rose respectfully, every one. "Mis' 'Lizar," he continued, "ef you ain't too proud to eat a mouffin in yo' ol' servant's house, me an' Kyarline would be mighty proud to stan' 'hin' yo' cheer an' sarve you ez we use to."

Unwilling to mortify the old man, and too long accustomed to having negroes around her table to attach a thought to it now, she sat down and took a cup of coffee, eulogizing the appearance of the table as she did so.

Caroline, with the inspiration of one who does not desire again to be detected in the indulgence of untimely slumber (in other words, to be a second time "caught napping"), took up a waiter, and obediently planted herself behind the old lady's chair.

Whether this graceful acquiescence at all softened her father's heart must remain an open question. If it had this effect, that sensitive organ was immediately re-ossified when he detected her in the act of amusing her guests by making a contemptuous grimace over his old mistress's head.

Without apparent notice of this by-play, he escorted Mrs. Darring to the street, and returned to the dining-room. "Ladies an' gemmen," said he, "de occasion uv dis festive dinner will have to be got off to-night. 'Skusin' sickness in de famly, I 'spec'fully axes you all to git 'roun ag'in 'bout eight o'clock dis ebening—which it's a mo' festusser time anyhow—an' we hopes to hab de contribilation of furdur comp'ny."

Having promised to return and spend the evening, the guests departed, and the old man took his daughter into the next room.

"Addum," cried his wife, "I mos' done bu'nt up. Kin I take it off?"

"Pen's 'pon whedder de ambitions is bu'nt outen you. Does you still want de white lady, my ole mis', to set down an' feed wid a passel o' niggers? An' does you still want Kyarline to be de gal she is—sassin' ole mis' an' knockin' her 'bout?"

Evidently amenable to instruction, Maria responded comprehensively, "I don't want nothin' I ortenter."

"Take off de plaster," said Adam, solemnly. "Ez for you," turning to his daughter, "I was hopin' dat de lesson uv makin' you stan' 'hin' ole mis's cheer an' wait on her wid yo' waiter in yo' han', 'fo' de res' uv de niggers, would ha' took the ambitions out o' you too; but"—with great deliberation he selected an osage-orange branch and thoughtfully drew it between his stiff old fingers—"but dar ain't nuffin' so instructive to a nigger ez a good larrupin'. A nigger, 'specially a young nigger, will take larnin' on his back dat you nuvvur could ha' got it in his head. De back way is de nachul way for niggers, sho'."

With a laugh at his own witticism which seemed simply demonic to his audience, he proceeded deliberately to select another switch, which he laid beside his first choice.

"Fac' is," pursued this moral philosopher—"fac' is, dar ain't nuffin' dat 'grees wid a nigger, 'specially a young nigger, like dogwood bitters. Dey orter hev' a dose uv it 'fo' 'brek-fus' fus' thing, ebry mornin'. When de Lord said, 'Let der be light an' let der be dark,' I makes no doubt He said, 'Let der be dogwood,' an' dat showed He knowed what He was 'bout, 'cos He fo'seen dat niggers was gwine to multiply 'pon de yuth, 'specially young niggers."

With these introductory remarks, and after some skirmishing around the room which did not amount to anything, succeeded by a very pronounced "scuffle" resulting in Caroline's defeat, the old man grasped the skirt of her dress, and, gathering it above her head, held it together with one hand, enclosing her in a bag from which there was no escape. Now, the yellow cotton garment thus brought to view being conspicuously deficient in latitude and longitude, disclosed two very knobby knees, and each time those osage-orange branches came whizzing through the air those knobby knees bent like the clasp of a jack-knife, the girl's heels saluted the small of her back, and there issued from the bag every variation of sound from the shriek of a locomotive to the groan of an ox-cart.

"What's yo' name?"

"Kyarline."

"Who's c'rec'in' you?"

"Daddy."

"Who's yo' pa?"

"Ain't got none."

"What white lady was dat you hit on de bres' o' pu'pose?"

"Ole mis'."

"What white pussun does you want to de birfday?"

"Don't want none."

"What dat little nappy-headed fool name?"

"Jim Simpkins."

Having graduated, she was released.

"Now, my darter—" He sat down and took out his pipe. His brow was placid and his smile benign. His eyebrows were raised and the corners of his mouth were down, and he looked very pitiful indeed (to those who had only a bowing acquaintance)—"Now, my darter, I ez tried to do my duty by you and Marriar, but ef you needs ennything mo', 'specially dogwood bitters, all you got to do is jes' to—come an' ax pa."

—Jennie Woodville, in Lippincott's for May.

A Texas minister arose before a large audience, took his text, and began preaching. A brisk firing of pistols began on the outside of the church.

"Brother Deacon," said the minister, "I believe those fellows are casting insinuations at me. In fact, I am very nearly convinced," he continued, as a piece of plastering fell from the wall close to his head.

"I think, parson, that it refers to some one else," replied the deacon.

The minister raised a tumbler of water, and was in the act of applying his lips when the glass fell, shattered by a shot.

"This is an innuendo no longer," said the minister, wiping the water from his vest. "This is what I term an unmistakable thrust. The congregation will please sing while I go out and investigate this matter. Is there another preacher in the house?"

"Yes," said a man, throwing down a stick which he had been whittling, arising and pulling at the waist of his pants like a man who had just straightened up after setting out a row of tobacco across a broad field.

"Got on an extra?"

"Yes."

"Unlimber."

The whittling preacher handed over a large Remington pistol, which the insulted preacher took, and drawing one from his belt, started out. After going out there was an immediate improvement in the firing business. It was decidedly more lifelike, inasmuch that the deacons sat working their fingers. After a while the minister returned, saying, as he took his place in the pulpit, "He that hath ears to hear, let him behave himself." The sermon then proceeded without interruption.

ON SELECTING SUITABLE WINE LANDS.

There is good reason to believe that the plantation of new vineyards and the extension of existing ones will be renewed, next autumn and spring, with a vigor greater than at any former time since European vines were introduced into the State by the late Mr. Haraszthy. After passing through the ordeal of most new industries in a new country, wine-making in California is now entering on the high road to lasting success; which it will surely achieve unless the stupidity, ignorance, and self-sufficiency of the viniculturists hinder or destroy the chance. Already the comparatively imperfect article has gained a footing in several great centres of the United States, such as Chicago, St. Louis, and New York; while recent shipments of young wines to France and Germany attest the appreciation in which it is held by professional wine traders and merchants. Evidence of this truth is before us in the fact of Gundlach & Co. having, within a few weeks, shipped fifty thousand gallons of Sonoma white to Germany, and other houses by the same vessel to the extent of two hundred thousand gallons of red and white wines to either France or Germany.

Now it is to the important matter of selecting lands and forming new vineyards that we would at present invite the attention of intending planters. It is generally known that all cultivated lands, taken indiscriminately, are not equally suited for vineyards, whether we consider the quantity or the quality of the produce. There will be at least two distinct classes of intending viticulturists—capitalists and companies, and men of moderate means, with resources enough to make a beginning, and the prospect of enlarging the area from year to year.

With regard to capitalists and companies, they can select and buy where they like, and a word or two is all that now need be said to them. Go to the foot-hills and take up an area of flat or gently sloping land, and as much of the hill-sides as you like, the more the better; the obvious reason being that on the rich alluvial or diluvial land the crop will be abundant and comparatively coarse in quality, while the uplands and higher slopes will yield less indeed, but of the highest quality. "Bacchus amat Colles"—the wine-god loves the hills. Yet whether the choice should fall on plains or hills ought to be mainly decided by the class and character of the contemplated yield, and the same may be said of the variety of vines selected. On rich, fat, loamy land such vines as Grenache, Miller's Burgundy, and Mataro would yield over one thousand gallons to the acre, while Zinfandel, the best red grape at present in the State, would hardly yield five hundred, and none of them would prove very prolific on high and dry hill-sides. Moreover, the State contains large tracts of country where the counterpart may be found for every wine region of Europe, from the north of France and Switzerland, to the Douro, Lisbon, and Jerez. But each and all of them requires study and attention to the varieties of vine to be planted, because every vine claims a special kind of climate in order to yield its best, both in quality and kind.

Now, thanks to the late Legislature, facilities are afforded not only for scientific investigation of soils and wines by the professor of agriculture at the State University and his assistant, but by enabling the Board of Viticulturists to open an office in San Francisco, with a secretary, to collect all sorts of useful information, and distribute it throughout the entire State; and also by making provision for lectures on viticulture and the management of cellars, to be delivered by competent persons in each of the principal wine regions of the State during the next twelve months.

But in many respects the most important consideration is, how to advise the intending cultivator, who, up to the present, has little or no knowledge of vineyard work. Let us suppose that his first aim is to make a living. In that case, secure either new rich lands, with fall enough to prevent accumulation of stagnant water, and, where possible, with a gravelly subsoil; or, what is better, land that has been exhausted by long-continued, injudicious cropping, remembering that though it will no longer yield wheat, it is not the less available for wines. The next thing is preparing such land for planting. The best of all is to trench it to the depth of two and a half feet, and form drains every twenty feet by burying twigs and light branches of trees, worthless scrub, and the like. But this is far too expensive for the means within the reach of the class of cultivators we are contemplating. The next best plan is to tear up the land from as deep as any subsoil cultivator can be made to reach, and leave the gables open to sun and wind for as many months as possible, and then work it down in the usual way. Avoid adobe land. Where the land is a light loam, with gravelly subsoil, and no hard-pan between it and the gravel, then ordinary deep plowing will suffice, as we have seen it at Fresno and some other localities. In the beginning, however, quantity, not quality, of grapes or wines is the primary consideration with the man of limited resources who means to live by viticulture.

It is the fashion in Russia that whenever two people meet on Easter-day they kiss each other on the mouth, and while one says "Christ is risen!" the other replies "He is risen, indeed!" Now it seems that the Emperor Nicholas had so arranged it that the sentry placed at the palace-gate should be an Israelite, and a very pronounced one. Early in the morning Nicholas betook himself to the gate, and giving the soldier the Easter kiss, said:

"Brother, Christ is risen!"

The soldier's bronzed face flushed, but, bringing his musket at the salute, he replied, resolutely:

"No, father, he is not!"

Upon this the emperor pretended to get into a furious passion, and in a loud voice he repeated, "Christ is risen!" The soldier trembled; he saw the knout-lash dangling before his eyes; but the love of his faith was stronger than his fear of punishment, and bringing his musket-stock down with a crash, he cried:

"No, he is not!"

The Czar respected the man's adherence to his belief, rewarded him, and left, heartily laughing over the adventure.

It comes kind o' sudden like, just as the congregation have finished singing "Salvation's free," to have the preacher announce that "the collection will now be taken up."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1880.

From the trifles and annoyances of our local politics, let us turn to more important matters. There are serious political questions pressing to the front for consideration; questions demanding the gravest deliberation of the wisest men, because they involve the welfare, indeed the very existence, of society. It is but a shallow and thoughtless brain that does not observe the cloud that spreads and darkens over our political horizon, and that does not observe that it is charged with elements of destruction to all organized government. The danger of which we speak did not originate in our country; but it is in our country that its violence will be most seriously felt. Like certain destructive epidemics, it passes away from the land where it originates, to find conditions more acceptable; and there it deals its most terrible and destructive blows. The social questions that in centuries past have so seriously menaced the governments of the world are again presenting themselves. The social wars of the Roman empire; the insurrection of the French peasantry against the French nobles in the thirteenth century; the reign of terror in France, that began with the execution of Louis XVI., and ended when Robespierre gave up his life on the guillotine; the insurrections and uprisings all through the history of the ages have indicated the unrest of that great toiling majority that ever since the world began has protested against the usurpation of its rights and the invasion of its privileges by the privileged classes. This sentiment is again active. Like earth's interior fires it is ever at work, ever restless, ever burning, and ever straining to throw off the mountains of government that suppress it, and to break the traditions of authority that, like rock-ribbed hills, chain it down. It is said there is always an earthquake somewhere on the earth's surface, and the theory is that the pent-up forces are ever searching for and striving to find the weak place. At times great upheavals and convulsions occur, demonstrating the vast forces that struggle below. In the social world, lying down—sometimes far down—under the patiently builded superstructure of authority—authority of dynasty, government, class privileges, and property rights—this great, toiling, restless mass of a human majority strains and hraces itself for revolt. In other and older lands government was organized in view of this known condition. Its foundations were laid by chiefs and leaders, and its superstructure was builded for the protection of a class. The divine right of kings, priestly privileges, and social distinctions grew up. Ecclesiasticism and prerogative were hedged round by superstition and tradition; and out from the people were chosen the young and the brave, to guard, as a standing army, the privileges that the superior class had stolen. Whenever and wherever there came the revolt of peasants and peoples, the soldiers of the people were hired, and from their own stolen treasures paid to suppress the social discontent that came from their robbery and oppression. This is the kind of government that controls the old world. It is the government of India and China. In those countries the battles, if ever fought, were won by the privileged classes, and for fifty centuries the people—the masses—have yielded the struggle, and been content to fight with nature for subsistence; content to live, only live. The later governments of the European lands, the governments we are pleased to call civilized, are splendid imitations of the olden type; and, except here and there, as in Germany and France and elsewhere, where local, brief, and fruitless efforts have been made for change, have been equally successful in maintaining governments in the interest of property, dynasties, ecclesiastics, and privileged classes. The struggle is going on to-day in Russia—one of the youngest and strongest of the dynasties finds itself fighting for its life against the secret force that plots its overthrow. The Czar, and terrible Romanoff, with his secret spies, his police, his faithful nobles, the national church, whose metropolitan he is, his vast standing army, his impregnable fortresses and well-guarded palaces, finds himself contending with forces that only show upon the surface—students, women, and unknown adventurers. Germany, with a monarch honored for his private character, with the strongest of military governments, fresh from a conquest that unified the German empire, with a parliament that embraces the best learning of the world, with universities that give scholars and teachers to civilization, and with a chancellor that stands foremost among the world's statesmen, and a standing army that can defy the world upon the battle-field, confronts, and tremblingly, the social apparition that hides among its students, lurks in the closets of its universities, and permeates the great toiling majority that wields the axe in its forests, and delves with the spade in its fields. The history of France and Spain within the century—the condition of France, and Spain, and Great Britain to-day—indicate the agitation of the same questions, and challenge the attention of their best and ablest statesmen.

If in China and India the victory has been won by the privileged classes, it may not be assumed that in America there will be a like result. Whatever may be the outcome of social agitation in Europe, it will furnish no example to America. Our conditions are so altogether dissimilar that he is an unwise and shallow thinker who hopes to draw any parallels from any other country than our own. Ours is a republic, where every white male citizen is the equal in political power of every other white male citizen. Ours is a government of law, where the majority is clothed with political authority. We have no privileged class under the law. We have neither kings nor nobles hedged around by traditions, nor ecclesiastics guarded by superstition. We have no standing army. We have no army nor police authority that is not recruited directly from the people. Our Constitution guarantees the right of all citizens to bear arms. Our law-makers are chosen directly from the people; our judges who interpret them are chosen in like manner. A majority rules; so that it must follow that whenever the interests of the majority prompt to action in any direction, that action will follow as a certain result. A judiciary holding its authority from the people will only be pure, learned, and firm so long as a majority of the people are of like character. Juries will only be honest when chosen from honest men. Legislators will only make good laws so long as the majority of electors demand good laws. The army will always submit to the authority of the dominant party; the police will only serve the people who elect them; the inferior magistracy will become the tool of the people who create it. From the majority there is no appeal; there can be none. Then it follows that our government can only endure in its present form just so long, and no longer, than it is for the interest of the majority to continue it; and whenever it becomes the interest of the majority to change it, then the change will quickly and inevitably follow. It is clearly apparent that there will be no sentiment, no hesitation, and no consideration for the protection of any interest other than for that of the majority. If the passion, the prejudice, or the self-interest of the majority prompts its movement in any given direction, that is the way it will go, and there will be no regard paid to the rights of the minority, and no hesitation in trampling them under foot. To illustrate with one suggestion: If, in a government like ours, there are more electors who have nothing than those who have something; if there are more who think their condition would be improved by anarchy, and that during the existence of a general disturbance their condition would not be injured, and out of such a disturbance they would emerge in no worse form than when they went in, what is to prevent them from deliberately making the experiment of a subversion of all authority? What is there to hinder an idle and impecunious majority from so legislating and so administering the laws that agrarianism becomes a practical reality? What is to prevent a division of property and a practical realization of those ideas that now disturb the imaginations of the Socialistic dreamers of Russia, Germany, and France? How long would the government of England endure the experiment of giving the ballot and the bayonet to every white male citizen within the boundaries of the United Kingdom? How long would those things remain which are now styled royal family, crown lands, nobility, aristocracy, established church, hereditary rights, entailed estates? Apply the laws of the United States to the United Kingdom, and the boasted government of our mother country would soon undergo a radical change.

Now, if we are right in these reflections, there can be only one way in which the Government of the United States can put off the evil day of the possibilities we have suggested, and that is by elevating the character—moral and intellectual—of that class upon whom depends the permanence of our laws and the preservation of our government. One upon which good and thoughtful people will widely differ: Some will say by religion and through the church; some, by education and through the school-house; some, by placing a strong man at the head of the government; some, by the subdivision of property—real property—into small holdings and thus interesting the masses in the preservation of their own accumulations; some, in confining the elective privilege to the intelligent; and some, by confining its exercise to those who have acquired property. Having in view a partial remedy, we will not turn aside to discuss those named. The partial remedy we have to suggest will be anticipated by those who are constant readers of the Argonaut. It is simply this: Let us so regulate our immigration laws as to prevent the coming to our shores of the ignorant, the idle, and the vicious of all other nationalities. Let America no longer become the City of Refuge for the paupers, criminals, and vagabonds of Europe, and the slaves and coolies of Asia. Let us not fling away our splendid heritage; let us not despoil our children of their inheritance to dower the poor of other lands. A nation fifty million strong need not be impatient to fill its vacant places. Its sons and daughters are crowding on fast enough. It is mad and insane profligacy to despoil them for the advancement of alien families. It is base and spurious sentimentality to invite to our country the uneducated and undisciplined of other and redundant populations. We are invaded from Asia and from Europe, and both are eating us up with their hungry multitudes. We fear the collision of these invading hosts. We fear and tremble lest our beautiful land shall become the battle-ground of these contending races. The advance of the Asiatic is a menace to American liberty and to our form of Christian civilization. Where he plants his foot he ever stands. The Chinese, once passing his wall of exclusiveness, never goes backward. He colonizes as he advances. The Chinaman in California is the reconnoissance. He invades the continent as the waters of our rivers invade the rescued tule lands; he does not hurst the levees by violence, and overrun the fields with torrents; he percolates. Silently, noiselessly, but steadily, he trickles through all our avenues of industry. The labor he attacks he monopolizes. His virtues are his terror. His industry, his economy, his law-abiding instincts, his fatalistic submission to the inevitable, his enduring patience, overcome and beat us. His one sole, governing, all-absorbing aim of life is simply to live; and against it there is nothing—not Asiatic—that can survive. Nothing but the sharply incisive action of the Federal authority will resist this inflowing stream of Asian life, and we despair of its being exercised. Commercial greed; the hesotted sentiment of pious ignorance; the indifference of those in Eastern States, who will never anticipate danger till its skeleton crouches at their own hearthstones; the cowardice of political parties; the mercenary subservience of the press; the shameful ignorance of the pulpit; and the indifference of the masses of the American people, make us despair of the only remedy till its enforcement will lead to conflict. The Chinese will not cease coming to San Francisco. The Chinese will not be driven out of Mott Street. There is not wealth, nor genius, nor lawful authority enough in the great, splendid city of New York to ever remove the Asian from his chosen domicile in the heart of its metropolis.

Another thing—looking to the preservation of our republican form of government—we would do, viz: repeal all existing naturalization laws, and by one sweeping enactment declare that no man should be an elector unless he was born upon the soil, unless he was white, twenty-one years of age, was sufficiently intelligent to read understandingly the laws of the country, paid some tax or performed some service for his country, and had never become (unless by sickness or calamity) a pauper upon its charity, or been convicted of willful breach of its penal laws. To this law there should be no other exception than by the National Congress for some distinguished and eminent national service. To accomplish this result we appeal to the native-born American to rescue our land and our government from this Asian and European invasion. We appeal to his patriotism, and to his love of family, of liberty, and of his native land. To the intelligent foreigner who has become domiciled among us, and who has been clothed with the elective franchise, we appeal to his gratitude, his sense of right, his self-interest. We say to him—that which he must know better than we can know—that the country of his birth is sending to us its criminals, its paupers, its idle, and its adventurers in dangerous numbers. Immigration has taken a new impulse. By the thousands every month, aggregating hundreds of thousands in the year, this foreign invasion is pouring in upon us. It crowds our cities, and already some of the more prominent of American cities are subjected to the political control of this un-American multitude. Let this invasion go on unchecked; let this alien mob be clothed with the privilege of the elective franchise, and our form of government, our social organization, and our property are imperiled. It threatens violence, anarchy, and misrule, which, within the coming generations, will be as injurious to you, and your children, and your interests, as to us and ours of native birth. We appeal to the intelligent only of foreign birth. Your interests are our interests; your destiny is with us. This land, ours by birth, is yours by choice and adoption. We must begin at some time to draw this political line. You are fortunate; you are citizens. Let us, then, work together. You may have some friends and countrymen yet to arrive. Forget them and their interests in remembering your own and your children's. Unless we can agree upon these modified laws in reference to European immigration and naturalization, neither you nor we can, with any propriety, ask for restrictive laws against the Chinese. To the low, ignorant, and vicious foreigner; to the meaner and more contemptible native-born demagogue; to those who make of politics a profession, and place-hunting a pursuit, we make no appeal.

And so the Democracy have determined to consolidate with the Sand-lot. Issues are to be pooled. Kallloch and Kearney, Steinman and Gannon, Mrs. Smith and Jimmy O'Meara, George Pen Johnson and Colonel Fritz, Judge Wallace and Buckley, Bryant and Brady and Mannix, Governor Irwin, Lieutenant-Governor Johnson, Cactus Burch, and Clitus Barbour are all wallowing together. A happy family of bears and bulls, birds, beasts, and unclean things connubiating and communing in ante-nuptial harmony. The ward Democratic clubs have resolved that Kearney is a martyr, suffering undeserved punishment, and that the good and pious Mr. Kallloch is being persecuted by wicked Supervisors; while the gentlemen Democrats of the State Club are lying back in easy dignity, expecting the higher offices, and leaving the unwashed rabble to struggle and sweat in the arena of ward conflicts. We are more than delighted at the prospect of this coalition between all that is worst in politics and all that is left of the Democratic party. The Democratic party is bad enough and dangerous enough when it is under the discipline of organization and the direction of a responsible leadership. So we are in earnest when we say that we rejoice at a unification of its heretofore discordant elements, and shall hail the event of a reconciliation between the Democracy of the Sand-lot and the Democracy of the Pacific Club as an event to be greatly desired. We congratulate the party that it secures the accomplished and versatile Mr. Kallloch, and that the eloquence of the Metropolitan pulpit will go out in prayers for the welfare of the Democracy. We congratulate it upon the acquisition of that other Republican, Mr. Kearney. And while we realize the loss that will occur to the Republicans, in the defection of such able and effective workers, we realize that in the Republican loss there is a Democratic gain that will greatly contribute to the general welfare of the whole country. There are other Republicans that the party could well spare. We shall do all that in our power lies to see that they are spared. If we could drive out about half a hundred Republican ward loafers and ring thieves, now hanging about the party for plunder and the loot of office, we should strengthen the party for the struggle upon which it is about to enter; we should make it more fit to enter upon the contest that lies before it, and prepare it to receive those new doctrines the adoption and triumph of which involve the safety and perpetuity of our republican government. Looking back over the past political history of this city and State, we are convinced that the best interest of the people lies in the maintenance of two great and nearly equally divided and responsible political parties. There comes a time, perhaps, when, in some occasional and anomalous condition of affairs, party discipline may be relaxed, and some local question makes it desirable for other than party divisions; but, as a rule, it is clearly better that the masses of our people should divide upon party issues. It is better that the Republican party and the Democratic party should exist, and that to these organizations should belong the great, unthinking masses. The uneducated of the rank and file of parties are better off as enlisted soldiers, fighting in the ranks, submitting to party discipline, and coming under the control of leaders, than as bodies of free-lancers, roaming at will, prepared for indiscriminate political pillage, or to act as mercenaries for the party bidding highest for their support. We have seen the evil that comes from mob rule. A Constitution has been adopted for which neither party is fully responsible; we have a partial city government that belongs to nobody; a Mayor that is neither Republican nor Democratic; a Supreme Bench that owes its Chief Justice and some of its members to a law-breaking element; a Sheriff that bails offenders and seems to be in sympathy with the class that sets law at defiance; a Treasurer that keeps the money of which his supporters contribute but a small part; and an Auditor that passes upon accounts which those who voted for him do not pay. We are not quite sure that our "Dolly Varden," "Independent," "People's," "Citizens," and "Tax-payers" parties have—in the long run—contributed to the better government of our city and State. We seriously question whether it would not be better to get back to the old condition of things, namely: two nearly equally balanced political parties. Between these two organizations, holding the balance of power, is always an intelligent, independent, non-partisan vote, that makes itself felt in the councils and nominating conventions of both parties. These men may be called "Independents," "Bolters," "Scratchers," "Sore-heads," or by any epithet that partisan passion may put upon them; but, after all, they exercise a healthful influence in keeping either party up to honest work. So, we say we rejoice at the probable coalition of the Kearney-Kallloch-Sand-lot party with the Democracy. There is a large and honest rank and file in the Democratic party. It has honorable, intelligent, and patriotic leaders. And if it has capacity to digest this nasty element of the slums we hope it will do so. At all events, we prefer to see the skunk in the bowels of the snake than to have it run at large.

The necessity of another and a different daily morning paper than any published in this city has been a want long felt. We have wished that it could be possible to give to our city an independent, able, and honest journal—one that should be enterprising, but truthful; racy, but not impure; newsy, but not slanderous; reliable, but not stupid; independent, but not vacillating; vigorous, but not venomous; liberal, but not licentious; conservative, but not old fogyish—one that would not pander to the Sand-lot or the grasping rich, and one that would seek to promote the material and moral welfare of this city and State—a journal whose methods should be legitimate and honorable, whose policy would be principle—that in politics would support the best man for the place, regardless of party, and the right, regardless of consequences—a journal appealing to the good sense, honor, and moral worth of the people—a paper of the highest motives, the purest moral tone, and the loftiest ambition for the accomplishment of good. The Daily Globe came into being, baptized with all these hopes and promises. It came from a labor strike, with which we sympathized, as we do with all honest efforts of honest labor to maintain its rights. We hoped it would be a valiant ally of good order and good society, and a bold soldier in the service of good government. We waited, hoping, till on Sunday it issued its fourth number, when it came out—as we interpret its attitude—in defense of Kallloch, in sympathy with Kearney, and in support of the principles and the objects of the Sand-lot. We have regarded Kallloch as an unprincipled demagogue, Kearney as an unprincipled agitator, and the Sand-lot as an academy of unprincipled and dangerous political adventurers. We have believed that the history and successes of this institution have been damaging to our material welfare, hurtful to our morals, and a menace to the best interests of society and government. Hence, when Kearney was imprisoned according to law, we rejoiced; when the Board of Supervisors took legal proceedings to remove Kallloch from office, we rejoiced; and when the result of this effort of law had resulted in the restoration of quiet and order, and allowed our city to start again upon its career of progress, we rejoiced. Last Saturday night an indignation meeting was called—a meeting to express indignation against the courts and judges for convicting Kearney; indignation against the Supervisors for subjecting the Mayor to a legal investigation; indignation against citizens for breathing more freely after this long nightmare of fear and terror coming from the insurrection of the Sand-lot. Out of this meeting came resolutions declaring Isaac S. Kallloch "the most upright, honorable, and best official;" denouncing the Supervisors as governed by "selfish motives," and as " nefarious plunderers;" and speeches endorsing the Sand-lot and the conduct of Kearney. Naturally we looked to the Globe for some editorial opinions upon this meeting. We said: "Let us see now where the new journal ranges itself." To our surprise, there was no expression in the editorial columns. And we said: "Let us look to the news column; it will reflect the sentiment that is to govern the new journal." The heading of the article declared that the meeting was "large and enthusiastic;" that the hall was "densely packed," "brilliantly lighted," "crowded with prominent politicians," "decorated with flags and banners." Through the speeches the reporter liberally sprinkled appropriate "applause," "tremendous applause," "cheers and hisses," "cheers," "hoots and groans," "cheers and laughter," "loud cries," "cheers." The speakers were styled "eminent," and the meeting was described as one of "intense enthusiasm of assembled thousands who almost idolized" our Reverend Mayor and Baptist parson. So far as we can guess, the Daily Globe ranges itself with the Sand-lot and the Democracy.

This is Monday morning, and if the Daily Globe shall define its position during the week to be other than in sympathy with riot, misrule, and disorder, we shall note and observe it. If it takes position on the side of good government we shall wish it success; if otherwise, we shall hope that business men will not support it, that intelligent men will not read it, and that over its early grave may be erected a monument bearing the inscription from the first line of the first column of its own first issue, as follows:

"DEATH, GRIM DEATH."

P. S.—Up to Friday we obtain no proof that this journal is not in sympathy with Kearney, Kallloch, and the Sand-lot. We are sorry and disappointed. We hope yet that it may embrace the opportunity of merited success, and array itself with the better side. Otherwise, it is clean, bright, and interesting. We wish it all the success it shall deserve.

We are not sufficiently advised of all the facts in the Mussel Slough business to venture upon its full discussion. It seems to us, as we now view the matter, as an inexcusable revolt of settlers against the law, not justifiable by any surrounding conditions. If we assume that the railroad authorities have been illiberal, unjust, and tyrannical; if they have committed crimes against the people of that vicinity; if Leland Stanford and Charles Crocker, disguised, and in the night-time, burned the settlers' dwellings, and in the first-born of every home, still there can be no possible defense or explanation of the fact that an armed body of mounted men resisted a United States Marshal in the execution of the final decree of a United States Court. That they did so, refused to hear him read his writ, threatened his life if he returned to Hanford, and by violence and threat of arms drove him from the performance of his duty, seems to be admitted. That seven men were killed is a sufficiently lamentable occurrence, and all kind-hearted persons will sympathize with their afflicted and sorrowing friends. But the death of seven, or seven thousand times seven, is not at all comparable to this wanton defiance of law. To bring the law into contempt is the unpardonable sin in a republican government. Unless the law is maintained, all human life is imperiled. To allow any class or community, for any cause, to set the law at defiance, is to endanger society. We reserve to ourselves the privilege of discussing this occurrence and the lesson to be drawn from it, independent of any consideration for the personal feelings or personal interests involved in it, when the facts shall have been more fully brought forth.

The ever-unreliable Associated Press dispatches telegraph us from the East, "A big boom for Field." This thunder in a pot resolves itself into an interview between Judge S. C. Hastings (who has not been East), and Alex. Mahon (of whom we never heard), and the reporter of an obscure newspaper. They say—which is absurd and untrue—that Field can carry California by ten thousand against any candidate the Republicans can name. We should be more than content to see Judge Field the Democratic candidate. We recognize his ability and his patriotism. He would make a good President; and it would be a matter of just pride to our State, for he is one of its oldest and most useful citizens. He aided in laying the foundations of our State government, and he has been a most faithful and diligent worker in building upon its foundation the present superstructure of law. To his judicial interpretation, more than to any one else, we owe our land, mining, and water laws.

A mad world, my masters! Here is a Gladstone placating his Imperial Kaisership, Franz Josef, surnamed of Hapsburg-Lothringen, Head of the Holy Romish Empire, by solemnly stating, in the face of Europe, that his recent reflections on that potentate were intended to bear a purely Pickwickian construction. And the face of Europe remains stonily grave, and there is never an indecorous quiver in the eyelid of it, hinting at any sense of the prodigiousness of the lark. For who is this Gladstone, whose ungarded speech has racked the bosom of Mother Church's eldest son? Positively a nobody—a mere mister—a plebeian—no one of whose wife's cousins, even, is known to have married an earl. To a kaiser of any delicacy of feeling it is painful to have his nose pulled publicly; but one would think it should be even more mortifying to have the ignoble fingers that did the deed twiddled before the eyes of Europe, even in a gesture of apology. The butcher's son of Ipswich who once made free with an ancestral emperor's nose had at least washed their natal stain from off his base-born hands in holy water. The Wallenstein who treated another ancestor with like indignity was a high-well-born—a fact serving as salve to the excoriated feature. But the Gladstone paw hath no strain of nobility. It even handles an axe with an aptitude hinting darkly at a professional dexterity on the part of some sufficiently remote ancestor. We trust—we trust this paralyzing thought will not occur to Franz Josef. For he is a dear old boy.

The Punch, just to hand, has a fascinating social picture: a party trooping to the dining-hall. One member of each couple is of vast stature and superb physical proportion, and of marked North-European physiognomy; the other member appears of the merely modern mortal size and form, with features of a Syrian cast. The text elucidating this drawing (which is of an imaginary assemblage some century or more hence), expounds the first group as the descendants of the tennis-playing female and her athletic mate of the present day; the companion group is described as of an ancient people who haste not, neither do they rest. Here is more mad world, my masters! It is only twenty-two years at this writing since the most noble, Her Majesty's House of Peers, conceded Baron Rothschild to be a fit associate for her loyal Commons. And behold now the organ of real "society"—in a mirthful spirit of prophecy, none the less instructive for all its levity of form—pictures the Baron's cousinhood walking away with the cream of society hooked under their arms. If it be true that the cream of society is an offer to the highest bidder, the prophecy is inspired by no lying spirit. Of course, this proposition is true. Of course, there never was a time in the history of human society when it was not true. And, of course, there never will be. But why should those gainful traffickers want then to invest in giants? As yet, my Lord Anak is lord of the land, and prudent purchase among his sons and daughters is not void of advantage. But in that further future the social prophet glances at, it is not altogether apparent that brawn will maintain the premium he predicates.

A ROSE-TINTED MATRIMONIAL DRAMA.

Dedicated to Unwary Young Bachelors.

[FROM THE FRENCH OF GUSTAVE DROZ.]

Madame—"Oh, how pleasant it is to have you come home early! Not six o'clock yet. Why, how cold your hands are! Come and sit by the fire. [She puts more coal on.] I've been thinking about you all day long. And such dreadful weather to be out in, too. Well, and how are affairs at the office?"

Monsieur—"Oh, pretty good, my dear, pretty good. [Aside.] Wonder what's the matter with her? She's as smiling as a basket of chips. [Aloud.] I've got a famous appetite, too, I can tell you. How's baby been to-day—good?"

Madame—"Oh, splendid—as quiet as an angel. And so you're hungry, are you? I'm awful glad. [Calling.] Marie, tell the cook that your master wants to dine early; and Marie, tell him to be careful about you know what, and—"

Monsieur—"Aha! A mystery?"

Madame—"Yes, I have a little surprise for you, and I know you'll be delighted."

Monsieur—"Well, tell me all about it."

Madame—"Oh, this is a real, true, genuine surprise—see how your eyes glisten—you're just dying to know what it is, but I shan't tell you—there!"

Monsieur—"Oh, my dear, you will break my heart if you don't."

Madame—"There, now, she doesn't want to see him dying from curiosity—no, indeed she doesn't. Well, he shall have—he shall have—oysters on the shell!"

Monsieur—"Oysters!"

Madame—"And he shall have quail!"

Monsieur—"Quail!"

Madame—"And he shall have a bottle of that famous Lafitte with his quail, so he shall! There now—ain't I good?"

Monsieur—"Good? Why, my little wife's an angel. [Aside.] I wonder what the devil's the matter with her? Hum—hum—let me see. [Aloud.] Anybody been here to-day, my dear?"

Madame—"No, nobody. Ah, yes—Ernestine was here. She's just turned off that good-for-nothing hussy, her maid, she says."

Monsieur—"Indeed? No one else?"

Madame—"Not a soul—why yes, of course; how forgetful I am, to be sure—Madame de Lyr was here."

Monsieur—"Oho! Bless her sweet soul! Is her smile as crooked as ever?"

Madame—"You oughtn't to speak so unkindly of her, my dear; she thinks a great deal of you. She always asks after you. She came to tell me to-day that her tea-party—now I know that you're going to be angry!" [She sits beside him, and puts her arm around his neck.]

Monsieur—"Angry? Why, one would think from your tone that I was a Turk! Well, what about her—"

Madame—"Oh, never mind. Dinner's nearly ready, and our quail will be waiting. Besides, you're in a dreadful bad humor, I know you are. Anyway, we're not going, so—"

Monsieur [aside, with a groan].—"I'm not so sure of that. [Aloud.] May the devil fly away with her and her tea-party! What have I done to the woman that she should invite—"

Madame—"Why, she thought you'd be pleased to come. She's a dear, good soul, and I like her because she's so fond of you. She's always praising you. If you'd been within hearing when she was here to-day you'd have blushed to your ears, I know you would. [Monsieur shrugs his shoulders.] 'He's such a charming fellow, is your husband,' said she; 'so witty, you know. Now do try and make him come.' Of course I said I would, but I knew perfectly well you wouldn't go. Besides, I don't care to go myself. There's always such a lot of pokey old people at her house. It's true, they're very wealthy, and influential, and all that sort of thing, and might be useful acquaintances—but, pshaw, what's the use of talking about it? Let's go to dinner. Your wine, my dear, is some of that famous old Lafitte of '56 that pa left me. It will be splendid with your quail, won't it? You don't know how much pleasure I take in seeing you eat quail!—every morsel is devoured with such an uncton. I'm afraid you're getting to be an epicure, my dear. [She takes his arm.] But come, let us go to the dining-room."

Monsieur [reflectively].—"Hum—hum! And when is it?"

Madame—"When is it—when is what?"

Monsieur—"Why, the tea-party."

Madame—"The tea-par—the tea—oh, you mean the ball—yes, of course, Madame de Lyr's ball. I'd forgotten all about it. But what does it matter, since we're not going? Let's hurry, or dinner'll be cold. For this evening."

Monsieur—"What!!! The tea-party is a ball, and the ball is for this evening! Why, that's a little strong, I think. Does she expect people to go to a ball on one day's notice?"

Madame—"Oh, no—she sent the invitation a week ago. I don't know what's become of those cards—I was going to show them to you, but I forgot."

Monsieur—"Oh, you forgot!"

Madame—"Well, it's just as well. And now to dinner."

And to dinner they go. The cloth is snowy white, the cutlery glistening, the oysters excellent, and the quails—which are done to a turn—exhale a most appetizing odor. Madame is simply charming; she laughs at all of Monsieur's jokes. He gradually unbends, extends himself comfortably in his chair, and says:

"Tell you what, my love, this wine is not to be sneezed at. Shall I give you another glass?"

"Of course I want another." [She waves her glass coquettishly.]

Monsieur—"What's that? Oh, that's the ring I gave you. You haven't worn it for a long time. Pretty, isn't it?"

Madame—"It's just too sweet! But look—the reason I don't wear it is because it's broken."

Monsieur—"Broken?—where?" [kissing her fingers].

Madame—"There, now, do be serious. Don't you see it?" They put their heads together to examine the ring. Madame points to the momentous fracture. They examine it attentively.

Monsieur—"Oh, yes, that little pearl—what have you on your hair, my love? Delicious perfume. Yes, we must send it to the jeweler's. Do you know, you don't look half bad with your hair that way?"

Madame [coquettishly].—"Do you think so? [She shapes her hair with a plump white hand.] I don't know whether to believe you or not. If I were in your place, and liked the way my wife looked, I would—"

Monsieur—"What would you do?"

Madame—"I would kiss my little wife, that's what I'd do!"

[*! *!! *!!!]

Monsieur—"Well, well—we act as if we were just married, don't we? Give me the least bit of quail, please. Ah, how funny they look, the little fellows, running through the fields in autumn. And then that peculiar cry they have—a little gravy, please. It makes one feel quite poetical to think of the fields and the country, doesn't it? And just imagine—there are barbarians who eat them with cabbage! But tell me [fills his glass], you have no dress ready, have you?"

Madame—"Dress—ready—and for what, pray?"

Monsieur—"Why, for Madame de—"

Madame—"Oh, for the ball. What a memory you have—are you thinking of that yet? No, I have nothing ready—absolutely nothing. But stop—yes, I have—there's my tartanet; and then, you know, it's very little trouble to get up something for a ball."

Monsieur—"But the hair-dresser is not notified."

Madame—"Yes, that's true, he's not; but pshaw, I don't care for the ball. We'll go and sit by the fire and read a while, then go to bed early. Now I think of it, though, Madame de Lyr said to me to-day, as she was leaving: 'My dear, we have the same hairdresser—I'll tell him to call at your house.' Wasn't I silly?—I didn't answer her at all. But it isn't far—I'll send Marie, and tell him not to come."

Monsieur—"Oh, since that fool of a barber has been told to come, let him come; and we will go and be bo—go and amuse ourselves at Madame de Lyr's for a while. But upon one condition."

Madame—"And that is—"

Monsieur—"That I find everything ready for me—gloves, steel-pen, and all laid out on the bed, and that you tie my cravat."

Madame—"Agreed. You're a dear, good boy, so you are, and the best of husbands. I know you don't want to go, and that it's only on my account that you do."

Monsieur—"Well, I'll go off and smoke a cigar, so as not to be in your way, and at ten o'clock I'll return. You'll be all ready then, and I'll plunge into my black togs in about five minutes. By-by."

Monsieur disposes of his two hours as best he may. You can pass the evening agreeably enough when you're not bound to a certain hour for returning, but when you are—that's another affair. At five minutes to ten he returns, and finds the carriage waiting in front.

In my lady's chamber two shaded lamps shed a discreet glow over a scene of wild confusion. Mountains of muslin, ribbons, laces, skirts, underskirts, and faldals of all kinds are upon chairs, tables, and the bed. Puffs and curls and switches festoon the room. Madame's bouquet is a marvel of beauty. And yet, strange to say, though throned in the midst of all these luxuries, Madame is restless, Madame is disheveled, Madame is furious.

Monsieur [looking at his watch].—"Well, my dear, is your hair dressed yet?"

Madame [with a moan].—"He asks me if my hair is dressed! Look at me! Can't you see that I've been waiting for the hair-dresser for hours, for days, for centuries! Can't you see that I'm just raving because the wretch doesn't come?"

Monsieur—"The monster!"

Madame—"Oh, indeed! 'The monster'—that's right—make fun of me, you hateful thing—do!"

Monsieur—"But, my dear—"

The bell rings, the door opens, and Marie cries, "Madame, he comes!"

Madame—"He comes?"

Monsieur—"He comes!"

The great artist enters in haste, rolling up his sleeves as he bows.

Madame—"Silvani, this is really unbearable—"

Silvani—"Sorry, very sorry, Madame, but couldn't come sooner. Been dressing hair since three o'clock. Just left the Duchesse de W—; sent me here in her carriage. Lisette, gimme the combs, and put the irons to heat."

Madame—"But, Silvani, my maid's name is not Lisette."

Silvani—"Sorry, Madame, but if I had to remember the names of all the maids who assist me I should require six clerks instead of three. Lisette's a nice name, and does very well for all of 'em. Lisette, gimme the brushes. Ball official?"

Madame—"Never mind, Silvani—it's a ball."

Silvani—"Can't dress, hair, Madame, unless I know where it's going. [To Monsieur, who is seated in a corner.] Would you be good enough to move, sir? An artist must recoil a few paces now and then, in order to judge of the effect."

Monsieur—"Only too happy to oblige you, Monsieur Silvani." [He goes to a chair.]

Madame [with alarm].—"Not there, not there! You'll rumple my skirt! [He seeks another.] Oh, do look where you're going—you've knocked down my puffs! [He turns around.] Oh, what a man! Now upset some more things—do!"

Silvani—"Must beg Madame to be calm—calmness is indispensable."

Monsieur—"All right, I'll go into the sitting-room; is there a fire there, my dear?"

Madame—"What on earth makes you think there should be a fire there?"

Monsieur—"Well, in the library then?"

Madame—"Oh, he'll drive me wild! There's no fire there, either. Not too high, Silvani, and a little studied disorder, you know."

Silvani—"If Madame will not hamper my artistic soul, I will idealize her coiffure."

Monsieur—"Marie, give me my overcoat—I'll cool my heels in the hall. [Gritting his teeth.] Oh, I'll get even on Madame de Lyr!"

Silvani—"I will allow Madame's shell-like ear to reveal itself betwixt her raven locks. It would be a crime to conceal it. Madame has exactly the same ear as the Princesse de K—, whose hair I dressed yesterday. Lisette, prepare the powder."

At last Madame's hair is dressed. Silvani easts a final glance of satisfied pride upon his work, salutes, and retires. In passing through the hall he collides with Monsieur, who is there engaged in a solitary promenade, enveloped in an ulster.

Silvani—"Oh, a thousand pardons! I did not have the honor to see Monsieur."

Monsieur [from the depths of his collar].—"G'night."

At last the slumbering coachman is aroused, for Madame is ready. She casts a hasty glance at her reflected self, smiles her ball-room smile, and proceeds to put on her gloves.

Monsieur has made a failure of his cravat, and, in his haste, has lost three buttons from divers portions of his garments. Ill humor is reflected from every portion of his countenance.

Monsieur—"Oh, come, hurry up! It's a quarter-past eleven, and the carriage is waiting. [They descend.] Whip up, John. Rue de la Colline de Nobbe, number two-twenty-four."

John does whip up, and in a few minutes Colline de Nobbe is reached. But there is something the matter there. Policemen are running through the crowd. In the distance is heard the rolling of whels. Monsieur thrusts his head out of the window.

Monsieur—"What's the matter, John?"

John—"It's a fire, sir. Them is the engines which is a-comin' now."

Monsieur—"Well, never mind; take us to number two-twenty-four."

John—"Nummer two-twenty-four—that's percisely where we are, sir—an' where the fire is too, I'm a-thinkin'."

A footman leaves a group of servants standing in the street, and approaches the carriage.

Footman—"Am I right in supposing that you are guests of Madame de Lyr? She is desolated, but it is impossible for her to receive this evening, her mansion being, as you see, a prey to the ravages of a destructive conflagration." [Coughs with much dignity, and retires.]

Madame [with indignation].—"Why, it's perfectly outrageous! I never heard of such a thing!"

Monsieur [with a grin].—"Shameful, my dear; perfectly shameful!"

Madame—"The idea of making people go to all this trouble, and then—"

Monsieur—"And then setting fire to her house! Ha, ha! John, drive home!" [The brute retires into his collar, and laughs. Madame weeps in silence. Curtain.]

JEROME A. HART.

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1880.

He entered the country editor's den with the air of a man of leisure, and desired to see the proprietor. That individual looked up from the leader upon which he was engaged, and remarked that he was very busy, but could talk for a few minutes.

"Well," began the visitor, rather dryly, "I just thought I'd drop in on business. You may not be aware of the fact that I have for sale the very best suspenders to be found anywhere. They have shoulder-braces attached, and are pronounced perfect by eminent professors of physical culture. They are called the 'Arizona,' and don't shed their color in the hottest weather."

"I am really very busy," responded the editor, testily, "and don't—"

"And then," broke in the suspender man, "I have a fine assortment of neckwear and cuffs. It would do you good to see them. My cuffs are all made on an improved pattern, originated by myself, and they are cheap, too; only ten cents a pair."

"I can't—"

remarked the editor, in an ecstasy of despair, when the man of business again interrupted him by remarking: "And you should just lay your eyes on my toilet soaps, in all their pristine sumptuousness. I have bear-grease soap, and turtle oil, and also a beautifier made of the tissues of nightingales. The latter is a great favorite with the ladies. On each cake is inscribed the following:

"This makes the maiden's skin snow-white,
And fills her bosom chaste with hope;
When used at morning and at night
There's nothing like Jones' Butbul Soap.
'Twill happy every damsel make
For twenty-seven cents per cake."

"Then I have shaving-soap of a high order. Have you ever heard of my snapdragon shaving-soap?"

The editor, entirely out of patience, yelled at the top of his voice:

"I don't want any brushes, hair-grease, suspenders, cuffs, ice-cream-freezers, Huxley on the cray-fish, razors, fish-hooks, pins, Shelley's poems, velocipedes, pruning-shears, or anything else. I am busy, and have no time to throw away on canvassers!"

"I am no canvasser," responded the other, turning red in the face.

"You are not?"

"No, I am not!"

"Then," continued the editor, with a dumfounded air, "why do you come in here eulogizing your wares?"

"To give you an idea, and get your views on advertising."

"Do you want to advertise?" inquired the editor, his eyes glistening like dew-glints in the morning sun.

"I do, sir."

Then the editor took his order, told him he had lots of time, showed him through the press-room, took him out to luncheon, and invited him to call at his house and be introduced to the family; after which they parted as sentimentally as an engaged couple when one is going to Europe to spend the summer.

An Oaklandese reporter gave recently a thrilling account of a cyclone, alleged to have visited that village with such violence that "it lifted several young ladies off their feet." As a cold scientific fact, the story safely may be discredited; but one truth is forthcoming: any cyclone which could be persuaded to perform such an ungallant act as disturb the average Oaklandese young lady would be certain to "lift her off her feet"—for by no methods known to the science of the modern cyclone could the average Oaklandese young lady aforesaid be lifted feet and all.

Hollyhocks have the honor of being the favorite flower of the hour.

STYRIENNE.

—o||o—

ARRANGED FROM THE "TRAUMBILDER," BY FRED. LYSTER.

The musical score for "Styrienne" is arranged for piano in 3/4 time, key of D major. It consists of seven systems of music. The notation includes treble and bass staves with various notes, rests, and dynamic markings. Pedal points are indicated by "Ped." and asterisks throughout the piece.

System 1: Treble staff has a melody starting with a quarter rest, followed by eighth and sixteenth notes. Bass staff has a steady eighth-note accompaniment. Pedal markings: Ped., *, Ped., *, Ped., *.

System 2: Treble staff continues the melody. Bass staff has a steady eighth-note accompaniment. Pedal markings: *, Ped., *.

System 3: Treble staff continues the melody. Bass staff has a steady eighth-note accompaniment. Pedal markings: Ped., *, Ped., *, Ped., *.

System 4: Treble staff continues the melody. Bass staff has a steady eighth-note accompaniment. Pedal markings: *, Ped., *, Ped., *, Ped., *.

System 5: Treble staff continues the melody. Bass staff has a steady eighth-note accompaniment. Pedal markings: Ped., *, Ped., *, Ped., *.

System 6: Treble staff continues the melody. Bass staff has a steady eighth-note accompaniment. Pedal markings: Ped., *, Ped., *, Ped., *.

System 7: Treble staff continues the melody. Bass staff has a steady eighth-note accompaniment. Pedal markings: Ped., *, Ped., *, Ped., *.

Dynamic markings include Cres., f, Dim., and p.

I do not think there will be found a dozen persons to say that they really like Bandmann's "Hamlet." Bandmann's "Hamlet"? Yes, it has come to that. This complex young Dane, who has puzzled the generations since ever he was born in letters, is Booth's "Hamlet," or Barrett's "Hamlet," or McCullough's, or Bandmann's, or any man's, according to the manner of his interpretation. No one ever thinks of saying he is going to see Shakespeare's "Hamlet." They are rational enough, for no one yet knows Shakespeare's "Hamlet." What is there to say of the melancholy Prince that has not been said a thousand and ten thousand times? What is there left for an actor to do that has not been done? Yet there never was a tragedian who did not yearn to play "Hamlet" his own way. However bad the business, however cold the critics, however desolate the house, he will play the part with some heart in it. Can you not understand its fascination? Drop into the house on any Hamlet night, and give yourself for a half-hour entirely to the charm of its words. Never mind the fair "Ophelia," or the pretty pages, or the grotesque couriers, or the always petrified "Rosencrantz" and "Guildenstern." There are always a hundred things to laugh at in one night of Hamlet. But listen with your mind's ears. Do you not like the music of this master diction? Do you not catch a hundred phrases familiar as cradle songs, and full of pith, which you use when you are at your best and brightest, without thinking they came from? Do you not find yourself puzzling over its hidden meanings, and waiting for the actor's reading of them with half-impatience? Do you not find yourself agreeing or disagreeing with him with unexpected warmth? To be sure you do. You may say you do not like Hamlet; that it is tedious, solemn, dull. But it is not so. Doubtless you would rather go to see the Pirates of Penzance, and you would deliberately refuse to inflict yourself with another "Hamlet." But if you got into a place where there was a "Hamlet," and you entered into the spirit of the moment, you would enjoy yourself. It is like meeting an intellectual person. No one wants too much intellect for breakfast, dinner, and supper. It is like meat for babes—a diet too strong. But what a rare and absolute pleasure it is to come across some one now and then who knows something. There is no one so uncultivated, so uneducated, that he does not enjoy it. It is like a breath of pure air in a foul place; like a drink of strong old wine to the fainting one; like the dew-fall to the parched plant. It is so refreshing to be obliged to use one's brain now and again, and we have all a bit of brain somewhere, of one quality or another. Listen to the hoodlums on the street corner exchanging a tide of repartee, which, purged of its drossness and grossness, would be fine wit. They come from the inelegant contest with shining eyes and souls looking out for the instant. Any one likes to put an intellectual lance in rest who can. Nothing is more exhilarating than a tilt of mind against mind, and there is no more novel sensation, as the times go, than to be set a-thinking. That is the only charm which Bandmann's "Hamlet" has; it sets you a-thinking. Like Barry Sullivan, he is something of an elocutionary trickster, and studies new readings, not for the new meanings which they convey to him, but for that they are new readings, and will startle an audience into some manifestation of feeling. He is a dramatic agitator, too, this Bandmann, and turns things topsy-turvy with a free hand. The most extraordinary changes and combinations have been made, and I defy the most practiced theatre-goer to tell at which act of Hamlet, as arranged by Mr. Bandmann, he is assisting. He plays a peevish, fretful, fitful "Hamlet," strung ever at high pitch. A disagreeable, a most uncomfortable "Hamlet"; a very melodramatic "Hamlet," yet, withal, a picturesque and delightfully intelligent "Hamlet." Inconsequent as many of his ways may seem, he must have reasons, for his readings are so clear. But why will these melodramatic people play "Hamlet"? Why will they not confine themselves to the line which is so clearly marked out for them? It is a terrible thing to laugh at "Hamlet" at any time, but really it was downright funny when Bandmann asked, in the play scene, with an accent and inflection which can not be transcribed, "If she should break it, heh?" It is strange that melodramatic fervor never impresses us deeply. All "Hamlets" pose. No man ever played "Hamlet" naturally, without a certain strain, and without giving evidence of that strain. But sometimes "in the very torrent, tempest, whirlwind [as I may say] of their passion," they forget themselves, and rise to their feet, with heights of fervor. Mr. Bandmann never forgets the heights, and he always knows just how high he is; but how thoroughly worn out the man must be after all this hysteria when he comes down for a breath of commonplace air. He is a picturesque-looking "Hamlet," with his striking face and head, and a garment or two of different cut and fashion from the orthodox, and the usual fall of soft lace on his wrists. He could not forego the lace-fall even in Narcisse, where the vagabond's hands looked as unused as a poet's. Ah well! after all is said and written, who knows which "Hamlet" is the right, for did not the unhappy prince himself cry, with last breath:

"O God, Horatio, what a wounded name,
Things standing thus unknown, shall live behind me?"

The Pirates of Penzance are far more easy to understand. All they ask is life,

"Without a touch of poetry in it."

Think of piracy without poetry, if you can. A blooming girl once told me, in a spasm of confidence, that she had long believed it not only possible, but probable, that she had been changed in the cradle, and I did not marvel. But when a prosperous and portly matron was once seized with a similar spasm, and confessed that the dream of her youth had been to be a pirate's bride, I realized how deeply this stratum of piratical poetry lay. If we all went about confessing all our romantic and poetical reveries, I fancy we would startle our friends somewhat. What manner of man is this Gilbert, who has brought the battery of an irresistible wit to bear upon people's most cherished weaknesses? The institutions which he attacks are for the English people, but the wit is for all peoples. Not a touch of that most odious quality, cynicism, in it. Cynics should be confined behind bars, like maniacs, idiots, and other irresponsible harm-doers. But when a man laughs with you as well as at you, it is easy to forgive him. With all due respect to Arthur Sullivan as a composer, one would more willingly lose a bar of the music than a sentence of the text. "Nonsense it is, I grant you, but a superlatively fine quality of it. The Pirates of Penzance is really not so keen a burlesque as Pinafore. The British army is not held up to light laughter in so deliciously absurd a manner as the navy was, but the Pirates of Penzance is as much superior—musically—to Pinafore as Pinafore to Trial by Jury. It has one serious drawback. How could the man have committed such a gaucherie—not to put it in stronger terms—as to quote from himself? Gilbert—as he himself explicitly states on a former occasion—let us dodge the fateful word this time—"knows the value of a kindly chorus." Perhaps this is why he slights his heroines, for "Josephine" has not the best music, and "Mabel" has really nothing but the pretty waltz which Miss Emelie Melville sings so brilliantly. It is hardly fair to introduce so charming a person, and then immediately obscure her. What is the matter? Is there a lack of prima donnas in England for this class of opera? Let Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan hear our own little fair-haired prima donna, and perhaps coming "Mabel's" will have something more to do; for after the waltz she has really nothing excepting a duet with "Frederic," in which she is choked off—one may almost say—by the tenor's music. Not that any one can reasonably object to Mr. Turner's music. He has a charming voice, and in this opera sings delightfully, whatever he may have done in the Royal Middy. But, oh! how tiresome he is when he begins to talk, and what an enormous capacity he has for forgetting his part. It is a question among people who have been to see the Pirates, whether they prefer a part well acted and badly sung or well sung and badly acted. To put the case in a nutshell, take your choice between Max Freeman and Turner. It is, upon the face of it, strikingly absurd to cast Max Freeman in the part of one of the most representative of Englishmen—a major-general in the British army. But, having been so cast, or mis-cast, his performance is certainly a most remarkable one. As for his introduction, it is a linguistic feat as well as a memorizing one. It is not a pretty song, and trivially unworthy of Gilbert, except as a display of polysyllabic agility. As for Max Freeman, no one will accuse him of any sweet notes, but he really did not render with an expression quite Lady Macbethian that exquisite little song of the breeze with surely the most melodious accompaniment that could be written. What an odd hodge-podge of burlesque, on music as well, is this Pirates of Penzance, with its choruses and glees and chants and hymns. Are you not thrilled with that solemn, beautiful invocation to Poetry, and startled—at first half shocked—by the religious chant of the police chorus? How still is the house as the major-general sings:

"Softly sighing to the river,
Comes the loving breeze!"

And how exceedingly grand-operatic is the beautiful duet in the Chapel of Ancestors. Talking of ancestors, is not this a clever hit at those who are buying pedigrees and coats of arms? As for the nursery-maid, Gilbert seems to have failed to make his point with "Buttercup," and he re-introduces that estimable person as "Ruth." It is a joke upon the many romances of changed cradles, or a hit at the mothers who leave their babies to slips of nurse-girls. Call it which you will, it is not likely that Gilbert, even from the depths of his fantastic fancy, ever conjured up anything quite like Miss Paulin's "Ruth." It has but one merit: you understand every word she says. At first, she appeared like a pretty young gypsy girl; and next, like a pretty young gypsy with an old woman mask on her face. The text states most explicitly that she is middle-aged; but who ever saw an actress make up for middle age? Extreme youth they will attempt if they have it not; extreme old age, it may be, for old age is picturesque and striking; but downright, hard, prosaic, fat, commonplace, unbeautiful middle age—I never saw the actress yet who would try it, if she were young and slender and pretty. It is but justice to Miss Paulin—who is a talented and painstaking little actress—to say that it is not a want of effort on her part, for she certainly did her best to uglify herself after the first night. It was a pity Miss Montague had not some notes available, but the music is written so exceedingly low that even Peakes was obliged to go down for some of his most disused notes in his spirited song, "The Pirate King"—which he sang atrociously the first night, but better ever after. In point of fact, no one was in a comfortable part of the scale but the happy Corporal, who played in the purest variety style, and sang his music with a nasal intonation hitherto held sacred to the serio-comic in the concert hall. But who can tell one-half about the Pirates at one seeing? You get a pretty good idea that the music is something delicious, the text exquisitely and irresistibly funny, and the cast passable. But it is a performance which people get into the habit of going to see, and New Yorkers report that you do not soon weary of it. Therefore, there must be something left to see.

BETSY B.

The Undemonstrative Audience.

Why is the American audience undemonstrative? As a matter of fact, it is cold and silent to a degree unexampled in the experience of the stage. Moreover, it is only of late years—within some thirty—that it has become so. By inheritance it should be one to give instant and clamorous expression to its pleasure or its discontent. Instead of this, it rarely that its approval finds decided expression. Only when forcibly roused from its apathy does it accord applause of any heartiness. Its disapproval is exhibited only by the same cold silence that is habitual when no disapproval is meant. In giving up the fitting and proper practice of hissing, it has almost given up all other form of demonstration. The result is bad in a variety of ways. For it deprives the actor of the most effectual stimulus toward bringing out his powers, while the spectators themselves forego the exhilaration and consequent access of enjoyment which mutual demonstration begets. I think the root of this regrettable apathy is not recondite, and that it may perhaps be best discovered through a glance at some audiences who have not lost the art either of applause or condemnation. I quote an account of what an English audience was capable of no further back than the time of Ludwig Tieck, foremost of critics:

"It is only fair [says Tieck, writing of a momentous theatrical event in London] that the artist should in any case be required, however poorly, by the loudest applause directly face to face, for he is powerless to preserve, even for an instant, the product of his genius to tell to a future generation of what quality it was. * * * Such were the plaudits, the cheers, the shouts of rapture, and the tears of emotion not given to the noble veteran. The loudest outburst of applause I had ever heard, even in Italy, was feeble compared to the indescribable din which, after the curtain fell, arose on every side. There were thousands present, packed closely together, and the huge area of the house [Covent Garden] was changed as if into one vast machine, which produced a supernatural clangor and jubilation, men and women shouting, clapping, smiting the sides of the boxes might and main with fans and sticks, while, to add to the tumult, everybody was making what noise he could with his feet [when the actor came before the curtain]. What seemed impossible nevertheless took place: the clamor grew louder and louder, until the tumult of sound aroused the feeling of something awful and sublime."

True, this was a great occasion, but then it was an occasion greatly met; and it is plain that the audience contributed to bring one another to a sense of it, when the effect produced on the clear and balanced mind of Tieck, even in its attitude of critical inspection, was of "something awful and sublime." I hazard nothing in saying that no such thrilling and noble scene could now be experienced in any American theatre on any occasion whatever; and by this measure of the possibilities we have lost at a supreme moment of the stage, we are in position to infer how much we lose from its nightly aspect.

But of all audiences, the Italian appears to be at once the justest and frankest critics. Says Story, the American sculptor:

"They are severe but just critics, and express their disapprobation at false singing or inferior execution in the openest way—sometimes by loud laughter, and sometimes by remorseless hissing. Many a time have I seen them stop a bad performance by strong expressions of displeasure, such as crying out to the impresario, jerking the unfortunate actor, and at times refusing to allow him to proceed in his part. * * * When it is the play, or the opera itself, to which they object, they await the falling of the curtain in the entr'acte, or at the close of the piece, and then assail it with a storm of hisses and groans."

Near the time Mr. Story was writing, a Roman manager had undertaken to introduce a poodle-play from the French. Mr. Story tells of its reception:

"The story was one of seduction, drawn from a French plot, but the people would not bear it. 'E infame! E pur troppo questo! E indegno!' was heard on all sides. Men who might, perhaps, have followed the course of the seducer in real life were indignant at its representation on the stage. They would not permit art to be dragged down into the kennels of sensual vice. * * * Whatever their life may be, art is a sanctuary, and not as in many French novels [and plays] of the present day, a neutral ground of assignation and seduction."

It is cheering to know that one people yet retains enough of gentleman-like feeling to insist that even its own wallowing shall not be made a public show. It has been said (with apparent truth) that "the devil is a gentleman": so be it; then he is needs a decorous simulacrum of one, and as such a less offensive companion than a saint who doesn't wash himself and exhales the odor of his sanctity. There are folk who "would rather be

Genteelly damned beside a duke
Than saved in vulgar company."

It is at least equally easy to understand that there may be people who would prefer to consort with fiends who pay the debt of outward show that vice owes to virtue than with good spirits who do not know enough of what is due to their own goodness to exact the payment. So of these tainted poodle-plays. Mr. Satan forbid that any one of us should be too good for this sinful world; but personal goodness has no more to do with tolerance of these things than it has to do with tolerance of foul linen. In either case, it is not likely to beget either a moral pestilence or a physical plague. Perhaps it is a mere matter of taste. There are parts of Europe where, only the other day, lovely serene highnesses fed peas to themselves on the blade of a knife. There are other parts where now it is no impeachment of a man's breeding to wear a stale shirt. We are not to think the worse of a Frenchman because he may run after his poodle-drama. It proves only that he is a—Frenchman, and the fibre of his mind, in one particular direction, has been infected and relaxed by his literature. But any foreigner to France, with his different texture of mind, who shall go to publicly paddling in the same "kennel"—and I lay the whole stress on its publicity—is a hog.

But in the enthusiasm begotten of the vision of that Roman audience crying "E infame!" and choking off one of these low exhibitions at the outset, we have drifted away from the point meant to be illustrated, viz., the right use of hisses in keeping the stage in order. That the hiss may be abused, even by Italians, we are reminded by another American observer:

"They assembled by hundreds and by thousands in the great theatre of San Carlo to do—what? Why simply to make fun of an old woman—to deride, to hiss, to jeer at an actress they once worshipped, whose beauty is faded now and whose voice has lost its former richness. They said the theatre would be crammed because Fuzzolini was going to sing. * * * And every time the woman sang they hissed and laughed, and as soon as she left the stage they called her on again with applause. Once or twice she was encored five or six times in succession, and received with hisses when she appeared, and discharged with hisses and laughter when she had finished. * * * The singer would have conquered an audience of American rowdies by her brave, unflinching tranquillity. * * * Think what a multitude of small souls were crowded into that theatre last night. If the manager could have filled his theatre with Neapolitan souls alone without the bodies, he couldn't have cleared less than ninety millions of dollars."

Such, at least, is Mark Twain's estimate, though he doubtless meant the figures to be understood as only approximate. But the above scene suggests, I think, the steps by which the hiss, at least, as a means of demonstration, has disappeared from the American theatre. The audiences were unwilling to hiss women; and it would soon come to be felt that to make a distinction between the actor and the actress was not only unfair, but must defeat all the ends in view—for silence would be justly read as approval of an actress whom there might be every desire to condemn. And I do not doubt that consideration for the feelings of actors contributed, just as it now impels the critic who prints, to say nothing when he can say nothing good. Thus our audiences have come to lose the means of expressing disapproval, whether of actor or play. The hiss could not be revived among us for use against the actor, but it is sorely to be regretted that it should not be available on the fall of the curtain to mark disapproval of the play. A hearty round of groans and vernacular outcries might have availed to sweep many a piece of garbage back to its swill-barrel.

With disuse of the habit of hissing, however, that of applauding would also naturally decline; that is, the whole attitude of the audience toward the performance would tend to become undemonstrative; and this might, in time, verge upon indifference in the face of really fine art, if not of absolute insensibility to it. The two things are nearly related in the spectator. But to the actor—that is, to the art itself—such indifference is murder and sudden death. It can not survive long in so nipping and withering an atmosphere. I believe that much of the hesitancy in yielding frank and cordial applause is due to uncertainty on the part of the audience as to whether applause is really due—for the proportion of habitués in a contemporary American audience is small. Few theatres possess a group of steady nightly patrons at all corresponding with the dandies of the Omnibus box, who for many years gave the cue to a London pit—and seem to have given it with real insight as well as independence and fairness. I do not doubt we should be willing to follow any competent leadership that could be recognized, and once more impart something of animation and spirit to the "amusements" at which we now assist like wooden images. But since we can not command this form of help, the managers might at least furnish an intelligently led claque. If only they are set off in the right places at the right times—and not as now, at the wrong times, when it is hopelessly useless to give a hand—something might be accomplished. In time, a good and useful habit could be re-established. It can not be set about too soon, for we have got to that pass that, four nights out of five, the theatre is about as exhilarating a place to visit as a chapel in the catacombs.

INTAGLIOS.

To the Dark and in the Dew.

In the dark and the dew
I am smiling back at you;
But you can not see the smile,
And you're thinking all the while
How I turn my face from you.

In the dark, in the dew;
All my love goes out to you;
Flutters like a bird in pain,
Dies and comes to life again;
While you whisper, "Sweetest, hark!
Some one's sighing in the dark—"
Never guessing 'tis for you,
In the dark, in the dew!

In the dark, in the dew;
All my heart cries out to you,
As I cast it at your feet,
Sweet, indeed, but not too sweet;
Wondering, will you hear it beat?
Beat for you and bleed for you,
In the dark and in the dew.—Anon.

Drinking Song.

Pshaw! ye fools that talk of pleasure
Sitting by your goblets bright,
He must be a sage can measure
Wine's ineffable delight.

'Neath it, phantasy e'en changeth
Till it like a garden shows,
Wherein breath divine still rangeth,
Wherein living beauty grows.

At our feet, lo! flow'rets gazing;
And above the evening star;
These so near their wee heads raising,
That so dazling from afar!

Endless joy to us is given,
All the air resounds with mirth,
Ours ev'ry star in heaven,
Ours ev'ry flower on earth.

—Von Bodenstedt.

The Touch of Grace.

Like morning, when her early breeze
Breaks up the surface of the seas,
That in their furrows, dark with night,
Her hands may sow the seeds of light—
Thy grace can send its breathings o'er
The spirit dark and lost before,
And, freshening all its depths, prepare
For truth divine to enter there.

Till David touched his sacred lyre,
In silence lay the unbreathing wire;
But when he swept its chords along,
Then angels stayed to hear the song.
So sleeps the soul till thou, O Lord,
Shalt deign to touch its lifeless chord;
Till, waked by thee, its breath shall rise
In music worthy of the skies.—Thomas Moore.

When the Grass Shall Cover Me.

When the grass shall cover me,
Head to foot where I am lying;
When not any wind that blows,
Summer-blooms nor winter-snows,
Shall awake me to your sighing;
Close above me, as you pass,
You will say: "How kind she was!"
You will say: "How true she was!"
When the grass grows over me.

When the grass shall cover me,
Holden close to earth's warm bosom;
While I laugh, or weep, or sing
Nevermore for anything;
You will find, in blade and blossom,
Sweet small voices, odorous—
Tender pleaders in my cause,
That shall speak me as I was—
When the grass grows over me.

When the grass shall cover me!
Ah! beloved, in my sorrow,
Very patient, I can wait;
Knowing that, or soon or late,
There will dawn a clearer morn;
When your heart will moan: "Alas!
Now I know how true she was;
Now I know how dear she was!"
When the grass grows over me!

—Ina D. Coolbrith.

One voice all over the land goes up from mothers,
that says: "My daughters are so feeble and sad, with no strength, all out of breath and life at the least exertion. What can we do for them?" The answer is simple and full of hope. One to four weeks' use of Hop Bitters will make them healthy, rosy, sprightly, and cheerful.

On Saturday next the pupils and friends of Laurel
Hall, San Mateo, will hold a reunion-picnic in the extensive grounds surrounding the hall. By special arrangement the regular trains going south will stop at Donald's Station, near the institute, whence lunch-baskets, etc., will be conveyed in vehicles sent from the school. Tickets may be had at Beach's book store and Snow's art rooms. Archery and dancing, crowning the May Queen, and "May-pole dance" on the green will be features of the day's pleasure. Mrs.
L. Manson-Buckmaster—principal of Laurel Hall—requests us to say that all friends of the school are most cordially invited to be present.

Mrs. Pearson, late President of Woman's Christian Temperance Union, has opened a temperance restaurant at 631 Clay Street, where she will be pleased to see her friends and all those wishing a good lunch for five cents. A large variety of articles not found at other temperance restaurants will be supplied to patrons at above prices. Business men will find no place more convenient or pleasant. Ladies out shopping will be cordially received. Be sure to call.

A CLOSE SHAVE.

The cold gray dawn was breaking, and the streaks of daylight, which crept in through the chinks and crevices of the rough, ill-fitted doors and windows in the primitive log hut, already began to overpower the glimmer of the one candle, which, from its socket in the neck of an empty and tallow-dripped black-bottle, had struggled to illuminate the gloom. It flickered, sputtered, blazed up, sank lower, and went out, and as if to celebrate the victory of day the sun sent its first golden beams through a wide crack in the wall, straight across the haggard face of the resurrected man. The hardy miners, who stood or leaned in picturesque attitudes half-hidden in the gloom of the cabin, looked with glad and eager eyes on their companion, who had come through death to share again their hard work, rough living, few rewards.

"I tell you, boys, it was a close shave!" and he drew a long breath, as he raised up in his bunk, and threw off the worn gray blanket which covered him. "The first warning of the danger was the shout from Tom there: 'Run for your life! She's caving!' I dropped my pick, and started, but the warning had come too late. The first giving way was at the mouth of the drift, and the weight of earth kept falling toward me. I could hear the timbers creaking, cracking, splitting like straws under the weight upon them, and I drew back away from the coming pressure. I felt the space growing smaller, and crouched low, almost imagining I could keep below the terrible crushing weight, and yet knowing that in an instant it would be upon me. The uprights trembled, then crashed, and I fell. I don't know how long I lay there, for I must have been stunned by the fall, or else I fainted from fear. Presently I woke and tried to move, but could not. I was pinned fast by the great timbers, which had fallen in such a way as to shield my head and body, while holding me immovable. I opened my eyes, and was confronted by a darkness so intense it could be felt. My first thoughts were as to the chances of escape from this frightful burial. I knew the law of humanity that holds in all camps of 'every one to the rescue of a miner in distress,' and I knew that in less than an hour every one of the two hundred men in the diggings would be taking his turn at the work of digging for me. I reckoned the time it would take them—twenty-five feet from the surface, about the same distance from the shaft, working in either direction through the coarse gravel—I thought they could reach me in ten hours. I could do nothing but wait. I strained my ears for a sound to break this terrible stillness, and in my eagerness I almost fancied I could hear the click of picks and shovels in the efforts to unearth me. But, boys, there was a new horror not one of you thought of in your most dreadful imaginings of my situation. While I lay there, counting the beats of my heart like you do the ticking of a clock in the dark, I felt myself growing cold. First my back, then it crept up my sides, then my arms, over my hands, higher, higher, colder, closer, what could it be? My God! The pumps had stopped, and the water was rising in the shaft. Higher, nearer it crawled, like the stealthy approach of some intangible monster. I could feel it like an added weight on my breast. Higher it crawled till it touched my chin, over my chin, it reached my lips. I screamed aloud in my agony. To be saved from the crushing of the earth upon me only to die by a more torturing and terrible means—to die alone here in the earth in cold and darkness. It was horrible. But the terrible fate came creeping, relentless in its very stillness and slowness. It came over my mouth, up my lips to my nostrils. Like a flash came the pictures of my life. They were hard, rough sketches, most of them; hardships and trials had made up my life almost since I left my mother's knee; but there was brightness enough in the darkest of the pictured days to draw me back like a cable to life. I clung to life, as I felt it slipping away; but death stared me in the face, and I could do nothing but die bravely here alone in the gloom.

"I said a last prayer, brief but fervent. I thought of you all, my good old friends, and knew there would be many a moist eye among you when, in the darkness, the light of your gleaming lanterns would flash on my dead white face. I closed my eyes to shut out the horrible gloom; and the water in its pitiless cruelty crept on over my nostrils, and I was gone. But sensation did not die. Could I believe it?—the water was going down; lower, lower, below my chin—sinking, sinking. Was I dreaming, or was this only a newer torture of drowning? No, it was not an illusion. I felt the chill leave me. The pumps had started again. Hope sprang like a ray of starlight into my brain. It was only a temporary stoppage after all, and I began again to speculate upon the strokes of willing hands that were working for me on either side. I could hear the dull grating and thud of the iron coming faintly to me through the gravel I had myself dug through in the search for gold. But again I felt that rising chill. The pumps had stopped again. It was useless to hope. This time death was surely here. It rose higher; slowly but surely, almost insensibly, it crept over my breast, over my chin, my lips, my nostrils. I died again and again. I woke to find myself still pinioned in this crumbling vault, and again heard the nearing blows of your steady work above me. I shouted to you, vainly imagining I could hurry you on. I dreaded, with a shivering fear, the rising again of this stealthy, creeping, crawling monster which stood ready to devour me; but your coming would be too late. It came again. Six times I died there, alone in the darkness and gloom—died with the sounds of salvation ringing in my ears, with succor only a few feet away—died alone and helpless. When I woke, here in my cabin, and saw the old familiar faces bending over me, the same warm light glimmering through the window, I thought my spirit had come back to my living baunts. But it is real—it is myself. Ah, boys, it was a close shave!" BUTTERCUP.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 21, 1880.

The New York paragraphers are happy over the story of a young girl in Bellevue Hospital who goes into convulsions whenever she hears music. Strangely enough—though there may be method in their denseness—they fail to ascribe her malady to its proper cause. The girl is not confused by the music, but by its lack. New York has no music. Let them send the young girl here, if they want her cured. We will talk to her.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

Two Women.

The shadows lay along Broadway,
"Twas near the twilight-tide,
And slowly there a lady fair
Was walking in her pride.
Alone walked she, but viewlessly
Walked spirits at her side.

Peace claimed the street beneath her feet,
And honor charmed the air;
And all astir looked kind on her,
And called her good as fair—
For all God ever gave to her
She kept with chary care.

She kept with care her beauties rare
From lovers warm and true,
For her heart was cold to all but gold,
And the rich came not to woo—
But honored well are charms to sell
If priests the selling do.

Now, walking there was one more fair—
A slight girl, lily pale;
And she had unseen company
To make the spirit quail—
'Twixt want and scorn she walked forlorn,
And nothing could avail.

No mercy now can clear her brow
For this world's peace to pray;
For, as love's wild prayer dissolved in air,
Her woman's heart gave way—
But the sin forgiven by Christ in heaven
By man is cursed away.

—N. P. Willis.

Magdalen.

If any woman of us all,
If any woman of the street,
Before the Lord should pause and fall,
And with her long hair wipe His feet—

He whom with yearning hearts we love,
"And fain would see with human eyes
Around our living pathway move,
And underneath our daily skies—

The Maker of the heavens and earth,
The Lord of life, the Lord of death,
With whom the universe had birth,
But breathing of our breath, one breath—

If any woman of the street
Should kneel, and with the lifted mesh
Of her long tresses wipe His feet,
And with her kisses kiss His flesh—

How round that woman would we throng,
How willingly would clasp her hands,
Fresh from that touch divine, and long
To gather up the twice-blessed strands!

How eagerly with her would change
Our idle innocence, nor heed
Her shameful memories and strange,
Could we but also claim that deed.

—Harriet Prescott Spofford.

After the Burial.

Yes, faith is a goodly anchor;
When skies are sweet as a psalm
At the bows it lolls so stalwart,
In bluff, broad-shouldered calm.
And, when over breakers to leeward
The shattered surges are hurled,
It may keep our head to the tempest
With its grip on the base of the world.

But after the shipwreck, tell me
What help in its iron thews,
Still true to the broken hawser
Deep down among sea-weed and ooze?

In the breaking gulfs of sorrow—
When the helpless feet stretch out,
And find in the depths of darkness
No footing so solid as doubt—

Then better one spar of memory,
One broken plank of the past,
That our human heart may cling to,
Though hopeless of shore at last.

To the spirit its splendid conjectures,
To the flesh its sweet despair,
Its tears o'er the thin, worn locket,
With its anguish of deathless hair.

Immortal? I feel it and know it—
Who doubts it of such as she?
But that is the pang's very secret:
Immortal—away from me.

There's a narrow ridge in the graveyard
Would scarce stay a child in its race,
But to me and my thought it is wider
Than the star-strown vague of Space.

Your logic, my friend, is perfect—
Your morals most dearly true;
But since the earth clashed on her coffin
I keep hearing that, and not you.

Console if you will—I can bear it;
'Tis a well-meant alms of breath;
But not all the preaching since Adam
Has made Death other than Death.

It is pagan; but wait till you feel it,
That jar of the earth, that shock
When the plowshare of deeper passion
Tears down to our primitive rock.

Communion in spirit? Forgive me,
But I, who am earthy and weak,
Would give all my incomes from dreamland
For a touch of her hand on my cheek.

And that little shoe in the corner—
So worn, and wrinkled, and brown—
With its emptiness confutes you,
And argues your wisdom down.

—James Russell Lowell.

FASHIONABLE FACTS AND FANCIES.

The prettiest use for Languedoc lace is making it into bonnet ties, for which it is exceedingly well adapted, being less easily spoiled than illusion and airier than Duchess, Spanish, or Breton lace. A satin-braid bonnet, with a garniture of daisies and Languedoc ties worked elaborately, and having some point-lace stitches in the larger flowers, eclipsed everything else at one of the openings last week.

Madame Récamier's method of dressing the hair is said to be coming in in France. Why not? With the narrow, short-waisted gowns, the hair may well be drawn to the top of the head and allowed to fall in tight curls, but how hideous everybody who has a short nose is going to look with the Récamier curls dropping over the eyes and the ribbon crossing the front of the head above them! But then girls with short noses have no rights. This is the day of classic faces.

Some of the new laces appear to have been dipped in coffee.

A new costume for the sea-shore is the bain de mer, or sea-bath dresses. These are intended to be worn as the first toilet after a morning sea-bath, but are sufficiently elaborate for any occasion not full dress. In reality, they are only a mass of white albatross and figured momie cloth, pervaded by dainty little ruffles and plaitings. There are parasols with gay-winged butterflies to match.

How to manage hairpins is told by a fashion writer: "Stick all your hairpins downward; then you will not be annoyed by their falling out by the way, neither will your friends be worried by mental calculations as to how long it will be before a hairpin falls when it hangs out of your head more than half its length."

Madame Lin-lu-jou, the wife of the Chinese minister in Berlin, has given her first entertainment. Everybody went, expecting to see something new and original; but there was nothing unlike the soirées usually given in court circles, with the exception of the one peculiarity that the hostess was unable to converse in any European language with her guests.

It cost the Countess of Potocki $25,108 for dress, and $17,000 for linen during eighteen months. The Count protests, and the case is in court.

Will some one willing to betray the peculiarities of the sex explain why a woman's watch never goes? Of course, one reason is that it is never wound up, but why it is not is what puzzles. Most watches, nowadays, are stem-winders, so the always-lost key is no longer an excuse.

In London, the latest society craze is for ladies to have hammocks, that can be slung between folding doors, or from one heavy piece of furniture to another. The fashion was introduced last year in lawn-tennis grounds and gardens, and found to be so delightful that, when winter came in, ladies decided to have their hammocks and down pillows brought indoors. The photographers' windows show the beauties taking their ease in hammocks. Lady Lonsdale has her hammock; so has Mrs. Langtry and all the rest of the society ladies.

Who would not be married in Baltimore, to have the wedding described by the newspapers in this Wegg-like style: "All things were auspicious for an event so replete with happiness. Blue skies were overhead, and a bright, genial sunshine cast its rays over field and forest. The fragrance of flowers filled the ambient air, and the most musical of birds caroled their sweetest roundelays. Within the church the skilled organist evoked from that king of instruments its most melodious strains." Ah!

"It's positively indecent to dress for dinner," according to Mrs. Beauchamp Brown, heroine of the latest "No Name" novel.

One by one the new spring bonnets creep out of their boxes, just as the tulips and hyacinths are pushing out of the dark earth; and it is good to watch them come, timid as they are. A noticeable difference is already made in the appearance of large assemblages by their gay presence. At the theatres, the past week, they have divided attention with the acting, and no doubt have been silently blessed for no longer obstructing the stage. Fashion is truly obliging for once, but no one knows how long the little-bonnet mood will last.

Strings or brides of bonnets worn at weddings must be fastened by a jewel of some kind. Diamonds are preferred, but small brooches in the form of a daisy, a clover-leaf, a serpent, or a lizard, composed of colored stones, are tolerated!

Little vases for the button-hole bouquets placed beside dinner-plates have their stems opened so as to leave a circular space in which the napkin can be inserted.

Long gloves have bands of silver and gold braid inserted in the wrists instead of the lace, and the effect is prettier than that of bracelets.

The latest ornament for a drawing-room or boudoir in Paris is a pair of love-birds. The birds, however, are a mere excuse for the cage, which is really a piece of bric-à-brac worthy of a place among costly bibelots and knickknacks of a Demidoff collection. It is made of ivory or tortoise shell, and stands on a plush table, surrounded by rare exotics. The nonsensical little inmates eat and drink out of Sèvres cups and Bohemian crystal, and live a life of reckless luxury undreamt of by miserable republican canaries in their vulgar brass cages in America.

Parasols are a serious item of expense this season. Forty-five dollars will purchase quite a decent affair of olive satin covered with flowers, wrought in gold threads and their natural colored flosses. The old style of ring has been revived apparently for the sole purpose of adding to the cost, turquoises, Rhine stones, and other glittering things being used to decorate it and the handles. Bunches of poppies and field flowers, or a few brown cat-tails, are often embroidered on one panel, while on the opposite side a bird on the wing or a gorgeous butterfly keeps up the pastoral illusion. If these artistic devices should be once taken out walking in city streets, their owners will stamp themselves shoddy to the last degree.

DOCTOR CRAFT'S MISTAKE.

A Romantic Chapter from the Social Annals of San Fulano.

Should the Happy Valley ever exist, save in the mind of the visionary, it would lie in the peaceful precincts of San Fulano de Tal. Near one of the old historic missions—built by soul-weary men, surfeited with the pomps and vanities of the old world, taking sanctuary in the priesthood, finding, in the primitive life of this then unknown El Dorado, novelty and purpose, the hamlet lies, in its sweet, sequestered loneliness—a living, a barely living, monument to the poetic temperament of the old fathers. Its serenity is sublime; its silence is full of peace. The ruined walls of its old church have an air, not so much of demolition as of arrested completion. Often an incredulous traveler, unversed in California history, happening upon the village (for we who love the place are chary of sounding its praises for tourists' behalf)—often this unbelieving traveler questions what caprice left the church unfinished, and smiles derisively at the "Terremoto, señor!" uttered with quaint rising inflection and expressive shrug. Standing under the time-worn porch that looks seaward away, one can let fancy wander at will, back into the days when these old rooms were the rendezvous of hidalgos—priests from Arragon and Castile, when these crumbling walls stood stanchly up in the sunlight, and these deserted corridors swarmed with native proselytes. One can almost fancy that the broken walls of the broken church spring again into shapeliness and grace; one can almost hear the drone of litany and the chant of requiem; sandaled feet pass along the echoing floors, dark faces gather in the shadowy corners. The ghosts of time and place glide into the heart and wait, silently, yet eloquently, within its threshold.

Late one autumn afternoon, the mail stage from Los Angeles, that daily clattered through the little town, scarcely awakening an echo from those terraced brown hills, deposited a passenger at the door of Dick Follen—stalwart, sleepy-eyed Dick Follen! Stranded here by the lawless tide of time, vested with half a score of Government appointments of minor importance, and clothed in more than a little brief authority, dealing justice, most strongly tempered with mercy, among his languid subjects.

This new-comer was an anomaly in the indolent solitude of the spot. Not obtrusively brisk, yet her step, her carriage, her whole air, gave the impression of a person of keen perceptive observation—wide-eyed, alert, complaisant, and complacent. The tile-covered porch of Dick's old gabled adobe caught her fancy, for the tangle of passion-vines that curtained it from the narrow street. Her eyes seized upon the million motes of golden dust flung after the retreating stage by the prodigal alchemist, Sunlight; then her gaze wandered to the surrounding hills, where glistening sheep-walks, touched by the lowering sun, had the semblance of tiny water-courses, leaping down those barren slopes.

"And this way the water comes down at Lodore!" quoted Miss Fleming, knocking lightly at the open door. No one responded. A man within was thrown back in a great, easy rocker, asleep or musing; the smoke curled up from a cigarette in his slender fingers. His position was the perfection of easy, boyish grace. Miss Fleming's beautiful eyes took in every detail of the room. The mellow tints in Dick's massive furniture, brought out by the exquisite light; the picturesque curve of a tasseled, swaying hammock; the happy abandon of the occupant. He sprang up sharply when her reluctant fingers tapped once more, loudly.

"The young 'Romeo'!"—Miss Fleming made inward comment; but, as he came nearer, those level eyes, with comprehensive glance, took in every white gleam in the heavy masses of straight, black hair, every line limned in that clear-cut, dark face.

He seemed to recognize, even then, under the quiet repression of her manner, the critical vigilance which characterized this girl, and which was one strong element in a character possessed of that great capacity for intense enjoyment, which, with its complement of sharpest suffering, is the lot of a rare few. Noting this ever so vaguely, it discomposed him; he had the consciousness of being ill at ease. His replies were more or less unsatisfactory, and it was a relief to both when Dick came in, to find Dr. Craft entertaining the new teacher after a somewhat dismal fashion. Dick himself received her with all the heartiness of his own genial manner; and this self-possessed young woman, who vainly tried to reconcile Dr. Craft's white-lined hair and boyish figure, found herself battling with an undignified temptation to answer with an outright smile every kindly look of this soft-voiced giant.

Anticipating her coming, Dick, in his capacity as "District Clerk," had secured for Miss Fleming the only available accommodations for an unmarried woman; this was tolerably near to his friendly bachelor quarters, and thither the three adjourned.

The hosts were simple, unsophisticated folk, unversed in worldly views, and long used to receiving, deferentially, Dick's suggestions. They made no comment when, after the early tea, he proposed that Miss Fleming should accompany him and Dr. Craft back to "the adobe" for the evening. The girl herself looked sharply up at this unusual proposition; she saw in Dick's face only a matter-of-course unconviction; in his companion's, a little amused curiosity. Her tact made instant decision against prudishness. Her assent secured an evening of unmarred enjoyment—the initial one of many.

To these two men, dwelling on the outermost rim of civilization, long remote from cultured women or from any intellectual society save their own, Miss Fleming proved a charming companion. There was a vigor in her thoughts, an incisive directness in her accurate language, a picturesqueness of diction, that was refreshing, stimulating, after the languid atmosphere of San Fulano. She was hardly the typical Californian girl; she had gone into the philosophy of life too deeply for that. But the dramatic, the picturesque, the grim, the droll, of this anomalous State—all these elements Miss Fleming realized and appreciated to their utmost; and, by some process of absorption or reflection, she showed the same traits vividly in the quaint piquancy of her own nature. Perhaps her most distinctive feature was the critical faculty; next to that, her acute consciousness.

For all the intimacy into which they grew, Dr. Craft hardly knew if he liked Miss Fleming; he sometimes said to himself, or even to Dick, that she was the most singular woman he had ever known. Her originality struck him only as peculiar. Yet there was a wonderful congeniality between them—a fullness of understanding that would have subjected both to discomfort in the civilized world, since it would have excited comment, conjecture, innuendo, and satire, more or less delicate. An observer would have been puzzled to define the nature of Miss Fleming's feelings toward the two men. If her sympathy made any distinction between them, it might have leaned toward Dr. Craft; perhaps because he was the younger—perhaps because his nervous temperament met a responsive element in her own carefully-disciplined emotions. She used sometimes to wish she might have known these men out in the world, where they would have met on terms of not quite such good fellowship. Knowing just how much of their innermost life she would thus have missed, she yet regretted the charm that unfamiliarity would have given to herself. That keen consciousness of hers, that knew so well the attraction of something withheld, understood how this daily incoming and outgoing with themselves detracted from the mystery with which man loves to invest woman.

And she was right, at least so far as regarded the younger man. Had he met her under the ordinary conditions of society, he would have felt the power of that strong, brave nature. Here, she was simply in keeping with the landscape. Her unconventionality was as much a part of the whole as were the dry, brown foothills, or the peculiar architecture of the San Fulano buildings. While the two were dimly conscious of some such feeling as this, Dick recognized, with an odd compound feeling of sorrow and elation, Craft's tendency to idealize the remote at the expense of the near. If their diversions and excursions cost him loneliness and some vexation of spirit, his multifarious offices and busy life excused the seeming neglect; if Dr. Craft sometimes monopolized Miss Fleming even at home, Dick justified his friend by the parity of age between them. If the serpent jealousy ever trailed his fiendish folds into the garden of Dick's thoughts, he found no welcome in that generous ground.

One day shrewd Dick tossed over to Miss Fleming, swinging in the hammock, their dainty drab volume of Bret Harte's poems. It was turned down at the first page of "Miss Blanche Says."

"That is Craft's nature to a dot; tell it to him." And Miss Fleming read the lines marked:

"One-half you poets, you can't deny;
Don't know the Muse if you chance to meet her;
But sit in your attics, and mope and sigh
For a faineante goddess to drop from the sky,
When flesh and blood may be standing by,
Quite at your service, should you but greet her."

Dr. Craft sprang up, pushing back his chair with one of his quick, impulsive movements.

"Ah, yes! that is my character, depicted with photographic exactness—almost! Wouldn't you better have handed her the Cyclopaedia, open at 'Niobe'?"

Miss Fleming looked up at him with a vague, disappointed pain in her face—the look she always wore when this man seemed to miss a fine shade of meaning, or showed an unworthy feeling, or lack of feeling. He had missed entirely Dick's meaning, she thought.

By and by, with a whirl of light wheels, he was back at the door, calling her, in his cheery, glad-hearted way, to come for a drive. Through all these past, pleasant months, nothing in their uneventful lives had been more pleasant than these frequent, long, aimless drives. Many a wild day, when the fierce southeaster smote the shore, had Miss Fleming donned her storm-coat, and gone away with Dr. Craft to the bleak beach, to watch the cold, angry waves that hurled at them challenging masses of foam, and hissed defiance to the shingle under foot. The foot-hills around San Fulano have echoed from memory the voices of these two. Every cañon, every wind-swept mesa, every plain across which the tumbleweed went bounding like a sensate creature, had caught and heard their tones. Every foot of this ground was steeped in the romance of those old native families, whose names yet live among us. Dr. Craft had taken care that Miss Fleming knew all this traditional lore, and many a day had she thrilled to the romance of a hillock that had been an hacienda, or a heap of rubbish marking the site of some old landmark. But no expedition had been more pleasant than this of to-day. Only one thing marred its perfection; an incident so slight that it would have passed unheeded by a nature less sensitive than her own. They were passing slowly across a tiny barranca, that led down from a neighboring cañon; a narrow stream of water slid along, fringed by scattering tules and wild celery. Further up the arroyo the melancholy notes of a piping quail throbbed on the air.

"The hills were brown, and the skies were blue."

A stray butterfly, beguiled by the water-plants into untimely appearance, flitted by the road. Dr. Craft cut at the fluttering creature with his whip.

"Oh, shame! how can you?—think of Psyche—don't you know—'Psyche, my soul'?"

"You know Utalume?"

"What did I quote from?" she retorted, a little sharply, stung by his apparent ignorance.

For all answer, he quoted slowly, musically, the first stanza of that weird poem. At any other time this sign of sympathy would have given her a keen delight; now, with the memory of his wanton cruelty upon her, she could hardly smile. But by and by she broke the silence that had fallen between them, and when they drove up to the old adobe not a trace of pain or misunderstanding lay upon their faces.

Dick looked down kindly as he lifted out the girl. "You must hurry through tea," he said; "the Padre wants us to come over. Some of those old fellows have a saint's-day, and we shall miss the music unless we hasten."

Dick could never forget the rapt look on Miss Fleming's face when they stopped at the door of the Padre's house. The long seaward corridor still held a faint light. The Padre was ringing the Angelus. A moment before, there had been a gay chatter within. They could fancy how, just over the way, in the little town, men were doffing their hats at the sound. Wool-flecked trascuiladores, among their trampling horses, rancheros in to purchase a scanty store of supplies, the brawlers yonder in the reeking cantina—were they not Cristianos all? When the chime was ended, a chorus of feminine voices within the house took up the Ave Santissima, whose last faint echoes died away as the three entered. The Padre's bare, shabby room was filled to overflowing with dusky paisanas, complacent in holiday attire and the importance of the occasion. For the most part dark, obese, unlovely—it is surprising how soon these women fade, and how coarse they become, losing utterly the frequent loveliness of their youth.

The Padre came forward to meet his guests; hilarity shone on his unctuous countenance. Untidiness in appearance, gnarled in person, a pipe of vile odor in mouth, a rusty old stock about his neck, a shuffling gait, a thick voice—this was the Padre. He took Dr. Craft's arm with an assured, confidential air.

"Ah, my Doctor! Come hither with me, good friend. I would have you see my little niece. She is making to me a little visit from San Luis. So this way, my Doctor."

In Miss Fleming's favorite nook, a deep embrasure of the old-fashioned windows, sat a beautiful Spanish girl, dowered with a tender, dreamy fairness that sometimes glorifies these women when young. The soft outlines of her face were colored like a Velasquez picture, and her eyes had the placid, serene satisfaction of a deer—or a cow, or any other ruminant. She raised those splendid, long-lashed orbs as the young man approached; it might have been mere curiosity, it might have been the expectancy of any female creature at the approach of a possible mate. But whatever qualities, physical or otherwise, it may have had, that future, sidelong glance had for Dr. Craft a strange, seductive sweetness. It dissipated all his fine theories of women in general, and this race in particular. Rapt, intense, he sat gazing into that dreamy face, drinking in the splendid languor of those great eyes, caressing those shell-like ears with the gentlest Spanish phrases his unused lips could frame. In that hour the man lived a lifetime of passion; not only that of the present, for in intervals of his own speech—while the air grew thick and heavy, while apoplectic forms shook with mirth and shrill voices grew vociferous, while the Padre chuckled, and Dick wondered, first uneasily and then admiringly, how Miss Fleming would bear this contact, while his honest face flushed with reverence when broad jest and coarse allusion seemed as unintelligible to her as if uttered in Sanscrit, instead of the Spanish she knew like her own tongue—through it all, Dr. Craft sat making a swift review of his life in its various emotional phases, comparing all other experiences with this delicious sensation that was thrilling him with its might, measuring all other women by this magnificent creature at his side.

"What a different being from Miss Fleming," he thought, almost exultingly. "One all mind, all nerves, the type of woman whose intellect feeds upon and consumes her body and her soul; the other a goddess, with powers perfectly balanced—formed to woo, to worship. One is a problem, the other is a poem."

He looked across, pityingly, at the fine head and clear-cut face outlined against the dark wood of the Padre's staircase. Pityingly! It had come to that. The memory of their close communion, their perfect understanding, their tacit faith, swept away by the sensuous spell of a woman's look!

When he reluctantly followed his departing companions, Dr. Craft mused his way over to the adobe, and loitered about the shadowy room, while Miss Fleming gathered up some of her belongings left there. In their desultory talk, Dick made some chance remark about the Spanish women. Then Dr. Craft turned about, his great Gypsy eyes lustrous with pride and passion.

"They are so charming, these Spanish girls, in their young, tender beauty. They are the embodiment of romance and grace; so different from our American women. See, for instance, the contrast between you and Chonita here. It extends to the most minute details. Did you notice how that girl held her hands? Instead of clasping them, or folding them, or taking hold of something, as you—as any other American woman—would do, she holds them so!"

He dropped his own slim, delicately-moulded hands lightly upon his lap.

"I don't know why so slight a thing should make the difference, but it does."

"It is the sense of repose that relaxation suggests," said Miss Fleming, slowly, softly; "the clasp implies effort."

Dick fancied there was a tone of subdued pain in her voice.

"Of course you are right," said Dr. Craft, magnanimously. "That is characteristic of the Spanish women," she went on; "they take life so physically well. There is a joy in mere existence for them. They are exempt from the requirements of mind and soul, as your pretty friend shows."

He turned upon her, almost with a snarl:

"You are harsh, unwomanly! I don't know why you should say that about Chonita. If you think I should have stayed by you and Dick over there—"

If ever cold amazement and calm scorn pointed a voice, they did Miss Fleming's then.

"You mistake if you think me actuated by motives like that. I am quite above all petty spites—and jealousies. I spoke in a general way, as the result of my observations. Good-night!"

She was gone, almost too swiftly for Dick to follow. Dr. Craft stood still.

In the days that ensued, Miss Fleming had cause to be grateful for the isolation of the place. If no sharper pain possessed her, wounded pride must have suffered at the total neglect shown her by Dr. Craft, who seemed hardly to breathe away from Chonita Ramirez. Daily, hourly he was with the supple siren, driving about with her as he had driven with Miss Fleming, wandering with her among the hoary olive-groves of the valley, haunting the old church and corridors like some slight, dark spirit. No one interfered with them; the Padre doubtless had reasons of his own, and Miss Fleming and Dick thought "Noblesse oblige." But to Miss Fleming the knowledge of whispered wonder and sneering sympathy would have been torture in a land where watchers might have gazed and gossiped. Here in the sequestered valley there was no one to notice—only Dick, who was even unwontedly gentle with the girl in these trying days.

One day he walked up to the school-house on trusteeal business. Returning, with Miss Fleming, they heard, as they passed the Padre's, a tenor voice, full, tender, lingering over

"Nita, Juanita, ask thy soul if we must part!"

Dick looked at his companion. Was it the heat that had paled her steady color to pitiful pallor?

"You are looking ill," he said, with non-characteristic clumsiness.

"Yes; it is for want of open-air exercise. I miss my drives."

He was amazed at her directness. What other woman would have been so candid? But Miss Fleming was unlike other women. "And there is not another buggy to be had about the ranch," Dick muttered.

His companion looked up with a half smile of pained surprise. "Do you suppose I would have spoken so, if there had been?"

Yet, as she left him, she took Dick's hand, and, with a sudden movement, laid her cheek upon it for a moment. It touched Dick sorely. She was so little accustomed to any show of feeling, so absolutely free from coquettish kittenry, that he knew well what that rare, impulsive caress meant.

* * * * *

An old paisano lay dying in a jacal around the point. Baile and rodeo of youthful days had drained the force from that feeble frame, equally with years. But this wreck of vitality clung to life tenaciously, and begged that the American doctor might see him. A fierce south-easter was scourging the day; to spare Don the struggle with its might, Dr. Craft took the short cut on foot. Coming back around the point, his foot slipped on the spray-wet rocks, and he fell, catching desperately at a ledge in the descent. For a few seconds—eternities, they seemed—he hung there by those slim, white hands. Then a Mexican, following along the narrow path, sprang forward with an oath of dismay at the sight, and, with strong, muscular grasp, reached over and drew the boyish figure back to safety.

Craft stood looking over the whitened water with a strange, startled gaze. "Have you yet the fear?" asked his rescuer, in a tone between compassion and contempt. Dr. Craft shook his head, absently. No, he was not afraid. That slender form held great reserve force of courage and endurance. But during the brief space while he had hung suspended by those slim, white fingers over the gulf of death, there had come to him a revelation. Under the tonic suffering of that few minutes, the passionate absorption, the mad infatuation of the past few weeks, died out of his brain like the delirium of departed fever. He was astounded that that parting moment brought no wild regret or longing for the woman who had held him bondsman. Instead, a strong, despairing yearning to see the mobile face, to hear the restrained voice, to touch the steady hand of—Miss Fleming! The recollection of her vivacity, her frankness, her intense consciousness, came upon him like the memory of the dead and lost.

Then set in the reaction. He started with his old, elastic step for San Fulano, somewhat decomposing his Mexican friend by the energetic pace. Meteoric conditions, the state of the roads, and various little matters, augmented his constitutional repugnance to such exertion. Moreover, he had misgivings as to the sanity of this extraordinary doctor. He cast about for some subject which should interest and delay his protégé.

"I go to San Fulano for a little visit. It is a busy place, this hacienda, and a little of life there tires me. But Chonita, there—Chonita could live there always. But that the house is so silent without her—sad. You know, it may be, how a few friends when she whom one affections is away?"

Coming in the man's manner caught Craft's attention.

Not the name Chonita—oddly enough, that had no connection, no association for him now. But he dimly divined some sort of effort on his dusky friend's part, and was also vaguely conscious that he owed the man some attention.

"Your wife—the Chonita?"

"Yes—but no! Always the same, see you—but not my wife by the church. I am sorry, for the child's sake. But when the wool is light, and hire is little, we shearers have few dollars. And Chonita wished rather for a scarlet shawl, and to go to Santa Margarita for the ball of cascarones; and when a woman wills, what can a man do? For the child, I hoped the Padre might show us favor. But no—he would have the whole fee, although he is my Chonita's uncle—the Padre."

If this mortifying disclosure affected Dr. Craft at all, it only increased his desire to reach Miss Fleming. Strong in this latest intensity of purpose, he bore away, up the valley, until the Mexican, hailing a boon companion, was leaving him. Then he put a broad gold piece into the man's hand. "Not from me to you, understand," he said, as the swart face flushed angrily; "but to fee the Padre—for the child's sake. For us—why, we two are compadres from now—no?"

In the porch where the passion-vines writhed and clambered, Dick stood, looking up the road, his crisp, bronze hair blown almost straight in the strong southeaster. Unabashed by the stern light in those regretful eyes, Dr. Craft began without prologue or preface:

"Where is Miss Fleming, Dick? It must be after school-hours."

"If you had not been otherwise occupied than with her or her affairs, you would know that Miss Fleming's school closed three days ago."

"Closed! Then where is she?"

"Yonder."

Dick's shapely index-finger pointed up the road. Haloed with a cloud of yellow dust, something was rolling clumsily up the crest of the loma. It was the daily stage, departing.

Disappointment, with discomfiture, darkened Dr. Craft's expressive face.

Then Dick said—a new light, or shadow, falling on his troubled face: "Did she ever tell you—did you ever learn her address?"

"Dick—never!"

Y. H. ADDIS.

LOS ANGELES, May, 1880.

The oboe resembles a clarinet very much as a rake resembles a hoe; all the difference is at one end. The voice of the oboe is very much like that of a man trying to whistle with his head under water. The orchestral composers use the oboe, on account of its simple, honest quality, to express a countryman going into a bank and asking the banker to lend him two hundred dollars until Tilden is elected. In Jacobini's beautiful creation, "Sounds from the Kitchen," you will remember the oboes are used to convey the remarks that pass between the cook and the grocer's boy, who had just brought home two gallons of golden syrup in a one-gallon kerosene can, and vice versa. The candid astonishment of the cook infuses the soul of the listener, while the efforts of the grocer's boy to explain away the apparent discrepancy between the quantity of syrup and the size of the can is beautifully and touchingly conveyed. The bassoon is made of wood, and the complete instrument is probably worth eight dollars a cord. It looks like a pump log, and is played by blowing into a silver stem that winds into the side of the tube. When the bassoon is not in use in the orchestra it can be utilized as a clothes-prop. It has two distinct qualities of tone. In the upper and lower register it has a voice like a cow that has fallen into a pit, and in the middle register it sounds like a man with the croup shouting "fire" from a fourth-story window. It is much used by composers for mournful, distracted effects; and in the opera of La Sonnambula it is employed as the interpreter of a man calling down a dark alley for his lost dog. When the average man listens to the ravishing bassoon solo in the slow movement in the concerto for piano and orchestra, it insensibly makes him think of a tall woman, with her head tied up in an apron and her mouth full of clothespins, trying to hang up a fourteen-foot sheet in a gale of wind. The flute is too familiar to require any detailed description. In the hands of the young man living in the next block its expressive, wailing notes are vaguely suggestive of a dog trying to crawl through a fence that is too close for him, assisted by another dog of greater weight and more irritable temperament. The double bass is the largest of the violin tribe. It is also the worst. The man who plays it is usually fat, and always bald.

It is rather hard that every physical ill the journalist is heir to should be ascribed to that awful appetite which culminates in delirium tremens. Yet the belief in the ineradicable weakness of journalists—as a class—is imbedded in the popular skull beyond the reach of an ordinary pickaxe. "Fore George 'is false! The London World has a curious illustration of this in the story of a young fellow who went originally to India as tutor to a native prince, and became afterward "special" to the Civil and Military Gazette. He did very well for some time. All at once his letters ceased, and the doctor of the military hospital wrote to say that young C. was in the hospital suffering from delirium tremens. This surprised all his friends, and especially his father, an elderly clergyman, who testified in high terms as to his son's morals. The doctor afterward feared he had done the young man a wrong. Delirious he had been, it is true, but the temporary madness arose from a letter which he had received telling him that he and his brother had inherited a fortune £60,000 a year. Excitement at such news took away his appetite, and to stimulate it he took to brandy, to which he was unaccustomed. Hence the D. T.

The latest bottle pitched ashore by the sad sea waves contained the following document:

"For thirty-eight days I have floated upon the bosom of the mighty deep. My health, thank God, is good, as well as that of my children. My animals, however, make a tremendous racket. The fox tries to eat the hare, the wolves snap at the goats, and the lion looks at me with an expression not at all reassuring. I have commenced to feel uneasy. Yesterday I dispatched the raven for news. The villain has not returned. The lion licks his chops, with his eyes fixed upon me. What can be the end of it all? If I am eaten who will find this document!"

"NOAH."

HAS THE EARTH'S POPULATION INCREASED?

Among the very many questions which Henry George has thrown into new light in his most suggestive and interesting book, Progress and Poverty, is one upon which he only incidentally and briefly touches, yet which is full of speculative interest. The common opinion is, that the population of the world, taken as a whole, has been for a long time steadily advancing, and is now greater than ever before. This opinion is so common that it is generally accepted as a matter of fact, and never questioned; but, like a good many other popularly accepted opinions, it is probable that it is nothing like as certain as it is assumed to be. The brief marshaling of facts which Mr. George makes, as he touches it in passing, clearly opens a very interesting question, which, so far as we know, has never been raised since Hume's Essay on the Populosity of the Northern Nations dissipated ideas in regard to the ancient populations which, till then, had been current. But it is evident, as George says, that the tendency of recent explorations and investigations has been to reveal indications in many places of much denser populations than now exist. He says, in the course of some remarks preliminary to an examination of the Malthusian theory:

It is a fact which, as we count our increasing millions, we are apt to lose sight of—nevertheless, it is a fact—that in what we know of the world's history decadence of population is as common as increase. Whether the aggregate population of the earth is now greater than at any previous epoch, is a speculation which can only deal with guesses. Since Montesquieu—in the early part of the last century—asserted (what was then probably the prevailing impression) that the population of the earth had, since the Christian era, greatly declined, opinion has run the other way. But the tendency of recent investigation and exploration has been to give greater credit to what have been deemed the exaggerated accounts of ancient historians and travelers, and to reveal indications of denser populations and more advanced civilizations than had before been suspected, as well as of a higher antiquity in the human race. And in basing our estimates of population upon the development of trade, the advance of the arts, and the size of cities, we are apt to underrate the density of population which the intensive cultivations, characteristic of the earlier civilizations, are capable of maintaining—especially where irrigation is resorted to. As we may see from the closely cultivated districts of China and Europe, a very great population of simple habits can readily exist with very little commerce and a much lower stage of those arts in which modern progress has been most marked, and without that tendency to concentrate in cities which modern populations show.

As may be seen from the map in H. H. Bancroft's Native Races, the State of Vera Cruz is not one of those parts of Mexico noticeable for its antiquities. Yet Hugo Fink, of Cordova, writing to the Smithsonian Institution (Reports 1870), says there is hardly a foot in the whole State in which, by excavation, either a broken obsidian knife or a broken piece of pottery is not found; that the whole country is intersected with parallel lines of stones, intended to keep the earth from washing away in the rainy seasons, which show that even the very poorest land was put into requisition, and that it is impossible to resist the conclusion that the ancient population was at least as dense as it is at present in the most populous districts of Europe.

Be this as it may, the only continent which we can be sure now contains a larger population than ever before is Europe. But this is not true of all parts of Europe. Certainly Greece, the Mediterranean islands, and Turkey in Europe, probably Italy, and possibly Spain, have contained larger populations than now, and this may be likewise true of Northwestern and parts of Central and Eastern Europe.

America also has increased in population during the time we know of it; but this increase is not so great as is popularly supposed, some estimates giving to Peru alone at the time of the discovery a greater population than now exists on the whole continent of South America. And all the indications are that previous to the discovery the population of America had been declining. What great nations have run their course, what empires have arisen and fallen in "that new world which is the old," we can only imagine. But fragments of massive ruins yet attest a grander pre-Incan civilization; amid the tropical forests of Yucatan and Central America are the remains of great cities, forgotten ere the Spanish conquest; Mexico, as Cortez found it, showed the superimposition of barbarism upon a higher social development; while through a great part of what is now the United States are scattered mounds which prove a once relatively dense population, and here and there—as in the Lake Superior copper mines—are traces of higher arts than were known to the Indians with whom the whites came in contact.

As to Africa, there can be no question. Northern Africa can contain but a fraction of the population that it had in ancient times; the Nile valley once held an enormously greater population than now, while south of the Sahara there is nothing to show increase within historic times, and widespread depopulation was certainly caused by the slave trade.

As for Asia, which even now contains more than half the human race, though it is not much more than half as densely populated as Europe, there are indications that both India and China once contained larger populations than now, while that great breeding-ground of men, from which issued swarms which overran both countries and sent great waves of people rolling upon Europe, must have been once far more populous. But the most marked change is in Asia Minor, Syria, Babylonia, Persia, and in short that vast district which yielded to the conquering arms of Alexander. Where were once great cities and teeming populations are now squalid villages and barren wastes.

It is somewhat strange that among all the theories that have been raised, that of a fixed quantity to human life on this earth has not been broached. It would at least better accord with historical facts than that of the constant tendency of population to outrun subsistence. It is clear that population has here ebbed and there flowed; its centres have changed; new nations have arisen, and old nations declined; sparsely-settled districts have become populous, and populous districts have lost their population; but as far back as we can go without abandoning ourselves wholly to inference, there is nothing to show continuous increase, or even to clearly show an aggregate increase from time to time. The advance of the pioneers of peoples has, so far as we can discern, never been into uninhabited lands—their march has always been a battle with some other people previously in possession; behind dim empires vaguer ghosts of empire loom. That the population of the world must have had its small beginnings we confidently infer, for we know that there was a geologic era when human life could not have existed, and we can not believe that men sprang up all at once, as from the dragon teeth sowed by Cadmus; yet through long vistas, where history, tradition, and antiquities shed a light that is lost in faint glimmers, we may discern large populations. And during these long periods the principle of population has not been strong enough to fully settle the world, or even, so far as we can clearly see, to materially increase its aggregate population. Compared with its capacities to support human life, the earth as a whole is yet most sparsely populated.

"Dogs, and the Problems connected with Them," is the title of Professor Huxley's latest London lecture. We expect a copy of the great lay sermonizer's paper soon. We shall read, inwardly digest, and then forward it to our Doctor Gally. When what Huxley knows about dogs shall be supplemented by what Gally knows on the same subject, we shall know better how to treat the complex outwardness of the various social, sacerdotal, and political puppies with which our commonwealth is afflicted.

The King of Siam has discovered an infallible cure for small-pox.

Upon learning that a child was suspected of having the disease, he caused the whole town to be burned, and everybody in it!

Two fishers were talking.

"I have found a splendid place for fish recently—a new place, where they bite like everything."

"Ah, have you? Where is it?"

"A little above Sèvres. I was there yesterday."

"What did you catch?"

"The six-forty train coming home."

Madame X. wishes to secure a new butler.

"You know how to serve the table? and especially, can you serve well?" she asked of an applicant.

"Madame may rest assured of it," he replied. "When one has been ten years a surgeon's servant in a dissecting-room, one ought to understand his business."

An honest farmer receives a visit from a dealer in live-stock, who wishes to purchase his pork-crop. After chaffering over the price, they go out to the farm-yard to inspect the animals.

On the threshold they meet the farmer's daughter—a handsome, strapping lass of nineteen, whose plumpness and color would have delighted Rubens.

"By Jove," says the admiring and gallant dealer, feeling that some compliment is demanded of him, "I say, if your pigs are anything like your daughter we will have no difficulty in making a bargain."

It is a very common inscription on tombstones—"Death alone could separate them."

An improvement upon this has been designed and introduced by a suburban artist, who has carved on a monument: "Sacred to the memory of Madame J. Leblanc and Monsieur Paul Lenoir, her son-in-law. Death alone could unite them."

Madame D—to her brother:

"Jean Baptiste, you have broken the flacon of rum."

Jean Baptiste, haughtily:

"I, madame? I was never known to do such a thing! It was the flacon of cognac!"

At the baccarat table, just as the dealer has given the cards to the players, news is brought of the death of one of the habitués. The punters look sadly over their hands, and murmur brief and broken tributes to the departed.

"Poor fellow," says the dealer, laying down his cards, "now he knows whether one ought to stand on five."

Victor Hugo never could abide Goethe. Good reason why. The great German said of Notre Dame that it was a nice enough story, but villainously valueless from a historical point of view.

"Goethe?" said Hugo, scornfully, when his name was mentioned once. "Goethe? Who is Goethe? What did he ever write? What does he amount to? The only thing he ever wrote that is at all passable is The Robbers—"

"Pardon me, master," observes one of Hugo's disciples; "but The Robbers is by Schiller."

"And that is Schiller's!" concluded Hugo, in triumph.

A notorious scandal-monger complained that she had bitten her tongue.

"Impossible," said a listener, "or you would be poisoned."

A certain dramatic author was seen by a friend to have a manuscript almost falling from his pocket.

"If you were not so well known, you would have had your pocket picked," said the friend.

Several ladies were talking of Madame S—, from whom her husband had just separated for a scandalous reason.

"What has become of the creature?" asked one.

"I see her every day, riding in the Bois."

"Mon Dieu! what effrontery!"

"She has not been devoured by shame. On the contrary, she has devoured hers."

"Heavens! what a coarse appetite!"

At the Police Court of a provincial city, an old poacher was condemned for the twentieth time. At the moment that the gendarmes led him away, he said to the judge, in a benevolent voice:

"Don't be disturbed, judge. You shall have your game all the same for dinner this evening."

Local item from Le Gaulois:

"Two martyrs of the science."

"It is yesterday that we have conducted them to the Roquette of the condemneds of that species."

"We have been a little barbarous at their behalf, because we have put them to the neck one fat chain; the throng which was following them and which composed itself of two or three bourgeois of the quarter, of four loungers, and of a little boy pastry cook, showed himself melted and prodigal of the marks of sympathy."

"One of them, a setter enough pretty—for it must well be said that these unfortunates were not others than two dogs extracted from the pound and conducted to the laboratory of the Hotel God—showed himself resigned."

"The other, at the contrary, was refusing to advance, and was protesting of all the fashions—the unhappy had divined."

"But, for example, at the door of the Hotel God, the resistance of the two prisoners became desperate; all both were protesting."

"We have seen them a few after behind the gratings. They had the head inclined, the ear low."

"Eh, well, these poor beasts made pity. Where was the Sir Bergh of the America?"

A COLUMN OF SONNETS.

Two Loves.

Two loves I have of comfort and despair,
Which like two spirits do suggest me still;
The better angel is a man, right fair;
The worse spirit a woman, color'd ill.
To win me soon to hell, my female evil
Tempteth my better angel from my side,
And would corrupt my saint to be a devil,
Wooing his purity with her foul pride.
And whether that my angel be turn'd fiend,
Suspect I may, yet not directly tell;
But being both from me, both to each friend,
I guess one angel in another's hell.
Yet this shall I ne'er know, but live in doubt,
Till my bad angel fire my good one out.

—Shakspeare.

Amiga.

Come! Look with me, dear love,
Where yonder hills rise blue against the sky.
Put by the cloud that makes your smile a sigh.
See! where the eagle flies so high above—
And yonder flower, that sways
And smiles; responsive to the sun's warm rays
It lives to light and sweeten human days.
Lay close your tired head upon my breast,
And let your heart, earth-weary, feel the rest
There is in these, God's ministers to life.
Forget the one who has forgotten you;
Forget the love you found so sweet and new.
Forget the past, with all its labored strife,
And seek with me the beautiful in life.

—Alice Turner.

Thought.

"O messenger, art thou the king, or I?
Thou dallest outside the palace gate
Till on thine idle armor lie the late
And heavy dews; the morn's bright, scornful eye
Reminds thee; then in subtle mockery
Thou smilest at the window, where I wait
Who bade thee ride for life. In empty state
My days go on, while false hours prophesy
Thy quick return; at last, in sad despair,
I cease to bid thee, leave thee free as air,
When lo! thou stand'st before me, glad and fleet,
And lay'st undreamed-of treasures at my feet.
Ah, messenger! thy royal blood to buy
I am too poor. Thou art the king, not I."

—Helen Hunt.

Anterior Life.

Ages ago, beneath vast porticos,
By ocean sunsets dyed with many a flame,
I lived, where grand, majestic pillars rose,
Which grottoes of basalt at night became;
The billows, mirroring each passing cloud,
Mingled, in solemn and mysterious wise,
The music of their diapason loud
With the rich sunset hues that filled my eyes.
Begin with splendors of the air and waves,
Thus did I dwell amid voluptuous calms,
Tended by naked, perfume-breathing slaves,
Who fanned my forehead with refreshing palms,
Their only duty being to divine
The vague unhappiness that made me pine.

—A. E. Lancaster.

To-day.

Each creature holds an insular point in space,
But what man stirs a finger, breathes a sound,
But all the multitudinous beings round,
In all the countless world, with time and place
For their conditions, down to the central base,
Thrill, haply, in vibration and rebound,
Life answering life across the vast profound,
In full antiphony, by a common grace?
I think this sudden joyance which illumines
A child's mood sleeping, unawares may run
From some soul newly loosened from earth's tombs.
I think this passionate sigh, which, half begun,
I stifle back, may reach and stir the plumes
Of God's calm angel, standing in the sun.

—Mrs. Browning.

Beauty.

O mortals, beauteous as a dream of stone
Am I, whose bosom, where so ill ye fare,
Awakens love in poet-hearts alone,
Deathless and mute as atoms of the air.
Throned in the azure, like a sphinx unread,
My snow-heart white as down of swan I keep,
All change from immobility I dread,
And never do I laugh, and never weep.
Poets, before my attitudes supreme,
Imbued with proud and monumental grace,
Consume their days in a laborious dream,
Since I, to fascinate their docile race,
Pure mirrors show, which make all things more bright,
My wondrous eyes, filled with eternal light!

—Charles Baudelaire.

The Poet.

There was a poet once, within whose heart
The passionate pulse of the world beat at full tide;
But all his love was centred in his bride,
Yet her men knew not, for she dwelt apart
From the loud world in the sweeter world of art,
Where in the peace of love they did abide.
Yet he at times would wander from her side,
To toil for her in traffic's noisy mart.
There, seeing him a lonely man, all men
Spoke ill of him, calling him cold and proud;
(So beasts treat one that with them never herds.)
But when he came back to his bride again,
Her hands smoothed from his brow the gathered cloud;
She loved him more for all his bitter words.

—Albert Roland Haven.

To the Memory of Hawthorne.

He stood apart; but as a mountain stands—
Supreme in calm repose above the plain,
Wearing no pride of aspect, no disdain,
Though clothed with power to steep the sunny lands
In mystic shadow. At the mood's demands
He too could cloud his soul, and so remain
Withdrawn, nor sight of it could any gain
More than of foot-prints sunk in surf-washed sands.
Yet, hidden within that rare, sequestered height
Of isolation, what a new-found world
Of splendor lay! What pathless realms untrod!
What rush of passion's cataracts! What delight
Of earth-sweet flowers! What zephyrs phantom-whirled!
And over all, the fair, pure sky of God!

—Margaret J. Preston.

Michael Angelo: Trifles make perfection, but perfection is no trifle.

Emerson: All human acts are satellites to the orb of nature.

Hutton: Every man has his hobby-horse, and it is no disgrace prudently to ride him.

Goethe: No one willingly concedes superiority to another so long as he can possibly deny it.

Erasmus: Smile on whom you please, but trust none that you do not know.

Luther: The better a man is, the more clearly he sees how little he is good for.

Bulwer: The littlest feeling of all is a delight in contemplating the littleness of other people. Nothing is more contemptible than habitual contempt.

Byron: Love has no gift so grateful as his wings.

Shakspeare: Plate sin with gold,
And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks;
Arm it in rags, a pigmy's straw doth pierce it.

Milton: To be weak is miserable, doing or suffering.

Carlyle: He that is the inferior of nothing, can be the superior of nothing, the equal of nothing.

Bulwer: Action is that Lethe in which alone we forget our former dreams; and the mind that, too stern not to wrestle with its emotions, seeks to conquer regret, must leave no time to look behind.

Horace: The foolish, while avoiding vice, run into the opposite extreme.

Chateaubriand: When we grow old, the horizon is not before us, but behind us.

Ballanche: One can not be false to one's own nature.

Winwood Reade: Conscience is merely an organ of the intellect, and is altered, improved, or vitiated, according to the education which it receives and the incidents which act upon it.

Emerson: Concert fires people to a certain fury of performance they can rarely reach alone.

Goethe: The times which are gone are a book with seven seals; and what you call the spirit of past ages is but the spirit of this or that worthy gentleman in whose mind those ages are reflected.

Froude: The essence of true nobility is neglect of self.

Herschel: Art is the application of knowledge to a practical end.

FAG, M. P.

Madame Swetchine: Youth should be a savings bank.

J. G. Holland: Silence is vocal if we listen well.

Bulwer: The darkest of all dooms—the remorse that comes too late.

Madame Swetchine: The void left by death is sometimes greater than the place filled in life.

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps: Save a lost man his memory, he will need no eternal punishment besides.

Longfellow: So many feet that day by day
Still wander from the fold away.

Anon: The reasons which most potent affect a woman's conduct are, perhaps, the only ones she never puts into words.

Bulwer: Error is sometimes sweet; but there is no anguish like an error of which we feel ashamed.

Ouida: Men are faithful only to the faithless. What is true to them they can easily forsake. To be faithful is no virtue; but only women that are vile can be faithless. It is nothing what one is asked; it is what one is, what one wills, that matters.

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps: One finds everywhere some strain at the fibres of one's heart. A man must be healthily reconciled to actual life before a poet—at least most poets—can help it. We must learn to bear and to work before we can spare strength to dream.

Bulwer: A woman always knows when she is loved, though she often imagines she is loved when she is not.

Ouida: Who has done the wrong never pardons.

Anon: Who cares for something they can have? Who cries for the moon? It is the intermediate something—the something that lies just a hand-breadth beyond the utmost stretch of our most painfully strained arms—that we eat our hearts out longing for.

L. E. H.

Erasmus: Love, undying, solid love, whose root is virtue, can no more die than virtue itself.

Brissot: The secret of independence is to have few wants and a steady employment to satisfy them.

Kant: Act always in such a way that the ground of your conduct might form a universal law of action to the world.

Goethe: A soul has only feelers, and not eyes; it gropes, but does not see. Ah! that it could get eyes

WATER RATES AND WATER RATS.

The provision of the Constitution that provided for fixing water rates has been interpreted by the Board of Supervisors as authorizing the board to defer the matter till the first of July. In the meantime the Supervisors have not been idle, and within a few weeks it will become necessary for the board to determine upon the schedule of rates that is to govern between the Spring Valley Water Company and the people who are consumers. The Constitution says that the rates so fixed shall go into effect on the first day of July, and then provides that any board or body failing to pass the necessary ordinances or resolutions fixing water rates, where necessary, within such time, shall be subject to peremptory process to compel action at the suit of any party interested, and shall be liable to such further pains and penalties as the Legislature may prescribe. This seems very peremptory upon the board. But let us suppose that this mandate remains unheeded till the time is passed; it is not clear to us how the courts can, by mandamus or other process, compel the Supervisors to the performance of their duties in this respect. Let us suppose that the twelve minds, or a majority of them, can not agree upon the rates to be fixed, can not come to an understanding as to the amounts that are to be paid by different classes of consumers, and are finally unable to come to any conclusion, or to agree upon the terms of the ordinance to be passed; can the courts compel these legislators to pass an ordinance or law that does not meet their approval? Then the Constitution goes on to declare that any company collecting water rates "otherwise than so established" shall forfeit its charter and works. Certainly the company dealing in water can not be proceeded against by information or otherwise, and can not be deprived of its property or charter until the board has first done its duty and has "fixed rates." So far our Supervisors are not in accord. There is to be reported a majority and a minority report; the minority report, to be made by Mr. Stetson, is ready; the other is not. The Bulletin makes this the occasion of a serious and scolding editorial, because the Supervisors will not proceed, by a haphazard and sweeping reduction, to strike a blow at the Spring Valley Water Company. The Bulletin invokes a certain resolution, passed by a Republican nominating convention, as an inspired and infallible direction to reduce the revenues of the company twenty-five per cent.—and this without any regard to the rights of that company or its shareholders. If, by the exercise of any legislative power, it was competent for the Supervisors to regulate the price of newspapers, the cost per square of advertising, it would be regarded as a very great usurpation of power for the board, without inquiry, and by one sweeping provision, to declare that all the revenues of the "Bulletin Publishing Company" should be reduced twenty-five per cent. The wickedness of such legislation would be very apparent indeed, if the legislators should do such an act without reference to the cost of running the Bulletin and Call—the price of paper, composition, ink, machinery, and labor.

It is a serious business, this interference with private property. It is treading upon dangerous ground, this claim of privilege to seize this water company's property, costing eighteen millions of dollars, and declaring that its revenues shall be fixed at the will of a political party, or at the caprice of a journalistic enemy whose personal feelings are so thinly disguised as are those controlling the twin journals. It is a question in which all classes of society are interested. It is within the agrarian spirit and tendency of the times. If the political or journalistic demagogue may gain office or circulation by pandering to this communistic spirit, then all property is imperiled. If it shall become the settled policy of the law that a municipal governing body, in the interest of its people, without the intervention of the law or the decision of the courts, without other than an ex parte investigation, may reduce the revenues of the Spring Valley Water Company twenty-five per cent., then why may not the same legislation be indefinitely extended? Why may it not be made to apply to railroads, gas companies, hotels, warehouses, to those who conduct journals, to common carriers of all kinds, to any kind of business that is in any respect public in its character? Is it not the entering wedge to the most dangerous kind of legislation? We would not seem to be the advocate of the Spring Valley Water Company, nor in deed of any corporation; but the fight has come to us in this shape, and we can not avoid it. There is this difference between the right to fix fares and freights upon railroad companies and upon this water company. Railroads invoke the doctrine of eminent domain. They take private property for a public use. They become common carriers, and come under well-established laws, authorizing the government to control them in their dealings with the public. But a company that catches water on its own land, holds it on its own artificial reservoirs, and distributes it through its own pipes to those who may choose to deal with it, is doing altogether a different business, and holds another and distinct relation to the community.

The gentlemen composing the Board of Supervisors seem to feel the responsibility of their position, and under their oaths, and their sense of duty to the stockholders of the company, are unwilling to proceed except with great caution. The Bulletin would hound them on with a whoop, seemingly intent upon one thing—to punish the company because the Bulletin has a chronic quarrel with the memory of the dead Ralston, and a livelier grievance against Senator Sharon. This business is, in the principles governing it, exceedingly simple. The company is entitled to collect money enough out of this community to fairly compensate it for its expenditure—that is, to have a fair rate of interest, a fair amount for running expenses, and enough beside to keep the property in repair. To allow it less is to work its confiscation. When this amount shall be ascertained, the burden of taxation to secure this income should be equitably divided proportionate to the property and the individuals who are benefited by this water supply. This is a task somewhat difficult in detail, and requiring patient consideration. But one proposition is most clear and just—that the entire cost of water, in this city of San Francisco, should not be placed upon consumers. It is right that property should pay as well as persons. It would, we believe, be simply just that property should pay one-half, and consumers the other half.

We know of no other city in the world where the direct consumers are compelled to bear all the burden.

We shall be glad when this controversy ends. We are tired of it, and we know the readers of the Argonaut are tired of it. But let our readers not forget that this is their fight, a fight in the result of which they are deeply interested. This controversy, settled as we propose, will relieve each and every family in this city from payment of one-half its present water bills. Every poor family now paying three dollars will pay half the amount, and every family paying for stable, lawn, bath-tub, and the water luxuries of a more elegant home, will pay one-half. Manufacturers consuming water will have their prices reduced. And those property-owners, non-residents, and speculators, who now entirely escape water dues, will be compelled to contribute their quota. This is, in our judgment, right; and if we thought the Bulletin honest and conscientious, we should be surprised that it did not agree with us in this view of the water question. Under the new Constitution, the city is not entitled to free water, as the Bulletin well knows. And as to the covert threat contained in Tuesday's editorial, viz., the unpleasant consequences of personal liability on the part of Supervisors, it occurs to us that the peril of doing their duty, conscientiously and honestly, is not greater than it would be if they should attempt to confiscate property by hasty, ill-considered, and illegal action. Three hundred thousand dollars a year is a large amount to save the people; and it will not be a very hazardous or uncomfortable job to take that amount out of the pockets of tax-shirkers to put it into the pockets of taxpayers.

Boom.

Hark! As from the gloom
Of the darkling tomb—
Syllables of doom:
"Nary boom!"
Listens all the street,
Craning necks to greet
Reverberation sweet
Of a boom.
Dreary are the sighs,
Dim the weary eyes
Watching for the rise
Of that boom.
A moaning faint and low,
That seems to come and go
And die and swell so—
Like a boom.
Then nearer and more near,
And clearer and more clear—
Till, bursting on the ear,
'Tis the boom!
The Bull high in mid air
Now heaves the groaning Bear,
Caught short of many a share
In the boom.
With quick reverberation
Of clam'rous jubilation
And roar of exultation
Rings the Room.
Shout "Hallelujah! Glory!"
Exalt the Bull's horn gory—
Let the big drum tell the story:
Boom! Boom! Boom!
Boom!

Puck has a cartoon entitled the "Codfish Exodus to Europe." Boston has sent a codfish exodus to California. The people of Boston—that is, some of them—are fearfully and wonderfully made up. Their ways are inscrutable, and past finding out. We have no doubt the recent specimens sent us—for some days on exhibition at the Palace Hotel—were all cultured and all wealthy. We Californians, away out on the border land of civilization, cut off from association with Boston, enjoy their visits "amazin'"; and we "calculate" that when the average Boston woman, of the average Boston age, opens her mouth—if she does not drop her teeth—she drops pearls of choice information—real nuggets of wisdom. The average Boston "wimmin" are not so everlastingly "putty," and they do not dress in the most "enticin'" way; but their manners are very "takin'" and free. These Boston people are not at all hard to get acquainted with, and we are only "afeared" there "wunt" be any information left when they have gone—as they do pick it up so fast. We called at the Palace several times, expecting to see the Boston millionaires revel. But Boston people do not revel, they save. For real, prudent folks the Boston man is our "idee." For encouraging examples of economy, we commend Boston travelers as models; they do not go frolicking through the country at haphazard, seeing things, but they contract for what they are to see and to get. For instance, you can't fool a Boston party by sending them to the Geysers one route and bringing them out another, when they can save a dollar a head by going in and coming out the same road. You can't fool a Boston party going to the Yosemite by imposing the Big Trees upon them, as an extra sight to be reached by another road at an extra price. They "kim" to "Californy" to see the "Yosemity," and when they want to see the Big Trees of Calaveras or Mariposa they will "kum agin." When the Boston party visits an orange grove in Los Angeles, and wants a few fruit-laden branches cut from the tree, it is not going to pay as much for a dozen oranges as it can buy 'em for in San Francisco—not if the Boston party knows itself. And if there is anything the Boston party does know, intimately, it is itself. We are very fond of Boston tourists. We are very fond of Boston brown bread, Boston codfish, and Boston culture, and we hope the time may come when we shall be able to visit Boston and take it in. We wish San Francisco could purchase the Old South Church, and Faneuil Hall, and the Pilgrim Rock, and the big organ, and get Mr. Wendell Phillips to come out and lecture to us, and induce the Rev. Joseph Cook to come here as a permanent missionary. We have climate, and soil, and bonanzas, and big pumpkins, and tropical fruits, and Geysers, and things, but we lack culture.

The discussion by the local press as to instructions of the State Convention is altogether unnecessary. Every delegate from California to the Republican Convention at Chicago will feel himself in honor bound to give Mr. Blaine his loyal support so long as he remains before the convention.

OBSCURE INTIMATION.—M. N.—Just returned from a trip out of town. Letter received safely. Subject matter attended to next week; too late now. The address is desirable, but not at all necessary.

THE INNER MAN.

A bride of a few weeks' duration went to market the other day, and seeing some large goldfish swimming about in a glass globe, was struck with the idea of having them for dinner. "I'd like those fishes, if you haven't any smelts," she said mildly to the man, and when told they were not to eat, but for pets, she declared it was a shame, for they would have looked so nice on her Nankin blue china!

ALICE CAREY'S ADVICE.

My lads, who sit at breakfast
With foreheads in a frown,
Because the chop is under-done,
And the fritter over-brown,
Just leave your dainty mincing,
And take, to mend your fare,
A slice of golden sunshine
And a cup of morning air.
And when you have eaten and drunken,
If you want a little fun,
Throw by your jackets of broadcloth
And take an up-hill run.
And what with one and the other
You will be so strong and gay,
That work will be only a pleasure
Through all the rest of the day.
And when it is time for supper,
Your bread and milk will be
As sweet as a comb of honey.
Will you try my recipe?

Considered merely as a romantic trifle, The Strange Adventures of a Phaeton is incomparable. Its descriptive passages are unsurpassed—in quality—by anything in either The Princess of Thule or McLeod of Dare. Its bits of character analysis are so keenly discriminative, yet so deftly veiled in persiflage—half sentimental, half satiric—that the spell of the inconsequent story-telling grows on one with repeated readings. Certainly nothing else in the book is more delightful than the various little suppers, by which the reader's fancy is led captive through half a score of the charmingest chapters in all English fiction. Herewith we reproduce a speaking fragment:

When the lieutenant came back from the fire, he stood regarding with some curiosity the mighty dish of ham and eggs that had come in for our supper. That was a very comfortable and enjoyable repast. A very liberal and honest appetite seemed to prevail; and there was a tolerable attack made on the ample display of ham and eggs. As for the beer that our lieutenant drank, it is not fair to tell stories. He said it was good beer to begin with. Then he thought it was excellent beer. At length he said he had not tasted better since he left London.

It is of course impossible to isolate from its context any passage like the one just quoted without marring the vivid coloring of its creative form. Ham and eggs is manifestly not patrician, and yet—. If you have not read the story, do so.

HOW TO MAKE CLAM SOUP.

First catch your clams. Along the ebbing edges
Of saline coves you'll find the precious wedges,
With backs up, lurking in the sandy bottom—
Pull in your iron rake, and lo! you've got 'em!
Take thirty large ones; put a basin under;
Cleave with a knife their stony jaws asunder.
Add water (three quarts) to the native liquor;
Bring to a boil (and, by the way, the quicker
It boils the better, if you'd do it cutely).
Now add the clams, chopped up and minced minutely;
Allow a longer boil of just three minutes;
And, while it hubbles, quickly stir within its Tumultuous depths, where still the mollusks mutter,
Four tablespoons of flour and four of butter;
A pint of milk, some pepper to your notion,
And clams need salting, although horn of ocean.
Remove from fire—if much boiled they will suffer;
You'll find that India-rubber isn't tougher.
After 'tis off, add three fresh eggs, well beaten;
Stir once more, and 'tis ready to be eaten.
Fruit of the wave! O dainty and delicious!
Food for the gods! Ambrosia for Apicius!
Worthy to thrill the soul of sea-born Venus,
Or titillate the palate of Silenus!

Regarded from a gastronomic point of view, it appears that there is nothing particularly desirable in dining with the queen, although it is a privilege much coveted by ambitious men. A distinguished divine, who occasionally preaches at Windsor, and dines and sleeps there afterward, said the other day that the dinner was a remarkably unsatisfactory affair to a hungry man. It is not considered etiquette to continue eating of any particular course after the queen has partaken of it to her satisfaction, and as her majesty eats very little the courses are hurried over. After dinner there is hardly time to take even one glass of wine before coffee is brought in. The queen does not put her cup on the table, but sips a little as the servant holds it on the salver. Then her majesty rises, and, of course, the guests all rise and stand back from the table. The queen then makes the round of the room, stopping to talk for a few minutes to any one of the guests whom she may delight to honor, and then goes out, leaving the guests to amuse themselves as they like for the evening.

CXXVIX.—Sunday, May 23.—Bill of Fare for Eight Persons.

Clam Soup.
Chicken Salad.
Fried Sheep's Trotters. Potatoes.
Baked Tomatoes. Asparagus.
Roast Veal.
Vegetable Salad.
Lemon Water Ice, Fancy Cakes, Cherries, and Oranges.

TO MAKE LEMON WATER ICE.—Four lemons, one-half pound of sugar, one and one-half pint of boiling water. Grate the rind from the lemon into a bowl, squeeze upon this the juice, add to this the sugar, and pour over all the boiling water, stirring until thoroughly mixed. Allow the preparation to stand until quite cold, strain through a hair sieve, put into a freezer, and freeze until very hard; then pack the freezer in fresh ice to keep its contents from melting. Serve immediately from the freezer. Water ices should be tasted before being frozen, in order that more sugar may be added if not sweet enough. Care must be taken to use lemons without bitterness in the skins.

OUR LETTER BOX.

The Development of a New Bard.

EDITOR ARGONAUT: I do not think you are altogether just to yourself or "our own poets" in withholding from the products of their muse the benefit of all editorial revision or embellishment. It would cost you nothing to intersperse a few plums amid the batter—and then consider the value to your own columns. I will give from your last issue some illustrations of what I mean—adapting my selections from those cruder forms in which they flowed off the poets' pens.

TO LANTHE JANE.

Alone I stand; on either hand
A street runs up and down,
And one doth lead by dewy mead
To Alameda town.

For she is in that Eden fair—
Around her roses blooming.
Ah, will she hate—or will she wait
Till stocks once more are booming?

I think that has a local flavor—do not you? Sort of redolent of the soil, as it were—suggestive to Eastern critics of that Pacific breeziness they seem to like. Another:

LOOKING BLACK.

When on life's ocean borne away
From Saucelito's painted mead,
We care not there to longer stay—
We never did care much, indeed.

When Faith's assessments have been paid,
Hope, poor flutterer, drooping low,
Of Charity now asks the aid,
One modest quencher to bestow.

Do you begin to catch the idea? See how this poetry may be made to appeal to the most torpid imagination! Again:

BOOBY AND I.

Aces a pair were the pictures I picked up
Under the mellowing skylight on high;
Three little queens were the cards that I dealt him;
Carefully playing were Booby and I.

Aces a pair I can draw when I'm careful—
Draw, and give Booby his innocent queen;
Raking the pot, I light out on my mustang,
For I am the terror from San Jo-a-quín.

I have adapted the location of that concluding line expressly to captivate the Eastern critic. I think he will be charmed with the whole effort—its largeness, freedom, and abandon. But let me fly an original flight—something strong in local allusion. I have done you a little idyl here which I call

THE BUZZARD OF SHEEPWASH MEADOW—A PICTURE OF THE SIERRA.

Loud roared the coyote across the wild plain,
Loud brattled the thunder and beat the sharp rain;
Quick scudded the rattlesnake through the down-pour,
The Jack-rabbit pulsed—chattering sore.

Then rose the king buzzard, and boomed in his pride;
He whetted his talons, his pinions spread wide;
He swooped on that Jack-rabbit—swallowed him down;
Then grappled the rattlesnake, ring-streaked with brown.

"Ha, whoop!" shrieked the tyrant of cañon and gorge.
"This worm in my talons I'll murder—by George!"
And, battling the storm, the fierce despot uprose—
All limply the serpent trailed down from his tocs.

But biding his time, as they mounted on high,
The poisonous insect strikes deep in his eye;
The venom infects his heart's life-blood yet warm.
"Ah, me," sighs the buzzard, "he's done me a harm!"

The storm passes off on the wings of the wind—
A stark and cold buzzard it leaveth behind.
The Monarch of Sheepwash lies stretched on the lea—
For monarchs don't thrive in the land of the free.

The kinglings of Europe may profit by he,
And learn what ripe-snorling old rattlesnakes we.

I don't say anything; but if an Ode is really wanted for any national occasion, I shall be at the old address, Cell No. 5. S. S. G.

Conventional Kissing.

This is a subject against which the satire of modern authors—generally of the male element—is continually directed. We seldom pick up a novel without meeting with some such passage as this—"Good-bye, dearest, do come and see me soon"—kissing her with effusion. Then, as soon as the door has shut behind her—Horrid, disagreeable creature! What people one does have to call upon!" And is it not more truth than satire? Do we not call formally on people, kiss them when we meet and when we part, and the very least we can say is that we are perfectly indifferent to them? Perhaps we despise them—we may possibly hate them—but in ordinary cases we care so little for them that, were we to read of their death in to-morrow's paper, we should not feel particularly grieved. Nevertheless, this mode of salutation has grown to be as common as—and, indeed, has almost entirely superseded—the old-time hand-shake. Certainly nothing could be more hypocritical. People kiss us whom we know have not an atom more of warm feeling for us than we have for them; whom we are well aware say disagreeable things about us, and criticise our peculiarities the moment our backs are turned. And yet we tolerate it! It is demoralizing to human nature. It makes us unable to discriminate between falseness and reality. It gives to society an air of hypocrisy and deceit. If any formal mode of salutation be necessary, the general re-introduction of the old-fashioned hand-shake would restore honesty to the world. But, if even that were rendered obsolete, it would not be much loss.

The old French adage is good, however: "Give your hand to an acquaintance, your cheek to your friend, and keep your lips for your lover." Were we allowed to salute people on the cheek it would not be so bad; but we are seldom presented with that substitute. Our numerous dear friends prefer to keep the powder where they have taken so much pains to put it. They are too considerate to imagine that it would becomingly adorn our lips when transferred thither. It is inconsiderate for people to fly at visitors and salute them in this manner. It disarranges their crimps, and discomposes the "dignified calling expression" which has been adjusted with so much care. I strongly suspect that this kissing at formal calls was introduced by some awful lady who was averse to soiling her light gloves. Moreover, it is decidedly comical to witness this conventional kissing. Two women fly at each other, and give one another a little peck, more often than not bestowing it upon the empty air. This duty over, they sit down and mentally criticise each other's clothes, head-dress, artificialities, etc. After ten or fifteen minutes' conversation, they peck each other again, and one departs to repeat the performance elsewhere. There are other gushingly disposed individuals, on the contrary, who take you into their arms, and give you such a hug that you wildly wish yourself away, and that kissing in any form had never been invented.

What does it amount to, after all? What good does it do any one? In fact, aside from its insincerity, it is decidedly nauseating. Imagine a lady who has just given a "tea" being the recipient of a couple of hundred of kisses upon her next reception day. Horrors! Let no one further talk about "teas" being cheap. It is dreadfully insipid as well. I can imagine that in kissing one's gentlemen friends there might be some spice—that is, until the novelty had worn off. Upon being reduced to a conventionality, however, it would soon become as uninteresting a performance—as both sides—as the other. No one need exclaim, in virtuous horror, there is just as much sense in the one as in the other. If we meant no more in kissing the members of the opposite sex than we do in kissing our own, the impropriety would not be great. In fact, I should think that in bidding an affectionate and mechanical adieu to the female portion of a large party of both sexes, nothing would be more natural than to "go it blind" among the opposite element. The change from the one form to the other is as meaningless as it is sudden.

Persons who are decidedly averse to formal kissing are more apt to carry it to extremes than those who are not. They have so worked up their minds to the highest pitch of endurance that they insist, as a matter of course, upon kissing every one who comes within their reach. To such an extent do some people—generally, gushing school-girls—carry the business that we see them kissing each other on the streets, or in the stores before the clerks. Nothing could be in worse taste, and it ought to be prohibited by law. There are others who have made such a habit of it, that I actually believe it has become necessary to their very existence to keep up an osculatory fire from morning till night. I have seen people, who in reality cared nothing for each other, keep up the performance at intervals during an entire evening. If they did but know how ridiculous it looks to non-participants, they would be apt to fly into the opposite extreme.

I think some girls have an idea that it is tantalizing to a man to see them kiss half a dozen friends of their own sex promiscuously. But I will venture to say that they are mistaken. It is not only apt to provoke ridicule, but, if I were in the man's place, I should care very little about kissing a girl who had made the subject so merely a matter of form that she would hardly be able to discriminate between one kind of kissing and another. If we followed the ancient, original idea, we would only kiss those friends of whom we are really fond—and then not too often. A little goes a great way; too much is apt to pall and render us indifferent. For even kissing one's relations has grown to be but a matter of form. We salute them morning and evening, as in duty bound, and so accustomed do we become to the performance that half the time we are hardly aware of what we are doing. If we omit the ceremony we are accused of indifference, whereas in all probability it has been so short a period since we have seen the offended party that we have really forgotten that the time has again come round.

However, it is all very well to salute our friends affectionately; but we devoutly hope that some day this absurd fashion of conventional kissing will die a natural death. Both dignity and the appearance of honesty, at least, would then be restored to society. FAG, M. P.

The Unreasonable Ant.

From Mark Twain's "Tramp Abroad."

Now and then, while we rested, we watched the laborious ant at his work. I found nothing new in him—certainly nothing to change my opinion of him. It seems to me that in the matter of intellect the ant must be a strangely overrated bird. During many summers now I have watched him, when I ought to have been in better business, and I have not yet come across a living ant that seemed to have any more sense than a dead one. I refer to the ordinary ant, of course; I have had no experience of those wonderful Swiss and African ones which vote, keep drilled armies, hold slaves, and dispute about religion. Those particular ants may be all that the naturalist paints them, but I am persuaded that the average ant is a sham. I admit his industry, of course; he is the hardest-working creature in the world—when anybody is looking—but his leather-headedness is the point I make against him. He goes out foraging, he makes a capture, and then what does he do? Go home? No; he goes anywhere but home. He doesn't know where home is. His home may be only three feet away; no matter, he can't find it. He makes his capture, as I have said; it is generally something which can be of no sort of use to himself or anybody else; it is usually seven times bigger than it ought to be; he hunts out the awkward place to take hold of it; he lifts it bodily up in the air by main force, and starts—not toward home, but in the opposite direction; not calmly and wisely, but with a frantic haste which is wasteful of his strength; he fetches up against a pebble, and instead of going around it, he climbs over it backwards, dragging his booty after him, tumbles down the other side, jumps up in a passion, kicks the dust off his clothes, moistens his hands, grabs his property viciously, yanks it this way, then that, shoves it ahead of him a moment, turns tail and lugs it after him another moment, gets madder and madder, then presently hoists it into the air and goes tearing away in an entirely new direction; comes to a weed; it never occurs to him to go around it. No; he must climb it, and he does climb it, dragging his worthless property to the top—which is as bright a thing to do as it would be for me to carry a sack of flour from Heidelberg to Paris by way of Strasburg steeple; when he gets up there he finds that that is not the place; takes a cursory glance at the scenery, and either climbs down again or tumbles down, and starts off once more—as usual, in a new direction. At the end of half an hour he fetches up within six inches of the place he started from, and lays his burden down. Meantime, he has been over all the ground for two yards around, and climbed all the weeds and pebbles he came across. Now he wipes the sweat from his brow, strokes his limbs, and then marches aimlessly off, in as violent a hurry as ever. He traverses a good deal of zig-zag country, and by and by stumbles on his same booty again. He does not remember to have ever seen it before; he looks around to see which is not the way home, grabs his bundle, and starts. He goes through the same adventures he had before; finally stops to rest, and a friend comes along. Evidently the friend remarks that a last year's grasshopper leg is a very noble acquisition, and inquires where he got it. Evidently the proprietor does not remember exactly where he did get it, but thinks he got it "around here somewhere." Evidently the friend contracts to help him freight it home. Then, with a judgment peculiarly antic (pun not intentional), they take hold of opposite ends of that grasshopper leg and begin to tug with all their might in opposite directions. Presently they take a rest, and confer together. They decide that something is wrong, they can't make out what. Then they go at it again, just as before. Same result. Mutual recriminations follow. Evidently each accuses the other of being an obstructionist. They warm up, and the dispute ends in a fight. They lock themselves together and chew each other's jaws for a while; then they roll and tumble on the ground till one loses a horn or a leg and has to haul off for repairs. They make up and go to work again in the same old insane way, but the crippled ant is at a disadvantage; tug as he may, the other one drags off the booty and him at the end of it. Instead of giving up, he hangs on and gets his shins bruised against every obstruction that comes in the way. By and by, when that grasshopper leg has been dragged all over the same old ground once more, it is finally dumped at about the spot where it originally lay. The two perspiring ants inspect it thoughtfully, and decide that dried grasshopper legs are a poor sort of property after all; and then each starts off in a different direction to see if he can't find an old nail or something else that is heavy enough to afford entertainment and at the same time valueless enough to make an ant want to own it.

ALL ABOUT THE WOMEN.

"No woman ever yet achieved a reputation for beauty without more or less deserving it."

Business before pleasure, as the man remarked when he kissed his wife before going to the club.

Having asked his girl for a kiss, as a tonic, she replied that there was such a thing as being too tonic.

The world is the book of women. A disreputable old bachelor says this may be so, but some women don't read it.

A queer old hen declined an invitation to a gander party recently, for the reason that the ganders did not belong to her set.

The passion for antiquities is on the increase, but old ladies are not appreciated more highly than ever. Neither are mothers-in-law.

A woman, in choosing a lover, considers a good deal more how the man will be regarded by other women than whether she loves him herself.

A young lady named Sheep changed her name to Lamb before she had been in Michigan thirty-six hours. She went west in quest of youth.

A Wisconsin girl broke off her engagement because her lover had no romance. She wanted to be married on stilts, and he wouldn't agree.

New York has a "Female Bible Society." Female Bibles may possess some advantage over the old Bible, but we doubt it. Sex in the Scriptures is all wrong.

It is said that women live on love. Small-salaried young men will be interested to learn the love referred to is for baked beans, beef soup, onions, and new spring hats.

Young ladies who wish to have small mouths are advised to repeat this at frequent intervals during the day: "Fanny Finch fried five floundering frogs for Francis Fowler's father."

One reason why Leadville has no schools is because all the school-ma'ams who go there find husbands between the depot and the hotels, and don't care a cent whether school keeps or not.

An Ohio woman, before drowning herself in a shallow trough, strapped her head down in the water for fear that her courage might fail her when she began to smother. A sensible woman.

When a boy falls and peels the skin off his nose, the first thing he does is to get up and yell. When a girl tumbles and hurts herself badly, the first thing she does is to get up and look at her dress.

An old girl, editing an agricultural newspaper in the West, writes: "Mixed husbandry is what we need." She also says with extreme unction, "There will be no clubs in the next world." No? Well, we'll make it next.

Curiosity thy name is woman, vengeance thy name is woman, and several other things. Perhaps, after all, woman is everything, and we never thoroughly learn anything until she teaches it to us by her intensity.

A Western girl writes that she hates engagement rings, "as they prevent a girl's receiving any attention from other gentlemen." Nonsense! Makes her all the more attractive. Half the fun is getting a girl away from some other fellow.

"Mother," said a seven-year-old son of an energetic mother, as he watched her vigorous manipulation of a kitchen utensil "you ought not to go to heaven." "Why not, my son?" "Because you would wear out your harp before eternity was half over."

If he puts his arms around her like a bear and stops her breath when he kisses her, they are not married, but are likely to be. If he puts his hands on her shoulders, leans forward a little, snatches the prize and falls back, they have been married two weeks. If he comes up with his hands in his pockets, looks out of the window, says "Well, good-bye," gives her a tasteless smack, and rushes off, they have been married two years and life is a desert.

A St. Louis young lady says she knows perhaps one hundred young men in round numbers; of these she knows about thirty intimately, and of these thirty there are not more than four whom she would consent to marry for either love or money on the spur of the moment. This young lady has not, however, made any statement to the effect that out of the one hundred young men—including the famed four—there is not one who would marry her for love or money on either the spur of the moment or the jab of a thousand years.

Girls, do you flirt at the matinees! Of course not; but maybe some of your friends do. There is a little story which you can read to these giddy fair ones. It is told by Catharine Cole in the New Orleans Times:

I went with Miss X. to the Varieties matinee. During the last act I noticed that the giddy girl frequently turned her head toward one side of the theatre. At length I quietly let my eyes follow the path made by my companion's, and saw a fellow to whose gaze she was thoughtlessly responding. Dear, honest, old Tom, who never seemed more honest than he did then, came in to take us home, and sat down beside her. Presently, in that delightfully innocent manner we women know so well how to assume, I leaned over and asked Tom "who was that gentleman?" Tom cast his eyes, further, smiled, and replied: "That gentleman, old lady, is my barbers." Of course, Tom teased me all the way home about my "gentleman," but, la! bless me, I didn't mind. Dear! you should have seen Miss X. color up when the fellow was.

THE RANGER'S REVENGE;

Or, The Awfully Awful Way He Socked It to a Sioux Savage.

CHAPTER I.

As the party swept out of the cañon to the brow of the hill they came face to face with an elegant brown-stone mansion. "Injuns!" ejaculated the guide, as the intrepid party of rangers hid behind the fence.

The window opened, and Ta-toncha-sappee, the dreaded Sioux and hereditary foe of the pale-faces, stepped upon the balcony, followed by his lovely daughter, the graceful Shung-wau-cau. The servant brought some chairs, and the parent and child sat down.

"And you really object to having me marry Claude Lavelette?" murmured the young girl.

A fierce wave of passion tore like his native blizzard across the old chief's face.

"I do," said he, in a suppressed tone. "He drinks, and no drunkard shall profane the family of Ta-toncha-sappee."

The fall of the young girl, as she fainted, drowned the fierce oath of Claude Lavelette, who was one of the rangers behind the fence, and who heard the sentence passed upon him.

Ta-toncha-sappee rang for restoratives, and, taking his umbrella and gun as protection against the sun and coyotes, he strolled off to the opera.

CHAPTER II.

Claude Lavelette was the son of rich but respectable parents; and, having been educated at Harvard, had early developed a taste for savage life. His father had fitted him out with a few companions, to whom he had given the name of the Jack Rabbit Rangers, and thus equipped he had made his way to the Far West, and wound up on the prairies of northern Montana.

He had met the beautiful Shung-wau-cau at a church sociable in the village where she lived, and her beauty had fascinated him. Nor was the young girl indifferent to the manly charms destined to effect such an impression on her after life. But Ta-toncha-sappee would not allow the young man to call, and Claude and the Jack Rabbits had sworn to take her.

As the old chief passed up the street, Claude swung himself upon the balcony and clasped the girl to his heart.

"I heard it all," he whispered. "But fear not. I will scoop the old guy yet."

And with this terrible threat he escaped as the servants approached.

CHAPTER III.

Ta-toncha-sappee leaned forward out of his box and scalped a fiddler.

"Sic semper soprano," he said, throwing the scalp to the heroine of the opera, who blushed, smiled, and put it in her bosom, as the house rang with applause at the daring act.

The chief laughed slightly and bowed his acknowledgments, while the sweet aria, "Di mi nea castio il Giovanna bello di verri," arose like the perfume and came down like the stick.

Entranced by the music, Ta-toncha-sappee did not see the glaring eyes of a young man bent upon him from the top tier.

'Twere better for him that he had.

CHAPTER IV.

For days the fragile girl lay at the point of death, but care and a strong constitution restored her, and in a few months she was able to sit up in an easy-chair and receive presents.

During this time the chief had spent days, and even nights, at the drug-store, looking over accounts with his clerk, and at last he discovered that he was ruined.

He had speculated largely in Rochelle salts, and dissipated his fortune. He could look for no assistance from the rest of the tribe, who were at war with the whites, and pretty generally had up.

But the old man was proud. The blood of many generations of Sioux ran in his veins, and it was hard for him to give up.

Influenced by his wife, he had consented to give a grand party in honor of his daughter's recovery, and the invitations were out.

On the evening appointed the guests arrived, hand-painted in full evening dress, and the crash of music and the hum of conversation mingled with the breath of prairie flowers through the halls of the stately mansion.

CHAPTER V.

Claude Lavelette—for it was he that had looked down from the top tier that night—had fled to his cave in the mountains, and, hurrying himself in the volumes of his well-selected library, had taught himself to write.

Carefully filling out the lines in a blank, he concealed it within his hunting shirt, and, mounting his champion charger, sped for the ball. His rangers followed him in a hack, engaged for the purpose, armed to the teeth.

Entering the drawing-room with a martial tread that attracted the attention of all, he handed the blank to Ta-toncha-sappee. The haughty chief adjusted his glasses, and, as he read, his face turned a ghastly hue.

"I can't pay it to-night," he whispered.

"Then I must turn it off," said the young man, sternly.

"But my guests—"

"Must dance in the dark."

There was a death-like silence in the room.

"I'll drop around in the morning and settle it," said the chief, quickly.

"Won't do—company's orders." And the young man turned toward the cellar door.

"Stay!" said a silvery voice behind him.

The young man turned, and faced the lovely Shung-wau-cau, the pride of the prairie.

"What would you?" she asked, in a voice that thrilled him.

"It is the gas-bill," he replied, "and it must be paid to-night, or I take away the merre."

Uncivilized though he was, Ta-toncha-sappee knew he was no match for a gas company.

"And what will tempt you to let this thing stand over until morning?" he asked, while perspiration stood on his brow. "Your daughter," was the sententious response.

"Take her," said the chief; and Claude Lavelette clasped her in his arms.

CHAPTER VI.

Claude Lavelette went into the drug business with his father-in-law. He found an immense quantity of salts on hand; but he was equal to the emergency. Having influence at Washington, he got a contract to furnish Rochelle salts to the American army in the field. Wealth began to pour in upon him, and in about an hour and a half he had restored his father-in-law's shattered fortune. The fate of the army was never known.

One night the chief and Claude were conversing upon their altered affairs, when Ta-toncha-sappee asked about the gas-bill.

"It was a forgery," said Claude, with a smile; and his father blessed him and took him to his bosom, for he recognized a prize in a son-in-law who could get a government contract and forge a signature.

Details About New Vineyards.

In continuation of the remarks which we offered last week—concerning the selection of land for a vineyard, by a man of limited means, whose aim is to make a living off it—we would repeat that he ought to select either rich, new land, easy to be drained, or else exhausted wheat-land, of which kind there is already a good deal in the State, and more about to become so, if the present ruinous system of cultivation be continued. This system takes every year so much out of the soil, and returns nothing in the shape of manure. The vine, fortunately, does not require very much of those kinds of plant-food which are indispensable to corn (or grain) crops. Potash in gravel, or loam containing lime in some form, and such vegetable matter as the roots may find as they penetrate deep into the ground, are of primary importance; matters containing nitrogen and soluble salicaria far less so. That new vineyards will be planted every year, and that most of the existing ones will be enlarged, there can be no doubt. The annual reports from Europe are encouraging in California just in proportion as they are depressing in Europe. The world will have wine from somewhere, and is not very particular about the country. But about those ten or twenty-acre lots, where wine is to be made, and raisins dried in the sun, of which we have heard a good deal lately—those earthly paradises of the future, where the sorrows and ills of this cold world shall cease—much that is not altogether picturesque and tempting remains to be told. On this branch of our subject we have the sad experience of failures in other lands, and we fear like results in California. The condition of the irrigated colonies about Fresno does not bring to our imaginations lively pictures of Arcadian happiness. However, once for all be it said—a vineyard of only ten or twenty acres is a very nice little property if you sink the first cost of land, buildings, and cultivation, and all expenses attending the first two years, which are always unprofitable. Now, the customary plan with the man of rather limited means is to take up land on deferred payment—which admits, indeed, of the capital being available for present requirements; building a dwelling, a cellar, outhouses, sheds, fencing, planting, etc. Yet, when all this has been done, the settler has to face the inevitable two years with everything going out and nothing coming in. Fencing is an important consideration. Something more is needed than to exclude cattle. It is most desirable to plant live hedges inside the frame fences of some hardy shrub, such as wild dog-rose or osage orange. Moreover, it is always advantageous to run several evergreen fences right through from north to south, or in any other direction which may be at right angles to the prevailing currents of cold wind. In Portugal, these are often rosemary or lavender; and, though of no great height, yet serve to check or modify air currents. Inside the outer fences there is no tree more profitable and advantageous to plant than the olive. There is always a strip of ground where that tree can be set out. It should never be omitted, for it makes an excellent break-wind, and its fruit, if not used for oil, is second to no food for fattening poultry. The use of fig-trees and late-ripening fruit-trees scattered about in a vineyard is, that small birds, which make such havoc among the grapes, are drawn off to the figs, which they prefer to all other fruit. The fig-tree ripens its principal crop from August till touched by frosts in October, when the vintage should be finished. The selection of vines and the methods of planting must be decided by the nature of the soil and climate; and here local experience is the safest guide. Vines that would yield abundantly at Fresno or San Bernardino would not flourish, for a long time, in Sonoma or Napa Valley; while some kinds, admirably suited to those valleys, might bear well if taken to the hot, irrigated plains, yet the character of the wine would show a marked change. A common error in this State is to plant a great number of varieties, while four for wines and one for raisins—or at most two—should be considered a maximum. As soon as planting is finished, keep down weeds; and when the scarifier, or cultivator, has been used for the last time in the early summer, pass a light wooden roller over the vineyard—just wide enough not to injure the vines, and only heavy enough to crush the clods and lay the ground smooth. It helps to keep down weeds, retards evaporation of moisture from the soil, and increases the temperature by reflecting and radiating heat. Simple and sensible and easy as this work is, we have never met with an instance where it was adopted in California. The Portuguese methods of cultivation with the enchada secures the same advantage without requiring a roller. Our readers may consider all these mere matters of detail, but we feel their importance to men about to start into viticulture. All things about a vineyard are matters of detail, and in proportion as details are attended to will be the success.

The expression, as applied to actors and public speakers, of "bringing down the bouse," originated with Samson. He was the first on record.

If Grant is nominated and elected a Shakspearean quotation will have to be changed to, "Now a tanner will last you twelve years."

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

Utopia.

If you and I might only go
Far from the world's rude, wrangling voices,
And find some leafy spot, and low,
Softly to charm our wedded choices—
A spot where black hill-shadows fall,
And yet where blue sea-spaces glisten,
A glen where dreamy hillows call,
For souls like yours and mine to listen—

How gladly, then, the days would glide!
How faultlessly the nights would follow,
With cadences of many a tide
In many a cavern cool and hollow!
What peace our sheltered lives would hold!
What rest our placid hearts discover—
While wind, and bird, and sea-wave told
The joys of lover and of lover!

I picture easeful moments spent
Among broad, shadowy branches, lifting
Their gloss to some pure firmament
Where spheres of pallid peace are drifting;
I see the flexuous vine-coil drowse,
The deep, dark mosses glimmer greenly,
And watch, between close-tangled boughs,
The clear-curved breaker flashing keenly.

Morn after morn our happy eyes,
From bright, smooth beach, or sheer cliff-ending,
Would greet with unassuming surprise
The grandeur of the sun's ascending.
A ceaseless marvel unto us
Would seem day's mighty flower unfolding—
Beholding the miraculous,
And awed with its divine beholding.

Eve after eve each fleeting hue
In western heavens would wake our wonder,
Till vaguely arched that eyrie blue
The white stars love to blossom under;
And o'er dusk waters, it might be,
The kindling eastern air grew yellow,
While gaudily from purple sea
Mounted the great moon, golden-mellow.

Ah, here how sweet, my love, my own,
To dream, aloof from any sorrows,
Of one fair, changeless monotone—
Serene to-morrows and to-morrows!
Ah, sweet, in sooth, when God had furled,
All colors at the calm sky-veiges,
And night came silencing the world,
And loudening the long sea-surges.

God's-Acre.

I like that ancient Saxon phrase which calls
The burial-ground God's-Acre! It is just;
It consecrates each grave within its walls,
And breathes a benison o'er the sleeping dust.

God's-Acre! Yes, that blessed name imparts
Comfort to those who in the grave have sown
The seed that they had garnered in their hearts,
Their bread of life, alas! no more their own.

Into its furrows shall we all be cast,
In the sure faith that we shall rise again.
At the great harvest, when the Archangel's blast
Shall winnow, like a fan, the chaff and grain.

Then shall the good stand in immortal bloom
In the fair gardens of that second birth;
And each bright blossom mingle its perfume
With that of flowers which never bloomed on earth.

With thy rude plowshare, Death, turn up the sod,
And spread the furrow for the seed we sow;
This is the field and acre of our God—
This is the place where human harvests grow!

—Longfellow.

"Some Time."

Some time, when all life's lessons have been learned,
And sun and stars forevermore have set,
The things which our weak judgments here have spurned,
The things o'er which we grieved with lashes wet,
Will flash before us, out of life's dark night,
As stars shine most in deeper tints of blue;
And we shall see how all God's plans are right,
And how what seemed reproof was love most true.

And we shall see how, while we frown and sigh,
God's plans go on as best for you and me;
How, when we called, He heeded not our cry,
Because His wisdom to the end could see.
And, e'en as prudent parents disallow
Too much of sweets to craving babyhood,
So God, perhaps, is keeping from us now
Life's sweetest things, because it seemeth good.

And if, sometimes, commingled with life's wine
We find the wormwood, and rebel and shrink,
Be sure a wiser hand than yours or mine
Pours out this portion for our lips to drink.
And if some friend we love is lying low,
Where human kisses can not reach his face,
Oh, do not blame the loving Father so,
But wear your sorrow with obedient grace.

And you shall shortly know that lengthened breath
Is not the sweetest gift God sends His friend,
And that sometimes the sable pall of death
Conceals the fairest boon his love can send.
If we could push ajar the gates of life,
And stand within, and all God's workings see,
We could interpret all this doubt and strife,
And for each mystery could find a key.

But not to-day; then be content, poor hearts;
God's plans like dillies pure and white unfold—
We must not tear the close-shut leaves apart,
Time will reveal the calyxes of gold.
And if, through patient toil, we reach the land
Where tired feet, with sandals loosed, may rest,
When we shall know and clearly understand,
I think that we will say, "God knows the best."

The average West Point cadet may not be fairly represented by the present classes—it is to be hoped he is not. A young lady attended a recent review at the academy, and in conversation with one of the cadets wondered "why Whittaker had no defenders among his classmates." "We don't care to face the ridicule of the other fellows," was the answer. "Then the courage you learn here is a strictly physical thing, is it?"

THE GEM PUZZLE.

In conversation, a few days since, with a Chinese gentleman—there is more than one of the race in this city fully entitled to the appellation—speaking of the manners, habits, and customs of his countrymen, he incidentally mentioned that they had in China a great variety of puzzles, of which comparatively few had ever gone abroad. They formed, he said, the staple of amusement for people of leisure, and were sometimes composed of costly material and were of rare workmanship. This led me to ask him if he had ever seen in China what has been called here the "Gem Puzzle." He said it was one of the simplest and most common, to be found in every house; it served to amuse the children and the inexperienced. He seemed to wonder greatly at the popular interest it had excited in the United States. Especially was he astonished when he heard that men of great intelligence—mathematicians and other savants—had differed, and almost quarreled, upon the subject. He said: "The whole thing is so simple that I think I can show you in a few moments what derangements of the fifteen numbers can and cannot be reduced to order." At his request I sent out and procured a box of sixteen pieces. My visitor then furnished the following analysis:

The puzzle consists in reducing to numerical order the deranged numbers, the operator being confined to the limited movement of filling a vacant space with a contiguous number. This vacant square may be shifted to any and every square in the box. The operator is in each movement limited to one of three moves. No matter what the derangement may be, a very little practice will enable the operator to bring into numerical order the three first rows of figures. This will necessarily leave the fourth or bottom row with the three last numbers in some one of its permutations. Now, three figures are susceptible of six permutations. Thus the three figures composing the last line, or bottom row—all the preceding numbers being reduced to numerical order—may be left in either of the six forms following:

First.....	13 14 15	Fourth.....	14 13 15
Second.....	13 15 14	Fifth.....	15 13 14
Third.....	14 15 13	Sixth.....	15 14 13

Now, it is to be observed that there is a feature belonging to the third and fifth derangements that does not attach to the other three. It is this: that in these two the numerical order can be restored by transferring, in the third, the 13 on the extreme right to the extreme left; and, in the fifth, by transposing the 15 on the extreme left to the extreme right—that is, by transposing the extremes. Whereas, in the second, fourth, and sixth derangements, numerical order can only be restored by interposing some one of the numbers between the other two. The change of extremes can be effected without disordering, or inverting, any of the numbers on the first, second, or third lines; the interposition can not be made without an inversion of some of the preceding numbers. That is to say, the limited sliding movement to which the operator is confined permits the first character of transfer, and not the second. Let us now call the two derangements which can be reduced to numerical order by transfer of their extremes, class "A," and the three that are wanting in this characteristic, class "B." They may be presented to the eye by the following diagram:

Class "A."	Class "B."
Reducible.	Irreducible.
14 15 13	13 15 14
15 13 14	14 13 15
	15 14 13

As a practical illustration of the possibility of the reduction of the one class and not of the other, arrange the three first lines in numerical order and leave the last line in either derangement of the reducible class, say 14, 15, 13.

Move the 12 into the space left vacant by the removal of the 16—9, 10, 11 right—14 up—15, 13, 12 left—11 down—14, 9, 10 right—15 up.

Up to this time no change has been made in the order of the numbers. If we should reverse the order of our movements, we should be just where we started. But the condition now is such that the three disordered numbers are contiguous to the vacant space through which we can move them ad libitum. It will be seen at a glance that the sliding movement to which the operator is confined will permit the change of the extremes, but will not permit the interjection of either one number between the other two. And here we should note that because transfer of extremes is possible, any one of either class may, by the sliding movement, be converted into any one of the same class, so that class "B" being inconvertible to class "A," and class "A" being convertible into the sixth permutation, which is the numerical order, it follows that class "B" can not be converted into that permutation which presents the numerical order.

Hence we conclude that the three first lines being arranged in numerical order, the fourth or last line, disordered in either of the two forms constituting class "A," the whole may be reduced to numerical order. On the other hand, if the last line is left in either of the three forms of class "B," the reduction is impossible.

But there is something more to be considered in this connection. Up to this point it has only been shown that none of the permutations of one class can be converted into a permutation of the other class, without disturbing the order of some of the other numbers. That is to say, that by such disturbance the one set of permutations may be converted into the other. If then, instead of one, we should have two "B" derangements, it follows that the same operation that converts the first "B" into an "A," disturbing, as it necessarily does, the second "B," that is converting it into an "A," the two "B's" will be converted into two "A's." On the other hand, if it is at the expense of an "A" derangement we seek to cure the "B" derangement, the result is that, the one being converted into the other, we are left with an irreclaimable "B." From these premises we may formulate the following tables:

PRACTICABLE.

1. One or more "A" derangements.
2. An "A" derangement with any even number of "B" derangements.
3. Any even number of "B" derangements, which leaves us for the IMPRACTICABLE.

1. An "A" derangement with any odd number of "B" derangements.
2. Any odd number of "B" derangements.

Nobody, says my Chinese friend, ever has or ever will solve this puzzle under either of the conditions herein designated as "impracticable;" while with the conditions pronounced "practicable," the expert will dispose of the case in the time required to move the pieces—and on these propositions he says "You may bet your bottom dollar."

If this disquisition of the "heathen Chinese" serves no other purpose, it will enable the reader to test the ingenuity of the inept members of his household in reducing to order a variety of "practicable" derangements without puzzling his brain over an "impracticable" puzzle.

There is one other matter connected with this curious puzzle to which my attention was called, and which I learned had been the subject of grave discussion in the American papers. The problem we have been considering is to reduce the deranged numbers, not only to numerical order, but to the specific numerical order in which the lines shall run from left to right. Now, let us assume that, having reduced the three first lines to order, we are left with a derangement of class "B," say the 13, 15, 14, in the fourth line. Move these three numbers to the right, so that the 14 will fill the space left vacant by the original removal of the 16; draw down the 1, 5, 9; 2, 3, 4 left; 8, 12, 14 up; 9, 15, 13 right, and so proceed until the first line to the left reads 1, 2, 3, 4. Then the 15, 13, 14 will occupy the fourth line to the right. Now, reckoning the rows up and down, instead of from left to right, you will have the impracticable 13, 15, 14, together with another "B" derangement; in other words, you will have an even, instead of an odd, number of "B" derangements, which is found in our table under the "practical" head.

Again, if in reducing the derangement or derangements to order, reckoning from left to right, the fourth line assumes either the numerical order, or either of the "A" derangements, and, by the operation just referred to, the 1, 2, 3, 4 are caused to occupy the first row to the left, you will then have the bottom line transferred to the right-hand row. But now the "A" derangement will be accompanied with one "B" derangement, which brings it under the "impracticable" head. Hence we find that the solution that is impracticable, reckoning the numerical order from left to right, becomes practicable reckoning up instead of across, and vice versa. Therefore, if the terms of the problem be so changed as to include either mode of counting, there is no possible derangement of the numbers that can not be reduced to numerical order.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 10, 1880.

Here is the boss specimen of graveyard literature. It was captured from the tombstone district at Crayford, Kent, England, and reads:

Here lieth the body of
PETER SNELL
(30 years clerk of this parish).
He lived respected as a pious and mirthful man, and died on his way to church to assist at a wedding on the 31 day of March, 1811.
Aged 70 years.
The inhabitants of Crayford have raised this stone to his cheerful memory and as a tribute to his long and useful services.
The life of this clerk was just 3 score and ten.
Nearly half of which time he had sung out Amen.
In his youth he had married like other young men
But his wife died one day—so he chanted Amen
A second he took—she—departed—what then?
He married and buried a third with Amen.
Thus his joys and his sorrows were treble; but then
His voice was deep bass as he sung out Amen.
On the horn he could blow as well as most men
So his horn was exalted in blowing Amen.
But he lost all his wind after 3 score and ten
And here, with three wives, he waits till again
The trumpet shall rouse him to sing out Amen.

And here is another, not from the same rich lead, but from the northern part of Ireland:

To the Memory of
Lady O'Looney,
Wife of Sir — O'Looney, and grandniece of Burke, commonly called "The Sublime."
She was Bland, Passionate, and deeply Religious; likewise she painted in Water Colours, and sent several pictures
to the Exhibition.
She was first cousin to Lady Jones,
and of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.

Oh, those fraudulent fiddlers! Not long ago the public of Munich saw the walls of their city covered with immense posters announcing the exhibition of a magnificent orang-outang that would play the "Carnival of Venice" on the violin. The baboon had great success for five days; the public agreed he was the Paganini of baboons. The night of the sixth day a spectator was so indignant as to stick a penknife into the baboon. The variations were more brilliant than ever. The nightingale whose eyes have mercifully been put out sings more sweetly than when she enjoys nature fair. Has steel the same effect on the baboon? The indignant spectator was an inquisitive fellow; seeking the why and because of things had given the world Newton; so the spectator, thinking if a little pain, such as a penknife, gives and increases talent, a good deal of pain might goad talent to genius. He seized the baboon's tail and pulled with a will—now—all together. The tail was left in the puller's hands, the baboon's skin fell to the floor; hidden underneath it was—the father of the showman.

Remembering the dearth of authentic information concerning Arizona, our readers will be glad to learn that Professor Lively has written a "doosid clever" book about that chipper territory. From a necessarily hasty reading of its very interesting, and almost ponderously fact-laden pages, we should say that the professor is very fond of Arizona, and it is quite possible that he has a mine down there. He describes the sections through which he traveled as a land of milk and honey on the half-shell, and oysters in gold foil for breakfast. Should any one discredit the statements of fact contained in the work, the author will be glad to set his doubts at rest; and may be seen at his electro-amalgamo parlors, number naught hundred and naught Pauper Alley. The book is not for sale by all booksellers.

HIGH AND LOW, GREAT AND SMALL.

I am a "low" man, in stature—barely five feet six inches high, in my boots; am spare and lean, a "bundle of nerves" and tough sinews. In fact, my "bodily presence is weak."

On one occasion, some humorous preachers, in a funny mood, held a mimic missionary meeting. In the course of one of the speaker's remarks he said that a cannibal chief offered a sea-captain, as an inducement to dine with him, "missionary for dinner." When he had concluded, a preamble was read detailing the dangers of an evangelist in Africa, and particularly from the man-eaters, followed by a resolution to send me to Africa as a missionary, on the ground that I would make such a poor roast as to be no temptation to the cannibals. I opposed the resolution by saying that I objected to going, on the ground that some of the cannibals might be fond of smoked herring, and take a notion to me some fine morning as an appetizer for breakfast.

There are many advantages in a fine physical appearance, for, with many, beef goes as far as brains. The length, girth, and weight of a man are often the measure of his merit. The scales of mind are seldom employed to determine a man's weight. Modern inventions, however, have done much to magnify mind, and to dwarf the mere vis inertiae. Standing amid the hum of ten thousand spindles, the clatter of flying shuttles, and the din of heavy trip-hammers—before the Corliss engine, representing sixty thousand well-conditioned, muscular men—I could not but inquire: "What is a man worth, now, viewed merely as a physical, producing force?" Answering my own question, with something of elation: "He isn't worth as much as a scuttle of coal and a few quarts of water." Machinery is crowning mind, and giving it royal leisure to learn and love.

Doctor Watts was a small man, and, when twitted upon his size, improvised the lines:

"Were I so tall as to reach the Pole,
And grasp the ocean with a span,
I would be measured by my soul—
The mind's the standard of the man."

Every small, short man is fond of speaking of the "Little Corporal" and the "great Napoleon." The antithesis is always designed, and intended to connect a small physique with a historic magnate. Alexander Stephens, the mummy statesman, is a great favorite with little men; who among them has not gloated with a savage delight at his quick, satirical repartee, when a big competitor threatened to pin back his ears and swallow him at a gulp? A thin, piping voice broke in on the laughter: "Well, if you should, you would have more brains in your stomach than you ever had in your head." Many amusing spectacles are the product of the contrasts between big and little men. I once saw a Masonic procession in which John Howard—seven feet, two inches—and John B. Harned—five feet two—were the Tylers, and walked side by side, bearing their official rods, and exciting much merriment on the curbstone, a wag designating them as "the long and short of Masonry."

On one occasion a very diminutive man, occupied, by exchange, the pulpit of a very tall man. As he entered it, his head bobbing up and down behind the book-board put every one in a tittering mood. When he announced his text, two twinkling black eyes peered above the Bible, and a falsetto voice exclaimed: "Be not afraid; it is I!" The explosion that followed was louder than the storm-shout of the waves beneath the sacred feet that trod the billows of the Galilean sea.

A small man, if a public speaker, is at a fearful disadvantage, provided he has a reputation that has preceded him. Men look for size commensurate with fame, and are disappointed if a diminutive figure presents itself for their admiration; although little men generally compensate in grace of action and attitude for any lack of altitude and corporosity. If a public speaker is gifted with genius, and succeeds in winning the approving verdict of an audience, it is astonishing how this magnifies his presence in the eyes of an admirer. "He looked a foot taller" is a commonplace compliment. Mind is a great elevator. Altitude of thought lifts up the head.

There are great advantages in being little—especially in street cars, with their low roofs. There is generally room for the little man in the stage-coach, in the crowded assembly, and in the bed. He has advantage in the duel. Indeed, I have read of a duelist of aldermanic proportions, who had been challenged by a little man, insisting that his size be chalked out on his broad chest and abdomen, and if the bullet struck outside the lines "it should not count."

Many a small man has escaped death from accident when a large man would have been a certain victim. What tall, lean, and lank, or adipose traveler has not envied the little man, curled up in the car-seat, and resting as softly and sweetly as if reposing upon the velvet cushions of an oriental divan?

The little man can live more economically than the big man, as smaller patterns afford him raiment, and often remnants cut him a suit. It takes less food to nourish his body. When racked with pain there is not so much of him to hurt. He can stand up in an audience because others can see over him, while if a tall or broad man rises the cry is sure to come, "Down in front!" If he stumbles and falls, he is nearer the ground, and there is not so much to pick up. In a procession he gets position in the rear—the position of honor, and far away from the glare of the brass band and the haughty brandishing of the marshal's baton. In a platoon he is on the extreme left flank, and away from the eye of the captain and his petulant call, "Bring your file forward; to the right, dress!" In a battle, a soldier of the rear rank, he makes his file-leader a barrier against bullets, and has a rest for his rifle on the shoulder of his comrade. If below the standard prescribed by the army regulations, he is exempt from draft and conscription. In fact, there are many compensations that reconcile one to being "a little man." H. A. M. HENDERSON.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1880.

The Mussel Slough rebellion brings up for consideration questions broader and more important than the inquiry as to the causes that led to it, or the details surrounding it, or the immediate consequences resulting from it. Whether the railroad authorities did or did not act honestly or generously—whether or not the settlers have equities—whether the members of the league did or did not fire the first shot—are questions altogether secondary and unimportant. They do not in the least particular involve the real question at issue. That seven good men and good citizens have been murdered; that seven families have been made desolate; that one most brave and gallant spirit was made to bite the bloody dust after he had held a score of armed men at bay till he had killed a quarter of them; and that to the accident of not being able to lay his hand upon his repeating rifle all the balance of them owe their lives, are interesting enough incidents. They go to add another to the bloody pages of our squatter riots. Seven lives are of little importance, except to those loved ones who mourn their loss. Accidents by rail, or explosion, or cloud-burst, or tornado; deaths by wars, epidemics, and disease; the every-day casualties, resulting in loss of precious lives, are too frequent to make us pause for any serious reflection. Every second of time ticks off a human life, and the pendulum of human affairs swings on. Sixty times each minute a human soul goes to its Creator, and the hands on the great dial of the clock of time move noiselessly on. The death of seven men at Mussel Slough is a matter of slight importance. A little excitement at the village of Hanford, an impressive funeral, a sermon, a prayer, and the world goes round. A widowed heart lies bleeding, a mother mourns her dead boy; but all the same the busy world goes forward—marriage bells ring out, the rains fall, the harvest fields laugh in the sunlight, the bending grain dances in the breeze, and the busy world forgets. Peace to these unquiet souls; the grave hides them. Let them rest, while we consider Major T. J. McQuiddy and his associates, the Leaguers of Tulare, who have declared war against the United States of America, and inaugurated it by setting at defiance the decree of a United States court—resisting its powers, and by armed violence opposing the service of its mandate by a United States marshal, and by force and threat of arms driving him from the locality under menace of his life.

The offense of Major McQuiddy and his associates has no just palliation if it is or is not true that he and his co-leaguers have been despoiled of lands to which they thought themselves equitably entitled. Messrs. Hartt and Crow were claimants of land in possession of some members of this league. They believed themselves legally entitled to the possession of that land, because they believed they held the legal title to it. Like good citizens, they sought the adjudication of their rights through the courts. They brought their action in a United States tribunal that had jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy. All parties had their day in court. A trial resulted in a decree giving to them the title. They waited till time for an appeal had passed. They asked—as they had a right to—for the writ of the court and the action of the marshal to put them in possession of the land that the court had declared was theirs. The marshal was in the performance of his duty when twenty or more armed men presented to him a written instrument, in which they admitted their knowledge of his official character; that he held the writs of ejectment; that the courts had decided the cases under United States patents issued; and in which they set up the hardships of their case, the equities of their claims; and proclaimed their intention to resist the process by force, and boasted that it would require "an army of one thousand good soldiers" to enforce the decree of the United States courts that had adjudicated these property rights.

The marshal was arrested—made a prisoner on parole. He was not allowed to show or read his warrant of authority, and was driven from the locality. As to who fired the first shot is a matter of no importance. The criminal purpose of the leaguers, resulting in the death of seven men, stamps upon them the crimes of murder, and of rebellion and insurrection against the authority of the United States. If Major T. J. McQuiddy and his associate leaguers are to be permitted, in the adjustment of their own controversies and the adjudication of their own land claims, to set themselves above the law, and with impunity to set at defiance the authority of the United States Government, its laws, its courts, and its executive officers, then we have neither government, law, courts, nor officials in the nation. If this example is unrebuked, and these criminals remain unpunished, then there is anarchy in Tulare County, and the people of that section are at the mercy of an armed band that is strong enough to set at defiance the local authority. If Major McQuiddy—who is described as a "mild-mannered man," an "influential leader" of the Settlers' League, and a "prominent citizen"—is to be allowed to make prisoners of war of United States marshals, to set at defiance the process of a United States court, and to inaugurate murder, then we have indeed fallen upon unhappy times; then we have entered upon another civil war like that in which Mr. McQuiddy won his title of major, and in which, the press informs us, he achieved honorable distinction for his personal bravery; then have we transferred our scene of action from the declamatory Sand-lot, with its alien forces led by a mouthing parson, to the ensanguined plains of Tulare, where actual war has baptized its fields with blood.

Those who read our leading article of last week may see the point to which we are drifting as a nation. Such an incident as this, if allowed to go unpunished, would precipitate our Government upon its downward career. We see, too, in this instance, the safety of that dual form of government that does not leave the investigation or punishment of this crime to the local authorities. Already we see "good citizens and influential men"—so described by the local press—endeavoring to make local capital out of a local excitement. We hear with pain that the District Attorney of Tulare County is speech-making to the leaguers, and that his speech was received with "cheers and applause." Could this attorney prosecute these men for crime with impartiality, and do his duty to the law? We hope the superior judge is not also speech-making. We hope the sheriff has not begun to court the influence of the league for reelection; and if they have, and if all Tulare County is in sympathy with this defiance of the law, and if it takes one thousand or ten thousand "good soldiers of the United States" to enforce its authority in the County of Tulare, it is the duty of the Government to send the United States marshal back to the Mussel Slough country with alias writs, and with power to put the heirs of these murdered men into possession of the property decreed them by the courts.

It is among the possible events that the Democratic party will have sense enough to nominate Senator Bayard, of Delaware, as its candidate for the Presidency. We wish it would do so, as in such an event we should indulge in the luxury of going through one campaign without fearing a disastrous result. We do not intend to disparage the candidacy of our Democratic friend, Mr. Justice Field, for if either were in nomination as against a good Republican, we should feel that the country was safe against any immediate peril. There is a vast deal of fustian in our present national politics. There is a vast number of ambitious men, and men living upon office, and men ambitious to obtain office, who periodically, once in four years, work themselves up to a degree of patriotic fervor that is altogether amazing. We have passed through an important national contest; we have fought out upon the battle-field great political questions; we have decided upon fields of fierce and bloody conflict, and at the ballot-box, great and vital questions; but we have fought them out, we have decided them, and they ought to be put forever at rest. We believe they are decided and will not be substantially disturbed, and we hope their discussion may not be revived. General Grant bears testimony to the peaceful condition of the South. The history of four peaceful and prosperous years under the administration of President Hayes has demonstrated that his mode of governing the States once in rebellion is the true one. It has demonstrated that this red rag, and bloody shirt, and armed supervision of the polls, and military interference in the administration of State laws at the South, is altogether unnecessary, and because unnecessary is a violation of law, and wicked. We hope not to be alarmed at any immediate danger to the Union. We hope to pass through one Presidential election in which our ears will not be vexed by the din and clamor of a mob of politicians, South and North, howling themselves hoarse over dire and dreadful prophecies of national ruin in the event that the other party elects its President. Hence we hope some most patriotic, most able, and most honorable gentleman may be the Democratic Presidential candidate. We look upon Senator Bayard as a statesman and a gentleman of the kind we have described,

We know that he loves the whole country; that he is moderate and conservative; that he is broad and comprehensive in his views; that his is a calm, well balanced, evenly poised, honest mind; and we believe he would make a good President of the United States, and if elected, that the republic would come to no harm. We know that he was a disunionist—he believed that, under his interpretation of the laws governing our confederation of sovereign States, the Southern States had a right to withdraw themselves from the Union, and to form an independent confederation. We of the North gave to the Constitution another interpretation. We believed that ours was a nation—an indissoluble and eternal compact that should endure so long as time lasted. We went to war for it, and our side won. Senator Bayard accepted the result, and submitted to the decree as a lasting and final one. This is all we have a right to demand of any Southern man, namely, that he shall accept the result and abide by it, and not attempt, in legislative halls or on fields of fraternal and internecine conflict, to disturb it. We do not question any man's right to have been a secessionist; we only demand that he be not now a secessionist, and will not again become one. If we had been born in South Carolina, and been educated there, and had owned negroes, we do not doubt that we should have been a fire-eating, and, to the extent of our courage, a bold, defiant, outspoken, fighting rebel. We like a Southern man all the better that he was a rebel. We have but a qualified respect for any man, born and educated at the South, who was not a rebel. We were loyal because we were Northern-born, and because, being born and educated at the North, we could know, and did know, that slavery was wrong. We knew that a white man had no more right to own a black man than a black man had to own a white man. We knew that no man had any right to the unbought and unpaid services of any other man; but if we had been born in South Carolina, and our mother, and our nurses, and our play-fellows, and our school-teachers, and our preachers, and our literature, and our laws, and our judges, and our interests, and our conscience had told us that slavery was right, we would not have known any better till it had been educated out of us and whipped out of us. It could not have been whipped out of us unless we had enlisted and gone to the war. If universal popular opinion said we ought to fight, and our preacher had prayed that we might fight, and our mother had buckled on our knapsack and given her blessing upon condition that we should fight, and our sweetheart had refused to marry us until we had fought, and threatened, if we skulked, to marry the other fellow that did fight, then of course we should have been a rebel. Only cowards, and those who did not honor their parents, and who had no sweethearts in all the broad Southland, were not rebels. On the same principle, we hated and despised Copperheads at the North. So we say, if the Democratic party will give us Senator Bayard of Delaware as its Presidential candidate, we will not allow any Republican politician to stir our patriotic indignation by reproducing a speech made by this distinguished gentleman favoring secession at a time when the whole Southern sentiment was drifting in that wrong direction.

BERLIN, May 17.—The emperor has assented to a draft of the measure modifying the Falk laws. The Ultramontanes are resolved to recommence war against Bismarck, and stir up the Catholic population against the government. The first important meeting of Catholics has been held at Dortmund, Westphalia, at which twenty thousand persons were present, including many noblemen and influential leaders. The meeting fully approved the attitude of the Centre party in the Reichstag, and expressed the hope that the Catholics would move in the Reichstag for a law making ministers responsible for their acts; also, to demand the total abolition of the May laws. The Catholic press have also undertaken a general crusade to excite hatred and mistrust against the government. Two members of the party, Prince Edward Radziwill and Count Ballestrow, have gone to Rome to give some explanation on the state of affairs to the leaders at the Vatican, and receive instructions.

The foregoing dispatch comes directly from the capital of Germany, where the Reichstag is now in session. It is well known that between Prince Bismarck and his party and the Ultramontane or Catholic party a feud has long existed. There has been a division of the church, Doctor Dollinger heading the conservative Catholic party. It was understood that a reconciliation had been had, and that Bismarck and his holiness had agreed upon a line of policy. In France, there exists a similar disagreement between the Republican party and the clericals, which has resulted in appealing to a long disused law for power to drive the Jesuits out of France. The political controversies between the Catholic Church and the state, in Italy, Austria, and Belgium, are fresh in the memories of all. We recall these facts for the purpose of justifying a frequent allusion to Catholic politics in this paper. There is a very large and very cowardly minority who think no allusion should be made by any political journal to the Catholic Church. Some Catholics are very sensitive upon this subject, and the more bigoted and ignorant part affect great indignation whenever the Argonaut indulges itself in the pleasure of criticising and questioning the influence of the Catholic Church, its priests and its laymen, in American politics. We make the foregoing dispatch, not the occasion for any apology for writing in this direction, but as a proof that we are not mere foolish alarmists upon this question. If the great empires and governments of Europe, such powers as we have named—Austria and Belgium—are disturbed by Catholic questions, political interventions and in interferences with their domestic affairs, ought we not as Americans also to take alarm at the same kinds of interference in our political affairs? In Austria, the church refused to sanction or authorize civil marriages. In Belgium, the priests claimed the right of religious as against secular education. In Rome, it was a claim of absolute sovereignty. In Germany and France, it is more especially a controversy concerning the education of the youth of the country, and a claim of right to influence the institutions of learning. These same claims are set up here—not so directly and boldly as there; but in New England the Romish priest has come into actual conflict in school matters with the local school authorities; and there is no zealous Catholic in San Francisco, having the ability, that does not send his children to parochial schools, and who does not declare that the public school moneys ought to be distributed pro rata, and who does not denounce our free public schools as “godless.” This kind of Catholic is always a “Democrat,” and, forming themselves into a political class, have become so influential and formidable in numbers that we fear them. If the Ultramontanes in Germany can war against Bismarck and stir up the Catholic population against the government, may they not do it in America? If twenty thousand Catholics at Dortmund, in Westphalia, may demonstrate against the government, may they not do it in America when they shall strengthen into a greater political power? If in Germany the Catholic press may undertake a general crusade to excite hatred and mistrust against German laws and German authority, may not the Catholic Monitor and the Daily Examiner do it in San Francisco? If Prince Radziwill and Count Ballestrow may leave Berlin and go to Rome in order to explain the politics of the German Empire to the Vatican, and receive instruction from the Pope, may not the time come when Judge Wallace and Robert Morrison may make the same pilgrimage from California and for the same purpose? And if this kind of church intervention disturbs the great empires and states and statesmen of Europe, may we not reasonably anticipate the recurrence of similar political questions in our republic? We see this church strengthening and growing by natural growth and by unprecedented immigration; we see it drawing its political lines closer and closer, till we begin to fear its encroachments; and we begin to question within ourselves whether this ever-ambitious and grasping power is not beginning to dream of the possibilities of directing American politics from the Vatican. Remember—we are not discussing a religious, but a political question. We are not challenging the infallibility of his holiness in spiritual affairs. We are not questioning that he is the vice-gerent of God in all church matters, nor that he holds the keys of Peter and may shut or open the celestial gates at his pleasure. We would not offend the religious sentiments or disturb the sensibilities of any Roman Catholic. But for fear of wounding their feelings we would not forego the privilege of expressing the opinion that the Catholic Church has no right to interfere in our political affairs—no right to control our common schools. And while we will not raise or discuss the question whether his holiness the Pope of Rome is the vice-gerent of God on any other part of God's broad earth than America, here we do challenge his right of interference, dictation, or council, upon any matters pertaining to the civil administration of our national affairs.

We would not willingly be misunderstood by the Daily Globe. We would not misrepresent it. The Globe is altogether at sea with reference to the Argonaut. The Argonaut may not be an optimist, and it may not regard the political, social, and business outlook as cheerfully as some of more hopeful and sanguine temperament. It may, perhaps, be found that our anticipation of future troubles may not be realized; that our country is destined to make uninterrupted progress in its political career; and that out of our present difficulties we may evolve a better and more permanent condition. It is, perhaps, true, that these disturbances that now seem to agitate society and government over all the length and breadth of our land are merely temporary and unimportant; that government, society, church, and party organizations may emerge from their present disturbed and almost chaotic conditions in a more hopeful and better shape. Our earnest aim is in this direction. We would build up all that is good, and tear down all that is bad. We would not array class against class; but we would consolidate into one class all that was intelligent, honest, pure, and patriotic in the land; and out of this we would organize a great political party that would never compromise with, but always antagonize, all that was ignorant, vicious, and mean. We do not understand a “neutral” paper any more than we do a “neutral” man. There are great business questions upon which honest men can not be neutral. When it comes to the consideration of a proposition that involves the permanence of our political union, the perpetuity of our republican form of government, the maintenance of law, the upholding of personal and property rights, the preservation and defense of our civilization against invasion from abroad or anarchy at home, we can not look with favor upon neutral men, or neutral measures, or neutral journals. Business jealousies the Argonaut has none. The Globe is in error when it assumes that we desire to tread in any other path than the one we have marked out for ourselves; and the Globe is altogether mistaken if it thinks that we do not most sincerely wish that it may stand squarely up to all its high resolves, keep all its promises, and reap the rich harvest that will surely come from such efforts. But the Globe will find that it can not blind its readers or this community as to its course. A newspaper has a character. It forms an atmosphere, in which it must live and through which it must be seen. In giving of news it may be just, fair, and impartial. We hope it may be. We hope it will give uncolored accounts of public affairs. But it must either withhold all editorial opinion or we must see where it ranges itself. It must cast its influence for or against the Sand-lot; for or against the Republican or Democratic party. When such an event as the Tulare massacre occurs, it must give an opinion. To withhold expression is not to be impartial. Silence is oft-times eloquent. The Globe is a new journal. We wish it well; we would be friendly with it. It has made a good beginning; we hope it may have come to stay just so long as its influence is good. We hope its course may suit the Argonaut, and if it does it will deserve to live. If it realizes our idea of a good daily journal, it will deserve immortality. If it remains “neutral” when it ought to become an eloquent advocate and an armed and aggressive soldier, we shall hope it may die prematurely and be damned permanently.

“The brutal elements of society”—we quote from our reverend Mayor in Christ, the Hon. Isaac Kalloch, pastor, etc.—have determined in their State organization to be governed by Kearney, instead of a State central committee. This was a triumph of city delegates over country delegates; a triumph of the Sand-lot, that grows fleas and demagogues, over the broad lands that grow men and ideas. The San Francisco delegates to the convention were largely composed of gentlemen from Tipperary, Limerick, Inniskillen, Kilkenny, and Donnybrook. The proceedings were very inharmonious, and the resolve was very emphatic not to coalesce with either the Republican or Democratic party.

How the devil must have split his burning sides with infernal glee when the Baptist clergymen, in State convention assembled, refused to censure the two right reverend and godly Kallochs because the elder divine sprung a point of order on the convention, and defended himself and son with Cushing's Manual. The resolution of censure against murder was laid upon the table by a vote of forty-six ayes to thirty-six noes; and, no one being found to lodge a complaint against these most worthy preachers of God's holy word, the Rev. A. J. Frost occupied the evening session in reading a carefully-prepared paper upon “The outlook of the Baptist denomination in California.” The outlook of the Rev. I. M. Kalloch is through prison bars, charged with the crime of murder. The outlook of the other Kalloch—the one who interrupted the reading of the resolution when it reached the solemn words, “vengeance is mine and I will repay”—is from the Sand-lot, where he has been for one year stirring up and preaching insurrection against the Chinese, for whom this same Baptist Convention organized a missionary service. But what pleased the devil most, and made him lie down and roll himself in sulphur, was the appointment of the Rev. I. M. Kalloch to be chairman of the Standing Committee on Woman's Home Missions. Forty-six to thirty-six! And then—Oh, shade of John Bunyan and the early Baptist martyrs!—chairman of the Committee on Woman's Home Missions! No wonder the devil laughed.

John W. Taylor, City Superintendent of Schools, could not have made a better appointment for School Director than Mr. Ashburner if he had combed the town with a fine-tooth comb. That he does not live in the ward is a matter of no importance. The best delegate to the Chicago Convention is elected from the Fourth Congressional District, and he lives in San Francisco. If the Board of School Directors does not confirm Mr. Ashburner's appointment, it will be another proof that the board is, in point of character, what we think it to be.

The Honorable Page, member of Congress from California, has been making a stage-driver of himself again by an attack upon Superintendent Dodge of the mint, which illustrates how little horse-sense this blank Page of ours has. If Mr. Page has influence enough in Congress to have the mint purchases overhauled, we will venture to declare that the strictest integrity, the very highest business prudence, and the utmost fidelity will be disclosed in all Mr. Dodge's business. What troubles Mr. Page is the appointments, and because he does not like them, the presumption arises that they are given to decent and competent persons. This illiterate man Page will never forget that he is not driving mustangs on a down grade. He would never get the smell of ammonia out of his political garments if he should reach sixteen hands high in official position.

And now that Mr. J. C. Duncan has been three times tried, and the juries have three times disagreed, is it not about time that his persecutors and prosecutors should relax their efforts, and allow the courts to accord him reasonable bail? Mr.

Duncan was an over-sanguine, speculative man. He invested his depositors' money in California stock. He purchased and improved property; the tide turned against him, and he failed. He did not spend money on himself or his family. He embarked his own and his family's fortunes, and all were wrecked. A portion of his depositors and certain Sand-lot demagogues have acted the part of shameless persecutors, and the courts have been influenced in the most cowardly way by outside clamor. He has been incarcerated in a living tomb. He has been forcibly confined in a cell with six others, while pet prisoners have had spacious rooms assigned to them. Mr. Duncan has not a single dollar of anybody's money. His wife and children have endured the pangs of poverty, and have wanted bread. He has been treated and punished like a criminal, while the law presumes his innocence. He has been held to impossible bail by judges who feared the clamor of the Sand-lot. He ought to be discharged on his own recognizance.

The writer of this paragraph conducted a long and unpleasant investigation of mint affairs when General La Grange was superintendent. Dr. Linderman, ex-Governor Low, and Mr. H. L. Dodge were the committee authorized by Congress to take proofs. Profligacy, criminality, and favoritism were charged against La Grange. We are now getting comparative figures that demonstrate the extravagant, if not criminal, management of the mint when General Grant was President, and when Sargent, Page, Gorham, and Carr ran the administration upon this coast.

	1877. LaGrange.	1878. Dodge.
Coinage	$46,101,500	$54,907,500
Expenses, including salaries and wages	239,877	143,128
Adds	67,001	64,056
Charcoal	6,336	2,801
Coal	29,695	11,719
Coke	11,478	3,620
Hardware	7,346	1,631
Metals and castings	14,981	5,577
Repairs	25,914	8,112
Wood	15,008	6,578

A difference, when the amount of coinage is considered, of nearly two hundred thousand dollars a year. If this money was not stolen and divided among Republican party thieves, then what has become of it? We present these figures to our country friends, and remind them of the angry controversy in which we were then engaged, as an explanation of the fact that we find it, if not impossible, at least difficult to fight our way through county committees and clubs and primary elections to a State or national convention from San Francisco.

The Democratic State Convention, in its personnel and its conduct, has been highly respectable; more than decent, it has been even dignified. We have observed among its delegates representative names. This is especially true of the country. Mr. Samuel M. Wilson was called to preside. One of the evidences of the respectability of the convention was that the country delegates quarreled with the city, and gave its potato-rot element the cold shoulder. The same incident occurred in the Workingmen's party. From the interior there came delegations of earnest, respectable men—men who are intent upon genuine reforms. These persons came necessarily into contact with the potato-rot Democracy of the city, and quarreled with it. The same condition of things exists in the Republican party. The truth is, that there is an organized band of political and party bandits in San Francisco, whose purpose is to prey upon all political organizations. These men are mostly Irish, recruited by an occasional German or American. They have no other profession than politics. They have no principles, and no idea of anything except the plunder and loot of the lesser offices. They attend ward meetings indiscriminately, and, like all mercenaries, are ready to sell their services to the leader who will bid highest for their very dirty work. This dangerous class infests all parties, and is a reproach to all parties. It dominates the W. P. C.; it is a large minority in the Democratic party; and there is more of it in the Republican party than is good for it.

The California Democracy has not instructed its delegates, but has expressed its preference for Allen G. Thurman of Ohio, and in this has reflected the wishes of a very large majority of the party. The Workingmen's wing has also expressed its preference for Thurman, and in event of his nomination, it is probable that there will be but one electoral ticket in California against the Republican candidate. A united Democracy for Thurman would make him a formidable candidate in this State against any Republican, requiring the best efforts of a united Republican party to defeat him.

Those Republicans who do not desire the nomination of General Grant, but who will support the nominee of the party through thick and thin, had best begin to prepare themselves for his probable nomination. The result in Illinois indicates the possibility of his success. General Grant and his friends are fighting for his nomination as he fought for Richmond, only that the permissible strategy of war has been excelled in the tricks of party politics.

SISTER PEG.

"Reine, it is just awful this permanent blue won't come out, and the pink madder resists the effects of alkali and ammonia alike. Your aprons look like our ancient pinafores, much jellied and jammed. I wish your canvas, instead of your clothes, got all of the paint."

Reine, sitting in the next room at her easel, did not notice this sally; she was too busy keeping the youthful scions of the household in proper pose. Her "Babes in the Wood" did not progress very rapidly, although curly-headed Rob and Nell were daily attired in rags, their mouths stained with blackberry juice, then divested of shoes and stockings, and made to lie on piles of leaves upon the studio floor. But Rob would tickle Nell, and somehow or other the picture was always out of drawing.

Handsome Reine sat helplessly gazing at the refractory children. The day was hot and sultry in the little studio, and they longed impatiently to be at their mud-pie making in the back-garden; and consequently, in spite of manifold bribes, would not look amiable. So she had given up in despair, and dismissed them. Reine was the "beauty and genius" of the family, Peg always used to say, and she was, perhaps, right. Reine's surroundings were poor and bare. The floor was carpetless, and an old, battered bureau, filled with painting materials, constituted the sole furniture of the room, with the exception of the easel, which contained a half-completed picture, with shadows distributed freely here, there, and everywhere. Light and shade were the trials of Reine's artistic existence—they would get jumbled. The philosophy of light was still an unsolved enigma to her. Sketches of the family, in various attitudes, done in charcoal, crayon, and oil, adorned the wall, some of them showing considerable spirit and skill. On the day in question, nothing had gone right, and she sat still, with palette in hand, dreaming, a customary occupation with Reine, and one that she decidedly preferred to work. A ray of bright sunshine stole in through a crevice in the closed shutters, and changed the heavy mass of auburn hair that rippled over her shoulders to burnished gold; it strayed lovingly over her features, perfect as sculptured marble, lighted up the dreamy expression of her dark eyes, tenderly touched her shabby draperies, then lost itself in a dusty corner.

"Reine, Reine, come here," Peg called again. She started then, and obeyed listlessly. Peg was the worker of the family, and was busily engaged in the unromantic task of washing the family linen.

"Can you get this paint out?—I can't," she asked. "I do wish that you would be more careful, Reine. It's one comfort that you have your sittings on Monday, and deck the youngsters out in rags, else they would have to go to bed until I washed their clothes. We appeal to the picturesque until after the wash. It's a comfort artists dote on rags. We are well supplied with subjects on which to enthuse therefor. Growing children, artistic maidens, and slender purses don't go together any more than corn beef and pound cake. When nature provides the luxuries—children, etc., I mean—she ought to furnish the necessities. We can't live on the cake."

Peg was the eldest of the family. She was tall and robust, with a bright, cheery expression in her face, and large gray eyes, that expressed courage and a firm will. Sometimes she looked almost pretty. She did now, as she sang merrily at her wash-tub, with her arms plunged to the elbows in white, foamy suds.

Their little family consisted solely of the three girls and little Rob. Their father had been a poor, struggling artist. The battle of life was too much for him, the blows of the world too severe for his sensitive heart. So he died; and soon after his wife followed, leaving another little babe to be cared for. They left a little cottage, but a very small income to the family; but Peg shouldered their burdens cheerfully, and—somehow—they managed to live.

Reine inherited both her father's talent and her mother's beauty, but she was indolent and dreamy. Rob and Nell were youngsters of ten and six, growing up wild as little colts, much to the horror of the neighbors.

"Reine," Peg continued, "we must devise a committee of ways and means, we must do something with Rob and Nell. I know 'genius don't burn' to-day, so help me out with the problem. Mrs. Jones was in here yesterday, and gave me a lecture long as the moral law about our government. She declared that the youngsters were perfect heathens; that Rob couldn't answer a question in the catechism; and—what do you think, Reine?" Peg's gray eyes opened wider, as she came nearer to her, and laid her soapy hand on Reine's shoulder. "She said it was wrong, and perfectly scandalous, for our Jack to come here as much as he does, and no married lady in the family. She said that they were talking about it in the sewing society. Just think, our Jack!"

Reine's cheeks flushed and her eyes sparkled as she brought her little fist down on the tub. "Let them talk; who cares? We couldn't live without Jack. He is our only breath of sunshine. We would stagnate without him. Let them talk, the old gossips."

A deep, manly voice was shouting from the gate: "Girls, may I come in? I know it's washing-day, and Peg's decree has gone forth; but she's neither a Mede nor a Persian. I say, Peg, let a fellow off this time. I've some good news. Here, Bob, here's an apple; one for you, too, Nell," he said, tossing the rosy fruit into their extended hands.

Peg had gone to the door, and was flourishing her wash-board dangerously; but at the words "good news" she threw down her combative weapon, and pulled her sleeves down over her bare arms. Reine came to the door, too, looking dainty, in spite of paint and oil and old gown.

"What's all this noise about, Jack?" she inquired. "I imagined the Workmen were making a descent. We were talking of his satanic majesty, but didn't expect an immediate appearance."

"It's only an angel in disguise, knocking at your door," he meekly responded. "Reine, Reine, I know, by the pucker in your fair brow, art has gone wrong to-day. Peg, leave your washing to a 'heathen Chinese'; and Reine, give your poor, ill-treated babes a chance to rest. You've got lots of bitumen in the shadows, and it will take an age to dry, you know; so come along with me. I made a strike—heard of an elopement; wrote it up in style. Distracted Romeo, lovelorn Juliet, cruel parents, clash of the Montague and Capulet clans, rope-ladders, kisses, sobs ad libitum. I assure you, it was quite thrilling. They gave me ten dollars for it. So I immediately went to the stable, hired a horse and buggy, and 'we'll all take a ride.'"

Jack Stuart was a noble-looking young fellow—tall and straight, with honest, dark-brown eyes, and a winning smile. He was a reporter on one of the daily papers, and had literary aspirations; but editors are proverbially hard-hearted in the eyes of luckless contributors, and his work was not always appreciated. But he was content. Life was all smiles and sunshine with him; he never sought its dark side; and, of course, money went as it came. He never could deny himself a pleasure. His whole heart was bound up in the Haviland family, and queenly Reine had it in her special keeping.

On her part, Reine cared for him in a lazy sort of way. "Jack was nice and good," she said; "but poverty was so hard." For Reine was ambitious. She loved art, she loved luxury, and she loved herself most of all. She possessed a rare, stately beauty; her face was almost perfect; her form statuesque. She felt that she ought to reign a queen in society. People snubbed her because she was only a drawing teacher, and this was very bitter to Reine. She loved wealth and ease and comfort. She longed for pictures, bronzes, books; her whole heart craved the beautiful and luxurious.

Peg answered: "I can't go, Jack. The children are reduced to a single garment, and Reine has promised to take some sketches to show to old Mr. Worth to-morrow, and she can't go in rags and dirt. Unfortunately, Cinderella is too old-fashioned to have much effect nowadays. My hands are full; so Reine must go alone."

"Well, I'm sorry, Sister Peg," he said. "Get your duds, Reine. We must make the best of this glorious afternoon." Reine soon appeared, fully equipped, the old black shawl that did family duty draped around her shoulders; looking as if it had been woven by an East Indian loom. When Peg wore it, it looked wrinkled and old; on Reine, it seemed fit drapery for a queen.

When they started, Jack shouted back:

"Good-bye, little busy bee. Don't expect us till you see us. We are going out to the foot-hills."

Peg did sigh a little, as she went back to her work.

"It is hard for Reine to have all the fun. I'd like to be the butterfly for a while." But she thought, "I am the oldest, and mother left them all to me. 'Take care of Reine, dear,' she said; 'you are only two years older, but Reine is wayward and headstrong, and must be ruled by love, and I know my steady Peg will be a mother to my darlings.'"

As she thought over her dear mother's last words, her eyes filled with tears; but her heart felt lighter, because she knew that she had done her duty well.

"If Jack and Reine would only marry," she thought, "all would be well; we would neither be poorer nor richer, but Reine would have somebody to look after her better." Her cheeks flushed a dark red as her thoughts ran on: "Maybe, if Reine didn't love him, he might care for me." But even the thought seemed sacrilegious.

"Why, Rob, what is the matter with Nell?" she asked.

"Nothing," he said; "only we were playing we were cows, so I made her eat grass. Nebuchadnezzar did, so I guessed Nell could; but she didn't like it, so I slapped her."

"You naughty boy," Peg cried, giving him a little shake. "I'll tell Jack, and he won't bring you any more apples. Come into the house, like good children, and while I get dinner I'll tell you a story."

"Tell me 'bout elephants," imperious Bob demanded.

"No, fairies," Nell said.

Then they set up a concerted howl at not being able to have their wishes complied with at the same time.

Jack and Reine came back with happy faces, and as he lifted her down he brought out an enormous crab from underneath the seat, and a bottle of dressing.

"Here, Peg, let's have a feast. Reine has promised to consider the 'final end' this week. Here's to success! But I am afraid we'll have to drink it in salad-dressing; the where-withal gave out when we came to consider the drink."

In the evening they were a merry party, and the neighbors were more scandalized than ever. Under the influence of salad-dressing, Jack delivered an extempore speech, then followed it with "The Bull-frog," "Little Brown Jug," and divers musical gems from his college days. Finally, "Good-night, Ladies," closed the evening.

Reine sat in the corner, looking steadily before her with a troubled expression.

"Good-night, Reine," he said, pressing her hand. "Good-night." His eyes shone with a soul full of love reflected in them. "Next week, I trust you will make me the happiest man on earth. When I have my little queen, I'll not envy any man. Success to your sketches to-morrow. Good-night, Sister Peg."

They heard him whistling as he went down the street, but Reine sat silently in the corner.

"Are you not happy, Reine?" Peg asked. "Don't you love Jack?"

"Yes, I love him—well enough. But, Peg, I hate poverty; I can't bear it. And Jack will always be poor. I know it. Don't scold me, Peg. I wasn't born good, like you. I was born with a love for the beautiful, for ease and wealth. I know that it is hateful in me. I strive against it. I strive to love Jack harder and harder every day; but, Peg, I'm not half good enough for him, and I can't. I don't believe I feel like other people."

She broke down, and commenced sobbing.

Then the sisters parted for the night. But Peg, who would have given her whole life for the love Reine did not value, hugged the secret to her heart, "for Reine's sake," she thought.

The next day Reine selected her best sketches, and went to see Mr. Worth. He had been an old friend of her father's, and he wished to help the girls along. She rang the bell, and was admitted into the library; and, as she sank back in a soft-cushioned chair, felt the Wilton carpet beneath her feet, and saw the dainty evidences of wealth scattered around the room, a great sigh filled her heart as she thought of the contrast with the home offered her. A young man entered the room.

"Is this Miss Haviland, with the sketches?" he inquired, politely. "I am Mr. Worth's son, and have just come from abroad, where I have been studying art a little; and, as my father was occupied, he desired me to look at the sketches, if you have no objections."

"Certainly not," she answered, and handed him the folio, saying: "You will find my studies very crude. I have had very little instruction; but it is the dream of my life to go abroad and study."

As he turned over the sketches, she could not help comparing him to Jack, and to the latter's disadvantage. Little things were so much to her. She noticed that his fingers were long, slender, and white, while Jack's were always discolored with ink-stains or tobacco; his dress, too, was faultless, while poor Jack never did have a whole garment. "He was as bad as Rob about tearing his jacket," he used to say.

In truth, Edgar Worth was a refined, cultured, traveled gentleman, and heir to a million.

"This sketch is excellent," he said, holding up a small pen-and-ink sketch of Peg at her tub. "Queen of the Tub" is a very appropriate name," he said.

"It is my sister," Reine replied, with a blush.

"This reminds me of Bouguereau," he said, stopping at a sketch of Rob and Nell in their garden hats. "Very good." The dearly-loved oil sketches of more ambitious subjects he scarcely noticed. But Reine was happy as he said:

"I am sure, Miss Haviland, father can dispose of these for you; and I advise you hereafter to work from models. Ideal pictures require a more practiced hand."

Reine fairly flew home.

"Hurrah, Peg!" she cried, "good times coming. My sketches were accepted. And, oh, Peg, he had such handsome eyes and such a heavenly hair!"

"Who—what—where?" Peg ejaculated.

"Oh, Peg, if we only lived there!" she answered.

When Jack came that night his probation was lengthened to a month, and the subject tabooed for that length of time. "I'll be so busy, and there certainly is no hurry, Jack," she said, with her "stand-offish air," as the children called it.

On the morrow Mr. Worth called with the money the dealer had given for the pictures; and "he had a commission for some more," he said. Alas! Mr. Edgar, those veritable sketches were reposing in your own cabinet drawer. But the fib was permissible, Reine was so happy. He accepted their invitation to call, and the whole family surrendered their hearts to him. Only Peg said to herself, "He is not like our Jack."

Day after day he called, on one pretext or another, showing them many delicate attentions. First it was a sketch for Reine; then a book for Peg, or dainties for the children; and soon he was installed a regular visitor. They were hard days for Jack, Reine had grown so cross and fretful with him. His heart was very heavy, and he was grave and silent. He had been working late at nights, and looked haggard and worn. One evening he came in, and as soon as Reine saw him she started away.

"Reine," he called, "don't be afraid, I won't trouble you. Won't you come out for a walk this evening?"

She could not well refuse; so assented, trembling with excitement.

"Reine," he said, as they walked by the rows of dusky buildings, "you know I love you. You are all I work for, hope for, live for." A great sob came into his throat. "I know that you'll think I'm weak; but, Reine, darling, I love you so I can not let you go. Often at midnight, when I am tired and worn out, I lay down my pen and think, 'Cheer up, old fellow, you are making a home for Reine, and she will be here in a little while and help you bear your burdens.' Reine, answer me; will you help me make the little home?"

Reine looked up in his face with a supplicating expression—the old haughty look had disappeared. "Forgive me, Jack," she said, "I have the same as promised to marry you; if you hold me to it I will never break my word. I don't want to hurt you, Jack, you are too good for me. I have tried, but I don't love you as you deserve to be loved. Tell me what to do."

He looked at her earnestly for a moment.

"Thank you, Reine. It is nobler to have told me the truth. I see my folly. You love Edgar Worth. God bless you and make you happy. Oh, Reine, it is hard to give you up, to say good-bye forever!"

They walked silently home. Peg was waiting for them.

"Good-bye, Reine; God bless you," he whispered. "May you find the happiness I have lost. Good-bye, Sister Peg," he said, then walked rapidly up the street.

"What is the matter, Reine?" Peg asked, as her sister ran up stairs, sobbing.

"It is all over, Peg," she answered; "the old life is over. Jack has gone forever. I love Edgar, and I have promised to be his wife if Jack would release me. I am so happy and so sad. Why do people love you when you don't want them to?"

Then she laid her head down in Peg's lap like a little child, and sobbed herself to sleep.

The weeks went on busily enough. Mr. Worth wanted to take the next steamer for Europe, and so they hurried the wedding. Reine's heart was light and happy, only Peg felt as if it were merry-making too soon after a funeral. Jack never came near them, but, in the bustle and confusion, only Peg noticed it. The day before the wedding a bunch of violets came from him to the bride. Reine was packing up her sketching materials, and murmured "Poor Jack," but he was forgotten in a moment, she was so absorbed in the chatter about what she intended to accomplish in Paris.

The days rolled on. Reine had gone, the old home was changed, the dilapidated furniture replaced by new, through the kindness of Mr. Worth. There was nothing left to remind Peg of the old studio but a few childish sketches, that were left on the wall. The house seemed so lonesome without Reine. After Peg had put the little ones to bed that night she sought the little studio; her heart was so full she could not restrain her tears; Reine was gone for years, and she had not seen Jack for months.

A knock at the front door startled her, and she answered the summons.

"Are you Miss Haviland?" a messenger boy said, "here's a note for you."

She read it through hurriedly. It was from Jack's landlady, telling her that he was ill of brain fever; as she was the only one of his friends that she knew, she wished her to come immediately, for, she said, "Mr. Stuart may not live until morning." She dried her tears hastily, put on her cloak, and went across the street to get an old woman to stay with the children; then followed the boy to a tenement-house in the lower part of the town. He took her up to the upper floor to a little garret-room. She rapped at the door, and then entered. It was hushed and quiet, broken only by the irregular breathing of the patient. The doctor was sitting by the bedside, holding his pulse, and he motioned her to take off her things, and pour the medicine for him.

"It is very particular that he should have a good nurse," he said, "the crisis will be to-night, and it will be a hard pull for the poor fellow, his constitution is so weakened by overwork. I have another case in hand, but will be back in an hour; I think I can trust him to you."

She sat down by the bedside and looked around the room. Poor Jack had often said it was "high and airy." It seemed very bare; the only furniture beside the bed was a chair and table. He lay on the bed unconscious; his cheeks were wan and hollow, his eyes sunken, his skin parched and fever-stricken, and his brown curls were matted and tangled.

In his delirium he constantly murmured "Reine, my little Reine, come back to me." As Peg sat there, counting the minutes, it seemed a lifetime.

"Oh, Reine," she sobbed, "this is your work, and you are so happy, and my Jack is so near death."

Finally the doctor returned, and they watched by his bedside till dawn.

All at once his ravings ceased, and he gasped "Reine!" so low you could hardly hear it; then he lay perfectly motionless, and his face looked ghastly white in the morning light. The doctor bent over him, feeling his pulse. A great agony filled Peg's heart. "Jack is gone," she thought, "what is life worth without him?" She closed her eyes and held her breath, waiting for the doctor to tell her the dreaded news. The suspense was terrible. She put up her hands, as if to ward off a blow as he came toward her.

"Why, child," he said, "what is the matter? He sleeps. The fever has gone, and he will live."

She sank down on her knees by the bedside, sobbing "Thank God." The reaction was too great. The doctor told her that she must go home and rest, as he had procured a competent nurse.

It was weeks before Jack recovered, and Peg came every day and sat by his bedside, reading to him and trying to amuse him. Once he said, suddenly:

"Tell me about Reine. I can bear it now. Why do you never mention her?"

She told him of her happiness, and how noble her husband was.

"I am glad," he answered. "She deserves it all." Then he turned his face to the wall, as if to sleep.

Peg saw that the old wound was not healed yet, and her heart was very sore. In those long days by the sick bed, and when he was so near death, Peg realized more and more how much he was to her.

One day he said: "Peg, since my illness a great change has come over me. I am no longer like a thoughtless boy. I am a man, who must work his way in the world and win something in the end. Our old days of play are over; we must be men and women in earnest now. Before my illness I commenced a book, but my MS. is crude, and I am going abroad for a year. I have a chance to go on a ship, and I shall correspond for the papers. Then I'll come back and complete my book. Wish me luck." Then he went away.

It seemed such a long year. One evening, when she was tired and worn from her day's duties, Peg felt in a desperate mood. Life seemed to hold no more joy for her. Her meditations were disturbed by the postman's ring. He handed her a letter with a foreign post-mark. It was from Jack. It commenced with spiey little bits of travel; then it said: "I met Reine, unexpectedly, in Rome the other day. To tell the truth, I dreaded the meeting; but she looked so happy and contented, I knew in a flash that the old wound had healed and my heart was whole. I was glad of it. Reine's husband is a treasure. I have found out that I owe my position to his kind influence. And then I discovered another secret. I have been very homesick; and I know that I want my Peg, my Margaret, my pearl without price, to help recover again. Peg, I love you, and I am only waiting for you to bid me come to you."

Peg's heart beat fast; her eyes sparkled. "My ship is fast sailing over the seas to me at last," she cried. "It will soon be safe in the harbor."

Nell and Rob came bounding into the room, with cheeks rosy from romping. "Children," she cried, joyfully, "Brother Jack is coming home to us."

MARY GLASCOCK.

OAKLAND, May, 1880.

A Paris correspondent says that the swell out-door occupation now is carpet-gardening. It consists in the laying out of beds on lawns, of borders and strips of earth, with shrubs or bedding plants of variegated hues in order to match the shades of Persian carpets and Indian shawls. This style of fancy gardening commenced in France a few years ago; the lovely Japanese carpet in the Trocadero grounds during the late Exposition gave an impulse to this mode of ornamentation. To quote: "I have seen the border of an Indian camel-hair scarf, with all its palms and intervening designs, most accurately reproduced on a garden border. Neither is it so difficult to succeed in this as one at first sight would suppose. It is a matter which requires care and foresight chiefly. The height of variegated shrubs, and the room they require for spreading, has to be acquired; the rest is only a case of painstaking and nicety. The beds of French lawns set aside for the purpose are prepared by the gardener, who makes all the surfaces perfectly level. When they are ready, the ladies lay on top a paper on which the design has been carefully perforated; the paper of course corresponds with the size and shape of the bed or border to be ornamented. All the holes are then filled with chalk, finely powdered, or sand, which leaves a perfect impress on the block-mould after the paper has been carefully removed. The plants are afterward sunk into the different compartments marked out for them. If the design is very intricate, it is wise to indicate the color and nature of plants to be bedded by writing their names on the paper. A plan, or paper bed, is usually prepared in-doors, when the weather does not admit of out-door exercise. Several gentlemen having property in the environs pride themselves on their carpet-lawn, which is the successful attempt of their wives and daughters. The cost is moderate. A table-cloth design is usually executed in low, cream-colored shrubs. I have seen a kiosk, under which meals are served in summer, with a circular border, repeating emblems of welcome and hospitality carried out in the shrubs."

SPIRITUALISTIC BLUNDERS.

There is nothing certain but science—absolutely nothing. And what is science? Established facts; logical conclusions; systems that work, that never fail, that never disappoint.

Three and two are five; that is science. A clock that keeps time; an engine that will run; a steamship that sweeps the ocean; a telegraph wire; laws of nature discovered; complications invented; systems of mechanism, chemistry, or thought that never fail—that repeat, or illustrate, or demonstrate whenever you choose to test them; contrivances and processes that know no failure and no disappointment. These are science.

Human testimony is not science. It can establish nothing. It can prove nothing but facts immediately perceptible to the senses. It is fallible. It fails all the time. It is not to be compared to scientific demonstration. A murder has been committed. We gather the testimony. It is sworn to. Lawyers sift, and scrutinize, and cross-examine. Juries find a verdict. Judges approve. The culprit is hanged. And in a few years it transpires that it was all wrong. This has happened a hundred times. Yet we have to rely upon these methods because a murder is an event that can not be repeated. It can not be done over again that we may watch, and see if the whole matter has been observed. We must rely upon the best evidence we can get, and act upon it; and we do; but often to find that, with all our care, we have erred.

Science is different. It depends on no human testimony. It says, "Come and see." It says certain contrivances will make a locomotive that will move, and draw carriages after it. Do you doubt it? Science puts the thing together, and it does move—when put up right, it invariably moves. That is science. It proves itself.

In all ages we have had another class of phenomena—marvelous, wonderful, out of nature, passing belief. It is attested; it is sworn to; it has been seen by hundreds. But it will not repeat itself; it will not come when wanted; it will serve no emergency, however important, urgent, humane, beneficent. It will come only when it listeth—by fits and starts, like a fleeting shadow that is gone before you can take a note of it.

Such is the phenomena of spiritualism. It can perform miracles, raise the dead, bring spirits from the vasty deep for dark séances of weak men and maudlin women. It can uncover the past and reveal the future. It can make tables dance, heavy pianos skip about the room, and enable people to fly, and even carry them through solid substances. But all these things are single events like the murder. They happen at odd times; they are seen by only a few; and they will not repeat. They can not be put to work on any good or practical thing. Just as soon as they are wanted for real service, they fail, they disappoint. They never come up to their promises. And, moreover, they deal in the most shallow and sophistical excuses, apologies, subterfuges, frauds, to cover up their shortcomings and keep those who believe in them in the faith.

In the recent murder at Saucelito, the truth of these remarks has been illustrated in the most striking manner. We have at least a hundred mediums in San Francisco, of every kind and grade. And yet a few detectives, with their simple five senses, beat them all—discovered the body and the money.

When it was almost certain that the body had been thrown into the water, one woman medium described the manner of the murder, and the body as in shallow water. The detectives—sensible fellows—refused to follow her vagaries. But they were making so thorough a search that she feared they would catch at her straw, and make a thorough proof of its fallacy. Then she had another revelation that the body had floated off into deep water. Had it never been found, she would have claimed that these delusions were veritable facts.

Then the facts came out that the missing man had left no money or property behind him. People began to surmise that he had run off. And forthwith mediums gave a negative concurrence. The spirit had not been seen in the spirit land. Had the mystery not been cleared up, the faithful would have clung to this as proof stronger than holy writ. But, alas! the body was found. It was not in the water. It was not slain in the manner described. All the circles were at sea on every point. No more disastrous failure ever befell the poorest tyro in jugglery and delusion.

Spiritualism will not be put to work, will not subserve any human purpose, will not come when wanted. It is, in fact, only the dregs of ancient superstition, fallen from the courts of kings and princes into the byways of credulity and imposition. The time was when every king had his astrologer, soothsayer, magician, and wonder-worker. They read signs and omens, consulted oracles, and predicted the issue of battles. Had they been worth their salt, they would have been retained till this day. And they are—among barbarians and savages. But every enlightened State has discarded them. There is not a medium in the pay of any government. No reliance whatever is placed on their powers or their predictions.

In real truth, the whole arena of the so-called spiritual phenomena is referable to three sources: First, sheer fraud, jugglery, imposture. Second, peculiar, morbid, and mysterious action of the nervous system and imagination, producing thoughts, feelings, presentiments, and pictures that are partially involuntary, and not well understood by the person possessing them. And third, the doctrine of chances—that will make a certain proportion of the wildest dreams, the merest fancies, and the most extravagant predictions come true. And we might add a fourth, perhaps, in the credulity of those who do not seem to know the nature of these delusions.

And first, as to the imposture part, while we do not pretend to affirm that all the spiritual phenomena are sheer imposture, we must aver that a large portion undoubtedly is; and on that account all is to be scrutinized with the utmost care. The writer has attended numerous séances with the single purpose of finding out what was true, and he has never seen one scintilla of performance that afforded the slightest evidence of spirit presence, or that was not within the reach of any adroit manipulator. On many occasions he has most distinctly detected fraud, and can give names, dates, and places if this proposition should be challenged. He has attended séances that were a blank—a confessed failure, and yet heard of those who were present afterward declaring that the most wonderful performances had transpired. These facts ought to throw the glamour of doubt and suspicion over all.

Second, the mysterious and involuntary action of the brain and nerves, mysterious to the most erudite physicians, must ever remain a source of wonder and alarm to the ignorant, the weak, the despondent, the despairing, and often to the hopeful and enthusiastic. The timid and cautious will forever conjure up a thousand fears. They take shape. They become presentiments of evil. And sometimes, nay, too often, the evil comes. Their hopeful and buoyant dream of success is felt to be assured—"feel it in their bones," as has become a by-word. It comes, and this presentiment has all the dignity of a prediction. Involuntary movements and impulses occur to nervous people. They are prompted to do this or that, and know not why, and are certain that it is spirit guidance whenever it seems to have been just what was wanted.

Third, comes the doctrine of chances, the slippery foundation on which all this superstructure of superstition and imposture rests. The doctrine of chances, of ratios, of averages, well known to the scientist, is a marvel to the ignorant and the unthinking. What is it? This: Ask a hundred questions to be answered yes, or no! Write them down! Toss up a button! Heads, yes; tails, no! And as the button comes down, so write the answers. You will find it right half the time. Now, use your judgment and change all those you feel sure are wrong, and you will get three-fourths of them right. You may set up business as a medium, fortune-teller, astrologer, faith doctor, and general utility adviser in love and war, on this basis. You can keep the button in your pocket unseen by your dupe. You can drop it, pick it up at random, let the thumb signify up, and the finger down, announce the result promptly, as if by sudden inspiration, and you can not fail to be right half the time. When you are right, it will be trumpeted abroad. It will not be forgotten. The further it goes, the more wonderful it will become. "Ah!" your dupe will say, "the answer came so quickly, so promptly, there was no time to think, to plan. It must have been inspiration."

Marry, when you err it is forgotten. It goes for nothing. Who cares to remember the thousand questions that did not come right? And you can resolve everything into a question of yes or no, and answer it in this way. It is a system of fraud well understood by the adept, set out in dream-books, determined by cards, letters, numbers, or signs. It is all on the same plan, and a certain general average will always come true.

There are a billion of people in the world, and a million of them had a vivid dream last night. A million of dreams, surely not too many. A thousand of them were something like an event that will occur to-morrow. They could be strained into a prophecy, a presentiment, with the greatest ease. A hundred of them were very clear. Ten were almost beyond criticism. And one struck the exact fact. And so the ordinary mind has faith in dreams. But the scientist sees nothing wonderful in it. The average is very low for mere guess or accident. It is very low indeed when we reflect that the dreaming mind is perturbed with speculations as to the future. One in a million! Yet even that has been enough to keep alive in the human mind a belief in dreams, in the soothsayers, the faith doctors, in quacks and impostors of every quality. Here is a hospital with a hundred patients. They are in every state and stage of disease; some at the point of death, others on the turn of life and health. Here comes the magnetic healer. He lays on hands. He bids them get well. And three out of the hundred do so at once. Three others die. Fifty feel no influence whatever. Twenty are improved, and the rest sink lower. This is the general average, and the poor quack does not affect it in the least. Yet those who rose at once, and those who felt improved, sound his praise, while the balance forget his effort, because it was barren of good results.

This doctrine of chances, or averages, when well understood, is death to all delusion and fraud. It apprises the mind what to expect. It fortifies against fraud. It knows no demon but demonstration. It accepts no authority and no testimony, except such as will repeat itself under the same conditions, that all may see it. It moves slowly—denying nothing, accepting nothing—till something is proven or disproven beyond a doubt.

A few days ago, says the Clinton (Mass.) Courant, a little fellow, anxious to find a home for a pet kitten where it would stand a good chance of being well brought up, carried it to the house of one of our clergymen, asking him, as he responded to the knock, if he would like a kitten.

"Oh, I don't know," said he, "what sort of a kitten have you got?"

"A Unitarian kitten, sir."

"No, I guess not, of that sort."

A few mornings after, the little fellow appeared at the same door and rang the door-bell. The boy repeated his offer.

"But are you not the same little boy that called the other day, and is not this the same little Unitarian kitten you had then?"

"I know it," the boy responded; "it's the same kitten, but he's got his eyes open now, and he's an Episcopal kitten."

It is fair to surmise that the "opening of the eyes" proved the salvation of pussy, and found for it an agreeable and congenial home.

Wer will, kann, is an excellent motto. Sir William Gull (funny name for a physician that) was a bottle-washer in Guy's Hospital once, yet he afterward rose to the front rank in his profession. Grant was a tanner, and before that worked on a farm. Lincoln split rails. And before Mr. Kearney came to inhabit the stately mansion where he at present resides, he was a more or less honest drayman. "Who will, can."

It eases a hen's mind to sit on glass eggs just as much as on the genuine articles. A hen can understand what a man swears.

AT THE PLAY IN JAPAN.

We had made several ineffectual attempts to get into the little theatre at Yokohama. It was always crowded to the very threshold, and the breathless, eager-eyed Japs, dovetailed together in the most extraordinary way that each might get a view of the fascinations of the stage, never vouchsafed even a glance of interest at the intrusive foreigners. It began to appear that thus much of the Japanese elephant must remain unseen. When, therefore, the professor wrote from Tokio, twenty miles away, "I have succeeded in securing a box at the Imperial Theatre for Thursday of next week," the amount of red tape implied was lost sight of in the keen satisfaction the news gave. But, as we bowled once more through the magnificent distances of picturesque, moat-lined Tokio, going endless miles to reach a theatre, the professor explained it all. Theatre-going in the Land of the Rising Sun is a complicated affair. Your Japanese would disdain the comfortable simplicity of our style of doing business. The very complexity of detail involved in giving his family a day at the theatre is a part of his enjoyment. Do you think he would go to the box-office, pay his way, and walk in? Or tip the usher for a seat if he had not reserved one? Or take his chance at getting one without the tip? Not so. He opens negotiations with a tea house. The street whereon the theatre is situated is lined with them, and banners of fanciful colors and various devices float from their balconies and proclaim the accommodation they have to offer. The proprietors of the tea-houses secure all the seats in the theatre, and then retail them to their patrons—quite after the manner of speculators in our own country. The tea-house figures conspicuously in the day's enjoyment, for play-going is an all-day affair; and as the Japanese takes a vital interest in the drama, he makes a day of his pleasuring. The tea-house furnishes his chow for the ten or twelve hours of his stay at the theatre; and, as your Japanese can eat with a frequency positively alarming to civilized barbarians, this is a most important item. At the tea-house, also, are to be procured saki (rice liquor) and tobacco. Also, if, worn out by the emotions of their very stirring dramas, he desire a siesta, he may retire to his tea-house and drone away an hour on the soft mats.

All this preparatory information served well when the professor turned the funny little Japanese pony's head into a narrow street full of tall (two-storied) tea-houses, whose flying banners gave the little thoroughfare a festival-day look. There was a tremendous clatter of voices and clogs, and the rattle of the most bric-a-brac-looking porcelain, as the Japs from the various tea-houses went by, laden with chow displayed in the most appetizing as well as high-art style. The graceful betto, flying ahead like an oriental Mercury of new and quaint design, cleared the way with his shrill, peculiar cry, and we dashed up to the very threshold of the last tea-house in the line. It is easy enough to drive up to the threshold in a native town, for the streets are ridiculously narrow, and there are no sidewalks, but these same thresholds are nearly a yard above ground, so that jinrikishas and traps may not absolutely get into the house.

An old crone with ebony teeth and shaved eyebrows took possession of us, with that effusive cordiality peculiar to Japanese women, and desired to fortify us with some tea and chow; but we were in too great haste to witness the novel spectacle to wait for chow just then, so we promised to return between the acts. She sighed, and entreated the professor not to forget to show the foreigners where General Grant, the American mikado, had sat. A bevy of bright-eyed little Japanese waitresses hung about us, with more soft entreaties on the chow question. They, too, sighed their regrets, with a politeness and insincerity truly French in its style; then one by one whispered to the professor in the softest Japanese—and a beautiful language it is, as spoken by the women and children—not to forget to show us where General Grant, the great American mikado, had sat.

A big, blue-cotton-clad chap came rattling across the street, in his tall clogs, to take charge of us. We were ushered through a dark passage, filled with strange articles, which the professor declared to be the properties of the theatre. We were then shot up in some inexplicable way to the top of a staircase built on a vertical line; and when we had recovered our breath and got over our amazement at our climbing powers, we were already seated in a box in the Shinto Miza Theatre of Japan. What a queer-looking place it was, to be sure, filled as it was from floor to roof-tree with those dark, intent faces, and queer-looking heads! Like everything else in the seaboard towns, it is not a distinctively Japanese structure; but it has been built to suit the peculiar habits of the people, and there is not a seat in the house.

Our guide did not forget to whisper, as he softly withdrew, that it would be well to show us the place where General Grant had sat—and we fell to a contemplation of the hallowed spot. It was just in the middle of the gallery—which had been made aristocratic for the occasion—and the sacred spot was occupied just now by just such an element as fills our galleries at home. All the applause seemed to come from the gallery. The applause itself is of a most peculiar character, and as much like a lengthened tion; but it is fire and inspiration to the Japanese actor. Aside from the gallery the entire theatre is laid out in little square boxes. In the pit these boxes are below the level of the aisles or passage-ways; and it is a funny sight when the little people clamber in and out of them. Our box was on the jutting balcony, and we loomed up in the most conspicuous manner above everything around us; for the tea-house had provided us with chairs, recognizing that we had not been trained to sit in our heels. In consequence of the barbaric use of these articles of furniture, there were but three of us able to get into the box at a time, while all around us families of six and eight fitted in quite comfortably. They go to the theatre in families. Every one loves the drama; and every one, down to the babies, is acquainted with the history and traditions of the country, upon which all their plays are founded. In one box adjoining ours there were at least three generations, and this box was a type of all the others.

It was evident that great preparations had been made for the day. The hair-dresser had paid an extra visit, for every head was sleek and shining. Bits of bright new crape, and a more gorgeous cluster of hair-pins, testified to the extraordinary interest of the occasion. The hair-pin is the Japanese woman's sole article of jewelry. Bracelet, or ear-ring, or pin—nothing is pinned in Japan—has she none. The bangle is an unknown mystery to her. The diamond solitaire she has not even dreamed of. She lavishes all on her obi, or sash, and her hair-pins. I know of a little cook in Japan who toils for seven yen a month, but will unhesitatingly spend twenty-five yen on an obi, and who laughed one day with the most good-natured disdain when her coral-tipped hair-pin was admired, because the coral was only beef-bone colored. They are not so very different from their diamond-decked sisters on this side of the pond. At the theatre there was a great showing of hair-pins and obi. The women, and for that matter the men too, seem all to be dressed alike at first glance, for every one in Japan wears blue. It is the national color for those who walk abroad. But it has half a hundred different shades, and the only difference between a rich man's goods and a poor one's lies in the texture. They are of one cut and style. But while the people in the gallery, and many in the pit, wore blue cotton, those in the balcony boxes were, one and all, dressed in silk or crape. The rich tones of the richer materials harmonized well with their dark-tinted skins, and one could see that they took an especial pride in their collars, which are always of finer material than the body of the kimono, a long-sleeved, sack-shaped, almost seamless garment, which is the universal wear.

Men and women smoked incessantly. Intent as they are upon the play, they do not forget almost unconsciously to roll their tobacco into the little pills which fill their tiny pipe-bowls. They are exceedingly impressive audiences, and melt to smiles or tears with a readiness most flattering to an actor. They have a merry, light little laugh which flutters all over the house in the pleasantest way when the actor points a joke. When he promises to become pathetic they pull out their little blue cotton squares, and prepare to weep. In a moment the big tears roll out of their soft black eyes, and a subdued sobbing may be heard here and there. But their emotions are evanescent. When the curtain falls, and the waiters come in with the chow, they fall to at the rice or fish served up on "old blue" with a will. As for the tea-pot, it is kept in the box all day, and filled at frequent intervals by the attentive waiters.

There is much rushing back and forth between the acts. There is a grand exodus of all who do not stop to eat. You will see pretty girls of fourteen, sixteen, or eighteen, brilliant with cosmetics, ambling to the door with their funny little gait, to exchange confidences with some young friend whom they have signaled across the house. You may know what they are talking about, for it is the custom to fall madly in love with the actors. The highest classes do not patronize the theatre. It is a plebeian form of entertainment. But the masses place the actors on such a pinnacle of popularity that we could quite understand the strut even of the "supes" and minor actors whose dressing-room is in the front of the house among the properties. We had seen them in various stages of make-up—for the cosmetic art has attained a high degree of perfection in Japan—as we passed up the eccentric staircase. They go up the aisle, straight through the audience, to get on or off the stage; but this long walk is taken in a high-art style which is something delightful.

As for the stage itself, it is, as all the world knows, a revolving stage. That in the Imperial Theatre contains, perhaps, three sets; and it would not be necessary to lose any more time than in Steele Mackaye's Madison Square Theatre. But the entr'acte is an institution with the people. They like it. They enjoy the play too much to desire to see the end of it. They are never in a hurry. If a Japanese ever does get in a hurry, he dies. His little frame can not stand the wear and tear of such a new and utterly absurd emotion. The play itself would exhaust a foreigner if he sat it through. There is so much hanashi and so little action. This is a realistic effect. If a Japanese is going to do anything, the amount of talk involved in the doing of it is something formidable. All their effects are realistic, consequently it is almost as interesting to visit a Japanese house as to witness a Japanese play. Their stage settings can not be magnificent because their own settings are not magnificent. Their costumes have not the gorgeous effect of Chinese stage costumes because the Japs themselves do not wear them. There is ease and comfort inexpressible in Japan, but there is no luxury. A Japanese interior setting would be interesting to a foreigner if he were not fresh from seeing twenty just like it. The sole piece of furniture in a Japanese room, aside from the omnipresent screen, is the hibachi, or fire brazier. If they are going to eat, the little tables are brought out of the closets. If they are going to sleep, the quilts are brought out of the closets. If they enjoy the possession of what we call "curios," they bring them out only one or two at a time. Thus they change their decorations every week. What would they think of the stage-setting of one of our interiors? Their garden scenes are exceedingly pretty, and the stage is at times interesting, for that it revives old dresses, customs, and articles of use now superseded: the kanga, perhaps, or the norimon, a couple of basket conveyances, which have now given way to the universal jinrikisha, or other articles of this kind, which are interesting because they belong to the past.

The play for the day was Kazuma's Revenge. We had hoped to see the Forty Ronins—which may be called the Hamlet of Japanese dramatic literature—or, at least, something in which hatri-kari would occur. They are said to give this with frightfully realistic effect. But it fell about that the play was but a mild one, though a tale of a sword—as all their tales are for that matter—and it contained an infinity of domestic detail. However, we saw the "Danjoro"—the Booth, so to speak, of Japan—and a capital actor the fellow is. He sinks his own name in this title of "Danjoro"—a proud one, since it signifies that he is the first player of the realm. He is handsome, in a Japanese way, and with the aid of cosmetics, is the type of Japanese manly beauty. His nose is long and slim, his eyes slanting, and his eyebrows half-way up his brow—a thin, well-defined, sloping line. His queue is of marvelous glossiness, and he is quick and lithe as a trapeze artist. They have a stilted stage language in Japan as well as at home, and he measures his syllables with most stagey incisiveness. Throughout the long, long, long siege of talking, which preceded any action whatever, the audience hung upon his words with attentive ears, and gazed on him with rapturous eyes. The language itself abounds in quips and quibbles (as Gilbert would say), and the people are inveterate punsters. They prize a mot as dearly as did any of Mürger's Bohemians, and a good story or a witticism easily passes into history.

Doubtless this explained the people's enjoyment of the "Danjoro's" hanashi. As the actor, like every one else, sits on the floor—on his heels—through more than one-half the time, the performance has not an enlivening effect. But when they do begin to act, they are as quick and agile as monkeys. Their fencing bouts are the most spirited encounters that can be imagined, and an actor of the highest degree studies to give a quickness and finish to his every motion. Thus, at one time, an old priest—in the play—with shaven crown and solemn mien, walked slowly through the queer little door of exit, and appeared about to pass to a kanga—a basket of the sedan-chair family, but absurdly small. He was tall for a Japanese, and his height was augmented by the pair of clogs into which he solemnly climbed at the door—for no Japanese wears his shoes in the house. As he neared the kanga he doubled himself into a ball and rolled into it, in the twinkling of an eyelash. Anything more quick and sudden I never saw. In fencing, or even in miscellaneous sword-fighting, they will revolve on their heels between the blows with astonishing quickness. There seems to be a gymnastic leaven leavening the entire dramatic lump.

An old comedian, who had been the favorite of the public for forty years, was one of the most interesting features of the stage. He came up the aisle with all the conscious pride of favoritism—as Warren might walk on a Boston stage, or Gilbert in New York, or Mrs. Judah in San Francisco. He looked the veteran of the stage, every inch of him. But he was the warrior for the nonce, not the comedian; and there were blended dignity and conscious pride in his acknowledgment of a clamorous greeting.

The female parts are all taken by men—as in the Chinese theatre. These men look immensely tall, for the Japanese women are tiny creatures; but they imitate ridiculously well the little, short, ambling, pigeon-toed steps, for it is the height of bad breeding for a Japanese woman not to walk with toes well turned in. Also, they dress their hair with the greatest fidelity, and tune their voices to the female pitch. Japanese women have figured conspicuously in the history and literature of the country, but they do not dramatize the Japanese heroine extensively. They prefer bloody battles, feuds between the great daimios, and stories of long vendetta. Kazuma's Revenge is of this latter type, and the endless expedients to which a couple of Japanese samurai resorted to get the better of each other became tiresome through the fellows unpacking their souls too much in words before they fell to fighting. The "Danjoro" took a leaf from Clara Morris's book, and gave us a scene of physical suffering. He fell a-shivering with a chill. His jaws chattered, his teeth rattled, and he became actually livid with cold. They piled covering on him, but he shivered through it all until one actually pitied him, and it seemed impossible that it could not be real. Then the fever came upon him. His throat grew parched, his tongue thick, his eyes glassy. He tossed the coverings off impatiently, and began to rave. The illusion was quite as vivid as the first. Then, in a twinkling, he restored himself to his normal condition. It had been a play within a play. He had denied himself to a friend or enemy on plea of illness, and when the visitor forced himself in he was seized with sickness. The gallery granted a most forcible approval, and there was the glister of warm commendation in the soft, dark eyes all around us.

One of the most peculiar features of a Japanese theatre is the scene-shifter, or shifters, for there are several. They also act as property-men. Articles to be used are not discovered when the curtain rises. These imps of darkness bring them out, and put them in place as occasion demands. They are dressed in black from head to foot, mask and all, and are supposed to be invisible. It is rather startling to see them walking about among the players, although they try to be mysterious and retiring in their movements. Actors and audience are entirely oblivious, and I really believe the people have worked themselves up to such a point of imagination that they do not see them.

When the sun began to set we left the great audience—a Japanese theatre is always full—silly enjoying themselves, and nowhere near the end. Several ushers glided up to point out the spot where General Grant had sat, as we prepared to fall down the steep staircase. We had been out between the acts, and had been entreated on various sides to observe the spot. His visit had really been a great occasion, and people were to be pardoned for remembering it. Thousands upon thousands of dollars had been expended upon each entertainment, and in the theatre such a performance had been given as will never be seen again in Japan. They dramatized for the occasion an old historical legend, whose hero, renowned for his valorous deeds, they likened to Grant. It was the most graceful compliment they could convey to a warrior. Actors and geishas, or dancing girls, were brought from far and near. The decorations were something fabulous. But are not all these things written?

I brought away my programme with me. It is a funny little buff pamphlet of rice paper. It begins at the wrong end, as everything does in Japan. The crest which ornaments it is on the last page instead of the first. The argument begins at the right-hand lower corner of the last page. It is profusely illustrated with grotesque-looking Japs in various stages of dramatic tribulation, but you must look at the last picture first. It is neither a very nice-looking, nor legible, nor intelligible document, but it brings back very vividly the interesting day when the professor sighed a big sigh of relief as we left what had become an old story to him. We took our last drink of tea and our last slice of bamboo root in the tea-house. We said "sayonara" half regretfully to the eyebrowless crone and her bevy of attending maids. The professor shook the reins over the Japanese pony's banged mane, the betto set up his cry of warning in the little banner-lined street, and to the tea-houses, theatre, and General Grant, we gave a silent sayonara. BETSY B.

At our own theatres business has been good, and very good. The management of the Baldwin has had nothing to complain of, and the Bush Street has been in bonanza from the first night of the Pirates. The great hit will be continued there until further notice. At the Baldwin, next Monday evening, Miss Rachel Sanger will make the successful Gilbert known to us even better than he now is, by appearing in Sweethearts and the Wedding March.

A BEAUTIFUL WORK OF ART.—Madame Wyse, an English artist of note, has lately arrived in this city, with the intention of remaining sometime. The lady's specialty is painting on silk and other dress materials. We were yesterday shown some specimens which are well worthy of inspection. They are two evening dresses. The first is a silver-gray silk, the flounces of which are very artistically painted with flowers and creepers entwined, while the sash—of great depth—is decorated in unison with the other parts of the robe. The second, a white silk dress, has three flounces, which, as in the first dress, are beautifully decorated with wreaths of the coral plant, as well as a sash about fifteen inches in depth, on which are painted all kinds of tropical plants, birds, etc. They are Madame Wyse's own designs, and the colors are chemically prepared and warranted not to run; this is a new invention, for which she is getting out a patent. These robes would look superb on ladies with any pretensions to figure. To each dress are several yards of silk for making the bodice. Madame Wyse is stopping at the Russ House.

At ten o'clock next Monday morning Messrs. Edward S. Spear & Co. will begin to sell at auction the furniture and fixtures of the Grand Hotel. The sale will be the most extensive, the most notable, and the most important that has ever taken place in San Francisco. Besides the bed-room furniture of over four hundred rooms, the massive and elegant parlor and dining-room settings, and a line of exceptionally elegant gas-fixtures, there will be sold three of Hill's best Californian landscapes, two paintings by S. Walker, and a fine study of the San Joaquin Valley, by Buttman. In the kitchen and engine-room the fixtures invite the attention of practical buyers. Housekeepers can ill afford to neglect this opportunity; and they will do well to remember that the furniture of the Grand cost originally over half a million dollars, and that the entire line is in first-rate condition—a great deal of it being, to all intents and purposes, "as good as new." The terms offered are cash, in United States gold coin, and purchasers will be allowed to select in lots to suit. Do not forget that the sale will begin promptly at ten.

Copied from the tablets of an old theatrical manager: "Actresses ought never to be married. They are widows by birth."

Die at home among friends. Don't go to far-off cities or foreign lands to suffer and die alone, but stay at home and live by using Hop Bitters, that drives away the first approach of disease.

Many clergymen who were obliged to withdraw from the pulpit on account of "Clergyman's Sore Throat," have recovered by using Fellows' Syrup of Hypophosphites and are preaching again. This preparation seems peculiarly and wonderfully adapted to diseases of the breathing organs.

Mrs. Pearson, late President of Woman's Christian Temperance Union, has opened a temperance restaurant at 631 Clay Street, where she will be pleased to see her friends and all those wishing a good lunch for five cents. A large variety of articles not found at other temperance restaurants will be supplied to patrons at above prices. Business men will find no place more convenient or pleasant. Ladies out shopping will be cordially received. Be sure to call.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

"OUR NANCY."

As an Advocate before the Court of Judge Lynch.

"Golly, massa, dat dar gal Nancy am de best shot on de ribber; jest seen her on de ridge yonder; reckon she's out for venison," said Black Pete to his master, Judge Dickson, as they were working their claim.

"Yes, Pete, she's some as a gal, I allow; but, Pete, boy, conversion to the Lord is a crowning glory above all things, as holy writ shows," said the judge, biting off a fresh chew of tobacco.

"Yes, massa, but de gal may hab a new heart from de Lord, an' be a lilly-white lam' ob de Lord Chrise; plenty time for dat yet."

"Yes, Pete, I allow that's so, but the Lord must give her a call first."

"Massa means she be regenerate, an' have a conversion inwards, dis nigger suppose."

"Yes, Pete, you lazy nigger; but meantime, the water runs, and the earth with gold in it jest waits for that pick of yours to loosen it up, and for your shovel to throw it into the long-tom. Hurry up, boy, and the Lord fructify our labor."

The speakers were "Squire Dickson" and his slave, "Black Pete," whom he had brought across the plains from Missouri to help him dig a fortune from the new-found California gold mines. Master and man were strict members of the Methodist church, each according to his peculiar light.

The scene was a little flat and bar, high up on the Yuba River, in Northern California, at the foot of a high mountain, requiring half a day to climb, in a zigzag mule path; and so steep that, looking down from the crest of the ridge on the bar below, men and animals looked no larger than mice. And so separated from the rest of the world was it by the surrounding mountain walls that it seemed as if only creatures with wings or claws could obtain access to it.

The two men—Judge Dickson and Black Pete—were working at the side of the bar, beneath a bank of earth that they were washing out in a long-tom, with water from a small mountain stream that came rushing down to the river. The bar and banks were worked by about a hundred miners, who had their cabins scattered here and there. There was a trading-store near at hand, where they could buy all sorts of supplies, from a paper of needles to pork, flour, and whisky. There was also a large log-house for those boarders whose claims paid so well they could not spare time to cook. It was a strange, wild spot, where the mountains—clothed in their primeval forests—towered above the rushing river, locked in its bed by immense boulders.

"Judge" Dickson was so called by the many who applied to him to settle their disputes in common matters. The more exciting and important disputes were brought before Judge Lynch, presiding over a high court of miners. They were Western men—with one or two exceptions—and "Our Nancy" was the only white woman in the camp. Nancy Grove and her elder brother, Mark, were survivors of a family of seven—father, mother, and five children—who, in crossing the plains, had been attacked by Indians. It was a hard fight. Nancy Grove and her brother Mark, hidden in the grass under their heaviest wagon, had, with their well-used rifles, killed some twelve of the redskins. This discouraged the band, and the survivors retreated, taking with them their remaining cattle. And yet the girl was only seventeen years old, gentle and kindly in her nature, but with spirit and courage that is rare in her sex. She was fair to see, was tall and well-proportioned, with limbs and body uncursed by corsets and the other deformities of fashion. She wore her long black hair wound in a braid around her head—to keep it out of her way. Her gray eyes—deadly over the sights of her rifle—were very bright and intelligent, and affectionate even, to all she cared for.

Nancy was a natural woman. She had been reared in ignorance of most of the conventionalities of society and its artificial wants, amid the grandeur of forests and prairies. She had gained her knowledge from nature—knowledge often more useful and practical, in new countries, than that gained in schools.

Her brother, Mark, surpassed most men in physical force and strength; and although a slight curvature of the spine brought his height down to that of common men, it did not appear to have lessened the great muscular power he possessed. He was an expert hunter, fearless and cunning in all woodcraft, but he was not so strong in his intellect or intelligence. He had unbounded trust in his sister, as the first of women; and, secondly, he believed in himself and his rifle; and he also believed in a God that had made all things, and existed somewhere, but he never had found time to ask Nancy about it, and had some doubts in his own mind that he knew she only could explain.

The brother and sister had come into the mining camp on the river, in company with some others, and Mark and Nancy had immediately gone to work and put up a large, tight log-house, of a few rooms, with one principal one for their boarders' use. It was not exactly a public house, but open to all travelers—Western fashion. Nancy was the head and director in all things, and, owing to her skill and intelligence in housekeeping and management, the house was very successful. They owned a good-paying claim on the river, too, which this strong, handsome girl would go to when she felt like it, and, taking pick or shovel, would "pan out" as much gold in a day as any other miner.

But the reason she was "Our Nancy," the beloved and respected of all, was owing to her noble nature and her generous heart. She was always the first to aid those who were sick and suffering; even dumb animals had her pity and kindness; and the miners who in their pain and illness had been watched and cared for by her would have fought to the death for Nancy.

Among all the men on the bar there was only one from New England. Ned Stratton was a fair-haired, blue-eyed young fellow of twenty-five; tall, well-proportioned, and good looking; a scholar from an Eastern college. In his early manhood he had devoted himself to the ministry, but, being on a visit to Boston, he had heard the great Theodore Parker, and the daring eloquence of the great Unitarian free-lance had thrown him into a sea of doubt. Since then he could never decide which of the many creeds was the true one. He had brains; he was a fine scholar, but he was not a practical man. A love for adventure, and the California gold-fever, had brought him to the great West; but he had formed no definite plans, and at the first mining camp he reached he found himself stranded. His head was full of "isms" peculiar to the land of the Puritans: transcendentalism, generally, which included deism; abolitionism—of all distinction in races of men; total abstinence from all stimulants—or temperance-ism; vegetarianism—or abstaining from all animal food; and other "isms" of the same nature.

A very honest fellow, of stern principles of right and wrong, was Ned Stratton, but his soul had been floundering about so long among the rocks and stormy seas of these "isms," he didn't know how to apply his principles to the facts of life; and he was imbued with that insane—New England—notion, that mankind can be driven, by enactment of mere human laws, into a good moral and political life. Among the miners he went by the name of the "Yank," and many a wordy discussion between him and the backwoodsmen was held in the trading-store, and at "Our Nancy's" boarding-house; but they couldn't understand him clearly, and although they "allowed" he was peart with his tongue, and almighty windy in words, he was "nowhere with a rifle or axe, and a baby in any kind of sense, except book-sense."

Whatever may be that influence which attracts human beings one to the other—magnetic or otherwise—it was certain that some influence induced Nancy to befriend and take the part of Ned Stratton against the rough Western men who ridiculed his "book-knowledge" and Yankee notions.

The young man had a good claim, that—worked one day in seven—would pay his expenses; but, somehow, if he went to work in it in the morning, the chance was he would find a curious pebble, or a bit of rock or soil with a strange mineral in it, or even a new flower or plant; and then he would immediately throw down his pick and shovel, and, seeking one of the few books he had, would become absorbed in study, and leave his gold-digging to itself. Sometimes Nancy would come along and find him with a book, and his rocker idle, and would laugh at him, and even take the shovel from him, and work and wash the dirt, and then hand him the gold; while he, astonished at the girl's skill, would sit and watch her, unmoved by the little pile of gold she would find in the tin pan; which was a very singular circumstance, if we consider the nature of the people he came from. Sometimes, when there was anything very nice she had prepared for her table and boarders, she would hunt him up, and take him into the house to eat; for he would forget all about his cooking, or perhaps the forgotten fire had burned his beans to a cinder.

The miners were amused at his "book-ways," but let him alone on account of the respect they had for her.

It was a quiet life on the bar, and there was little excitement, except the vagaries and occasional misdoings of Black Pete. He was a jolly, good-natured African, under all ordinary circumstances; but he had a decided weakness for strong drink. He lost all his amiability and civilization under the influence of tangle-leg and bottled lightning, and became once more the black savage he had been when taken and sold into slavery. The judge used to beat and thrash him sometimes, to cure him of his weakness and bring him to; and this style of argument seemed the best adapted to his intellect and understanding.

Ned Stratton had several times been witness to this punishment of Black Pete, and had even talked to him of the equality, the brotherhood, of all men; but the negro's head was too thick to comprehend him entirely; and the miners, although indignant at his remarks to the slave, passed them by as only one of his oddities.

One day Ned found Pete sitting on a log by the wayside, more than usually downcast and miserable, from a deserved punishment he had received for a bad fit of drunkenness.

"Well, Pete," said he, "what's the matter with you?"

"Dis nigger been drunk, massa judge he beat him with cane; cane hurt considerable, I allow."

Ned didn't stop to consider the circumstances of the case, and the half-savage nature of the man before him; but immediately went into "the brotherhood of all men," and their "rights," of which the negro only understood a few words, and nothing of the argument. It was, however, pleasant to have a white man sympathize with him in his troubles, and he said:

"Look hear, Massa Ned, I'se a great man in Africa once; beat everybody, now dey beat me."

"But it's wrong," said Ned. "All men—white, red, or black—are equal. It is wrong to sell them, wrong to beat them. Suppose you should beat Judge Dickson for drinking too much, what would he say to that?"

The idea of beating his master seemed so absurd to Pete that he almost laughed at it; but it set him to thinking, as nearly as he was able to accomplish that mental process.

After Ned left him, he brooded over it in his half-tipsy condition. Pete was just in the mood to crave more liquor, and after he had drank it he soon fell into his old savage, sullen, African nature—the brute predominating over the human nature.

Nancy heard Ned talking to the black, and, to prevent any possible trouble, had on some pretext called him away.

Judge Dickson's claim had not paid expenses for some days, and this was partly owing to Black Pete's continued intoxication; as a natural consequence, the judge did not feel in very good humor with him, and when he staggered up to their camp in the afternoon, half savage, and altogether foolish, he took his walking-stick and laid it across Pete's back with some emphasis. The black man's eyes gleamed red like a wolf's at this, and, stooping down, he seized an axe standing by the door-way, and, swinging it round, struck the judge with it on the side of his head, felling him to the ground, where he lay, bleeding profusely, and senseless.

Pete stood staring at his own work in blank horror and amazement. Two miners, who were passing and saw the deed, seized the black and bound him hand and foot, and with the assistance of others removed the body of the judge to his log-cabin. The news of the deed spread like wildfire over the camp. The miners assembled at once, and as one of them had heard what Ned Stratton had said to Black Pete not long before he struck the judge, Ned was also seized, and, securely bound, was brought before the court of "Judge Lynch," held by the miners in the large eating-room of "Our Nancy's" boarding-house.

Nancy almost broke down at these tragic events, and that evening her skill in providing for the miners' supper was gone; for Ned was more to her than she had ever thought before, and the little knowledge she had been taught by him from his books now seemed to bind her to him.

"Judge Lynch" holds his courts with few forms or ceremonies, and in any place most convenient. The large eating-room in Nancy Grove's house was quickly arranged with seats and benches for the jury, and a table in the middle of the room was placed there for whoever should act as judge, and those who were to act as lawyers. The two prisoners were seated on a bench, with their hands tied together. There were about seventy miners in the room, who had come in from their camps in the neighborhood. Some had their rifles, and each had a bowie-knife and a revolver strapped to his belt. There was a rude counter or bar in one corner of the room, where whisky and tobacco were sold. The miners, like most Western frontiers-men, were uneducated, and there were only two, except Ned Stratton, who could even read.

Judge Dickson was the most important person in the diggings. Next to him in influence among the miners were Dusty Dick and Shortee. The former was so called on account of working a claim in a white-colored clay, which, drying upon his clothes, kept him as dusty as a miller. He was a stout, tall, middle-aged man, who had seen much of the world, and was a decided original in character, with a dash of humor in him that made him very amusing. Shortee was a stout little fellow, grave and dogmatic in his ways, who had lived and traveled in nearly every part of the world, and who was often consulted by the miners on account of his varied experience.

By universal consent Shortee was chosen judge and Dusty Dick was made prosecuting attorney. After the names of all present were written on slips of paper, they were put in a hat, and twelve were drawn out for the jury, who were seated apart by themselves.

There were so few arrangements to make in this mode of trial that all was soon ready. Dusty Dick rose with all the dignity he knew how to use, and thus addressed court and jury, against the prisoner:

"Gentlemen of the jury: This ere case is plain to see through as spring-water, and comes out strong as the nose on a man's face. It ain't no use to flabbergaster you all with a string of words as long as would string from here to San Francisco. I shan't do it. I'm going to stew the case down, till it's easy to take, and smells strong and tastes sweet. The way those lawyers at Frisco turn, twist, and rip up words, and obfuscate and conglomerate things, till a jury can't tell black from white or how much two and two are, would make an owl shed his tail feathers. I've seen it, gentlemen, and I don't mean to try it on; if I do, d--n me. Ye see, this ere case lies in a nut-shell, an' I'll pick it out fur yer considering as neat as a monkey takes their meat from a cocoanut. Judge Dickson owns a nigger—ye see setting that, Black Pete. Well, Black Pete is a good kind of nigger enough, ef ye can keep whisky from him; for when the corn-juice gets inside him, he goes back from civilization, thinks he's in Africa agin, and jest becomes rip-roaring savage. But before I go on I must amply, and explain to yer what murder is and how many kinds of it there is. Well, now, ther's three kinds of murder. Firstly, comes 'murder of the first degree,' that means, when a human critter, with malice aforethought, med-itates and chalks out how he will kill somebody; the punishment for that is sudden death. The second kind of murder is called 'homicide,' or 'manslaughter'; it's when a man has to defend himself from another who wants to kill him, or when a man is killed sort of accidental like. The punishment is putting in prison. The third kind of murder is 'accessory murder'; that means when a man, with malice aforethought and meditation, is knowing to a murder, before or afterwards; its punishment is likewise sudden death.

"Now, fellow-citizens, that nigger setting thar, Black Pete, committed murder in the first degree, cause why? It was malice aforethought and meditation made him pick up that axe, and slinging it round hit the judge on the head with it, and break in his upper crust. Ye see, Pete had been on a rip-staving drunk all day; well, who should come along and meet him but Ned Stratton, and what does Mr. Ned do but commences, with malice aforethought and meditation, to rile the nigger up worse than ever, by telling him abolition stuff about the rights of man and slavery, till the nigger biled over and struck his master, breaking his upper crust, as aforesaid. That's the whole case, straight as a loon's leg, and when the judge goes under, we must string up Black Pete.

"As for Mr. Ned Stratton, setting thar, I must now argufy him and his case, and amplyfy considerably, as he comes under a different catagory of 'murder in the third degree,' or 'accessory murder,' before or after the fact. He is what the lawyers call, in Latin, pressipice criminalis, which is, in English, he stands on a precipice of crime, and may take a drop or fall, which likewise he will, if the judge pegs out. Ye all know Stratton is a Yank, but do ye know what a Yank is, or do ye know ther country he 'riginated from? Gentlemen of the jury, I've ben thar, and will tell ye. It's my firm 'pinion climate makes people what they ar. I've seen it, and what I sees I knows. Yankeeland, especially near the sea, ain't got no one climate, cause why? It's got every climate, good, bad, and cussed, can be scared up over our round arth, and so mixed, the devil couldn't tell tother from which. Gentlemen, I've been in that country in July, near Boston, an' I swear ter ye, in the morning I was broiling like a herring on a griddle, in a straw hat an' cotton pants, an' in twenty minutes by the clock, it come up so freezing cold, I had to put on the fur dress I'd worn in Labrador. Can human natur stand that kind of thing? No, sir, it kin not, and that's the reason the Yanks have interierated, and ar as full of cranky notions and crazy ways as a mad bull in fly time. I pinionate Ned Stratton couldn't help bornin in that place, and taking in their pizon notions, but he hadn't ought to be coming here, stirring up niggers to sassinate their masters. I allow he hadn't; but we can't blame him for getting out ov sich a land as that is; hard to live in, an' hard to die in, for I sees thousands ov acres thar with no sile for a grave, and only rocks. Fishes in the sea kin lead a nat'ral life thar, I allow, but humans an' beasts kin not. I've seen on the gravel lands near the Massachusetts Bay a chipmunk squirrel setting on ther top-rail on a fence gnawing a pebble-stone, with the tears running down his face, and the skunks was so weak they couldn't make themselves unpleasant. It's a hard country that, an' has interierated an' made its people half-crazy with all sorts of idees. Gentlemen ov ther jury, I allow Ned Stratton was accessory before the murder, an' must swing of the judge pegs out."

Dusty Dick looked around with a self-satisfied air after he thus concluded, and, turning to Shortee, said:

"Judge Shortee, did I speak ter the pint?"

"Dick, ye just spoke right up ter the handle, straight as a loon's leg," replied Shortee.

The foreman of the jury then arose, saying:

"There must be somebody to speak for and defend the prisoners at the bar."

There was a grotesqueness about the way these rough, uneducated men administered justice in the courts of Judge Lynch; but nevertheless they were terribly in earnest. In this case—before the verdict, before the trial even—the miners had prepared the strong branch of an oak tree with two hopes hanging down, in readiness for the expected execution of Black Pete and Ned Stratton; as they supposed there was no doubt that Judge Dickson would die.

Ned had been sitting by the side of the black man during the trial, not appearing to notice or observe the events that were passing. When the foreman of the jury had spoken, he arose and said:

"Fellow miners, I scarcely know what to say to you, being a perfectly innocent man, and being tried by you, who have no just right to try me, in this extra-judicial manner—which is a singular anomaly in this land of freedom, and not concomitant with its code, or justice—"

Long Tom, foreman of the jury, here interrupted Stratton, saying:

"Judge Shortee, this man is just throwing book-words and Latin in our faces, that nobody understands: who knows what kind of a critter a 'nomoly' is, with a 'code' coming after it like a tail? Can't you scare up somebody who kin sling our nat'ral English?"

At this point Nancy Grove, who had been an attentive listener, but unseen, stepped slowly forth among them. Her cheeks were flushed, but her eyes were very bright and determined in their expression; her tall, graceful figure and her beautiful face made her an attraction for all eyes; her long, black, silky hair was woven and braided around her head somewhat in the form of a coronet, and she had thrown around her a crimson shawl; making the Western maiden resemble some Oriental queen, came accidentally among them. She stood by Judge Shortee, and spoke to them all:

"Miners, you all know me, and I wish to speak a few words for the prisoners" (she hesitated a moment), "for Ned Stratton, who seems to have few friends—"

Dusty Dick rose at this point, and said:

"When 'Our Nancy' wishes to speak to any crowd in these diggings, she kin do it. Every heart among us affectionates and respects her as a sister. Pile up ther words as yer please, Nancy, ef they reach down to Frisco. We will all, and the jury also, listen kindly; and, ef we kin do it justly, we'll just take your counsel and advice considering the prisoners."

Nancy then continued:

"I know well these two accused of murder, and have heard Dusty Dick's remarks against them, and in ridicule of the land of the Yankees, where Ned Stratton came from. But making fun of that place is nothing against Ned, nor does it prove anything in the present case. It's natural he should have ideas and opinions learned from those who brought him up; we all of us generally do. And even if the Yanks are—many of them—a cranky, conceited sort of people, that don't prove Ned is anything of the kind. Miners, it isn't easy for a young woman to talk to you and defend a young man [here Nancy's face flushed very red], but, as it is a case of life or death, I shall do it. But I'll first say a few words for Black Pete, sitting there. He is as simple, kind, and good-hearted a nigger as can be found, if you keep corn-juice away from him; but if he drinks it, he becomes no better than a crazy beast. I have never let him have a drop in our house; and think whoever gave him whisky is partly to blame for this evil thing he has done. At least, deal with him justly, and give him all the show you can. Ned Stratton is a young fellow with less bad ways than any one I have seen, and scorns a lie, and I believe would die quicker than do an unkind action to any one. He has been with me and taken care and cured many I see in this room, who have been very sick and dead broke, without friends. And as for his meaning any evil by talking to Pete, it's out of all sense and reason to say it. [Nancy's eyes were growing very bright.] Ned has got more book-knowledge in his head than most men; but I allow, in every-day common-sense knowledge, to get a living by, he ain't thar. But take to him a beast of the field, a bird of the air, or fish from the waters, or even a flower, plant, or pebble, and he will tell its history, also strange things about it; would make your eyes stare and your hair pretty near raise up to learn the wonders of nature. As for an axe, rifle, or pick, they're strange to him, and his bringing up as concerns 'em is of no account; but he ain't to blame for it. As for his hurting any human creature, I know better, for I've seen him step out of the path rather than step on a black bug and take its life."

Here the jury whispered together, and the foreman rose and said:

"Nancy, we would like to ask you a question—a little out of the common—if you will let us."

"Certainly," she answered.

"We wish to ask if this young man, Ned Stratton, is anything to you—that is, if ye've ben sparking together? Ef ye have, we will do for your sake what we allow we'd never do for anybody else."

Nancy's face flushed red as a rose as she cast her eyes down.

Ned Stratton rose up quickly, and said: "Miners, you can do as you please with me, but I pray you not to hurt the feelings of Nancy by requiring an answer to that question. I am but a poor fellow, with little skill to make money, or in useful labor; my knowledge is not of much use here. Nancy is well off, and can, with her money and beauty, look to a man far higher in life and position than I am. Were it otherwise, I might be very bappy with such a wife."

As he finished speaking, Nancy went up to his side, and put her hand in his, and, turning to the jury, said:

"Miners, I do care for Ned, if that will do him any good in your judgment of him; but there is one thing of much importance in this trial you should know. You can bring no verdict against either Black Pete or Ned Stratton until Judge Dickson is proved to be in danger, or dies. The doctor was sent for, and has been with the judge, and will send word to us of his condition."

At this moment a miner came in and whispered to Nancy, who listened, much pleased. Speaking to all, she said:

"The doctor sends us word that we may stop all further proceedings, for Judge Dickson will be all right to-morrow, and walking about. The wound on his head was only a scalp wound."

Long Tom, the foreman of the jury, now jumped up and spoke:

"We all allow that is good news to hear, an' it breaks up this court 'cordingly; but before we go we wish to say to Black Pete, ef he meddles with corn-juice again, and makes hisself an African beast, we will tie him to a sapling and whip his bare back till the blood fills his boots—sure as shooting. We do all solemnly swear to it. As for Ned here, 'Our Nancy' can take him prisoner, and do jest as she pleases with him."

All were so delighted with this happy termination of what might have been a tragedy, that the miners gave three uproariously loud cheers and an Indian war-whoop that made the loose things rattle. After this, everybody asked everybody else to take a drink.

Ned Stratton changed his whole life under the influence of "Our Nancy." In six months he was one of the best shots and miners on the river, and also the most fortunate, for he took from his claim some thousands of dollars; his books were put away for the idle days of winter, and Ned, for the first time, became a practical man as well as a learned one. But, best of all, he had "Our Nancy" for a wife.

H. C. DORR.

SAN FRANCISCO, May, 1880.

Swinburne has written the following sonnet "On the proposed desecration of Westminster Abbey by the erection of a monument to the son of Napoleon III.":

"Let us go hence." From the inmost shrine of grace
Where England holds the elect of all her dead
There comes a word like one of old time said
By gods of old cast out. Here is no place
At once for these and one of poisonous race.
Let each rise up from his disshallowed bed
And press forth silent. Each divine veiled head
Shall speak in silence with averted face:
"Scorn everlasting and eternal shame
Eat out the rotting record of his name
Who had the glory of all these graves in trust
And turned it to a hissing. His offense
Makes havoc of their desecrated dust
Whose place is here no more. Let us go hence."

A new Welsh greenback paper in the West says: "Emedan detta blad blir en advokat af den financiella teori som besjalar greenback partiet." This is an infernal lie. We happen to know that nothing of the kind ever occurred.

Shakspeare says: "Delays have dangerous ends." The same may be truthfully said of the wasp and the hornet, albeit they are not "delays."

THE INNER MAN.

We print the following bit of Atlantic culinary comment, hoping it may provoke discussion. This column will always be open to intelligent opinion, interestingly expressed, upon its prime topic or any kindred ones.

It is appropriate at the present season to make a protest against the pernicious habit of incessant broiling practiced in so many American households, clubs, and restaurants. This old, hasty, and imperfect method of preparing delicate food ought to be abandoned. It naturally finds favor in the eyes of the cook, because it saves time and requires little skill. When legitimately used in the cooking of a fat, juicy beefsteak or a mutton-chop, it is good enough. But it should be held as an axiom that to broil a fish or a bird is wicked. Take a North River shad, for instance; when it comes from the gridiron, all the delicate flavor of the fish is disguised by the taste of the butter which has been lavished upon it to prevent it from drying up. But the same fish steamed or boiled, and served hot with an egg sauce, or cold with a sauce tartare, or in potted shape, can hardly be beaten. The same may be said of blue-fish, salmon, trout, or bass, as any one may determine for themselves who are accustomed to the hastily-broiled dishes of fish usually brought forward at the sea-side summer hotels. Take again a spring chicken or, worse still, a snipe. What barbarity to split them open and dry out their delicate juices on the gridiron! Nothing but careful roasting will do them justice. The same holds good with all sorts of game, particularly the woodcock and chicken partridge, which will be the first to come in season after the snipe family. Another drawback of our kitchens is the ignorance of the real use of the stew-pan. Stewed meat, if properly cooked, is a most nutritious and delicate form of food, and a stewpan is an important article in an economical kitchen. The joint of roast lamb which left the table only slightly cut into, would, if properly roasted to be served hot, present an unsightly appearance as a cold joint. But by the skillful aid of the stewpan, and a judicious knowledge of seasoning, an excellent dish may be prepared of it. Efforts in this line, however, usually result in a fearful concoction called an Irish stew.

"I told Goudomor, by his good favor, he should not dine with me at that time, and that when I would entertain the ambassador of so great a king as his, it should not be upon my ordinary, but that I would make him a feast worthy of so great a person; howbeit, that he might see after what manner I lived, I desired some of my gentlemen to bring his gentlemen into the kitchen, where, after my usual manner, were three spits full of meat, divers pots of boiled meat, and an oven with store of pies in it, and a dresser-board covered with all manner of good fowl, and some tarts, pans with tarts in them, after the French manner; after which, being conducted to another room, they were showed a dozen or sixteen dishes of sweetmeats, all of which was but the ordinary allowance for my table. The Spaniards returning now to Goudomor, told him what good cheer they found; notwithstanding which, I told Goudomor again that I desired to be excused if I thought this dinner unworthy of him, and that when occasion were, I should entertain him after a much better manner."

Oh! carve me yet another slice,
Oh! help me to more gravy still,
There's naught so sure as something nice
To conquer care, or grief to kill.

I always loved a bit of beef,
When Youth and Bliss and Hope were mine;
And now it gives my heart relief
In sorrow's darksome hour—to dine.

When oil is disliked in salads, the following dressing will be found excellent: Rub the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs very fine with a spoon, incorporate with them a dessert-spoonful of mixed mustard; then stir in a tablespoonful of melted butter, half a teaspoonful of thick cream, a saltspoonful of salt, and cayenne pepper enough to take up on the point of a very small penknife-blade, and a few drops of anchovy or Worcestershire sauce; add very carefully sufficient vinegar to reduce the mixture to a smooth, creamy consistency.

The first green vegetable in market is the pie-plant, or rhubarb, and very tart and delicious it is, and very wholesome after all the fatty substances of our winter diet. So we think; but here comes the query: "Is rhubarb wholesome?" Every once in a while there appears a newspaper paragraph stating that the acidity of rhubarb stalks is due to oxalic acid, and therefore poisonous. This would be "important if true," but, fortunately for those who find in rhubarb a most acceptable substitute for fruit, it is not true. The acidity is due to a mixture of malic and citric acids—the one being the acid of apples, and the other the acid of lemons.

"Pockton" is a Toulouse dish. This is the way to make it: "Take any kind of boiled fish left over from dinner; remove the bones; put in a mortar and pound it; use about the same quantity of stale bread crumbs; put this bread alone in a half-pint of milk, and place to warm until the milk is all absorbed; then put in mortar, and pound in mortar with fish until the result is a paste; add the yolks of two eggs, beaten lightly; add salt and pepper, a spoonful of butter, chopped parsley, and a little nutmeg; grease a pan with butter; pan should have high sides; pour in the mixture; place some few small bits of butter; place in an oven, and bake some twenty minutes; should be well browned; it may be cooked in a 'bain marie'; turn out of the dish when served; eat with either a sauce piquante or a sauce with capers. Exactly the same thing may be done with cold waste meats, or with the end of a ham; the ham be grated."

Chicken Soup.
Broiled Shad.
Veal Croquettes, with Green Peas.
Roast Lamb. Mashed Potatoes.
Tomato Salad.
Swedish Pudding.
Cherries, Bananas, and Oranges.

SWEDISH PUDDING.—One-quarter pound of flour, one-quarter pound of butter, one-quarter pound of sugar, four eggs, and a little salt. Rub the sugar and butter to a cream, add the yolks well beaten, the salt, flour, and lastly the whites of the eggs beaten to a stiff froth. Put the batter three-fourths of an inch deep into cups, cook by steaming them in a steamer about half an hour; turn them out upon a hot platter. Serve immediately, with a rich, clear brandy sauce in the bottom of the dish.

BAKER'S BLUE-JAY YARN.

From Mark Twain's New Book, "A Tramp Abroad."

"When I first begun to understand jay language correctly, there was a little incident happened here. Seven years ago, the last man in this region but me, moved away. There stands his house—been empty ever since; a log-house, with a plank roof—just one big room, and no more; no ceiling—nothing between the rafters and the floor. Well, one Sunday morning I was sitting out here in front of my cabin, with my cat, taking the sun, and looking at the blue hills, and listening to the leaves rustling so lonely in the trees, and thinking of the home away yonder in the States, that I hadn't heard from in thirteen years, when a blue-jay lit on that house, with an acorn in his mouth, and says: 'Hello, I reckon I've struck something.' When he spoke, the acorn dropped out of his mouth and rolled down the roof, of course, but he didn't care; his mind was all on the thing he had struck. It was a knot-hole in the roof. He cocked his head to one side, shut one eye and put the other one to the hole, like a 'possum looking down a jug; then he glanced up with his bright eyes, gave a wink or two with his wings—which signifies gratification, you understand—and says: 'It looks like a hole, it's located like a hole—blamed if I don't believe it is a hole!'

"Then he cocked his head down and took another look; he glances up perfectly joyful, this time; winks his wings and his tail both, and says: 'Oh, no, this ain't no fat thing, I reckon! If I ain't in luck!—why it's a perfectly elegant hole!' So he flew down and got that acorn, and fetched it up and dropped it in, and was just tilting his head back, with the heavenliest smile on his face, when all of a sudden he was paralyzed into a listening attitude and that smile faded gradually out of his countenance like breath off'n a razor, and the queerest look of surprise took its place. Then he says, 'Why I didn't hear it fall!' He cocked his eye at the hole again, and took a long look; raised up and shook his head; stepped around to the other side of the hole and took another look from that side; shook his head again. He studied a while, then he just went into the details—walked round and round the hole and spied into it from every point of the compass. No use. Now he took a thinking attitude on the comb of the roof and scratched the back of his head with his right foot a minute, and finally says: 'Well, it's too many for me, that's certain; must be a mighty long hole; however, I ain't got no time to fool around here, I got to 'tend to business; I reckon it's all right—chance it, anyway.'

"So he flew off and fetched another acorn and dropped it in, and tried to flit his eye to the hole quick enough to see what became of it, but he was too late. He held his eye there as much as a minute; then he raised up and sighed, and says, 'Confound it, I don't seem to understand this thing, no way; however, I'll tackle her again.' He fetched another acorn, and done his level best to see what become of it, but he couldn't. He says, 'Well, I never struck no such a hole as this, before; I'm of the opinion it's a totally new kind of a hole.' Then he begun to get mad. He held in for a spell, walking up and down the comb of the roof and shaking his head and muttering to himself; but his feelings got the upper hand of him, presently, and he broke loose and cursed himself black in the face. I never see a bird take on so about a little thing. When he got through he walks to the hole and looks in again for half a minute; then he says, 'Well, you're a long hole, and a deep hole, and a mighty singular hole altogether—but I've started in to fill you, and I'm d—d if I don't fill you, if it takes a hundred years!' And with that, away he went. You never see a bird work so since you was born. He laid into his work like a nigger, and the way he hove acorns into that hole for about two hours and a half was one of the most exciting and astonishing spectacles I ever struck. He never stopped to take a look any more—he just hove 'em in and went for more. Well, at last, he could hardly flop his wings, he was so tuckered out. He comes a-drooping down, once more, sweating like an ice-pitcher, drops his acorn in and says, 'Now I guess I've got the bulge on you by this time!' So he bent down for a look. If you'll believe me, when his head come up again he was just pale with rage. He says, 'I've shoveled acorns enough in there to keep the family thirty years, and if I can see a sign of 'em I wish I may land in a museum with a belly full of sawdust in two minutes.' He just had strength enough to crawl up on to the comb and lean his back agin the chimney, and then he collected his impressions and begun to free his mind. I see in a second that what I had mistook for profanity in the mines was only just the rudiments, as you may say. Another jay was going by, and heard him doing his devotions, and stops to inquire what was up. The sufferer told him the whole circumstance, and says, 'Now yonder's the hole, and if you don't believe me, go and look for yourself.' So this fellow went and looked, and comes back and says, 'How many did you say you put in there?' 'Not any less than two tons,' says the sufferer. The other jay went and looked again. He couldn't seem to make it out, so he raised a yell, and three more jays come. They all examined the hole, they all made the sufferer tell it over again, then they all discussed it, and got off as many leather-headed opinions about it as an average crowd of humans could have done. They called in more jays; then more and more, till pretty soon this whole region 'peared to have a blue flush about it. There must have been five thousand of them; and such another jawing and disputing and ripping and cussing, you never heard. Every jay in the whole lot put his eye to the hole and delivered a more chuckle-headed opinion about the mystery than the jay that went there before him. They examined the house all over, too. The door was standing half-open, and at last one old jay happened to go and light on it and look in. Of course, that knocked the mystery galley-west in a second. There lay the acorns, scattered all over the floor. He flopped his wings and raised a whoop. 'Come here!' he says, 'Come here, everybody; hang'd if this fool hasn't been trying to fill up a house with acorns!' They all came a-swooping down like a blue cloud, and as each fellow lit on the door and took a glance, the whole absurdity of the contract that that first jay had tackled hit him home, and he fell over backward suffocating with laughter, and the next jay took his place and done the same. Well, sir, they roosted around here on the house-top and the trees for an hour, and guffawed over that thing like human beings. It ain't any use to tell me a blue-jay hasn't got a sense of humor, because I know better. And memory, too. They brought jays here from all over the United States to look down that hole, every summer for three years. Other birds, too. And they could all see the point, except an owl that come from Nova Scotia to visit the Yosemite, and he took this thing in on his way back. He said he couldn't see anything funny in it. But then he was a good deal disappointed about Yosemite, too."

The following thrilling sketch from the same book is a clever hit at the peculiarities of German composition: "It is a bleak Day. Hear the Rain, how he pours, and the Hail, how he rattles; and see the Snow, how he drifts along, and oh, the Mud, how deep he is! Ah, the poor Fishwife, it is stuck fast in the Mire; it has dropped its Basket of Fishes; and its Hands have been cut by the Scales as it seized some of the falling Creatures; and one Scale has even got into its Eye, and it can not get her out. It opens its Mouth to cry for Help, but if any Sound comes out of him, alas! he is drowned by the raging of the Storm. And now a Tomcat has got one of the Fishes, and she will surely escape with him. No; she bites off a Fin, she holds her in her Mouth—will she swallow her? No; the Fishwife's brave Mother-Dog deserts his Puppies and rescues the Fin, which he eats himself as his Reward. O horror! the Lightning has struck the Fish-basket! he sets him on Fire; See the Flame, how she licks the doomed Utensil with her red and angry Tongue! Now she attacks the helpless Fishwife's Foot—she burns him up, all but the big Toe, and even she is partly consumed; and still she spreads, still she waves her fiery Tongues! She attacks the Fishwife's Leg and destroys it; she attacks its Hand and destroys her; she attacks its poor worn Garment and destroys her also; she attacks its Body and consumes him; she wreathes herself about its Heart and it is consumed; next about its Breast, and in a Moment she is a Cinder; now she reaches its Neck—she goes; now its Chin—it goes; now its Nose—she goes. In another Moment, except Help come, the Fishwife will be no more! Time presses—is there none to succor and save? Yes! Joy, joy! with flying Feet the she-English-woman comes! But alas! the generous she-Female is too late! Where now is the fated Fishwife? It has escaped from its Sufferings; it has gone to a better Land; all that is left of it for its loved Ones to lament over is this poor smouldering Ash-heap. Ah, woeful, woeful Ash-heap! Let us take him up tenderly, reverently, upon the lowly Shovel, and bear him to his long rest, with the Prayer that when he rises again it will be in a Realm where he will have one good square responsible Sex, and have it all to himself, instead of having a mangy lot of assorted Sexes scattered all over him in Spots."

Gustave Doré's latest work is "A Tortured Soul." It is described as representing a young monk seated before an organ in the choir of a Gothic church: "His fingers stray over the keys, while his pale, attenuated countenance and great, hollow, dark eyes are turned toward the spectator. The church below is thronged with white-robed monks like himself, some of them bearing lighted tapers, while the painted windows overhead glow jewel-like in the gloom behind the altar. At the young organist's side, amid the sunny light that streams through the arched window, stands a female form, vague, vaporous, and beautiful, a white mist amid the golden rays. It is the vision of his lost love that haunts the youthful ascetic, the embodied remembrance of the woman for whose sake he had sought refuge in a cloister."

There is a good deal of human nature in a ten-year-old girl. The Browns were discussing, at the breakfast-table, how many conference delegates they would try to entertain. Two, four, and six were the numbers before the house, and the general sentiment seemed to be in favor of the smallest number. Little ten-year-old, however, stoutly advocated the maximum number. "We have three spare beds, and might as well take six. Take six, mamma, please do!" "Well," responded the matron, "if you will wipe the dishes each time, we will." Ten-year-old immediately began to sink down in her chair until her head almost disappeared under the table. "How many shall we take?" asks mamma. "One," was the whispered answer.

Professor Nordenskjöld, the Swedish explorer, at a recent dinner party given in his honor at Paris, related the following story: Speaking with one of the inhabitants of Siberia, he said to him: "You have a good climate, excellent soil, broad rivers—all that should make a country rich—but you lack what is indispensable to the success of a country, viz., the varied efforts of human intelligence." "You are mistaken," replied the Siberian; "Siberia is one of the countries which contain most intelligent men, for as soon as any turn up in Russia the Emperor Alexander sends them here."

That "things are not always what they seem" has received a new illustration. It was dinner-time in a select boarding-house. At that interesting moment a new boarder arrived. He was a venerable looking gentleman, with long silvery hair hanging low upon his shoulders. His face beamed with benevolence and a sweet repose betokening a pure and holy life. As he joined the other guests at table, the landlady looked toward him, saying: "Would you please ask a blessing, sir?" And the venerable stranger shouted in reply: "You'll have to talk a little louder, marm. I'm so deaf."

There is a man at Luray, Va., who became convinced when young that kissing was wicked because Christ was betrayed by a kiss. He resolved never to kiss anybody. He has been married twenty years, and is the father of eleven children, but has never kissed his wife nor one of his offspring. This fact is prayerfully commended to the attention of our contributor "Fag, M. P."

THE WATER QUESTION.

The Whole Question of Rates Elaborately Discussed from a Financial and Economic Standpoint—The Conclusions of the Committee—Majority Report of the Committee of the Board of Supervisors on Water and Water Supply.

[Supervisor Bayley, Chairman of the Committee on Water and Water Supply, at the meeting of the board, last Monday evening, submitted an exhaustive report, reviewing the testimony taken by the committee on its long investigation as to the value of the Spring Valley Water Works, and the principles which should govern the fixing of water rates. The report of the committee is as follows:]

To the Hon. Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco—GENTLEMEN: Your Committee on Water and Water Supplies, to whom was referred the matter of ascertaining and reporting their conclusions to your honorable board as to the rates to be paid by the inhabitants of this city and county for water supplied for their use, with the several orders proposing certain rates, would respectfully represent that your committee have invariably invited all the members of the board to attend the meetings held, so that the questions involved might be considered by all the members, and lead to a solution and just determination of this question in the public interests, and so that a valuation basis may be established to compute, determine, and insure just rates for the present and future wants of this great and growing city.

Under Article 14 of the new Constitution, the rates or compensation to be collected by any person, company, or corporation for the use of water supplied to any city and county, or to the inhabitants of any city and county, are required to be fixed annually by the Board of Supervisors.

The City and County of San Francisco, and most of its inhabitants, are supplied with water by the Spring Valley Water Works. Small portions of the city are supplied by artesian wells owned by Mr. Bradbury and Mr. Warner, but neither of the latter supply any water to the city for the extinguishment of fires, or for flushing the sewers, though both express their willingness to do so.

As these individuals supply but small portions of the city, and as the rates which would be just to the Spring Valley Water Company would also be just to them, your committee will present their views as to the principles which should control the action of the city toward the company.

In response to a general invitation to the public to appear before the committee, many citizens appeared and presented their views as to the rate of interest, value of the works, and principles which should regulate the fixing of rates.

NATURE OF BUSINESS AND RATE OF INTEREST.

As to the interest to be allowed, Mr. Claus Spreckels stated that he would not invest a dollar in an enterprise of this kind unless he received 12 per cent., and that in view of the risks, natural wear, and waste, he regarded the business as a hazardous one, adding: "I do not think the company's revenue can be safely diminished; a serious accident happening might reduce the interest from 12 to 6 per cent."

Ex-Governor Low said: "I would not be willing to invest in such property for anything like the rate I would in bonds when they run for a definite time, properly secured and providing for an interest payable annually. In other words, I would not purchase Spring Valley stock unless it paid a very much larger dividend than would the bonds of the company secured by a first mortgage upon the property, and running for a definite term—say 25 years at a fixed rate of interest. I would prefer the bonds at 5 per cent. rather than the stock at 8. I consider, too, that the property is liable to be affected by the contingencies of the elements. An earthquake or a sweeping conflagration would cut off a large portion of the revenue for probably some time afterward. It is the hazard of the business which renders its income unstable, and I would prefer well-secured bonds, running for 25 years, at 6 per cent., rather than the stock at 9."

In reply to the inquiry as to the reason why 4 per cent. U. S. bonds were bringing $107½, while Spring Valley stock, paying 8 per cent., was bringing only $85, Governor Low replied that in the case of the Government bond the security is ample, and the bonds are free from taxation, while the Spring Valley stock is not. "But above and beyond that is the stability. Capital is timid. You may call it cowardly; it runs at the slightest provocation. It seeks stability more than it does a large rate of interest. If the city government would guarantee 5 per cent. for 20 or 30 years it would make the stock a better investment. * * * In that event, however, the city would assume all the risks and hazards, instead of the company. Should the city establish certain rates, it would be no guarantee of income to the company."

John Perry, Jr., a well-known dealer in bonds and securities, said: "The reduction of interest will hurt the stock. When the company reduced its interest from 9 to 8 per cent. it caused great complaint. The interest should not be reduced because of the contingencies. The overflowing or breaking of a reservoir would subject the company not only to the loss for repairs, but for damages occasioned to adjoining land. The company should have a good rate of interest, not less than 10 per cent., and probably 12, when you bear in mind the risks and uncertainties, and the future needs of the city."

Mr. J. D. Walker, of the firm of Falkner, Bell & Co., considered the business a hazardous one, and regarded 9 to 10 per cent. in addition to operating expenses as a fair rate of interest upon a just valuation of the works.

Mr. Bradbury, the owner of artesian wells in competition with Spring Valley, thought the business a hazardous one, and 9 per cent. a reasonable rate of interest, stating that he would not be content with that rate in his artesian well business.

A committee from the Real Estate Protective Association, consisting of Messrs. Frink, Lamb, Weller, and Bush, had little to say on the subject of interest, but did not think 8 per cent. unreasonable. They thought the chief difficulty in the present system was in the inequality of the apportionment of the rates, as between the city and the consumers, and that this should be remedied by compelling the city to pay one-half of the total income, to be derived by the company for the water used for municipal purposes and protection against fires, and by so doing reduce the rates to the 18,000 rate-payers one half.

The prevailing sentiment or opinion of those who appeared before your committee accorded with the foregoing. It is true that Mr. Dougherty and Mr. Hancock presented different views, the former to the effect that the interest allowed should correspond with that allowed on United States bonds and with that on county bonds, from 4 to 6 per cent., and that the whole amount to be paid the company should be paid by the city, and raised by taxation, as for other municipal purposes; the latter claimed that the interest of the company ought to be diminished to correspond with the depressed condition of the times. But United States bonds are free from taxation, and have the honor and property of the whole country as security, while the bonds of the city and county are secured by all the wealth of San Francisco. It is a financial axiom that the rate of interest increases as the security diminishes. If San Francisco should issue its bonds at 6 per cent. to the Spring Valley Water Company for the purchase of its works, they would doubtless be taken at par, but the company would have as security for the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds, not only the water works, but all the taxable property of the city and county; and if that was the case, the city would run all the risks in connection with the business of conducting the works. If the city expects that the income of the company should be limited to 6 per cent., it must possess the power to guarantee the income and assume all the risks of the business.

The proposition to raise by taxation the whole amount to be paid the company, for all the water supplied, would, in our opinion, be as unjust to property as the present system is to the ratepayers.

It also appears in evidence that Spring Valley Water bonds, amounting to several millions of dollars, bearing interest at 6 per cent. and secured by a first mortgage on the works, were recently offered here and in New York and London, and the best offer that could be obtained was 87½ cents on the dollar. This made the real rate of interest on the bonds for the term for which they were issued over 7 per cent. Ex-Governor Low was of the opinion that as the bondholders have the best security, the stockholders having only the surplus after the bondholders are satisfied, the stockholders ought to receive at least three per cent. more than the bondholders. If this conclusion is correct, the rate of interest to which the company is entitled would be 10 per cent.

Your committee are satisfied from our investigation that the business must be classed as hazardous, and is subject to contingencies, in the matter of competition and otherwise, which entitle it to a rate of interest in excess of the rate prevailing upon mortgages or other first-class securities. In view of the hazards connected with the business, and the enterprise and skill required in its conduct, and the absolute duty on the part of the board to make it a desirable investment, so as to insure its efficiency for the protection of life and property, your committee are of the opinion that the income of such a business is not unreasonable so long as it is confined within the limits of between 8 and 10 per cent. upon a fair valuation of the works, in addition to operating expenses.

The next question to be determined is, upon what amount does the present income of the company yield the foregoing rate of interest, in addition to operating expenses. The income of the company during the last year was, in round numbers, $1,258,000, which was expended as follows:

Running expenses	$300,000
Interest on indebtedness	287,000
Dividends to stockholders, 8 per cent. on $8,000,000	640,000
	$1,227,000

Leaving a surplus of about $31,000.

A detailed statement of the operating expenses was presented to the committee.

Upon being questioned as to the statement appearing in one of the volumes of the Municipal Reports that the running expenses of the works were only $100,000, the president of the company replied that the statement referred to only covered the office expenses and salaries; that it did not cover all the operating expenses of the works; adding that the estimate of $300,000 per annum for operating expenses was a low one, and that they had amounted to more during the two previous years. The engineer of the company, Mr. Herman Schussler, also stated that it would not be safe to estimate operating expenses at less than $25,000 per month.

Assuming, then, that $300,000 is a proper estimate for operating expenses, and deducting this amount from the total income of the company of $1,258,000, we have $958,000 as the net revenue of the company, which the present rates enable it to collect. This amount, $958,000, is 8 per cent. upon $11,975,000, 9 per cent. upon $10,650,000, and 10 per cent. upon $9,580,000. Are the Spring Valley Water Works worth either of these amounts? If not, the revenue should be diminished, and the rates correspondingly reduced.

What, then, is the value? The solution of this question is attended with considerable difficulty.

A variety of views have been urged before the committee as to the correct mode of ascertaining the value of the works.

MARKET VALUE OF STOCK.

By some it was insisted that the value should be determined by taking the aggregate market value of the stock and adding thereto the bonded indebtedness of the corporation, amounting to $4,000,000. During the examination had by your committee the stock has varied in price in the market from $83 to its present value, $94 per share. If the market value be estimated at $94, this mode of calculation would establish the value of the works of the Spring Valley Water Company at $11,520,000. Others were of the opinion that the market value of the stock is no indication whatever of the value of the works. It appeared by the testimony of Mr. John Perry, Jr., a dealer in bonds and securities, that the stock of the Spring Valley Company since 1875 has fluctuated from $110 to $83 per share. This latter depression, he said, was owing to the adoption of the new Constitution; also, that the stock had always been held as an investment by parties seeking an income on their capital; that seven-eighths of the stock sold passed through his hands, and that very little stock had changed hands at these low prices. He further stated that the action of the Water Commissioners in 1877 affected the stock, and when the commissioners reported in favor of Blue Lakes it sold at $83; that the abandonment of that scheme ended the agitation, and the stock went up to $90 and $95.

It was also shown in favor of this mode of determining value that in London, recently, when it was proposed to condemn the water works there, the authorities provided for taking the property at the market value of the stock, but further inquiry developed the fact that the water companies there were guaranteed an interest of 10 per cent., although the prevailing rate of interest there is from 2½ to 5 per cent. Such a high rate of interest had the effect of making the market value of the stock many times its par value. Therefore this was a liberal measure of valuation there.

The difference between the two cases is, that in London the stock of the water companies has been protected by allowing them a fixed and liberal rate of interest, and consequently the market value of the stock was greater than the value of the works, whilst here the popular impression that the high rates were due to the extortion of the company instead of the unjust system of collecting the entire revenue of the company from the rate-payers only, letting property go free, has produced an agitation of the water question which has depressed the stock below its real value. Although these fluctuations have varied from 110 to 83, certainly the intrinsic value of the water works has not thus fluctuated. We must look, then, to some other standard to measure their value:

PAR VALUE.

By others it was suggested that the works should be valued by taking the par value of the stock and adding thereto the indebtedness, which should make the works worth $12,000,000.

Your committee do not think this furnishes any absolute standard of the true value of the works. As corporations are organized, the value of their property may be either greater or less than the par value of their stock. If the par value of the stock be taken as the measure of value, then that value might be doubled by simply doubling the stock. Thus, for instance, the stock of Spring Valley was doubled in 1876, though the extra $8,000,000 of stock has not been issued. To take either the par value of the present issue, viz., $8,000,000, or the par value of the increased stock, viz., $16,000,000, would in our opinion be arbitrary.

It was also stated that the works had been offered in 1877 to the city for $11,800,000. The officers of the company, however, say that this was unauthorized, and the fact seems to be established that no such offer was authorized by the company. The lowest offer made by the company was $13,250,000. This was made in 1877, and it is claimed by the officers of the company that $500,000 have been since expended on the construction of works. As to the estimate of value based on this offer, the president of the company, in a communication to the board, makes the following statement:

It is true that, in 1877, the company proposed to accept from the city for its property and works the sum of $13,250,000. That proposition was not based on the company's estimate of their value, nor was the sum named at all commensurate with the real value; but it was founded upon the company's preferring to consent to sell on terms involving a loss rather than risk the result of hostility or competition by the city, which might seriously cripple it. It may be as well to remind the committee that a price set upon property when its future was imperiled, by circumstances not necessary to be reviewed here, is something very different from a fair and just valuation of the same property sought to be arrived at for the purpose of establishing by law the revenue of the company. Since that time the company has expended in improvements $300,000.

Your committee can not justly dispute these reasons, for no man is bound by an offer which is not accepted. The offer, it is understood, was made as a reduction of a previous offer made by the company of its works for $16,000,000, and at a time when it was feared that other and more costly schemes would be accepted by the city, which would diminish the value of Spring Valley, and when there was every inducement to compel the company to make its lowest offer.

COST OF WORKS.

As to the cost of works, Jno. F. Pope, a competent expert, has recently made a thorough examination of the books of the company. He submitted an exhibit marked "Exhibit C" as a correct statement of the cost of the works—namely, $18,840,202.37; and stated that the principles upon which the cost was ascertained were correct, and were such as would regulate any business man in estimating such cost. He further stated—

That the different increases of the capital stock of the company substantially conformed to the expenditures made; that the Spring Valley Company was organized June 10, 1858, with a capital of $60,000, which was increased June 16, 1860, to $3,000,000; that the San Francisco City Water Works was organized in August, 1857, with a capital stock of $1,500,000, which was increased June, 1864, to $2,000,000; that these two companies consolidated in February, 1865, with a capital stock of $6,000,000; that the cost of the works of both companies up to that date was $5,551,420.89; that up to that date the Spring Valley Company had paid no dividends, and the San Francisco City Water Works had paid about $60,000, with this exception the receipts of both companies have been invested in the works; that in March, 1868, the capital stock was increased to $8,000,000, cost at that time $7,969,710.39; that in July, 1876, the capital stock was increased to $16,000,000, and that the cost at that date was $16,245,659.30.

Mr. Pope's statement was verified by two bookkeepers, both as to the computations and the principles upon which the cost was ascertained, and by Colonel A. J. Moulder, who stated that he had examined his report, and entirely coincided with the method adopted by him, saying:

In theory, I believe it to be faultless. I discovered several errors, which amounted to $153,825.61, no doubt arising from the haste in which the work was done. The scope and magnitude of the labor would reasonably require some months work, and Mr. Pope's exhibits are remarkably accurate for the time allowed him. I have examined his exhibits, and regard Exhibit C as the correct mode of ascertaining the cost. The cost by that exhibit is $18,840,202.37, less deductions of errors which I have enumerated, amounting to $153,825.61.

As to the estimate of value based on cost, your committee believe that while the cost may be taken as an element in determining the value of the works, yet it does not go to the extent of furnishing an absolute standard, for property may be worth twice as much as it cost, or it may be worth only one-half of what it cost.

COMPARATIVE VALUE.

It was stated by other persons who appeared before the committee—among them Mr. J. D. Walker and Col. Weller—that the true way of ascertaining the value of the Spring

Valley Water Works was to ascertain what it would cost to bring an equal supply from some other source. Upon this subject Col. G. H. Mendell, of the United States Army, who was employed by the late Board of Water Commissioners, and who made an elaborate report to them, stated to your committee—

That it would cost not less than $18,300,000 to construct water works capable of supplying San Francisco with 22,000,000 gallons daily from any other source of supply than Spring Valley. That when Crystal Springs shall be connected with the city at an expenditure of $1,000,000, the Spring Valley Water Works should be able to supply San Francisco with between 19,000,000 and 22,000,000 gallons daily. That the cost of increasing the supply from any other source than from Spring Valley would be much greater than from Spring Valley. That with Calaveras, which he regarded as an indispensable adjunct of Spring Valley, the company could supply the demands of 1,300,000 people. That this estimate was based upon the worst case that could happen—namely, its capacity during two years of drought, when they could not get any water at all in their reservoirs.

The opinion of underwriters who have appeared before us is that Spring Valley affords a system of protection against fires unequalled in this country, and they ask liberal treatment for the company, so as to encourage it in increasing its facilities to protect the city against fire. The evidence is indisputable that the Spring Valley system, as Colonel Mendell terms it, is the natural system of supply for San Francisco; that it possesses great advantages over any other system that could be constructed in cheapness of operation, in efficiency, and in ability to meet the growing requirements of the city; also, in cheapness of increasing the supply. The problem of supplying San Francisco with water was a difficult one. Cities like St. Louis, Philadelphia, and Chicago, on the shores of natural rivers or lakes, have only to run a pipe into the river or lake, construct a distributing system of mains and reservoirs, and the works are complete, and the supply unlimited. San Francisco is situated on a sandy peninsula, far distant from natural streams; the seasons are dry. It was necessary to construct immense artificial lakes, capable of storing three years' supply, and connect them with the city by expensive pipe-lines and aqueducts. The project required great engineering skill, energy, and foresight. The works have, ever since their construction, protected this wooden city from fire.

In view of these facts, your committee believe that the property should be valued as a comprehensive system of water works, constructed for and adapted fully to this particular purpose.

The rule of valuation that applies to all properties is the rule of comparison. If a man wishes to purchase a mill site and mill, he ascertains what similar property, with equal advantages in location, proximity to market, etc., will cost. All property depends upon the purposes for which it is or may be used and adapted for its value, and if it is especially suited to the purpose to which it is put, it has an additional value. If this rule should be applied to the Spring Valley Works, it is demonstrated by Colonel Mendell's statement that they are worth at least $18,399,200, less $1,000,000, the amount necessary to utilize Crystal Springs Lake; but your committee are of the opinion that whilst it can not be claimed that there is no other scheme with the cost of which Spring Valley can be compared—for there are many which are practicable—still, the distance and the difficulties to be overcome in introducing water from other sources are so great that we do not think this standard should be adopted. Yet it should be considered in arriving at a valuation. We have, therefore, from the foregoing, five estimates of the value of the Spring Valley Water Works:

1st.	The market value of the stock, $94 per share, with the debts added, making.....	$11,320,000
2d.	The par value of the stock, with debts added, making.....	12,000,000
3d.	The offer the Spring Valley Company made in 1877, of $13,250,000, to which is to be added $500,000, being the cost of construction since that time.....	13,750,000
4th.	The cost of the works as per Pope's report, verified by Colonel Moulder.....	18,686,376
5th.	The amount that it would cost to introduce 22,000,000 gallons daily into San Francisco from sources of supply other than Spring Valley, as per Colonel Mendell's statement.....	18,399,200
	From which is to be deducted.....	1,000,000
	That being the amount necessary to expend in connecting Crystal Springs Lake with the city, in order to make the supply of Spring Valley equal to 22,000,000 gallons daily. Balance.....	$17,399,200

Which of the foregoing estimates is correct? The fact is, there is no absolute standard of value, and the only way is to take all the estimates named into consideration, and thus arrive at a conclusion as to the value of the works. Your committee are of the opinion that the true value of the works should be fixed at some point between $12,000,000 and $17,000,000, the former sum being too low and the latter too high; but they differ as to the precise value, and deem it unnecessary to fix it, for the reason that their only duty is to ascertain whether or not the present income of the company is unreasonable. Your committee have already assumed that a revenue of between 8 and 10 per cent, upon a fair valuation of the works, in addition to operating expenses, is not unreasonable, and, as we have already shown, the company is at present realizing a net revenue of 8 per cent. upon $11,974,000: 9 per cent. upon $10,650,000, and 10 per cent. on $9,580,000. It appears clearly, then, that neither of these amounts equals even the lowest limit which can be placed upon the value of Spring Valley—viz: $12,000,000.

DISCRIMINATION UNDER OLD LAW.

The next question to determine is, whether the burden is equally apportioned; in other words, whether or not any discrimination exists. Under the law prior to the new Constitution, the company was compelled to furnish water free to the city for all municipal purposes, and during the last 20 years it has collected from the city about $6,000. In other words, the whole burden of the annual cost of supplying San Francisco has fallen on about 18,000 rate-payers, and they have thus paid, not simply for water used for domestic purposes, but also for all the water used by the city in its public squares and parks, for flushing sewers, and protecting all the property in the city against fires. It would certainly be a matter of complaint if any man or set of men should receive water free whilst others were obliged to pay. It is equally unjust that the city should receive water free whilst the 18,000 rate-payers pay the whole income of the company; there is no discrimination more unfair, more unjust. It is a discrimination in favor of the large tax-payer, and against the poor rate-payer.

So self-evident is this discrimination, that of all those who appeared before us, but one upheld the justice of the present system; all the others admitted that the city should pay, but there was one difference of opinion as to what amount should be so paid. A few contended that the city should pay only for the water it actually used, but almost all contended that the city should pay for protection against fires, not simply for the amount of water used to extinguish fires, but for the protection which property received, and which reduced the rates of insurance, it being claimed that the city should pay for water the protection that water gives, just as it pays for lighting the streets or for police protection. By most it was considered that the city should pay at least one-half, and that this payment should be used to reduce the rates to consumers one-half. These views were presented by Claus Spreckels, Esq., whose pecuniary interests would, if he had been influenced by them, led him to a contrary opinion, for his property is in the main supplied by artesian wells, and also by Governor Low, and they were pressed with great vigor by the committee from the Real Estate Protective Association, and by many others.

It is true that Mr. Hancock urged the point that the obligation of the company to furnish water to the city free of charge was a contract, which could not be affected by the new Constitution. But if this be so, then the entire section of the law in question, which provided that the city should have water free, constituted the contract; and as this section also provided that the rates should be fixed by commissioners—two to be appointed by the city, two by the company, and the fifth to be appointed by the four—it follows that, if the law constituted a contract and the Constitution could not change it, then this board has no right to fix the rates at all. Your committee have no hesitation in saying that the law which provided so inequitable a system of apportioning the burden of the water supply ought to have been repealed; and we are advised by the City and County Attorney, and by W. C. Burnett, ex-City and County Attorney, and by the Honorable John F. Swift, that it was repealed by the new Constitution, and that under it the city and county is compelled to pay. To those of our wealthy tax-payers who oppose this view, we have only to state our belief that the continuance of so unjust a system will only result in a clamor for the purchase of water works by the city, with the view of compelling property to pay, as it does elsewhere, almost all the cost of the water supply, thus making the rates to consumers merely nominal. Your committee are not, however, prepared to say that the city should pay so large a proportion as one-half of the annual cost—conceiving that it would be sufficient to fix the city's rates in such a manner as to pay about one-fourth of the annual income of the company, and reduce the rates to consumers to that extent. We have, therefore, fixed the rates for fire-hydrants and for municipal purposes so that they will yield this proportion, and have provided, in the order submitted, that when paid monthly by the city to the company, a reduction of 25 per cent. shall be made upon the bills of consumers for the following month.

CONCLUSIONS.

Your committee beg leave, as the result of their labor, to report the following conclusions: First—That the principle which should govern the regulation of rates is, that the Spring Valley Water Works is entitled, in addition to operating expenses, to a fair rate of interest upon the value of its works. Second—That a fair rate of interest is between 8 and 10 per cent. Third—That the income at present derived from existing rates, after deducting operating expenses, does not equal even 8 per cent. upon the value of the works. Fourth—That the old system of collecting rates, which placed the whole burden upon the rate-payers, is unjust and inequitable, and is the real cause of the great dissatisfaction with the rates. Fifth—That this system has been abolished by the new Constitution, and that, under the new Constitution, the city is compelled to pay for water for all municipal purposes. Sixth—That the rates of the city should be fixed and established as to yield about one-fourth of the revenue of the company, and that the payments made by the city should not increase the revenue of the company, but should be allowed upon existing rates to consumers, so as to reduce the same 25 per cent.

Your committee recommend the final passage of the order introduced by Supervisor Bayley. It establishes more uniform rates than those at present collected by the Spring Valley Company. It takes as a basis the schedule of rates established by the commissioners in 1878, which fixed the rates for family uses only. As the new Constitution requires that the Board of Supervisors should fix the rates for all purposes, the rates for different places of business heretofore collected have been added to the schedule. In it the provision which required an additional charge of twenty-five cents for each member of a family over five is stricken out. The schedule of 1878 fixed a maximum in many cases above the rates actually charged.

From this maximum the proposed ordinance deducts 20 per cent. Under the old schedule the lowest value was $2, with 10 per cent. off, or $1.80. Under the proposed ordinance the lowest rate is $1.60, or $1.20 in case the city pays. It is also provided that the city shall pay $15 per month for hydrants, $500 per month for the Golden Gate Park, and $7,000 for the public buildings.

It is estimated that the city will thus pay about one-fourth of the revenue of the company. It is provided, further, that the amount thus paid by the city shall be applied on the bills of all other consumers for the succeeding month in such manner as shall reduce such bills 25 per cent.

The Chairman's Individual Views.

[The undersigned, chairman of the Committee on Water and Water Supplies, concurs in the majority report, and begs leave to present for the consideration of the board certain individual views which he holds upon the question.]

It is evident from the evidence which has been presented, that the revenue of the Spring Valley Water Works ought not to be reduced, and that the present rates which yield this revenue ought not to be reduced, except by allowing on them the 25 per cent. which the city is to pay the company for water used for municipal purposes under the proposed ordinance. It is true that the company objects to the ordinance introduced by the undersigned, upon the ground that it fixes a maximum below some of the rates now collected, and yet does not permit the rates now collected, where they are below that maximum, to be increased to it. It is claimed that this will reduce the present revenue considerably.

The undersigned, in reply to this, says that it has been his object to establish the rates now actually collected, but as the schedule of the old commissioners was in some cases from 10 to 20 per cent. above the rates actually collected, and the rates within the limits of the schedule varied according to circumstances, it was necessary to reduce the maximum, in order to make the rates as nearly uniform as possible, while it will have the effect of reducing some rates even below the 25 per cent. paid by the city; yet the undersigned is of the opinion that increase of consumers will make up the deficiency. The undersigned is further of the opinion, that while the rates of the proposed ordinance are at present reasonable, and will be so for some time, yet the increase of population will before many years so increase the revenue of the company as to call for a reduction of rates. The income of the company has almost doubled within the past ten years. The great expenditures of the company have been made, and the foundations laid of a system of supply sufficient for the wants of a population of over 1,000,000 of inhabitants; therefore, comparatively small expenditure in the future will be necessary to meet the future wants of our city. Thus, for instance, an expenditure of $1,000,000 additional, in connecting Crystal Springs Lake with the city, will give a supply sufficient for 300,000 more people.

If, then, the population increases during the next ten years as it has during the past, the present rates will, if maintained, largely increase the revenue of the company, and at the end of ten years be double what it now is. It is obvious that such an income will be unreasonable and excessive, and in view of the experience of almost every community as to the aggressive nature of corporate wealth, I deem it just to the community to give now my opinion as to the limit of the revenue of the company, so that when it is reached, the rates may be reduced and kept within a reliable and definite valuation of the property. The question then is, what is a fair limit as to interest and value? The majority were of the opinion that the limit should be between 8 and 10 per cent. I am of the opinion that it should be 9 per cent. Next, as to value, five different estimates are presented in the majority report, the lowest based on the market value of the stock, being $11,320,000, the highest based on cost, being $18,686,376, the conclusion of the committee being that the works were worth more than $12,000,000, and less than $17,399,200.

As stated in the report, there is no exact standard of value. The only way is to take all the estimates into consideration and thus arrive at a conclusion. Taking the five estimates and adding them together, and dividing by five, makes the average $14,671,115. I am therefore of the opinion that $14,500,000 is as low a valuation as should be placed upon this property. To this should be hereafter added such sums as the company may expend in the construction and extension of its works, when future action is necessary. This determines the value and protects the people by preventing a fictitious increase in value of the works, simply based on an increase of revenue, which would certainly be the case in the future if a basis of value is not established.

I am of the opinion, therefore, that the rates fixed in the proposed ordinance should remain as they are, until the income of the company equals an amount sufficient to pay the operating expenses of the company. Nine per cent. on a valuation of $14,500,000, and nine per cent. upon such further sums as the company shall expend hereafter in the construction and extension of its works. The amount so expended can be ascertained every year by the board, and made a matter of record in the Municipal Reports. My belief is, that by thus placing the works of the company upon a fair basis of value, and providing that the increase in population and consumers shall tend toward a reduction of rates, when the income of the company shall equal a certain amount, the increase in the number of consumers will, after the limit has been reached, gradually diminish the rates instead of increasing the revenue of the company. CHARLES A. BAYLEY.

No, Ethel, we don't suppose "clerical kissing" is any worse than the other kind. The worst thing about it seems to be that it is more readily and certainly found out, and people make a greater fuss about it. Kiss your pastor if you wish, and if he wishes it; but, Ethel dear, remember this, although you kiss him never so darkly, in the hall, behind the door, down in the cellar in the dark, down in a coal-mine even, it will be in the papers some time; though never a word will be said about those two times you kissed your Cousin Tom on the front veranda at noon while we all were passing by.

Tompkins dined one day with an aristocratic old lady whose temper was short, and whose face was decorated as are the faces of many aristocratic old women. During the repast, Tompkins was informed that his shirt-bosom was badly stained with wine. "Yes," he said, coolly, "I always spatter my wine." "I never do!" said his hostess, angrily. "Ah! dear madame," said Tompkins, "that is because your mustaches have not yet grown quite so long as mine."

In his Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, Oliver Wendell Holmes aptly styles the work of years thus: "First, the years pelted them with red roses, and set their cheeks all aglow, and then with white roses; then one year threw a snowball at their heads, and the succeeding ones threw more snowballs. Now and then an arrow was let fly and one disappeared from the ranks, till but few remain, and these are no longer called girls, but—"

David Swing, writing in the Alliance, tells a story of Bella Puella Zoe Mou Sas Agapo, a young woman whom he says that he knows. She shelters her plants under Japanese parasols and fans, writes lines from Virgil and Ovid on her cows' horns, has pictures painted on the vegetables, and dresses her milkmaids in maroon and gold. How is that for a bric-a-brac girl?

A pretty little actress settled her advertising bill with a Little Rock newspaper last week by kissing the editor. That was Scriptural—a kiss for a blow. The coin, however, is current in San Francisco.

AN ADVENTURE WITH AN ANTEDILUVIAN.

During the month of July, 1879, while on my way to Sacramento from Los Angeles, I was compelled to wait over at Lathrop one morning from eight o'clock until nearly noon—until the arrival of the Eastern-bound train. Always hungry at meal-stations, and voraciously so upon this occasion, I had made up my mind, even before the arrival of the train which dropped me at Lathrop, to indulge in a repast cooked to order so soon as the regular train-breakfast should have been disposed of by the through passengers for San Francisco and Stockton.

I sat down to my breakfast about half-past nine o'clock, and noticed that plates had been placed for two; and I had hardly seated myself, when I was joined by an elderly-looking gentleman, closely shaved, cleanly and well appareled, who pleasantly said, as he dropped into a chair opposite me:

"I have taken the liberty, my dear sir, if you have no objection, of joining you, this magnificent morning—and especially as the waiter has kindly directed me to a seat near you—in the discussion of an ample modern meal; for, my friend, let me assure you, upon my honor, this is the first time in several thousand years that I have sat down to breakfast with a gentleman. If I am not greatly mistaken, indeed, the last time I appeared my appetite it was with one Noah, a distinguished navigator."

Naturally enough, such a speech elicited my attention, and I looked directly into the old gentleman's face; but I discovered nothing except candor and intelligence therein, and I asked, with an affectation of seriousness:

"Did I understand you, sir, to allude to Noah of sacred history?"

"I referred to that same dear, departed old mariner, with whom I was on terms of exceeding intimacy, and whom I knew as well as I knew Adam, or Moses, or Solomon. It is true that I was well along in years when all of those historical fellows were boys; but I used to run with them, nevertheless. Why, I made the first kite that Methuselah ever flew; and I kicked foot-ball with Cain and Abel in the Garden of Eden. Noah and your humble servant have spent many a night out together, and what Solomon and I didn't know about the erring gender don't grow luxuriantly in any of your quarter-sections of wild oats to-day."

During the progress of this last irreconcilable utterance, I had concluded that I had "pooled issues" with a lunatic, and I kept one eye upon a new carving-knife lying upon my side of the festive board and the other upon the door, fully convinced that the result of the matinée would be a fight or a foot-race. Thinking, however, that some of the railroad boys might have "put up the racket," and had set the old gentleman on, I encouraged the séance by saying:

"Did any of your old comrades have go-as-you-please walking-matches, hop-bitter base-ball clubs, or Pinaf—"

"Sir!" he replied, in accents of unmistakable surprise and indignation; "if you think me crazy, I will depart at once. No gentleman will insult or ridicule a person of my age and erudition," and the distressed relic of the antediluvian period wiped his weeping eyes with the back of an aged hand.

I became somewhat embarrassed; but curiosity overcame my momentary perplexity, and I broke a short and unpleasant silence by calling for a bottle of claret, and requesting the sad-faced pilgrim to join me in a friendly glass of wine. He declared that nothing would give him greater pleasure; and, soon after, the waiter returned and filled two glasses with "Cateau Larose." My companion drank with gusto, and ejaculated, after smacking his withered lips:

"My congenial friend, that wine is as superior as any I ever drank with Noah in his own vineyard, or with Nimrod—when that excellent marksman and your humble servant used to go out after larks."

I was on the point of interrogating my weather-worn companion as to whether he and the other old boys ever went out on larks; but, fearing that he might possibly brain me on the spot, I maintained silence—a silence which the old gentleman quickly broke, by saying:

"As soon as we have concluded our repast, sir, I would like to have a long chat with you. By way of introduction, however, I would respectfully ask you your impression touching the creation of this beautiful world. Do you believe that this world was made in six days, and that Adam was the first man, and that during what fictitious writers call The Flood rain fell incessantly for forty days and forty nights, inundating all creation, and that all human beings except Noah and his family, and all other living creatures except those in the ark, were drowned or were otherwise swept from the face of the earth?"

"I spring from old New England, dyed-in-the-wool puritanical stock," I replied. "I read my Bible daily, and believe all that there is in it. I do not examine the dangerous and polluting writings of Volney, Voltaire, Payne, Draper, Darwin, or Renan, nor do I dare to lend a faithless ear to such heretics and blasphemers as Gladstone, Ingersoll, and Beecher. I prefer that holy book, given me by my dear old mother, to telescopes and augurs and all other paraphernalia of scientific innovation. I believe in no laboratories but hell's, and hope for no perfect bliss except that to be found in Abraham's bosom. I—"

"You're about as clean gone as any maniac I've seen since the cunning Iscariot sold his Master on a margin!"

"Pardon me, sir; I will come to the point at once: I do believe that this beautiful world and all that in it is was made in six days, and that Adam was the first man; and that, on one occasion, God, in a great fit of anger, ruthlessly destroyed all that he had made except Noah and his family and two birds and two beasts and two rattlesnakes and two musquitos and two fleas and two flies, et hoc genus omne, two of each kind, for breeding purposes."

"You do?"

"I do!"

"Then you are a first-class idiot!"

"Thank you!"

"It is not necessary," he said, quickly. "However, if you do not wish to listen to one who knows it all, without getting angered, then we had better drink to each other's health and separate."

"Ob, dear, I could not think of letting you go," I exclaimed. "I am getting interested in you. Go on, and I will keep perfectly cool and—"

"Well, then, why was it not just as feasible for the Creator to have made all of these living things over again, if he at one time made them with such ease and perfection as you give him credit for? If it is pleasant for you to believe that the Supreme Ruler of the universe—He who pencils the flowers and marks the constellations—did so far forget Himself, in His inexcusable anger, as to destroy His matchless handiwork, is it possible that he selected a few wretched human beings, a score or two of worthless animals, and a collection of repulsive insects and reptiles as spectators and survivors of so grand a catastrophe?"

I was still all astonishment. I did not know whether to assume an air of seriousness or levity, and laughingly replied:

"Let me assure you, my dear sir, that I am not clever in guessing conundrums."

This facetious declaration of mine came near inciting a riot, as I first thought, for the old man turned as red as blood, in the face, and quickly sprang to his feet, while I seized simultaneously the handle of the carving-knife and got ready for action. But I was entirely mistaken, for he said, after rising, pleasantly:

"Let us go and take seats in the bar-room." Which we at once did; and subsequently we moved out of the sitting-room and took chairs on the platform.

As soon as we got satisfactorily located, the old gentleman resumed:

"Now, sir, would you like to have me relate a story from the very beginning down to the present time? Would you like me to present an accurate and detailed account of the commencement and growth of what we call the world—or, to speak more scientifically, the growth of our planet, from its gaseous birth in space through its process of assimilation, its dark Plutonian periods, its glacial epochs, its terms of aqueous, ferocious, reptilian, and mammiferous life to the time when humanity began, some few thousands of years ago?"

I became greatly interested, and, while I hardly knew what to say, responded:

"My good friend, I do not entirely understand you. If I intelligently comprehend the tenor of your interrogatories, I should reply by saying that there are no materials for such a sketch. I am quite convinced that—"

"Monuments," he said, "exist, by which science has been enabled to mark with surprising probability—and accuracy, indeed—the stages of the creative drama; forming a picture in outline, as it were, against infinite space, which, by reason of its very distance, resolves its lines into an apparent juxtaposition sufficient for comprehension."

This utterance was made rapidly, and I became more and more interested as the old gentleman warmed up; and he grew merry as well as warm—grew as merry as the poor, happy little "Reyna Coquina" of the Alhambra; and again interrogated:

"Do you believe, sir, that Deucalion made man by throwing stones over his shoulder? that Jupiter's head burst open to give birth to Minerva? that Venus was born one fine morning of the sea-foam? that nothing stopped Saturn eating his own children but cracking his teeth one day on a stone? that Pegasus flew to heaven without a rider?"

Again I was amazed! This violent departure from antediluvian scenes, this scornful raid upon mythological deities, again aroused my suspicions that all was not right. I thought, however, that I would give my eccentric friend one more chance, even if he pitched into Æsop and La Fontaine, and ended off by extinguishing the lamp of Aladdin, and smashing the slipper of Cinderella. But he proceeded no further with his erratic tergiversations; indeed, right at this point he gathered himself up for a tremendous scientific effort, and said:

"I will commence with the Primitive Epoch, and propose statements and calculations in support of the gaseous, or nebulous, theory of the earth's formation, showing that at the inconceivable heat of 195,000° Centigrade, which is received as the mean temperature of the interior of the earth, our planet could have been, at the first, only a vast puff of vapor eighteen hundred times as large as its present bulk. Among the agencies which would operate in its condensation, its passage in its great circuit through the frigid planetary intervals, where the temperature, according to the best scientific information of the present day, can not be less than 100° below zero, must by no means be forgotten. This would gradually form the crust of the earth, which now, by some thirty miles of thickness only, holds us out of the incandescent horrors below. Just think of it! At the same time, the molten mass, operated upon by the attraction of the sun and moon—as it still is, though now so much spent that it only issues volcanically in its throes—would rush up in great waves when the crust was thinner, not only forming those immense wedges of primitive granite which erect themselves in many of the mountain ranges of America and elsewhere, but many of those irregular stratifications which make the sections of rocky deposits look like huge agates for a Titan's ornaments. These eruptive rocks are called Plutonic and volcanic—the former including the granites and the kindred compact rocks formed far below the surface, and cooled under great pressure; and the latter, including trachytes, basalts, and lavas, which are of looser texture, and have cooled nearer to, and upon, the surface. By the way, my friend, and of this you are probably aware, there are about three hundred volcanoes on our planet more or less active, a number of which, when you for a moment pause to consider what they serve to vent, no one will be disposed to grudge, however wide a berth be may wish to give them."

"Go on, my friend," I said, as the old gentleman drew in a long breath, "I am very much interested."

"The next great epoch," he continued, "is the Transition—"

"Proceed with the Transition scene; I am all attention."

"When light began to pierce through the deep mists of the exhaling and condensing atmosphere, and the mollusks and primitive vegetables came to life."

"Proceed, sir."

"This epoch is divided into four periods. The Silurian period—isolated projections only, beginning to gather around the accumulation which slowly formed the land divisions of the present time; shallow and extended seas, under which reefs and rocks were rising, a dim light above, and the simplest forms of vegetable and crustaceous life. In the Devonian (or old red sandstone) period, all things had perceptibly changed and advanced."

"How do you know of all this?" I involuntarily asked.

"I know of all this because I was one of the first men on earth," he replied.

"You were not living at the age of which you speak?"

"No; but when I first had my being, the foot-prints of time were fresher than they are to-day, and yet your own scientific men will tell you almost as much as I can. Please don't interrupt me so often. Whatever I tell you are truths of my own knowledge and research, and science and study will corroborate all I say. I'll make you ashamed of yourself before I get through with you, my young friend."

"Well, don't get mad, now, old man; proceed with your chronology, and I won't interrupt you again."

"Well, then, as I said before, during the Devonian period all things had changed and advanced; the primitive Tribolites, with their four hundred-faced eyes, of whose remains whole quarries were formed, had given way to more perfectly articulated creatures; vertebrate life, as represented by a considerable variety of fishes, also appeared; there had been as yet no forests, but now they began to show themselves—first in the shape of gigantic ferns, then in asparagus trees, from forty to ninety feet in height, thus introducing the marvelous carboniferous era, which is divided into sub-periods—those of carboniferous limestone and of the coal measures. These periods were of unknown and incalculable lengths; it is estimated that one hundred and twenty-two thousand four hundred years would be required to form only sixty feet of coal. The astonishing character of these calculations appear when you bear in mind, young man, that the coal measures in Wales are twelve thousand feet by actual trial. The characteristics of this period of wonderful provision for the latter ages were excessive heat and humidity, and an equal and high temperature throughout the world. Owing to the inward heat there was no perceptible climatic difference between the poles and the equator; vegetation grew with a rankness and a rapidity that baffles conception; but there were as yet no birds, no mammals, no saurians; one or two muddy reptiles of small size appear—the principal of which is the Archegosaurus minor, a queer thing with a head like a pointed shovel. The Permian period was similar in its characteristics, but progressive; a few vegetable and animal species being added—among the latter of which may be noted the Productus horridus, a nightmare abortion of slimy fertility."

The gentleman again drew a long breath, and I hazarded an opinion, thus:

"This general epoch unquestionably corresponds to that Second Day, as recorded in sacred history, in which God said, 'Let there be light'—the influence of the sun being gradually admitted through the reluctantly-subsiding elemental conflicts of many years."

His only reply was:

"Many years? Many millions of years!"

And again he proceeded:

"Now comes the Secondary Epoch—divided into the Triassic, the Jurassic, and the Cretaceous periods. This epoch introduces many kinds of forest trees, reptiles of appalling size, form, and strength, and crustaceans in such numbers that the greater part of the earth's surface is covered with them, and much of its substance composed of their calcareous remains. The salt and chalk rocks were found—the latter being composed almost entirely of minute crustaceans, as the analysis of any bit of chalk powder under the microscope indicates. The Secondary Epoch is the most marvelous of the chapters of creation. Here are the great saurians—the Nothosaurus, the Ichthyosaurus, the terrible Pleiosaurus, and the dreadful Pterodactylus, to see only whose bones chills the blood. It was an epoch of ferocious terror. These creatures are found in fossil, with the remains of their own species, as well as of others, within them, as they were overtaken in acts of carnage. Their conflicts in the midst of convulsions of nature must have been fearful. Pleiosauri and Ichthyosauri of prodigious proportions filled the seas. Innumerable ammonites floated on the surface of the water—the nautili of those days—some of them three and four feet in diameter. Turtles and crocodiles of tremendous size crowded about the shores. The pressure of the atmosphere was diminished, the earth was less hot—something like climate was establishing itself. Vegetation increased in forest forms, the palms and other trees appeared; and at last, in the Upper Oolite division of the Jurassic period, the first bird was discovered—the famous bird of Solenhofen—the feet and feathers of which have been found in the lithographic quarries of the present age. A few other birds appeared in the latter part of this epoch, in the Cretaceous period, so-called, because the rocks deposited by the sea during the process are almost entirely composed of carbonate of lime from remains of shell-fish. In this period the great terrestrial saurians, the Iguanodon and Megalosaurus, appeared, preparing the way in the uniformly progressive processes of nature for the gigantic mammals which were next to grace the swelling scene."

Taking advantage of a momentary pause, I asked the old gentleman if he would not go inside and take a glass of wine, or something stronger, to which he replied:

"The theme cramps my time—I can not stop."

"Proceed, then," I said, "I am all attention."

"The Tertiary Epoch follows, with the mighty Pachyderms. Just observe, my friend, the course of nature: In the Primitive Epoch—chaos, convulsions, darkness; in the Transition—ferns, fishes, light; in the Secondary—trees, succulents, reptiles; now, in the Tertiary, the whole face of the earth blooms, and the mammals rule supreme—not few nor small, but in countless numbers and of great size. Of the saurians and other reptiles we have only fossil remains; but of the mammals, some have come down almost to your own time, preserved in Siberian ice, in the skin and sinews which they had in life. There are three divisions of the Tertiary Epoch—the Eocene, Miocene, and Pliocene—indicating by their etymology that they are more or less remote from the Beginning and from the Present. There were plants in these periods which are still represented upon earth. The horse, too, appeared; though, singularly enough, smaller than yours; and the mammoth, the remains of which you have seen in your museums. The mammals, trees, and flowers now only found within the tropics, flourished in those periods, in what are termed the northern parts of our globe, showing surprising differences of temperature between those days and yours. A great variety of these large-framed mammals, which fed upon antediluvian forests, have been discovered. Of these the Paleotherium magnum, constructed from many fossils, by Cuvier; the Xiphodon gracilis, for which you are indebted to the same great naturalist; the Dinotherium, the Mastodon gigantum, found in North America in 1705, but fully collected and erected in 1801, by Peale; and the Sivaltherium, or four-horned stag, about as large as a modern-sized elephant, are among the more important. It is probable that at the close of the Pliocene period the great landed divisions of the world—Europe and Asia especially—had gained very nearly their present outline.

"I should think that your—"

"Don't interrupt me! I now come to the Quaternary Epoch, which is distinguished by a series of European deluges; by the Glacial period, and by the appearance of man and the subsequent Asiatic deluge. This epoch is divided into the Past Pliocene, and the Present (or upper) Pliocene periods. It is the era of the Mammoth (Elephas primigenius) whose skeleton stands for wonder in the St. Petersburg Museum, grandly rescued from Siberian ice; of the colossal Spelæan bear, tiger, and hyena; of the prodigious edentata—the Megatherium, which burrowed in the earth, with limbs that could tear up the roots of great trees like thread; and the Megylonyx and Mylodon, all of America. Of the deluges, there were two before the Asiatic, distinctly marked by the deluvium which appears north of the fortieth and fiftieth parallels in Europe and America, and in the corresponding southern hemisphere, but is entirely absent from the equatorial regions. This consists of sand and clay, mingled with fragments of rock, angular and rounded. The greater and lesser boulders, and the solitary erratic blocks—some of immense size—scattered throughout the regions, with the marks of glacial and other abrasion, furnish the abundant proofs upon which your geologists rely. These deluges were the results of great convulsions. The first occurred in the north of Europe, and was caused by the upheaval of the mountains of Norway. The second was caused by the rising of the Alps, and inundated the valleys of Germany, Italy, and France. A great destruction of organic life ensued, but the devastation was nothing to what followed: there came a reign of snow and ice, the cause of which, even up to the present age of science and reason, almost completely baffles conjecture and investigation, but which seems to have denuded Europe, and probably all the corresponding belt of the world, with the region north to the pole, equally of vegetable and animal life. The Asiatic deluge, which occurred a long time after the appearance of man, and of which you have somewhat fictitious accounts in your so-called sacred histories, and which is now generally acknowledged to have been local instead of universal in its scope, was occasioned by the upheaval of a part of the long chain of mountains which diverges from the Caucasus. Mount Ararat—"

"Upon which the ark rested?"

"Upon which the ark rested! What are you giving me, young man? Mount Ararat, sir, is itself the monument of this convulsion!"

The old gentleman at this juncture indulged in a lengthy pause, as if he had concluded; and I was about to go for him on earthquake theories, when he continued:

"With but thirty miles of precarious crust between you and the internal fires, the approach to which is attested by a uniform increase of temperature of a degree for every sixty feet you penetrate; with the atmospheric and volcanic changes which are continually working their recondite results—with the progress—"

"Here he is!" "Here he is!" shouted a couple of men; and simultaneously they rushed up to where we were sitting, and secured my companion.

I was amazed at this strange performance, and asked: "What are you doing—what do you want?"

"We want this d—d lunatic!" said one of them.

"He escaped from the asylum yesterday," added the other. And they hand-cuffed him, and took him back to Stockton.

SAN FRANCISCO, May, 1880.

It is said that Eugénie, widow of the third Napoleon, during her journey to or from the place in South Africa where her son was killed, will touch at St. Helena, the prison-house of the great Napoleon. Her melancholy mission will thus vividly recall the terrible misfortunes of the Bonapartes. Even the brightest of their triumphs were scarcely more brilliant than the circumstances under which the mortal careers of the first and fourth Napoleons closed were mournful. The mighty conqueror chained to a barren rock, and becoming a prey to one of the most insatiable and painful of diseases, and the young prince, in falling the victim of a band of savages, culminated careers resplendent with the brightest hopes that ever entranced the human imagination amid the most gloomy surroundings that can well be conceived.

A smart young man asked a gentleman from Cape Cod, "What's the difference between you and a clam?" thinking that the Cape Codger would say he didn't know, and then the young man would pity him for not being able to see any difference between himself and a clam; but the thing didn't work. The Codger took the young man and swept a path across the street with him, and then, after crowding him into an empty fish-barrel and yanking him out again, said: "A clam wouldn't be playing with you in this way. That's the difference 'twixt me and a clam." The young man had no more questions to ask.

The Mother Goose parol has not yet been devised, and the reign of the good old lady is at present comparatively limited. Now, how would a picture of "Over the hills and far away" do for a girl living at the Highlands? A wicked man suggests: "There was a little guinea pig," as a good subject for his wife's skill, and promises to take a long walk with her when she has embroidered a parol with it.

"Honesty is the best policy," but too many people claim that they can not afford the best of anything.

INTAGLIOS.

My Old Love.

My old love, whom I loved not,
Is this your friendly hand?
Your voice with a tremble in it
None else could understand?
My old love, whom I loved not!
After so many years,
Parting in silence and in pain,
To meet with smiles, not tears.

My old love, whom I loved not,
Do you regret—not I!
That all died out which best were dead,
All lived which could not die?
Till at the last we met here,
And elaps long empty hands,
Keeping our silent secret safe,
Which no one understands.

You will leave a name behind you—
A life pure, calm, and long;
But mine will fade from human ear
Like a forgotten song.
You have lived to smile serenely
Over a grief long done;
You will die with children round your bed,
But I shall die alone.

O kind love, whom I loved not!
O faithful, firm, and true!
Did one friend linger near my grave,
I think it would be you.
Could I wish one heart to hold me
A little, unforgotten,
I think 'twould be that heart of yours,
My love—whom I loved not!
—Dinah Muloch Craik.

A Boon.

I bring the flower you asked of me,
A simple bloom, nor bright nor rare;
But like a star its light will be
Within the twilight of your hair.

And though it breathed its small perfumes
So low it did not woo the bee,
Exalted, how it shines and blooms
Above all flowers since worn by thee.

And thus the song you bade me sing
May be a rude and artless lay,
And yet it grew a sacred thing,
To bless me on life's dusty way.

And unto this, my humble strain,
How much of beauty shall belong,
If thou wilt in thy memory deign
To wear my simple flower of song.
—Thomas Buchanan Read.

The Kiss and Flower of Love.

But once to feel my loved one's kiss I fain
Upon his lip would fall a flake of snow,
Though in the self-same moment I were doomed
To perish of its glow.

But nay, as snow, cold, biting, I would hurt him,
And he would smile at my untimely death.
Oh, better far I were a little rosebud,
Rich of its fragrant breath.

Sun-stolen hues and Eden-borrowed graces,
Gathered to bloom and wither on his bosom;
For then might he, regretting past delights,
Bemoan the faded blossom.
—Felicita.

A Farewell.

My fairest child, I have no song to give you,
No lark could pipe to skies so dull and gray;
Yet, ere we part, one lesson I can give you
For every day.

Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever;
Do noble things, not dream them all day long;
And so make life, death, and the vast forever
One grand, sweet song.
—Charles Kingsley.

At the Stile.

The leaves are growing ruddy as the sun begins to dip,
The birds are twitting forth their even-song;
Little Lucy sits expectant, with her finger at her lip—
What makes her sister Alice stay so long?
There are butterflies and dragon-flies all ready to be chased,
There are daisy-chains to weave, there are blackberries to taste,
Why not play about the meadows for a while?
Why linger, linger, linger at the stile?

Impatient little Lucy is a simple-witted mite—
Her sweetheart days are future joys, 'tis clear;
Why should Harry keep his arm around her sister's waist so tight?
Why make her blush by whispering in her ear?
The sun will soon be setting—Lucy does not love the dark;
She does not love the silent bats that flit across the park;
Since he met her, Alice might have walked a mile—
Why linger, linger, linger at the stile?

This dialogue, small Lucy, which seems tedious as you tarry,
To Alice is a rather serious thing;
For it means that she and Harry have this evening vowed to marry;
It means a cake, lace veil, and wedding ring.
And when a little brides-maid, uncommonly like you,
Comes into church so trippingly, all dressed in white and blue,
You'll discover, as you reach the middle aisle,
Why they lingered, lingered, lingered at the stile.
—Anon.

The Blessed Love of Nature.

Good Lord! it is a gracious boon for a thought-crazed wight like me
To smell again these summer flowers beneath this summer tree!
To suck once more, in every breath, their little souls away,
And feed my fancy with fond dreams of youth's bright summer day,
When, rushing forth like untamed colts, the reckless, truant boy
Wandered through green woods all day long, a mighty heart of joy.

I'm sadder now—I have had cause; but oh! I'm proud to think
That each pure joy-fount, loved of lore, I yet delight to drink—
Leaf, blossom, blade, hill, valley, stream, the calm, unclouded sky,
Still mingle music with my dreams, as in the days gone by.
When summer's loveliness and light fall round me dark and cold,
I'll bear indeed life's heaviest curse—a heart that hath waxed old!
—William Motherwell.

LES INCOMPREHENSIBLES.

By Victor Hugo.

BOOK I.

A man sat on a picket fence.
Picket fences were invented by Charlemagne, and improved upon by Charles II. of England.
Still the man sat on the fence.

BOOK II.

The fence surrounded a tall, gloomy building. The building had shutters at the window. The man was a Frenchman. There were other Frenchmen in the same neighborhood. They were in bed. Frenchmen were discovered by Oliver Cromwell, and subsequently patented by the author. It was night. It was a dark night. Darkness is a shadow that rises from the ground when the sun goes down. The man on the fence was thinking. His name was Lippiatt.

BOOK III.

Lippiatt loved Maronette. Maronette was a girl. She knew Lippiatt. She did not know that Liappiatt loved her. Maronette lived in the gloomy house. Lippiatt did not tell Maronette that he loved her. He was contented to sit on the fence in front of her house. He was a quiet man. He was a tailor. A tailor is one who promises to have your clothes done Saturday, and then brings them round week after next.

Lippiatt was poor. All heroes are poor.

BOOK IV.

Maronette opened a window and shied an old book at Lippiatt.

"Is that you, Lippiatt?" she said.

"Yes," said Lippiatt.

Maronette laughed.

"My father says I must marry the man who will bring him the Norwegian maelstrom," said Maronette.

Lippiatt got off the fence and walked away.

BOOK V.

Like all tailors in France, Lippiatt was a good sailor. He stole a boat and started for Norway. A fearful storm came on. Great, grasping hands of darkness reached down to snatch him.

Lippiatt only laughed.

BOOK VI.

In four days Lippiatt arrived at the maelstrom.

"It is for Maronette," said he.

The maelstrom is shaped like a funnel. The lower end is at the bottom. The mouth is at the top. It is caused by the tides. The Norwegians suppose it is caused by a hole in the earth. Lippiatt knew better.

He went down into the maelstrom and fastened a rope around the lower end. To this rope he adjusted blocks and pulleys. Then he climbed out of the pit, and fastened the other end of the rope to the mast-head. The blocks gave him a purchase.

He rested.

BOOK VII.

Having rested, Lippiatt pulled on the rope. He pulled the maelstrom inside out. The bottom was then at the top. Lippiatt drove a staple into it and fastened his line. Then he set sail. The maelstrom followed.

"I shall marry Maronette," he said.

BOOK VIII.

Another man sat on the picket fence. It was Goudenay. Goudenay loved Maronette. Maronette loved Goudenay.

Goudenay saw something coming in the harbor.

"What is that?" he asked.

It looked like an inverted funnel. It was a thousand feet high.

"I don't know," said Maronette.

She was right. She didn't.

BOOK IX.

Lippiatt disembarked. He took the maelstrom on his shoulders. Then he went to the gloomy house. He hung the maelstrom on the picket.

"How do you do, Goudenay?" he asked.

He knew Goudenay. He had disappointed him about some trousers.

"I am happy," said Goudenay; "I am going to marry Maronette."

Lippiatt looked at Maronette.

"Yes," she said, "I marry Goudenay this morning."

BOOK X.

Lippiatt went to the wedding.

He gave Maronette a silver card-receiver.

Maronette smiled.

Lippiatt went back to the picket fence. He ate the maelstrom up.

BOOK XI.

As the wedding party went home they saw a dead body lying beside the picket fence. The point of the maelstrom was sticking out of his mouth.

"Good gracious!" said Maronette.

"Holy smoke!" exclaimed Goudenay. It

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1880.

When our readers shall find themselves perusing this—on Saturday—we shall be rushing through the broad cornfields of Illinois, chained to the iron horse, on our way to the great national Republican Sanhedrim that once in four years, and for now these twenty years past, has moulded the political affairs of the nation and given direction to its destinies. There have existed within our Government, ever since its formation, two great political organizations; changing somewhat from time to time—changing in personnel as generations pass on—changing in name, by caprice or otherwise—changing in principles, as the growth and development of the nation make such changes necessary. Two political parties have divided between themselves the control of the country since its birth. They emerged from out the revolutionary war, and they contested between them the formation of States. They have from time to time divided upon such questions as finance, internal improvements, revenue, protection, the acquisition of foreign territory, the regulation of domestic institutions, the sovereignty of States, and the interpretation of the Constitution. At a later period, they divided upon the questions of the reconstruction of States in rebellion, and the extent of authority that can be rightfully exercised by the Central Government at Washington. We recall no former instance in the history of the country when, at the call and assembling of a national convention, there was not some great, some moving question agitating public opinion. At times the nation has been stirred to its profoundest depths. Once the convention assembled on the eve and in the dark shadow of a civil war. Once again it assembled when the contending armies of a disunited people confronted each other on battle-fields.

Now, as we take our departure for Chicago, what are our reflections? Going two thousand miles, at our own expense, upon a vain errand; to take an insignificant part in a pre-arranged programme; bound hand and foot, head and conscience, in cast-iron instructions of "first, last, and all the time," for an impossible candidate; forming one of a noisy multitude, to sit dumb and voiceless before a presiding officer instructed to recognize no one of the minority; compelled to assent to resolutions already prepared; compelled to acclaim a candidate already nominated; and then demanded, by the usages of party, to accept a result one had no part in achieving, and to work and vote for a candidate that one's conscience, intelligence, and patriotism can not approve. Such is our attitude as we go whirling, and such will be our reflections as we steam through lovely valleys and across rich plains bending with corn and grain. We are carrying instructions from our State that give it no voice in the selection of a President. We feel the humiliation of knowing that the majority of the Republicans of the Pacific Coast, the majority of the Republicans of the nation, have been outwitted by the politicians who live upon them. We feel, and know, that a score of intriguing partisans, controlling the machinery of party organization, have defeated the expression of an honest popular opinion, and have stifled the voice of the rank and file of the party; that they are endeavoring to put upon us an administration that will not take council of the higher and better sentiments of national patriotism; that will not call around it the purer and better men of the republic. We know that here in our State a gang of greedy men, hungry for office—unprincipled party mendicants, starving for opportunity to steal—will, in the event of Grant's election, march in upon us with all the swaggering insolence of conscious party favor. Of this business we are a part—an insignificant and unimportant part, it is true; but nevertheless we form a cog in the machinery that will move forward its duty when set in motion by the party engineers.

If we act in an independent manner, and exercise our individual judgment—if we protest against being a mere cog in this revolving machinery, and undertake to assert any opinion of our own in the choice of a Presidential candidate, or do not cheerfully abide the result—we shall, upon our return, be set upon by every yelping cur in the Republican pack, who, like the dogs that licked the sores of Lazarus, feed off the crumbs that fall from the official table. We shall be denounced as bolter, sore-head, and malcontent by all the buzzing flies that swarm around custom-house, post-office, internal revenue, and mint. Blooming patriots of the ward clubs will be indignant at our treachery. We can not help it. Ours is a sincere and honest conviction that it is dangerous to the welfare of our nation that its traditions in respect to a third Presidential term should be changed. We may not believe that General Grant can succeed in revolutionizing this Government from a republic to one monarchical in form; we do not undertake to say that he would endeavor to establish a dynasty in order that his son might succeed him; but we do honestly fear that political power which is now strong enough to plant a military chieftain at the head of our Government, in defiance of an almost universal belief that he is not, and in his last term of office was not, a success in civil administration. If, by the politicians, the money, the banks, and the corporations, he may now be nominated in defiance of popular will, we ask what shall hinder him from again succeeding at the end of four years, aided by more than one hundred thousand men in office?—and again, and yet again, and as often as the constitutional period shall come around?—till finally the administration shall be strong enough to defy the will of the people, dispense with the ballot, and proclaim the empire. There was never a time in the history of this nation when there was so little necessity for departing from constitutional traditions. The nation was never more prosperous. It is at peace with all the world: It has no cloud of danger on the domestic horizon. The policy of President Hayes has worked well at the South—quiet, order, and prosperity reign there. Our finances were never in a better condition. All parties are very nearly in accord upon all leading political questions.

As a question of party policy, we do not think the nomination of General Grant wise or expedient. From a great, triumphant, national majority, our party shrunk under his administration till the Democracy became dominant in Congress, held a majority in the Senate, and the South became solid in its opposition. State after State, North and South, swung out of line, till, in the last Presidential election, Rutherford B. Hayes, a compromise candidate, representing all the strength of the Republican party, received a quarter of a million of votes less than his opponent; tied the electoral college; and finally became President by an expedient so questionable and so dangerous that we pray the country may be spared the recurrence of a similar peril. If it is desirable that the Republican party continue in power—and there are very many good Republicans who think it would not be a calamity to see the administration pass out of its control—then it is necessary to nominate a popular candidate, and one who would unite all the elements of party strength. Leaving the higher questions of General Grant's fitness for the place, not questioning the integrity of his second administration, not now considering the third-term proposition, can General Grant get as many votes as any other respectable candidate? Would not Mr. Blaine, or Mr. Washburne, or Judge Edmunds, or Mr. Secretary Sherman arouse less antagonisms, and bring out a stronger party vote? If Governor Tilden, whom we regard as the weakest of Democratic candidates, should oppose General Grant, is there a Democrat in the nation who voted for him before that would not vote for him again? Are there not thousands upon thousands of Republicans who voted for General Grant twice before that would not vote for him a third time? Would not many Republicans abstain from voting in the event of a contest between Grant and Tilden? How would it be if Seymour, or Thurman, or Bayard were nominated by the Democracy? Are there not thousands and tens of thousands of Republicans who would quietly cast their votes for either one of these eminent Democratic statesmen in opposition to General Grant? The rank and file of the Republican party is intelligent, observant, and reflective. It is not unmindful of its past party history. In other States, as in this, it has observed that the keys to the kitchen and housekeeping department were in the hands of men entirely vile. In California, it has been true that no gentleman could approach the administration except by the favor of a band of political freebooters. It sees three great politicians in three great States manipulating a national convention by every art and trick known to party intrigue. It knows that a great majority of the Republicans of Pennsylvania do not desire Grant to be nominated. It knows that New York was carried by means not transparently honest. It knows that the result in Illinois comes from a successful intrigue. It knows that a great proportion of the Grant strength comes from States that can not cast a Republican electoral vote. It knows that Grant has been hippodromed around the world for political effect. It knows that the "boom" was sheet-iron thunder, and that the whole business has been for stage effect, and a hollow party pretense. It knows that all this "strong man" pretext is a pretext, and if there is anything in it, it embodies an idea suggestive of danger to republican government. It knows that the best and purest men of the nation, the ablest and most independent journals of the country, look with anxiety and alarm upon the nomination of General Grant, and it knows that every political party rat and rat-catcher and rat-catcher's dog is enlisted in the intrigue that now for four years has been at work to make him President of the United States for the third time.

We carry our privilege of opposing the nomination of a candidate up to the hour of the convention. This is our last opportunity of observation. When next we write upon the editorial page of this journal the nominations of both parties will probably have been made, the issues will have been formed, the helligerents will have been marshaled in the line of battle. There will be presented a new condition of things. General Grant may or may not be nominated. Tilden may or may not be the Democratic candidate. We shall be at liberty then to take new observations, to look around us. It will then be our privilege to fall in on one side or the other of this great peaceful conflict for party and political supremacy. We shall hope it may be where nearly all our life has been spent—side by side with those political and party friends for whose opinions we have great respect and in whose patriotism we have entire confidence. It may be that we shall be driven to that meanest of all political corners—to choose between the least of two political evils. We shall not sbirk, nor dodge, nor endeavor to be neutral. We shall hope not to be unfair nor dishonest in stating the political position, or in the arguments we shall base upon it. Already we observe that the ward clubs—those that are composed of office-holders and office-seekers—are making preparations to hold meetings of ratification. No matter who is nominated, he will be ratified by these hungry party rats, who are already smelling out the provender of the party crib. At the first click of the telegraph, bonfires will be lighted and torches grasped. At all the corner-groceries good hands of "cinch," "pedro," and "pitch seven-up" will be dropped, and the patriots of the wards will rush to their club-rooms, and rendezvous at Union Hall, to listen to speeches already prepared, with the Presidential nominee's name in blank. This rule of supporting the candidate, whoever he may be, is regarded as the highest evidence of party allegiance. "Any Republican, however vile, is better than any Democrat, however good," is a paraphrase of that old Democratic doctrine formulated by Governor Weller when he proclaimed that he "would support a Democrat in preference to a Whig, if he was a professional gambler, dealing a hogging game." This class of party men is confined to those who hold or desire office. In the city of San Francisco they are numbered by thousands. Their clamor seems to be enthusiasm, and when the machine gets them fairly into action it seems as though the boom was a natural whoop-up and the manufactured yavp spontaneous political emotion. There is another class—and we must be pardoned if we think it the better one—that has opinions of its own; that thinks, and, after thinking, acts; its every member regards himself as an independent citizen, entitled to the formation and expression of an individual opinion; he wants no office, seeks no place of emolument; he asks no party favor; he may not belong to a ward club; he does not play "cinch," "pedro," or "pitch seven-up" for beer or gin at the corner-grocery; he looks upon himself as a responsible member of society, charged with the performance of grave political duties, from the exercise of which he will never allow himself to be driven. With this class of Republicans we desire to act. We are not prepared to admit that General Grant has as yet secured his nomination; we are not yet prepared to admit that fraud has triumphed and that party machine trickery has defeated the will of the Republican majority in Republican States. The battle has not yet been fought in convention; there is many a hard blow yet to be given and taken before the victory shall have been won; and if the convention is a deliberative one, where free debate is permissible, we shall be surprised if there is not music in the air before the Republican hosts shall have crossed the Rubicon with Caesar at its head.

The Sacramento Record-Union—whose Republicanism can not be questioned—in a well-reasoned and temperate editorial, thus discourses of General Grant and his candidacy:

There is a strongly marked and firm determination in many quarters not to accept Grant as a candidate, and we entertain no doubt that this determination will be held to unflinchingly. The fact, therefore, must be fully recognized that the nomination of Grant will be the signal for such a break in the Republican ranks as has never occurred before, and that this break will take place at a time when every Republican vote is needed to make victory at the polls possible. The Grant managers apparently have it in their power now to put their programme through, but they do not possess the power to make the Republican masses endorse their policy; and, as the case stands, this really involves the whole outcome of the campaign. The party could never so ill afford to lose votes as this year; yet if Grant is nominated it may be said that it was never so certain to lose them. It is difficult to understand how those who desire the Republican party successful can approve a course which is on its face so hopeless as that now being pursued. It may be alleged that the indications of disaffection are exaggerated, but our observation does not warrant that view. On the contrary, we think the opposition to Grant in many of the Eastern States is far stronger and deeper than has yet appeared, and that consequently the nomination of a third candidate threatens to produce a disruption which will at once be seen to be fatal to all hopes of success for the regular nominee. This is the present outlook, and we see no probability of its modification. It is, of course, equally useless to advise or complain at such a juncture, but it is impossible not to realize that the whole Grant movement has been an extraordinary piece of infatuation."

If General Grant shall be forced upon the party as its candidate, what course will those journals which are now opposing him pursue? What can they do? Will their editors eat dirt—go in the country—travel in Europe? What will the Sacramento Record-Union, the Chicago Tribune, Cincinnati Commercial, Cincinnati Gazette, Ohio State Journal, Indianapolis Journal, New York Tribune, New York Evening Post, Brooklyn Union, Springfield Republican, Boston Journal, Boston Transcript, Albany Journal, Utica Herald, Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, Philadelphia Record, Milwaukee Times, Reading Journal, New York Herald, Chicago Times, St. Louis Dispatch, Cincinnati Times, Philadelphia North American, Toledo Blade, Detroit Courier, New York Independent, Harper's Weekly, New York Nation, and San Francisco Argonaut do?

We are very sorry to have such most worthy and excellent Democratic gentlemen as Harry Thornton, Governor Johnson, and Samuel M. Wilson beaten by ex-Supervisor Foley and Messrs. Frost and Metcalf. Only think of it—these men are sent to Cincinnati to choose a Presidential candidate; while Judge Terry, Doctor Shorb, ex-Justice Wallace, and the other most worthy and excellent representatives of the party, are willing to become electors in advance of the nomination, and to pledge themselves to vote for whomsoever Messrs. Foley & Co. shall dictate. The Irish wing and the chivalry wing of the party seem to have carried off most of the honors of the Democratic State Convention. And this is right from the Democratic organization. Take the chivalry and the Irish, and there is no party left.

This has proved to be a good year for condoning offenses against the party. The rejected stones of the last year's builders have been chosen for the corners of the new edifice. Judge Terry—last year a bolting Democrat, howling for White, and advising the Sand-lot to accept Republican and Democratic money and vote against both Glenn and Perkins—is now chosen to be an elector upon the Democratic ticket. Frost, of the Post—a Grant paper—was last year in opposition to Doctor Glenn and the Democracy. He voted for Perkins for Governor. He goes as a delegate to Cincinnati. Stephens, of Sacramento, bolted the Democratic ticket last year, and wrote an open letter against Doctor Glenn. He is a delegate to Cincinnati. The Democratic lions and the Sand-lot lambs are lying down together.

We know what's the matter with Page. Mr. H. L. Dodge, in utter defiance of all party usage, has withheld two hundred thousand dollars annually from the party thieves since he became superintendent of the mint. He has caused his chemicals, wood, coal, and all the supplies of the mint, to be purchased from merchants engaged in legitimate trade, by means of which the middle-men—the curbstone loafers—have been deprived of an opportunity of stealing that amount. One curious fact: Page charges Dodge with not being a Republican—"that when he [Page] was sweating over the State, in a vain endeavor to make political speeches, the superintendent of the mint was taking his ease." Now, the real fact is that when Page was driving mustangs over a down-grade, with his number twelve boots on the king-bolt, Mr. Dodge was in the Senate, doing the Republican party and the State good service. Page ought to be thoroughly cleaned and curry-combed when he next returns to run for governor or senator.

The course of the Board of Education in relation to the salaries of teachers, which has resulted in a dead-lock, during which the teachers get no salaries at all, seems to us unnecessarily inconsiderate and severe, not to say spiteful. The board, last winter, reduced the salaries of teachers all along the line. To this there was, of course, much opposition and outcry from the teachers, and not a little remonstrance from the press. But the board stuck to its reduction. Thereupon the Legislature passed a bill raising the salaries to the point from which the School Directors lowered them. This bill, like the McClure charter, and much of the legislation of the past session, is not in form a special bill, but applies to all cities of over one hundred thousand inhabitants, of which, of course, there is but one in the State. School Superintendent Taylor, in obedience to this mandate of the Legislature, which was promptly signed by the Governor, drew the warrants for the April salaries at the old rates. These the President of the Board of Education refuses to sign, on the ground that the Legislature has no power to set aside the provision of the Constitution forbidding special legislation, by the device of calling San Francisco "any city of more than one hundred thousand inhabitants," and there the matter rests, the teachers getting no pay at all. The teachers have no recourse but to get out a mandamus on application of one of their number, and carry it to the Supreme Court for final decision. Now the question thus raised does not merely affect the question of teachers' pay. A mass of important legislation, and probably heavy interests, political and otherwise, are interested in the decision. For that reason the appeal to the courts can not be rushed through, but the legislation at each step will probably be slow and tedious. In the meantime the teachers will get neither the money which they have earned, and which is lying in the treasury for them, nor yet will they get the warrants, which they might shave. They will be kept out of their money, to their infinite annoyance and, in many cases, loss, and also to the loss and annoyance of those whom they owe, or who are dependent on them. And there is danger, if the litigation extend past the 30th of June, of their losing their pay altogether. Now it does not seem to us that there is any necessity or justification for this, and we are sorry to see Mr. Stone, who in his action on the school-book question has earned the gratitude of the people, lend himself to a course which seems dictated by petty spite. He may have done so, thinking there was no alternative but a surrender of what he deems the rights of the board. But, if this be so, we hope he will reconsider his action, for if the board will consent several courses are open. In the first place, the board might pass a resolution, raising all the salaries save one to the figures of the Traylor bill. Even those tax-payers who favor reduction would not object to paying the old rates for a few months until the courts could settle the question, and the legal fight could be made as well upon one warrant as upon a thousand, and in fact must be so made. In the next place, all the warrants save one might be drawn at the reduced rates, with the understanding that if the courts sustain the Traylor act, the difference shall be made up to the teachers by an increase for the succeeding months. And there are several other ways of getting out of the difficulty. What we object to, and what the public will certainly object to, is the keeping of the teachers out of their honestly-earned pay while the litigation goes on. It looks like spitefulness; like an effort to punish the teachers for the action of the Legislature, or for their audacity in asking the Legislature to interfere. This is not just. There should be no temper about the matter. The money is not the School Directors' money, and they are not paid for temper. The school-teachers have just as good a right to think their salaries should be kept up as the Board of Education have to think they should be cut down. And they ought not to be punished by being kept out of their salaries, when an agreed case, which will test the matter at issue, can easily be made.

It was in strict accordance with their natural and acquired instincts that the text-book majority in the Board of Education, at the last meeting, passed a resolution ordering the scandalous contract they had entered into with the Cincinnati book house to be signed, sealed, and delivered; despite protests, in defiance of everything and everybody. And so, by the voice of majority and authority, the transaction would have passed into an account for parents and tax-payers to settle, but for the action of the President of the Real Estate Protective Association, who filed a formal complaint against the board, reciting the history of the text-book awards, and asking for an injunction to restrain and stay the crowning act of the infamy. And now, perhaps, by a judicial investigation, tax-payers will be able to get a few explanations that heretofore they have been scornfully denied. Perhaps reasons will be given why the highest was preferred to the lowest bidder. Perhaps the whole secret history of the seven consecutive resolutions, and the details of the determination to make the McGuffey selection of books, will be brought to light. Perhaps—darkly, even as through a glass—it will be seen why the nomination of William Ashburner was not ratified. Perhaps there will be a reconciliation with, or at least an understanding of, the eighth commandment before this matter is finally settled.

On one of the inner pages of this issue we publish in full the majority report of the Water Committee of the Board of Supervisors relative to the fixing of water rates. It is a clear-spoken, easily-understood document, and one that will be read with interest by every tax-payer, property-holder, and water-consumer in the city. It seems to have been carefully, thoroughly, and honestly prepared. Nothing has been left undone to thoroughly inform the committee and assist them to their conclusions. Experts have been employed to go through books for facts, figures, and points of valuation; these experts have themselves been experted, so that there could be no mistake or collusion. Business men have been called in to testify as to the valuation of the Spring Valley, the nature of the water business, the rate of interest that capital so invested should pay, the equity of the city paying for its water service; the proprietors and managers of daily papers have been invited to attend a special meeting to make suggestions and objections; and above and over all, members of the Board of Supervisors not on the committee have been specially requested on all occasions to be present at the meetings, to assist in arriving at a just valuation and a sensible, business-like settlement of the whole vexed question. A report framed under such conditions and drawn in such a spirit is entitled to all the weight and consideration of absolute fact. It is a basis for an honest settlement between the people and the corporation, so that the one will be satisfied that they are not being swindled, and the other can transact business and go on with improvements without being continually harassed or having to struggle with the uncertainty of persecution and possible confiscation. The individual views of Mr. Bayley, the chairman of the committee, are clearly put and well taken. The gist of the whole document, however, is to be found in the following conclusions arrived at by the committee:

First—That the principle which should govern the regulation of rates is, that the Spring Valley Water Works is entitled, in addition to operating expenses, to a fair rate of interest upon the value of its works. Second—That a fair rate of interest is between eight and ten per cent. Third—That the income at present derived from existing rates, after deducting operating expenses, does not equal even eight per cent. upon the value of the works. Fourth—That the old system of collecting rates, which placed the whole burden upon the rate-payers, is unjust and inequitable, and is the real cause of the great dissatisfaction with the rates. Fifth—That this system has been abolished by the new Constitution; and that, under the new Constitution, the city is compelled to pay for water for all municipal purposes. Sixth—That the rates of the city should be so fixed and established as to yield about one-fourth of the revenue of the company; and that the payments made by the city should not increase the revenue of the company, but should be allowed upon existing rates to consumers, so as to reduce the same twenty-five per cent.

By the way, that was an immensely clever coup of the Water Committee, in extending a particular and pressing invitation to the journalistic gladiators of the dailies to enter the arena and ventilate themselves. Let the Call—the little wheel of the Bulletin bicycle in this water controversy—describe the scene in its characteristic and thrilling style:

Supervisor Bayley, chairman of the Water Committee, on Friday last addressed notes to Colonel A. P. Jackson, of the Post; George K. Fitch, of the Bulletin; Loring Pickering, of the Call; M. H. De Young, of the Chronicle; P. A. Roach, of the Examiner; and Frederick MacCrellish, of the Alta, notifying them that the committee would be prepared to hear them at ten o'clock yesterday morning, upon the subject of the proposed water rates. Charles Webb Howard and Frank G. Newlands, on behalf of the Spring Valley Company, were present in the committee-rooms shortly after the hour named, as were also the members of the Water Committee. The committee waited two hours, and none of the gentlemen having appeared, they adjourned.

Not a single gladiator heard from. Not even regrets sent. Jackson was out of town—probably at the Napa Soda Springs; Fitch was busily engaged in figuring with an artisan well contractor; Pickering, like old Diogenes, was floundering about in an overflowing tub; Roach was cringing under a cold shower; De Young was up to his neck in the Terrace tank, and McCrellish stood with a glass of it—water—in his red right hand. None of them knew anything about the subject as individuals. But as newspapers? Ah! that materially alters the situation. You never knew a San Francisco daily newspaper of this particular day and generation to make issue with business men on a business proposition in a business way. They have a way of their own. Ostensibly it is pro bono publico, and in following it up they never take water—that is, except, of course, in this one instance. No, these newspaper coons were altogether too cunning to be caught in any such trap as that baited by the committee. What they don't know about water is only paralleled by what they do know about dodging an honest and open expression of opinion. They dare not come from behind their impersonal newspaper screens.

The die for this community is virtually cast. There appears to be no protection under the law. The Supreme Court of this State, on Thursday last, in the habeas corpus case of Denis Kearney, declared null and void the judgment of the Police Court, and ordered the Sand-lot vagrant discharged from the custody of the Keeper of the House of Correction. The same day, that part of our Superior Court engaged in hearing the impeachment case of our Reverend Mayor in Christ rendered a decision to the effect that corruption in the man is not necessarily attached to the Mayor in his official capacity, and gracefully dismissed the whole proceeding. And this is the end, is it? This the outcome of investigation and prosecution, of citizens' protective associations, of the accomplishment of "The Council?" This the result of two years of agitation and business depression and general humiliation and disaster? No, it is simply the beginning of the end. The tramp returns in triumph. In the language of the Call, "the news of the decision favorable to the president of the party was received with unbounded satisfaction; and it was predicted that the agitator would have as large an audience on the Sand-lot next Sunday as he had addressed since the commencement of the agitation." And so we are to have it all over again, with the added insolence of repeated triumphs. Not this week, perhaps, or this month, or the next week or month. But when the harvest has been garnered and the goods are in store, and the vendors thereof are dwelling in fancied security, then will come again the mouthings of the Sand-lot. Plumed for the conflict, every tramp and loafer and vagrant, daubed with his thickest and fiercest war paint, will howl incendiarism and slaughter to his heart's content. "But sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Just now it is enough to know that even the leash of the law will not hold these human hounds; that courts, instead of upholding laws, are seemingly intent on breaking them; that our newspapers are either silent, submissive, or jubilant under the decisions; and that even the dred convicts at San Quentin have hopes.

MORE OR LESS TRUTHFUL STORIES.

Old and New.

"Mr. Froude sends us the following little novel"—says the limpid liar of our esteemed contemporary, the Chicago Tribune:

It was autumn.

Yes, merry, golden-tinted autumn. The sun poured down its mellow rays on the laughing fields of grain, and all nature seemed to rejoice in the gladness of the ample harvest. The little birds twittered and sang their sweetest and cheeriest notes in the branches of the oak trees that skirted the foot of a cloud-topped hill, while the big ones sat still and looked at them. Far away to the right lay a vast marsh, in which water-cresses, sweet-smelling sedges, and bullfrogs gently mingled.

Don't forget that it was a pretty sight.

Suddenly a boat is seen shooting out from the mossy banks that encircle the marsh like a chaplet of laurel. In the little craft are seated a young man and a maiden; he strong-limbed and handsome, his face bronzed by the kisses of the burning sun and scent-laden breezes; she fair and delicate like the lily, or a Chicago base-ball club.

With powerful strokes he sends the boat shooting through the water, while the ripples fall away on either side. Suddenly the maiden utters a faint shriek, and a pallor o'erspreads her lovely countenance.

She has seen a bullfrog.

One hand dropped nerveless by her side, and from it fell her hat—a dainty thing of straw and canvas trimmed with flowers. The young man at once plunged into the water to recover the hat. The cruel waves closed over his fair young head, the last thing seen being the part in the middle of it. But he omitted to come up again.

After waiting until it was a betting point that he had gone to stay, the maiden rose in the boat and gave a despairing shriek.

"Dead, dead for a duck hat," she moaned, and fell over the starboard side, never knowing that she had got off a good thing.

That night the sexton in a little village near the lake laid down one pair—and he was not playing poker either. The pair was the two lovers who had died that day, and had been fished out later in the evening.

But where was the bullfrog that had caused the calamity? Oh, where indeed?

This oft-told tale is of Circassian birth, but of universal application: A man was walking along one road, and a woman along another. The roads finally united into one, and, reaching the point of junction at the same time, they walked on together. The man was carrying a large iron kettle on his back; in one hand he held the legs of a live chicken, in the other a cane, and he was leading a goat. They neared a dark ravine.

Said the woman: "I am afraid to go through that ravine with you; it is a lonely place, and you might overpower and kiss me by force."

Said the man: "How can I possibly overpower you and kiss you by force, when I have this great iron kettle on my back, a cane in one hand, a live chicken in the other, and am leading this goat? I might as well be tied hand and foot."

"Yes, but if you should stick your cane in the ground and tie your goat to it, and turn the kettle bottom side up and put the chicken under it, then you might wickedly kiss me in spite of my resistance."

"Success to thy ingenuity, O woman!" said the rejoicing man to himself. "I should never have thought of this or a similar expedient."

And when they came to the ravine, he stuck his cane into the ground and tied the goat to it; gave the chicken to the woman, saying: "Hold it while I cut some grass for the goat;" and then—so runs the legend—lowering the kettle from his shoulders, he put the fowl under it, and wickedly kissed the woman, as she was afraid he would.

This is not a story, nor an essay, nor a poem, nor an advertisement; it is a libel. "How girls go to sleep" is going the rounds. The manner in which they go to sleep can't hold a candle to the way a married woman goes to sleep. Instead of thinking what she should have attended to before going to bed, she thinks of it afterward. While she is revolving these matters in her mind, and while snugly tucked up in bed, the old man is scratching his legs in front of the fire, and wondering how he will pay the next month's rent. Suddenly she says:

"James, did you lock the door?"

"Which door?" says James.

"The cellar door."

"No."

"Well, you'd better go down and lock it, for I heard some person in the back-yard last night."

Accordingly, James paddles down stairs and locks the door. About the time James returns and is going to get in bed, she remarks:

"Did you shut the stair-door?"

"No," says James.

"Well, if it is not shut, the cat will get up into the bedroom."

"Let her come up, then," says James, ill-naturedly.

"My goodness, no!" returns his wife. "She'd suck the baby's breath."

Then James paddles down stairs again, and steps on a tack, and closes the stair-door, and curses the cat, and returns to the bedroom. Just as he begins to climb into his couch his wife observes:

"I forgot to bring up some water. Suppose you bring some up in the big tin."

And so James, with a muttered curse, goes down into the dark kitchen and falls over a chair, and rasps all the tinware off the wall in search of the "big" tin, and then jerks the stair-door open and howls:

"Where the deuce are the matches?"

She gives him minute directions where to find the matches, and adds that she would rather go and get the water herself than have the neighborhood raised about it. After which James finds the matches, procures the water, comes up stairs, and plunges into bed.

Presently his wife says:

"James, let's have an understanding about money matters. Now, next week I've got to pay—"

"I don't know what you'll have pay, and I don't care," shouts James, as he lurches around and jams his face against the wall. "All I want is sleep."

"That's all very well for you," snaps his wife, as she pulls the covers viciously; "you never think of the worry and trouble I have. And there's Araminta, who I believe is taking the measles."

"Let her take 'em," says James.

Hereupon she begins to cry softly, but about the time James is falling into a gentle doze she punches him in the ribs with her elbow, and says:

"Did you hear that scandal about Mrs. Jones?"

"What Jones?" says James, sleepily.

"Why, Mrs. Jones."

"Where?" inquires James.

"I declare," says his wife, "you are getting more stupid every day. You know Mrs. Jones that lives at No. 21? Well, day before yesterday, Susan Smith told Mrs. Thompson that Sam Baker had said that Mrs. Jones had—"

Here she pauses and listens. James is snoring in profound slumber. With a snort of rage she pulls all the covers off him, wraps herself up in them, and lies awake until 2 A. M., thinking how badly used she is. And that is the way a married woman goes to sleep.

"Is there any vacant place in this bank which I could fill?" was the inquiry of a boy, as, with a glowing cheek, he stood before the president.

"There is none," was the reply. "Were you told that you might obtain a situation here? Who recommended you?"

"No one recommended me," was the answer; "I only thought I would see."

There was a straightforwardness in the manner, an honest determination in the countenance of the lad, which pleased the man of business, and induced him to continue the conversation. He said: "You must have friends who could aid you in a situation; have you advised with them?"

The quick flash of the deep blue eyes was quenched in the overtaking wave of sadness, as he said, though half musingly: "My mother said it would be useless to try without friends;" then, recollecting himself, he apologized for the interruption, and was about to withdraw, when the gentleman detained him by asking him why he did not stay at school another year or two, and then enter into business life.

"I have no time," was the instant reply; "but I study at home, and keep up with the other boys."

"Then you have a place already?" said his interrogator.

"Why did you leave it?"

"I have not left," answered the boy, quietly.

"Yes, but you wish to leave it. What is the matter?"

For an instant the child hesitated; then he replied with half-reluctant frankness: "I must do more for my mother."

Brave words! talisman of success anywhere, everywhere! They sank into the heart of the listener, recalling the radiant past. Grasping the hand of the astonished child, he said, with a quivering voice: "My good boy, what is your name? You shall fill the first vacancy that occurs in the bank. If in the meantime you need a friend, come to me. But now give me your confidence. Why do you wish to do more for your mother?"

Tears filled his eyes as he replied: "My father is dead, my brothers and sisters are dead, and my mother and I are left alone to help each other; but she is not strong, and I want to take care of her. It will please her, sir, that you have been so kind; and I am much obliged to you."

So saying, the boy left, little dreaming that his own nobleness of character had been as a bright glance of sunshine to the busy world he had so tremblingly entered. This was the dawn of his prosperity. But it broke up the depositors entirely. For these were the preliminaries of the greatest bank robbery that occurred in the year 1879.

A late number of an educational journal thus describes the troubles a Frenchman had with the verb "to break":

"I begin to understand your language better," said my French friend, Mr. Dubois, to me; "but your verbs trouble me still; you mix them up so with prepositions."

"I am sorry you find them so troublesome," was all I could say.

"I saw your friend Mrs. Murkeson just now," he continued. "She says she intends to break down housekeeping; am I right there?"

"Break up housekeeping, she must have said."

"Oh, yes! I remember; break up housekeeping."

"Why does she do that?" I asked.

"Because her health is broken into."

"Broken down."

"Broken down? Oh, yes! And, indeed, since the small-pox has broken up in our city—"

"Broken out."

"She thinks she will leave it for a few weeks."

"Will she leave her house alone?"

"No; she is afraid it will be broken—broken—how do I say that?"

"Broken into."

"Certainly; it is what I meant to say."

"Is her son to be married soon?"

"No; that engagement is broken—broken—"

"Broken off?"

"Yes, broken off."

"Ah, I had not heard of that!"

"She is very sorry about it. Her son only broke the news down to her last week. Am I right? I am anxious to speak English well."

"He merely broke the news; no preposition this time."

"It is hard to understand. That young man, her son, is a fine young fellow; a breaker, I think."

"A broker, and a very fine young fellow. Good-day."

So much for the verb "to break."

GEORGE ELIOT'S MARRIAGE.

All the readers of the Argonaut have doubtless heard, through the press despatches, the announcement of the recent marriage of "George Eliot" to "a Mr. Cross." The newspaper which printed the marriage notice gave the bride's name as Mary Ann Evans Lewes. Readers of the great novelist's early stories—as they originally appeared—will remember that they were announced as by "Marian Evans." The evolution of Marian into Mary Ann will be something of a shock to the aesthetic sensibilities of our dilettanti; almost as great a shock, indeed, as the recent marriage itself. George Eliot is sixty years old, and her late companion has been dead little more than a year. George Henry Lewes was a remarkable man, and has been one of the most conspicuous figures in the philosophico-literary history of the century. The Biographical History of Philosophy, the Life of Goethe, Problems of Life and Mind, were among his best-known works—though the three mentioned constitute an inconsiderable portion of his published writings. Long before Miss Evans was known to the literary world, Mr. Lewes had established a large reputation as a man of letters. He was a student who lived among his books, and cared little for the social pleasures which are so alluring to the vast majority of mankind. His first matrimonial venture was not a happy one. His wife was gay, possibly frivolous, and she soon tired—as most of us would—of the ponderous society and the metaphysical, or, as he would rather say, metemprical conversation of her spouse. She fell in love with an English army officer, and one bright day she by eloping with her lover. The philosopher went on with his studies; and when his faithless wife, grown tired of her military affinity, returned to ask forgiveness, he took her back to his heart and home. But she lapsed again, and left him to return no more. In the meantime, Miss Evans, the daughter of an obscure clergyman in one of the country parishes of Warwickshire, had startled the literary world by her achievements in the domain of fiction; and Mr. Lewes, discovering in her earlier writings the evidences of that genius which has since given her a foremost place among the novelists of modern times, took every occasion to commend her works. The acquaintance thus formed soon ripened into intimacy, and, if both were free, would undoubtedly have led to a marriage. But under the English law, Mr. Lewes having once condoned his wife's offense, could not obtain a divorce; and it is said that an agreement was formed between him and Miss Evans to the effect that they should live together as man and wife until such a time as their union could be sanctioned by the law. However this may be, they did live most happily together for many years; though, owing to their peculiar relations, society was not disposed to grant them that recognition which, under different circumstances, would have been won by their great literary achievements. It does not appear that either cared much for the pleasure thus lost. They were surrounded by congenial friends, and their home became a centre of enjoyment for artists and literati. We Americans—who happen to be admirers—are of course interested, may be concerned, in the latest turn of our author's life. We would not be Americans else. Possibly some of us feel more than a little piqued that we were not taken into the great writer's confidence. But all the same it is none of our business. Our surmises and deductions are alike impertinent—yet both are American, and not unnatural. And, when the worst is said (we are not bad fellows—in either sex), we are royally appreciative of greatness in any guise. We think we know a novelist when we see one, and we have taken to our literary heart of hearts the magnificent, artistic personality, George Eliot. And though she should marry again to-morrow—though she never had been married and never meant to be—we should have the calm, discriminative insight to know that the modern literary horizon is wide enough for only one George Eliot.

There is to be another prize carnival. Time was, the mummer had his place in English-speaking life—a time before the proprietor of that life had forgotten the art of taking it easy. Folk born to speak the American tongue or its English dialect are born to passivity of feature and moral shade as the sparks to fly upward or the fog to wet things. Such a crowd in masquer garb are paralleled in the animal kingdom only by capering cows and dampened hens. There is but one way to really surmount its horrors, and that is, to attend in a state of civilization; but having attained civilization the just man hies to bed. Nein: masques, pretzels, vaterland, and Gretchen are simple joys for simple souls; let us leave them to the placid Albrecht and to Fritschen—fair-haired boy.

When the shrewd small boy who is left alone in the house during the evening makes such a mess of his raid on the pie-closet that it is bound to be noticed when his parents return, he hies him to his room, puts a pillow in his bed to represent himself, extinguishes the gas, and gets under the bed. And when the old man comes up stairs, madder than a wet cat, and, without stopping to light the gas, lathers that pillow with a trunk strap, the boy yells as though he was getting it hard, and the old man goes off satisfied. That's the sort of a boy who will grow up to a future.

It is affirmed that at a recent counting of noses by a San Francisco militia company, numbering one hundred and fifteen men, it was found that twenty-five were out of employ. This count appears to show the advantage of joining a militia company to be as three to four; that of not joining, to be as four to three. Now both these ratios when added make seven; and "things that are equal to the same thing are equal to each other." The problem now is: To find the square root. A year's subscription to the Argonaut will be awarded to the successful competitor.

The zeal of Officer Clinton defrauded some deserving shrimps of the animal juices of drunken Thomas Smith. This sort of governmental interference to protect the industry of the home worm at the expense of his fellow-craftsman is justified on the Protectionist theory.

IMAGINARY LOVE-LETTERS.

According to the New York Times, an unmarried woman in Ohio lately amused herself by writing anonymous love-letters to a great number of men, married and unmarried, in the town in which she lived. Each man, undoubtedly, fancied himself the favored object of the affection of the fair unknown. These men concealed the blissful secret, and would have kept on looking for the fair writer until this day, if the lovelorn damsel had not betrayed herself by writing similar letters to women, married or otherwise. No reasonable woman could long conceal her being drawn into such a complication. No woman of ordinary sharpness could fail to discover the writer. The men had dawdled over the matter in their rough and stupid fashion. Some of them—especially they who were married—thought it a fine thing to receive love-letters from a stricken creature; and others laughed to think that their graces and manly charms should have attracted another heedless butterfly of the softer sex. But when the women became personally interested in the affair, they went to the bottom of things in twenty-four hours. Women excel men in wanting to know all about things, especially mysterious things, and in finding out what they want to know. But we do not propose to discuss so evident a proposition as this. The point which is worthy of especial attention in this case is the woeful plight of the spinster who wrote the anonymous love-letters. It was discovered that she was not an insane person, afflicted with an abnormal desire to write tender epistles to all sorts of people. She was not beset with cacoëthes scribendi of the erotic variety. She was simply a tender-hearted and loving woman with no one to love. She must love somebody or something, and, in default of anybody else, her fitful affection fluttered over an entire community, lighting first on the men, as a matter of course, and then hovering over the women, when the small number of men in the village had been exhausted. This may seem grotesque, even ridiculous, to the casual observer. But it is tragical. There is a depth of pathos in the spectacle of a young woman vainly struggling with her fate of singleness, and yearning after some one to love. This is in itself a moving sight; but when we consider that the hapless woman was forced to pour out her overflowing affections promiscuously, as it were, simply to relieve her mind, there is an element of real tragedy in her case. If she had written the letters, and had burned them as soon as she had written them, she would probably have accomplished the same purpose; and this would have been much safer. She might have gone on writing love-letters to the day of her death, and she would not have discovered her painful secret if she had taken care to destroy them as fast as produced. Probably she enjoyed watching the male objects of her somewhat capricious affections as she saw them going about the streets of the village hugging themselves with the knowledge of their sweet secret. It nourished the flame of her changeable passion to regard the several recipients of her letters day after day. And it was more real to write to a real person, even if that person were a woman, than to project her tenderness into space, as it were, and "to stand apart in a sweet but secret flame." Her fatal error consisted in falling in love with other women. She was promptly brought to book when, so to speak, she tackled the superior sex. Women think they know all about men. They certainly do know all about each other. From the time of Pandora to the present, women have gone to the bottom of things when they have once begun to inquire. It is surprising that there are not more female detectives in the world. How many women are there who are overburdened with an accumulation of tenderness for which there is no market! How many unmarried women pursue the safe plan of writing love-letters to real or imaginary people, and burning them as soon as written? An American poet has fitly celebrated the fate of those who "die with all their music in them." Will nobody perform a similar office for those whose native sweetness slowly sours and hardens to worthlessness, because no channel of escape, no responding recipient, presents itself? It is sad to think that the Ohio spinster may be only an accidental example of a large class of deserving women. Her discovery was an accident. In Massachusetts, according to the statistics, there are several unmarried women to every unmarried man. So that, if every single man should immediately marry, there would yet be a great residue of women on hand, not only unprovided for, but hopeless of being able ever to find husbands. This illustration of the eternal unfitness of things is a favorite stock argument with polygamists. But it suggests a deeper woe when we consider that many of the unmatched and unmatched women may be writing love-letters and mailing them, so to speak, in the kitchen range or library fire. Women must love. Women must write letters. In default of any proper and legitimate object, they "dote" on kittens, pug-dogs, parrots, and even charities and bric-à-brac. But these do not respond to love-letters. It would be midsummer madness to indite elegant and tender epistles to a dog or pet squirrel. A man answers the purpose much better. He is more real. And, if the maiden be discreet, she need never be found out. It would surprise and pain the majority of men to know how many women, deprived of exercising their own choice by a false condition of society, go through the world with all their sweetness, as it were, hermetically corked and sealed.

The connubial management of American mothers is said to be more skillful than that of the practiced dames of the old world. The following story tends to strengthen the boast: An elder daughter had sailed from New York with a party of friends, made the grand tour of the continent, and finally settled down in Paris for a few months of rest and recreation. In that gay capital she had many suitors, two of whom were conspicuously eligible. They were so evenly matched in every respect that the young lady, feeling that she could be perfectly happy with either were it father away, wrote to her mamma that she was in the famous dilemma of the mule equally placed between two equally attractive bundles of fodder. Mamma cabled her instructions with Cæsarean brevity and Napoleonic promptness: "I sail to-morrow. Hold both till I come." Sequel: Not long thereafter mamma attended the wedding of her two daughters on the same morning, at the American chapel. She and her daughters still "hold both."

Before Sedan.

Here, in this leafy place
Quiet he lies—
Cold, with his sightless face
Turned to the skies.
'Tis but another dead;
All you can say is said.

Carry his body hence—
Kings must have slaves;
Kings climb to eminence
Over men's graves.
So this man's eye is dim—
Throw the earth over him.

What was the white you touched,
There, at his side?
Paper his hand had clutched
Tight ere he died.
Message or wish, maybe—
Smooth the folds out, and see.

Hardly the worst of us
Here could have smiled!
Only the tremulous
Words of a child;
Prattle, that has for stops
Just a few ruddy drops.

Look—she is sad to miss,
Morning and night,
His—her dead father's—kiss;
Tries to be bright,
Good to mamma, and sweet.
That is all. "Marguerite."

Ah, if beside the dead
Slumbered the pain!
Ah, if the hearts that bled
Slept with the slain!
If the grief died! But no—
Death will not have it so.

A Spring Day-Dream.

The sun was sinking low in the west—
Low in the west at the close of day;
And the opal clouds, in splendor drest,
Shone crimson, and amber, and silver-gray;
And the twilight lay like a veil of white
On the face of day, at the door of night.

The spirit of Spring touched all the trees,
And the leaves broke out as they felt her pass;
Her voice was heard in the balmy breeze,
And her ankles twinkled in the grass;
The buttercups sought to kiss her feet
As she trod the daisy-lighted street.

The fragrant breath of the violets blew
On my face like a pleasant dream of rest.
Oh, the world was fair and the world was true!
And the sun was sinking low in the west,
And the twilight hung like a pall of white
On the wraith of day, at the grave of night.

And over the violet-scented sod,
Through purple beds, in the purple shade,
The maiden I love beside me trod,
And fair was the face of my lily maid;
And the tender light of her violet eyes
Dispelled the shadow that filled the skies.

We spoke no word, for the solemn hush
Of the evening lay on my soul and hers;
But we heard the song of a missal-thrush
That sang with his mate in a belt of firs;
And I knew that my heart, though unawares,
Was singing a sweeter song than theirs.

But the shadow grew, and the night came on,
And with it the hour of parting came;
The daylight died when my love had gone,
But the love-light burned with a brighter flame;
The shadow of grief was in my breast,
And the sun was sinking low in the west.

O sweet, fair face, that I love so well!
O beautiful face, that no more I see!
Must I lose the love that I could not tell,
And mourn for the hopes that die with thee?
Hast thou gone from my life like leaves that fall?
Wert thou only a dream, then, after all?

The Jester's Sermon.

The jester shook his hood and bells, and leaped upon a chair;
The pages laughed; the women screamed, and tossed their scented hair;
The falcon whistled; stag-hounds bayed; the lap-dog barked without;
The scullion dropped the pitcher brown; the cook railed at the lout;
The steward, counting out his gold, let pouch and money fall;
And why? Because the jester rose to say grace in the hall.

The page played with the heron's plume, the steward with his chain;
The butler drummed upon the board, and laughed with might and main;
The grooms beat on their metal cans, and roared till they were red;
But still the jester shut his eyes, and rolled his witty head,
And when they grew a little still, read half a yard of text,
And, waving hand, struck on the desk, and frowned like one perplexed.

"Dear sinners all," the fool began, "man's life is but a jest,
A dream, a shadow, bubble, air, a vapor at the best.
In a thousand pounds of law I find not a single ounce of love.
A blind man killed the parson's cow in shooting at the dove.
The fool that eats till he is sick must fast till he is well.
The wooer who can flatter most will bear away the belle.

"Let no man halloo he's safe till he is through the wood.
He who will not when he may must tarry when he should.
He who laughs at crooked men should need walk very straight.
Oh! he who once has won a name may lie abed till light.
Make haste to purchase house and land; be very slow to wed.
True coral needs no painter's brush, nor need be daubed with red."

"The friar, preaching, cursed the thief (the pudding in his sleeve).
To fish for sprats with golden hooks is foolish—by your leave.
To travel well—an ass's ears, ape's face, hog's mouth, and ostrich legs.
He does not care a pin for thieves who limp about and begs."

"Be always first man at a feast, and last man at a fray.
The short way round, in spite of all, is still the longest way.
When the hungry curate licks the knife there's not much for the clerk.
When the pilot, turning pale and sick, looks up, the storm grows dark."

Then loud they laughed—the fat cook's tears ran down in the pan;
The steward shook so, he was forced to drop the brimming can;
And then again the women screamed, and every stag-hound bayed—
And why? Because the motley fool so wise a sermon made.

—Walter Thornbury.

FASHIONABLE FACTS AND FANCIES.

Primrose gloves are at present the most fashionable in New York.

The new coaching hat is the "Spanish Student." It is very handsome.

The long cords and tassels, now in use, are in memory of the Capuchin monks.

It is well to remember, in all that pertains to dress, that a good contrast is better than a poor match.

A contemporary thinks girls who are engaged ought to be made to wear a flaring red necktie to prevent trouble.

You can't suit a man any way. He will scoff at the microscopic bonnet on the street, and growl at the aspiring one in the theatre.

Imperial dragons wrought in scarlet and Chinese characters form the embroidery of some black silk gowns, which are styled Oriental.

The number of ruffles on the most recent petticoat reminds one of a ballet-dancer's frills, but they serve a good purpose in extending skirts.

Lately, many ladies have abandoned their elegant bracelets, because there are so many cheap imitations that their own rich ornaments are not sufficiently surprising.

It appears to be the fashion for distinguished men in Europe to wear their decorations hung around their necks like a woman's locket. Pictures of Nordenskjöld, the Arctic explorer, represent him with a gorgeous star depending just below the cravat, and very chic it is, too.

Casaquins made entirely of beads are a decided novelty. Like the Jerseys they are moulded to the figure, but the beads are so close set the foundation can not be seen. They are made in ruby, emerald, and amethyst, as well as jet, and recall the days of the Amazons.

Ladies with really beautiful necks object to covering them with high ruches, and wear the long scarfs of lace laid flat on the dress and having one end fastened on the left side of the belt, but this way of arranging the dress is very trying compared to that of muffling one's self to the chin.

Prepared seaweed, the invention of a lady, and patronized by Queen Victoria, is a novelty for ball dresses. It is made in red, white, and shaded green. It is prepared in a particular way, mounted on wire, and looks very fine and graceful. The view through it is also very fine and entrancing.

There is probably no dictum of fashion that is more aggravating to the feminine mind than that the short baby bangs must give way to the long, wavy crimps, now so essential. It is almost maddening to those who have burned their hair, so that it won't even grow in time to come.

Pretty young girls, pale with the study that is supposed to be eating out their vitality, or, more probably, with slate pencils and late hours, find the very yellow lace and pink ribbons exceedingly becoming, and the quantity of both materials that is fashioned into bonnets is really amazing. Wreaths of lilies of the valley are also in great demand.

One of the strange freaks of fashion has brought into general use by ladies as ugly a piece of attire as was ever seen. Instead of the handsome, long, and well-fitting six or eight-button glove of last season, Biarritz gloves are universally seen, concealing well-turned wrists and graceful arms with their loose and slovenly-looking creases. They remind one strikingly of stockings down at the heels. It is to be hoped they will soon be superseded by a more graceful novelty.

"I guess you're full of fleas," said a fashionable American beauty to a young English lady. The latter blushed vividly, and was about to repudiate the imputation indignantly, when it was explained to her that her interlocutor merely intended a compliment to her sprightliness and vivacity." Which is a very good story from the London World. It strikes one, however, that the laugh is upon Mayfair, which made the American beauty fashionable, and which prefers beauty to brains, rather than upon our vulgar country-woman.

"I have witnessed," writes a correspondent of London Truth, "many a strange dance, from the nautch to the can-can, and my experience of casinos ranges from the Argyll to the Mabelle; but I have never before seen so grossly indecent a step as that favored in the neighborhood of Portsmouth and Ryde, and popularly known as the 'Southsea Cuddle.' Surely, young ladies at a public ball should draw the line at biting the shoulder-cord of the uniformed partners in whose arms they are gliding round the room."

Those of the gentler sex who delight in ear-rings will be surprised to learn that the Romans regarded the piercing of the ear as a mark of slavery, which they inflicted upon the vanquished. As these ornaments also enlarge the ear, their wearers will be pleased to know that a small and delicate ear is by no means everywhere in favor. "The Chinese," says Dr. Goulin, in his work on fashion, published in 1846, "esteem large, long, and pendant ears very highly. These they pierce, and suspend heavy weights to them. In the same manner the people of Laos enlarge the puncture until it is of sufficient size for the fist to pass through. The Omagnas carry bouquets in these openings." If these statements are not correct, one must blame Dr. Goulin.

Mrs. Langtry, the great English beauty, has introduced a new garment in the shape of a flannel undershirt, which is made to fit tight to the figure and reaches below the hips. The venerable Peter C—, the noted philanthropist, upon reading this information, quietly remarked to his cashier: "Johnny, let me have a couple of dollars; I want to buy a Jersey." "I don't think they have got over here yet, Mr. C—," said Johnny, looking much puzzled, "and besides, you know, the Jersey is a lady's garment." The great philanthropist bestowed a slow and solemn wink upon Johnny, reached for his two dollars, and started for his Jersey. "I wonder who he is going to give that to," said Johnny to himself, in a dubious sort of a tone, as he deposited a tag in Mr. C's account in the till.

Gilbert! Gilbert! Gilbert! Gilbert at the Bush Street Theatre in the Pirates of Penzance; Gilbert at the Baldwin in Sweethearts; Gilbert at the Baldwin in the Wedding March; Gilbert in the drawing-rooms on the lips of every one. Have you seen Sweethearts? A simple, pretty thing; difficult to classify because of its very simplicity. It would have delighted Charles Lamb's cousin Bridget, of whom he wrote: "She has a native disrelish for anything that sounds odd or bizarre"; nothing goes down with her that is quaint, irregular, or out of the common road of sympathy. She holds nature more clever." Sweethearts is something delightfully possible, probable, common—even commonplace. Such little, uneventful stories are taking place every day, more especially in the countries where there is a surplus female population. This shatters a little of the romance of the woman's faithful waiting; but then, you know, one really never does hear of such stories on the frontier. Besides, the parties concerned have much to do with the interest of a tale. I saw Sweethearts once before, at the California Theatre, a long time ago. It was played by William Horace Lingard and the third of the Dunning, who was an actress for a fortnight or so. Any performance more ineffably stupid was never presented to an audience. The idyllic little sketch given at the Baldwin, Monday, was so little like it that only its quaint, sweet, homely name identified it. Every one knows the story, because every one knows Sullivan's pretty song. Perhaps you lose the words in the melody; but you will recall their exchange of roses, the capricious girl who cast the flower aside, and the fervent lover who pressed his rose to his lips and "by yon moon did swear," etc., and how "They met again in after years,

In life's sad, sorrowful time;
Their heads were heavy with age and tears,
And white with the winter rime.
He found the flower she scorned in play
At her faithful heart did dwell.
His flower, they say, he had cast away
Before its petals fell."

"How like a man! how like a woman!" says Gilbert in the play. By the by, what a fashion he has of furnishing up old ideas and making them not only "a la mode" as well as new, but a great deal better. He went to the "Bab Ballads" for Pinafore, and the "Sweethearts" ballad and the Sweethearts play are twins. Of course, it is, all essentially English—a pretty girl in a rose-garden playing at planting, and a young lover going to India. Somehow, English lovers always do go to India; and somehow, too, no one ever goes to India from anywhere but England. As a matter of course, when he comes back he finds his old love in precisely the same place he left her. Possibly there are no mortgages in England. At all events, they can not be indigenous. There are, too, many stories extant of people finding people in exactly the same spot after lapses of twenty, thirty, or fifty years. However, there is no Comstock Lode or stock exchange in the vicinity of these places. At all events, it makes a nice little story, and I would not ask to see anything prettier in its way than Miss Rachel Sanger's "Jennie Northcott." She is of the most pronounced English type, and I could not fancy her in a much heavier rôle; but she has the nice discrimination and the good taste which go to make these genre stage pictures something charming. What is there in life more beautiful than a tranquil, sweet old lady? I have always admired Dinah Maria Mulock Craik for daring to picture, in that most charming of all her stories, A Brave Lady, a heroine eighty years of age. True, Mrs. Craik has since almost shaken herself off her pedestal by perpetrating that latest mass of milk-soppy called Young Mrs. Jardine. But her Lady de Bougainville ensures her forgiveness. Blue blood is never so blue as in old age. Do we not all admire an old gentleman of the old school? And now and then we meet an old lady of the old school—there are not many of them—who is like a good book or a good picture to remember. They have a few of the lighter foibles left. They like rich, soft, old lace to fall over their withered hands, and soft mantles to hide their shrunken shoulders, and rich drapery to give elegance to their carriage. They are always thoroughly well appointed. Their silver hair softens their quiet, passionless, Buddha-faces, wherein is written what the Buddhist priests call the majesty of peace. Their voices, untuned by time, are yet gentle, and they have a cooing, caressing quality. Their speech has a strange, old-fashioned elegance. They are like the faded pressed roses one finds in an old book, or the disused treasures one finds in an attic. It is true there are many old women of the other kind, like her violent Grace of Marlborough, to let them down as easily and aristocratically as possible, but—Where did

I leave Miss Rachel Sanger? Ah, in the bright, pleasant youth of "Jenny Northcott." In the second act the pretty diminutive had become Jane, and she was a subdued, sweet old lady, and a delightful opposite to her garrulous chuckling old returned lover, "Mr. Spreadbrow." As for "Mr. Spreadbrow," or James O'Neill, he was never more finished than in this tiny play of two acts. What is this wild absurdity, the Wedding March, which follows? A long farce, laid in England, which is as un-English as it is possible to be. And it is written that Mr. Gilbert adapted it from the French. Why will people, even of Mr. Gilbert's intelligence, persist in adapting from the French? Why will they not give us a downright, honest translation? Anything French is not adaptable. Fancy an English wedding party prancing about London in that absurd way to see the sights. Funny? Of course it is funny—wildly amusing for the matter of that; but there is the humor of the Gaul in every contretemps, and not the humor of the Anglo-Saxon. The wedding party are dressed as honest country folk might have dressed in France once upon a time, while Mr. Morrison, the bridegroom, is in modern English morning dress. Everything else is equally inapposite. Miss Sanger's scene is interjected in a haphazard sort of a way, and there is a general wild disconnectedness. It is droll enough to laugh at, and if any one else had written it it might do, for the adapted situations are all amusing enough; but, from the beginning to the end, there is not a line in it worthy of Gilbert.

How different from the Pirates of Penzance! This is as irresistible as a contagious laugh. It is a bubbling, sparkling, gurgling mirth, with more of matter in it than appears at once. The satire is as delicate as it is keen. Do you not often listen to the various verdicts of an audience as you wedge your way through the crowd coming out of a theatre? Many of them are faithful to their first love, and still like Pinafore best; others will not allow a comparison. In point of fact, a few besotted individuals have dared to like the Royal Middy as well. But that can only be the lust of the eye for silk and tinsel. But, for a genuine canvassing of the merits of the Pirates, I like to hear a New Yorker and a San Franciscan get into a disquisition on the subject—if one may call the argument by so formidable a name. "Does Miss Emelie Melville sing as well as Miss Roosevelt?" asked an inquiring New Yorker the other day, who had not yet done his duty by the Bush Street Theatre. "As well!" shrieked the moderate Californian; "if Miss Melville sang that waltz in the Fifth Avenue Theatre, people would tear the house down with enthusiasm!" And so it goes. Freeman is compared with the New York "Major-General," Turner with the New York "Frederic," Miss Paulin with the New York "Ruth." Poor Miss Paulin suffers more than any of the others, for, heaven not having favored her with a bounteous and spacious person, she is miscast. It is strange, however, how some people manage to please, even against the better judgment. Every one knows that a score of points are lost by her utter unfitness, yet the little woman works with such a will that you half-forget it. As for Freeman, he is a marvel. The amount of expression which he manages to throw into an unmusical voice, and an accumulation of shaky English, is something extraordinary. Turner has waked from his lassitude, sings exquisitely, and really does act a little bit. As is usual with these partners in text and song, they give the best of everything to the choruses. And people do say that to the chorus and the orchestra belong much of the credit of the success of the Pirates. Why not? On Peake's best nights, when he does not get into the overdoing vein, he imparts something of his own vigor to his piratical followers, and there are some excellent voices among them. As for the basso policemen, people are going about in the most absurd manner, trying to imitate, with soprano, tenor, and other unsuitable organs, that wonderful note, miles below the line, which these fellows take every night, to the gratification of a much-edified public. Then there is the trim, sweet-voiced, pretty female chorus. How unlike they are to those old crones who used to fringe the stage with a well-defined set of collar-bones, and a singularly good view of the conformation of the vertebra. Take it for all in all, we shall not soon again have anything as good, as well played, or as well sung as the Pirates of Penzance.

And we are to have the beautiful, bewildering Neilson soon again. For the last time, possibly, for she is not one to face a public when her charms are on the wane, and it takes a long time to get around the world to California again. What a triumph was hers when she first came! Who does not remember her in the balcony scene, when she hung over its red-draped rails like a great, tropical tiger-lily? Her beauty, her diamonds, her "Juliet" were the sensation of the hour. They have not lost their fascination yet. It thrills us all a little to know that Neilson is coming again. It wakens people a little from their dramatic lethargy. They are beginning to inquire what is going on at the theatres. In fact, quite a number strayed up to Baldwin's last week to try to get into the habit of going once more. I am quite sure that a prospect of a season of the legitimate warmed James O'Neill up to an interest in his part in Sweethearts. Unhappy man! It is easy to see that he was first stage-struck by the legitimate—that his choice, his training, and his adaptability all point that way. Yet he has been obliged for so long to do emotional melodramatic society rôles—nay, even comic parts—that I doubt whether he will find himself fitting with old-time ease into the tragic garments of "Romeo."

BETSY B.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Oil-Can Odes.

Do not cry for little Georgie,
He is in the golden camp;
Gently was he wafted upward
By the non-explosive lamp.

Mary, we shall always miss you;
Gone with your pleasant smile;
Had the oil-can been much larger
You'd have gone about a mile.

Oh, You Angel!

I have watched you long, Avicé—
Watched you so,
I have found your secret out;
And I know
That the restless ribboned things,
Where your slope of shoulder springs,
Are but undeveloped wings.
That will grow.

The Canary.

There is a young lady of Lansing
Who flatters herself she just can sing
And the cats through the fence
Of her pa's residence
When she chants—'tis so very entrancing.

The Property Man.

They met; and when the fair one gazed
Upon his whiskers fine,
She felt that she had found at last
The paragon divine.
They courted through the summer months,
And married in the fall.
She gave her heart and hand, and he Gave beard, mustache, and all.
One night they passed in pleasant dreams,
A happy wedded pair;
But ah, alas! the next morn's light
Brought sorrow and despair.
The count arose and washed his face,
But fear o'erwhelmed his soul—
The glue had started, and he left
His whiskers in the bowl.
The wife looked up; she saw his face,
Smooth as a new-mown lawn—
Save here and there a single hair.
His whiskers all were gone.
She swooned, and fell upon the floor—
Her reason overthrown.
The count secured her jewelry,
And left for parts unknown.

Love and Indigestion.

Oh! I feel so very curious—Liza Jane!
For within me there's a furious—gastric pain;
I would call up happy visions,
But they turn to sad derisions,
And the effort is in vain—Liza Jane.

I ate lobster pie for supper—Liza Jane,
With an under crust and upper—how insane!
Now it pinches and it gnaws,
As if all the lobster's claws
I had swallowed—ouch! the pain!—Liza Jane.

And All the Result of a Call.

A dashing young man in St. Paul
Loved a maiden exceedingly tall;
Two nights in the week
He would muster up cheek
And make the fair creature a call.
One day her pa shouldered his gun,
And went out to discover the son
Of a sea-cook who would
On a young heart intrude,
And say he was only in fun.
He met the young man in a store,
And blew him out through the front door.
A father-in-law jury
Let him off in a hurry,
But the boys shunned that girl evermore.

The Fan.

There lives in the land of Japan
A very lughrious man,
Who sketches with toil,
In water and oil,
Strange scenes for the Japanese fan.
He paints with a Chinaman's queue,
And uses vermilion and blue;
He delights in large berds
Of long-legged birds,
Which he makes with their bodies askew.
He strives, with the noble intent
To picture each current event;
He often spends hours
Over intricate flowers,
And receives just the eightb of a cent.

Spring Chicken.

What a beautiful time is spring,
When the woodcock begins to sing,
And the humblebee and chickadee
Carry their heads around in a sling.
When the hlack and tickling ants
Crawl up the young man's pants,
And the straddlebug and mosquito bug,
While the spiders engage in a dance.

And the birds get drunk on dew,
And offer the robins a chew,
While the great owl blinks and the sparrow winks
At the wife of the gay cuckoo.

And the coon goes off on a spree
Along with the chipmunk and flea,
The odorous skunk gets thundering drunk,
And tries to make love to the bee.

The "Pirates" in One Flat.

When the young and tender school-girl isn't thinking,
Isn't thinking,
Of the time when she'll be allowed to vote,
'Lowed to vote,
The chances are that she is coyly hinking,
Coyly hinking,
At some youth in a zebra overcoat,
Overcoat.

Sweet Fraud.

Come, gentle spring! Emerging from the damp,
Accept a sweet eulogium from the printer,
Yet—come to think—why, you're a fraud, you tramp!
You've hung around all winter!

OUR LETTER BOX.

Church Music.

EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT: In the Post of Saturday last an article appeared in regard to applicants for positions as singers in church choirs, evidently written or suggested by some organist or choir-leader, and which verifies the old maxim, that a poor workman always finds fault with his tools. I have observed church music in this city to some extent; and the reasons for its defects do not lie with the singers, but with the leaders—that is, the organists and choir-masters—and also in the want of some competent person on the music committee, able to judge not only when the singing is bad, but, also, who is to blame that it is bad. A person may be an excellent singer of love ballads, and for that very reason wholly unfit to take a prominent part in rendering the music of the church. The Rubric requires the clergy to suppress—with the aid of some skilled person, if he be not such himself—all light and unseemly music. Now, a piece of music may be very devotional, but may be sung in a style which suggests thoughts other than devotional. It is the duty of the organist or choir-master—here one person generally occupies both the offices—to give the style and character of expression to the music. The correspondent of the Post would have the singers so accomplished as to instruct the choir-master, instead of his instructing them. Again, the writer in question complains that the singers, although they have good voices, fail to sing at sight without an accompaniment, but require the piece to be played over for them. The best singers go slightly astray sometimes, and it frequently happens that it is the listener and not the singer who is at fault; but, notwithstanding all that, a good choir-master could produce, with such material, far better singing than is ever heard in one of our churches. I have lived five years in San Francisco, and I have never heard a chant well sung in this city. The fault does not lie with the singers. For it would not be tolerated that one singer should correct another. The fault lies in this: there is not in any Episcopal church in San Francisco a choir-master who has the slightest idea how to train a choir to chant. The choir-masters here verify the saying that "fools rush in where angels fear to tread." The choirs here are fully competent, under proper leadership, to sing good, plain church music; but they murder the works of the great masters; and choir-leaders know so little that they can not perceive that that music is not sung, but simply buttered in cold blood. As to the criticism I affirm that the singers so glibly criticised are better able to perform their parts than their critic his. They have some idea of their duties, he not the slightest of his own. I know that newspaper discussion never amounts to much. But it may lead to the opening of the eyes of some of the music committees, and pave the way to a request to incompetents to step down and out.

A LOVER OF CHURCH MUSIC.

The Success of an Idea.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: It was a California woman who, a year ago, became possessed of an idea, and who has successfully worked it out. It was simply the thought that a thoroughly American school for advanced pupils, located in the most attractive center of European culture, would be a good thing educationally. The lady—Mrs. Burrage—had been successful as a teacher and in the building up of an excellent private school. She had taught, and knew the desirability of such a finish. She had traveled, and knew that American parents could not satisfactorily trust their daughters in a foreign city, removed from the influence of an American home. She had the courage horn of confidence, and announced in the Argonaut her plan. The reputation she had established, and the esteem in which she was held by those who knew her well, enabled her to soon gather a class, and, selecting Dresden as the objective point, she started eastward with a heavy California girls. Boston, of course, appreciates ideas—that is what it is for—and she there filled up her school to the desired number, and sailed away to the Saxon capital. Her success has been complete. She secured the best instructors, located herself in an attractive part of the city, and has maintained for the year a school-home, where progress and enjoyment have been happily blended. The advantages enjoyed in Dresden need not here be dwelt upon; whether music, language, or art be the end sought, no more favorable spot can be found. It may not be altogether modest to mention it, but Californians are kindly received in the old world. They are comers from the ends of the earth, and excite interest at first as natural curiosities. This kindness has been especially shown to our fair and courageous California teacher, and good society has not been among the wants of the school. Several of her pupils went for a year only, and accompanied by Mrs. Burrage, arrived in New York by the last steamer from Europe. Early next week she will return them to the fortunate parents, who have been able to give their children the advantages of Europe while they have remained at home to enjoy the unique social and political movements that can only be experienced in California, and to show their dexterity in standing from under a falling stock market. She remains in the city but a week or two, and then returns with another class.

A PROUD FRIEND.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 27, 1880.

Promotion from the Ranks.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: An editorial in a morning paper, a few days ago, commending the recent act passed by the lower house of Congress, making enlisted men who shall have served continuously for fifteen years—the last five years as non-commissioned officers—eligible for appointment as commissioned officers, shows some ignorance on the subject, not only here, but in Washington. Under existing laws and regulations, any enlisted man between the ages of twenty-one and thirty, who shall have served two years with a good record, can ask for an examination with a view to being commissioned. A board of officers is then convened to examine the applicant; and this examination is such as citizen appointments are subjected to. The record of the examination is sent to the War Department; and, if satisfactory, the applicant's name is placed on file for promotion, if no vacancy exists; and he is, while awaiting promotion, exempt from trial by an inferior court-martial, and is allowed to wear a distinctive badge. The last army register shows one hundred and fifty-eight officers on the active list appointed from the ranks: two in the quartermaster's department, four in the signal corps, thirty-nine in the cavalry, fifteen in the artillery, and ninety-eight in the infantry.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 26, 1880.

Mills Seminary Commencement.

The commencement exercises of Mills Seminary, last Thursday, were more than ordinarily interesting and successful. Many of the essays were really enjoyable—which is more than can be said of the general run of graduation productions. Essays were read as follows: "Our Lives and Time," Lottie M. Whitaker, Tomales; "The Marble Waiteth," Emma J. Allman, San Francisco; "Can we Afford It?" Nellie W. Huff, San Leandro; "Bismarck," Amelia S. Brum, Lockeford; "A Lesson from the Carnival," Lizzie G. Derby, Fruit Vale; "The Eclipse in 1900," Electra M. Camden, Oakland; "Shoes," Georgia Ray, Galt; "A Reverie," Ethel M. Watson, Sacramento; "The Seen and the Unseen," Eleanor I. Carter, San Jose; "No Birds in Last Year's Nest," Matilda Zeile, Haywards; "Le Changement de la Marée," Jeanette A. Reynolds, San Francisco; "Sign Boards," Mary D. Sagendorph Ware, Massachusetts; "The Power that Wins," Lloyd S. McAllis, Oakland; "Venus de Milo," Josephine S. Byington, Santa Rosa; "Optima Altissima Tentamus," Amelia E. Nye, Willows. A "Class Song" followed, the music of which was composed by Professor Boscovitz, and then the presentation of diplomas.

Extensive and unusual preparations have been made by the Grand Army of the Republic for the observance of Memorial Day, which has been set for Monday next. It is anticipated that the programme will eclipse anything of the kind heretofore seen on this coast. One of the tender and touching as well as beautiful features of Memorial Day is the strewing of the graves of the remembered dead with flowers; that the offerings may be abundant, the following circular has been issued by the committee:

HEADQUARTERS MEMORIAL DAY COMMITTEE,
118 DUPONT STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO, MAY 24.

Memorial Day having been made a legal holiday in this State, and falling on Sunday, it will be observed on Monday, May 31, by the Posts of the Grand Army of the Republic in this city. The Order is making extensive arrangements for decorating the graves of soldiers, and now, as in previous years, depends upon the kind cooperation of all who appreciate and sympathize with them in this beautiful service to the memory of their departed comrades. Ladies and gentlemen in San Francisco and vicinity are respectfully invited to contribute such floral offerings, in the way of wreaths, bouquets, or loose flowers, as they may find convenient, and send the same to any of the branch post-office stations in the city, or to the headquarters of the G. A. R., No. 71 New Montgomery Street, on Saturday and Sunday, May 29th and 30th. Those living in the vicinity of San Francisco can entrust them to Wells, Fargo & Co.'s agents, who have kindly volunteered to forward them to the Committee free of expense. Please send name and address with your contributions.

C. MASON KINNE, Chairman of Committee.
L. L. DORR, Secretary.

NEPTUNE AND MERMAID SWIMMING BATHS, foot of Larkin and Hyde Streets. The improvements made at this establishment—first, for the safety of its patrons, in the way of life-lines, rafts, etc.; then by the construction of roomy platforms, protected from winds and well supplied with seats for spectators, fronting on the beach, with broad steps leading to same; also, an elevated platform in front of Ladies' Parlor, commanding a view not only of the entire beach, rafts, etc., but affording a grand view of the Golden Gate, bay, Mount Tamalpais, Sausalito hills, etc.—make it one of the most desirable and pleasant places of resort, not only for bathers and swimmers, but for those admiring marine views, beautiful scenery, and aquatic sports. In short, the proprietor proposes to make it a popular and pleasant resort for gentlemen, ladies, and children who visit for bathing and swimming, and also for those wishing to spend an agreeable hour or two. Strict propriety enforced.

You have often remarked in theatres, when the curtain is down, a tiny hole in it through which an inquisitive eye inspects the audience. It is usually the eye of some little actress, who looks to see if Richard or Ferdinand remains in his chair between the acts, or goes to flirt in the lobbies. In some of our theatres there is a perpetual struggle among the actresses for a place at this little hole. This bothers the machinists, for how can they place the decorations with a tumult of young women encumbering the stage, each waiting her chance at the hole of inspection? This trouble had grown to such an excess in a Boston theatre that the machinists were obliged to resort to the following expedient: they rubbed the aperture in the curtain with garlic! And the machinists were triumphant, for not an actress would approach it.

Helen Faucit, the once celebrated English actress, by the knighthood recently conferred on her husband, is now Lady Martin. Speaking of Miss Faucit recalls this anecdote: On one occasion she had a signal revenge on an actor, who, by virtue of his being the lessee of the theatre, insisted on playing "Romeo" to her "Juliet." It was at Drury Lane. When Juliet had to address Romeo on the reason why and wherefore he was Romeo, Helen Faucit could not resist the temptation of placing the slightest accent on the personal pronoun, which was well understood by those who thought with her that Mr. Anderson was unfitted for the character. Juliet said: "Oh, Romeo, Romeo, wherefore art thou, Romeo?" We do not believe Anderson ever repeated the character of Romeo with such a Juliet.

Censorship of plays in Vienna seems to be carried to excess; for a farce was recently returned to a minor theatre of that city with this inscription opposite a line requesting a waiter to bring a beefsteak: "Should this piece be performed during Lent, the text of this passage must be altered to 'Bring me a dish of fish.' It is not essential that any particular fish should be specified; but, should these instructions be neglected, or violated through recalcitrance on the part of the actor, the play will be immediately suppressed."

A Mademoiselle Rabany, said to be the niece of Victor Hugo, has come out at the opera at Nice; and on the two occasions when she appeared, she gave universal satisfaction, and was greeted with great applause.

R. B.—It is "not at all necessary" to intimate that you do not understand obscure intimations. Otherwise otherwise.

"The Stage is a-Waiting for Sarah" is the title of the latest sensation in the gay capital of France. The day may come when Sarah will wait for the stage.

All these slender boys that are pimping round with thin cheeks, no appetite or ambition, that fond mammas or doting papas are doctoring to death with expensive doctors, can be made strong, hearty, rollicking boys by the daily use of Hop Bitters a few short months.

Cases in which the heart is weak and irregular in action are soon restored to health and regularity by Fellows' Syrup of Hypophosphites. As persons whose heart's action is feeble are most susceptible to the influence of cold, it is in the advent of the cold season its use is specially advised.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

CALIFORNIA COLONIALY CONSIDERED.

The current year is the thirtieth in the course of an interesting experiment, viz., the experiment of founding on the shores of the Mediterranean a nation with personal habits, industrial organization, and social methods from the North Sea. For California is a Mediterranean country; her plains are the plains of Andaluz, of Macedon, of Trebizond; her hills the hills of Estremadura and Lebanon; her cañons the cañons of the Pyrenees and Taurus; her coast is the coast of Catalonia and the Levant; its rivers the Mæander and Guadelete; while inland we have an Euphrates; and behind the mountains new Dead Seas with their tributaries. In order to obtain old-world material for a full comparison with Californian territory we must pass into Arabia Deserta to parallel our southeastern counties. Following the Pacific Coast line north, we leave the Mediterranean to seek the type of Oregon and Washington nearer the Loire, the Mosel, or the Oder. Throughout the Mediterranean regions named, peoples are found differing widely enough from one another, but in whose outward and visible life there are traits common to all, separating them broadly from the peoples who occupy that part of Europe that sheds its water toward the north. This opposition of watershed marks an equivalent broad separation of two aspects of nature. There are features common to that face which is veined by the Elbe, Seine, and Thames, distinguishing it from the other face veined by the Tagus, Rhone, and Po. The separation is similar, both in kind and degree to that which distinguishes the regions drained by the Wallamet, Snake, and Columbia, from that of the Colorado, San Joaquin, and Sacramento. From Mount Shasta northward, the country and its climate are such as have always afforded a home to the various branches of the great Germanic race; from Shasta to the south, the countries are those which have been the homes of the Canaanite and Cushite, the Ionian, Slav, and the rest of that mixed cousinhood who parted from our Gothic stock so very long ago. Broadly speaking, then, we who have here in California intruded into the habitat of the Catalan, the Tuscan, and the Greek; have brought with us, in mature and rigid form, all the social polity, all the industrial methods, and above all, the fixed personal habits of a Breton, a Hamburger, or a yeoman of Kent; or, in other and equivalent words, of the New Englander, the Kentuckian, and the farmer from Pike. The attempt has been to use with little adaptation the old tools in new and different fields, to apply the old methods to new and different needs, to wear the old garments of habit under new and very different thermo-hygrometric readings.

It is not likely that an English tenant-farmer, set down, with his farming equipment and household brigade, on the plains of Castilla, would make much of a success of it, though the Spaniard lives there and thrives—in his way. It is quite certain that in the fairer fields of Lombardy, under conditions of labor still more strange to him, such an Englishman would fail dismally, amid Italians who were prospering—after an Italian standard of prosperity. In Armenia, that Briton would simply starve to death. Is it, then, altogether surprising that the similar experiment, now in its thirtieth year, of planting a whole population of Kentish men—or farmers from Pike—amid an environment wholly foreign to their experience, should disclose a variety of prosperous and unsatisfactory aspects? The course of things among us, and their tendency, is so plain that he who runs may read. Lacking coal, as California does, her iron ores are locked up (Washington Territory is now developing these); and the barring of those two items, under the existing conditions of production and transportation round the world, means exclusion from competition in the greater lines of modern industry. Our labor must be restricted within fields whose idiosyncrasies of soil and climate afford us a monopoly within the American nation. Thus we are thrown back upon the extra-hazardous resource of mining for the precious metals, upon the cultivation of produce the surplus of which shall be exportable in kind, and upon our flocks. In these three lines of labor we recognize at a glance the immemorial occupations of the Mediterranean peoples, while unlike them in the historic days of their prosperity, we are without a slave class whom we can rob of the profits of their labor. The mines, wool, and wine of Spain; the wines and wheat of Southern France; the wines, wheat, and silk of Italy; the wines, wool, and linens of Asia; and the wheat of Egypt, in an endless round from earliest days, have afforded, as they to-day afford, the livelihood of those countries, where they are now produced by the labor of a peasant class who could no more survive among us in competition with the great grain growers than the hand-loom weaver could survive in competition with the power-loom capitalist. True, time was when the Mediterranean countries were also the artificers of the world, but that was in days of hand-work, and before the uncultured North had entered into competition at all—a competition which, in its established existing form, has disposed of the question of any possible rivalry for generations yet to come. The same class of questions is settled as effectually for California by the looms of Rhode Island and Georgia, as it is for Spain and Rumelia by the looms of Manchester, of Lyons, and Antwerp. Industrial activity in our day is a question of coal measures; and the colonies of New South Wales or British Columbia may become centres of manufacture before California can. There are enough points of identity in the economic conditions that attend each group of these facts to insure the same result in all the several cases. Again, the Mediterranean nations were once nations of conquest, receiving tribute from subject peoples of all climes and lands; and at times they have been the traders of the world. But the present era is not one of conquest and the receipt of tribute moneys; while the lines of modern trade are charted by screw-steamers and those leveled rails which have supplanted the mountain passes and water highways that once fixed the course of traffic. It is scarcely probable that control of these agencies will be permanently retained by a small and poor nation like California; yet we may discern in this a possible one among the few sources of great wealth that may ultimately be hers.

We apply advisedly the word "nation" to this California, which is different in interests (not diverse, but different), as it is in geography, from the remainder of the Union embracing the broad territory that sheds into the Atlantic. Compared with their numbers, this detached and isolated California is very small; compared with their wealth, it is very poor; compared with their variety of industrial resources, hers are very few. She is not free to embark a few thousands of capital in any of the lines in which their marshaled millions are engaged and stand prepared to overwhelm any inadequate competition. As California could not support the inequality of such contests, so she does not, in point of fact, enter upon them. Thus she is again seen to be thrown back upon her agriculture and her mines. The last will doubtless continue to all time, presenting the features with which we are familiar—alternations of bonanza and borrasca, of delirious prosperity and desperate adversity. But what adaptation, if any, has been shown toward meeting the conditions of profitable agriculture? The main staple must be wheat, for that can be sold abroad; and so long as there is one class of grower which can undersell all others, it appears that this class must increase while the others decrease. It is quite plain that the operator who sows by the square mile and reaps with a score of machines can undersell the plowman who plants by the quarter-section. To agricultural irrigation, associated capital is as imperative as to hydraulic mining. So much, then, of adaptation to his environment the Californian has worked out. He has shown how to produce the main exportable staple at the least cost, and that this method is such as the "farmer"—in the inherited sense of that word—can not compete with. And our State statistics do, in fact, show that within the wheat area the "farms" are growing larger—not smaller. Wine, as a Mediterranean staple, yet remains; and there is nothing fantastic in the thought that another thirty years may avail to raise its exportable surplus to an equality in value with that of wheat. But what manner of nation is it to be that shall occupy the land thirty years hence as foreshadowed by these things? May it not consist, perchance, of agricultural princes loading fleets from their own domains, vinicultural patricians at ease beneath their vine and fig and orange groves, mining magnificoes in magnanimous state, and, possibly, merchants wielding a monumental trade—albeit there are adverse influences which this class should find it hard to stem.

But here is no very good place in this scheme for the old Northern farmer, the operative, or the unskilled laborer—at least if the last is to be anything higher or better than a tramp, making wages during harvest, then drifting back to the city, as he now does, perforce, to be fed during the winter. There must always be room for a limited number of each class, but the total should be easily reached. And here we find that we have got back, by a new road, to an old Spain, or an older Rome, with its territorial grandeës, to the trade of a mediæval Florence or Genoa, with magnificent Lorenzos or superb Dorias, diversified by the mighty miners of mines—American Demidoffs of many sumptuosities. Whether, when these things shall be, or before they are, we shall experience trouble with the plebeians, and hear unpleasant things from the great army of tramps, are conundrums we need not concern ourselves to answer, for their solution rests with our children to work out. For those who believe that the presence of enormously wealthy people in any community is a good thing for it—operating to promote a high civilization and truly liberal culture—the future of the Californian people forms an attractive theme for speculation. They appear likely, on many grounds, to grow into a type exceptional among the elements of the American nation. While it would be quite idle to attempt drawing any of their specific features, it is fairly safe to assume that one element in their progress will be extreme and exceptional wealth in the hands of certain classes; and this wealth implies power. The effect of opulence on human character appears to be good; that of power, bad. Between these two opposing forces the character of the typical Californian of the future will be moulded. On which side the balance of advantage will be found to lie is one of the many questions that make sensible people wish to live another half century, that they might learn the solution.

"An American newspaper representative recently offered Bismarck $130,000 yearly to write a weekly article for it." Wait a bit. There is matter in this beyond the cackle. Prince Bismarck, of course, declined; but the next such offer that we hear of will be an accepted one. The reason Prince Bismarck declined is, that it would be infra dig.—not for the imperial chancellor to write articles for publication in a newspaper, but—to take money for writing them: mere wages. It would not be infra dig. for him, or even for his master, to write articles with a view of effecting a diplomatic or political object. The article has become nearly the most effective tool of diplomatist as well as politician, to be wielded with art; but each can, for this purpose, usually hire a skill beyond his own. At crises, however, he may without derogation do the work for himself, and by doing it supremely well, earn a new laurel and be accounted all the more accomplished diplomatist—all the greater man in his statesmanship. Since the work itself, then, is of a sort not infringing the personal dignity of Kaiser or Pope, the thing objected to is the receipt of wages, and this objection in turn rests upon pride of tradition in its existing form. The magnitude of the price offered is not the thing to be first considered—though that will, later on, contribute to dispose of the question: the preliminary point is, whether such wages may be taken at all. May an hereditary noble (not a bohemian) write for the press for pay without loss of social standing? If a noble may do so at all, any nobleman may; if a baron may do so, then so may a duke. This last conclusion does not follow at the first flush of the novelty; a term of about twenty years would, in the usual course of things, be the natural period for it to mature; but it would mature, and mature in this trade as fully as in the score of others which the present century has seen the superior creatures condescend to with thankfulness.

The profession of arms (called "trade" by the thoughtless), the profession of the church, and the profession of landlord were the only three callings open to a gentleman sixty-five years ago. It was possible for him to take seriously to the law, but a dancing barrister was never more than a tolerated figure. During the period mentioned, the profession of arms has gradually come to cease to pay, and can be undertaken with advantage now only by individuals who command a home-allowance—i. e., who command "rent" in some form. A scion can no longer be presented with a pair of colors to go push his fortunes in the Low Countries or India. The trade has suffered a change, and a portion of its prizes are gone. The church is far from being the trade it was. For one thing, within fifty years it has come about that an incumbent is expected to perform clerical duties—a thing unspeakably distasteful to an average younger son seeking merely to be provided for. Practically this resource may be considered closed to a majority of the class who used to avail of it. The third profession—that of landlord—has been markedly prosperous for some sixty years; but it has received a shock, and there are cracks in the foundations of it visible to the unaided eye. During this sixty years, while radical changes in the economy of things have been going on, a compensating growth in the landlord interest—an enormous increase in the rental of land—has availed to cement the old fabric and sustain it in nearly its old proportions. At last, that cement shows signs of failing. The Fates forbid that it should crumble and bring a ruin about the world's ears. But time and change have told upon it, and it can no longer be trusted to support, and it will no longer avail to support, all the superstructure it is now sustaining. During these years of change, the young gentlemen have been casting about them for the means to assure food and raiment. To supply the food of these youth, the ends of the earth are compassed, and their raiment is as the raiment of kings. The desiderated supplies rise to the dignity of financial operations. It was but a year or so ago that Mr. Punch—that judicious observer—remarked that a haronet with three thousand pounds a year and three sons, was a pauper. If he was a pauper then, what is he now?

We have come to see the young gentlemen taking to trade. A duke's son kindly went into a hanking house—his lordship's high connection was the equivalent of a moneyed capital to the business—which smoothed the way for all the rest. Already hanking baronets are plenty as blackbirds, and the difference between traffic in money and traffic in bohbins or beer is not one of kind; while as to dignity, a fine old haronetcy looks down a long way on one of your fire-new earldoms. Hence it is no more surprising to find a banker or two raised to the peerage than to mark how the list of haronets swarms with Bakers, Cookes, Jacksons, Robinsons, and Smiths. Hence right honorables appear on boards of direction to linen mills, and Lord Hugo Fitzblazon (the Marquis of Tweed's second son) is chairman of the Wheal Penrwyddllwm, and Sir Orlando Montagu-Cocks undertakes the agency of the Diamantes Brazilaos Prospectadores (limited). In all this, these nobles are merely selling their names, which possess a definite commercial value, for money. Within a few seasons past it appears that gentlemen of the first social standing, endowed with a melodious voice, or a histrionic talent, or other kindred accomplishment, let themselves out for an evening's display in consideration of an honorarium. The honorarium, in terms of sterling money, runs from twenty to forty pounds; and some undoubted aristocrats make a pretty thing of it. All this without any impeachment of dignity—in fact, with applause. The guineas themselves are knighted, and plain wages becomes honorarium—much as Peter Hohbs, foreman of navies, becomes Sir Peter Beech-Hohbes, of The Beeches, Hants, railway contractor.

In all this is to be recognized the pecuniary stress—the imperative need of money in society of our existing type. As civilization advances—which is paraphrase for saying as luxury advances—the need of mere money becomes more pressing, and life without enough money becomes less worth living to many people, the number of whom also increases. The condition of neediness, more than any other of the external conditions of life, undermines the higher elements of character, tends to lower the aims, to dim the honor, to how the pride, and warp the standard of right and wrong. The command of money enough contributes more than any other external condition to maintain all phases of character at the ideal standard. And at this day some of the best part of European humanity is losing ground in point of relative wealth—much of it already becoming conscious of a sense of poverty. Poverty is a relative thing as well as a relative word. We have already quoted a sense in which a haronet with three thousand pounds a year may be pronounced a pauper.

They all, to a man, write to and for the papers. But not avowedly for money—yet. Neither did, nor would, my Lord Byron accept pay for his incomparable poems—till he needed the money. The first step once taken, the rapacity exhibited by his lordship appears unsoftened by scruples as to fairness in dealing with which a little commercial training would have adorned his noble and brilliant mind. Since his time no nobleman has scrupled to take money for the MS. of a regular hook. Now the publisher of the contemporary newspaper is in position to pay more, and many times more, for a name than any hook publisher, and when the price shall reach a sufficient figure, who can doubt that

The jingling of the guinea'll
Heal the hurt that honor feels?

It will not be long ere the needy noble will begin to take money for his regular article; and his order will applaud very nearly in proportion to the price he gets. Then let no Yankee weekly repeat the offer of five hundred pounds a column to a prince (most princes are needy) unless it wants to be taken up. Nor let any one for a moment fancy that we are to wait for the year 1900 to witness this phenomenon. Before the century runs out, we can engage the Argonaut shall have a noble or royal correspondent in half the capitals of Europe, and run its circulation up to half a million among the fierce democracy—its daughters and wives—of America, by the contributions from names of historic nobility on its regular staff.

A TEST KISSING CASE.

The newspapers East and South are busily discussing a very important law-suit now in progress in Newbern, South Carolina. It is said to be the first suit of the kind on record, and as such is watched with great interest by the legal profession in all parts of the country. The cause of action and points involved are substantially as follows: Some time ago Mr. Finch, of Newbern, who is in the jewelry business, exhibited to Miss Waters, a young lady with whom he was on friendly terms, a beautiful set of real jet. The lady was very anxious to own the set, but was not able to buy it. In these circumstances Mr. Finch proposed a novel kind of bargain. He said that he would sell Miss Waters the set for one hundred kisses, to be paid at the rate of one kiss daily on each and every day next ensuing from the day of the date of the agreement, excepting, nevertheless, each and every Sunday thereafter. It was further provided that Mr. Finch was to call at the lady's house every morning, except Sunday morning, to receive his daily kiss, which Miss Waters undertook and promised to duly deliver to him. This contract was not reduced to writing, but it was fully understood and agreed to by both parties, and the set of jet was tendered to Miss Waters and accepted by her. The next morning Mr. Finch called on Miss Waters for his first kiss, which, as the young lady now maintains, was fully paid. On each subsequent morning for thirty consecutive days—Sundays excepted—the same proceedings were had. On the thirty-first day, however, Mr. Finch made a formal complaint that Miss Waters was not fulfilling her contract, inasmuch as she insisted upon permitting him to kiss her cheek only. He maintained that this did not constitute a legal kiss, and he demanded that he should be allowed to put his arm around Miss Waters's waist and kiss her in the highest style of the art. To this request a firm refusal was returned. The lady professed her willingness to carry out her agreement, so far as her cheek was concerned, and even offered to give Mr. Finch his choice of cheeks, but she insisted that the contract would not bear the construction put upon it by Mr. Finch, and that she would never submit to such a construction. Thereupon, Mr. Finch, in great indignation, left the house, and brought an action for breach of contract against the lady. This action raises several new and interesting questions, among the most important of which is, What constitutes, in the eyes of the law, a kiss? The testimony of several experts is to be introduced by the plaintiff; but, although all those experts will probably start out with the assertion that a kiss is that which is impressed by one pair of lips upon another pair, they will subsequently be compelled to admit on cross-examination that one pair of lips alone may imprint a kiss upon any accessible object. This seems, at first sight, fatal to the plaintiff's claim that the defendant did not furnish him with lawful current kisses, but he sets up the further plea that there is a difference between active and passive kisses; that Miss Waters promised to give him a certain quantity of kisses—not to permit him to take them—and that giving kisses is an act which requires the use of the lips. This is certainly a strong point, and though the court may decide that there is no one variety of kiss which can be held to be the only kiss known to the common law, it may give an authoritative definition of an active kiss which will be of immense service to mankind. It is maintained by counsel for the defendant that there was no contract between the parties, for the reason that kisses can not constitute a valid consideration. The decision on this point will be eagerly waited for. That a kiss is something which can be given willingly or taken by force, and that it is commonly reputed to possess more or less intrinsic value, are points which the plaintiff's counsel will eloquently maintain. Hence, it seems that a kiss may be a valuable and sufficient consideration upon which to base a contract. On the other hand, it is asserted that courts have never recognized a kiss as property capable of being stolen, and that when a kiss has been seized by violence, the only remedy of the injured person is an action for assault. It is evident that we have here a question which admits of a vast amount of argument, and that its judicial decision will mark an era in our common-law jurisprudence. There is still another defense upon which the defendant's counsel is understood to place great reliance. It is claimed that even if there was a valid contract between the parties, and if the defendant did break it, the plaintiff's proper remedy is not an action for breach of contract, but a bill in equity for specific performance. Probably the plaintiff would have been wise had he resorted to the latter course. In case of his success, he would then have received specified quantities of definite kisses of one kind or another, and would thus have gained a substantial victory. As it is, his triumph in his action for breach of contract would doubtless bring him only a nominal sum by way of damages, and would render it necessary for him to institute fresh proceedings in order to gain possession of the jewelry. Still, it by no means follows that because he may have a remedy in equity he has no remedy at law, and it is reasonably certain that if there was a contract between himself and the defendant an action for breach of it will lie. There are many ignorant persons who fancy that the law is a dry, prosaic business. This action, however, proves the contrary. The questions at issue in Finch versus Waters come home to every mouth in the country. There is at present a most lamentable vagueness of helief as to what constitutes a kiss, and as to its precise legal status. We shall now, it is hoped, have these questions decided.

It seems that in the midst of a general conflagration a Japanese householder can only insure immunity for his property by promptly offering a bribe to the firemen. When this is done, the latter are perfectly reckless as to the destruction of other property in carrying out their contract.

A TRUE STORY OF THE CHIMES.

"Cecilia! Cecilia!" the bells went calling along the street and among all the little alley-ways; the chime ran up the busy ways—it dropped, and down the busy ways and through the air went blossoming. In among the windows it floated, like the tuneful hum of a melodious breath, and the notes clustered like handfuls of flowers flung upon doorsteps. Sick people and poor people heard the chime, and closed their eyes to hear it plainer still. Everyone nodded and said: "It's twelve o'clock." And the swinging bells, with an odd little undertone and murmur through the anthem, went calling up and down: "Cecilia! Twelve by the clock! O Cecilia!" And then, as if kicking up their heels of bells, they tangled and frolicked about her ears.

Cecilia, under the acacia-tree, looked up through its gently tossing boughs, and smiled. All her life she had lived just under the sweet-tripping chimes, and somehow they so wandered in and out of her memories, they seemed woven like golden threads into her mind and heart. Her needle was poised between her fingers, and her thoughtful eyes upturned toward the church-tower with a wealth of devotion in their hazel depths. In a moment she rose, passed rapidly along the oft-pressed path, opened a side door, and glided within the hush and gloomy grandeur of the church. Pausing half way down the aisle, she knelt with a silent rustle among the folds of her simple garments, and began her prayers. The dark and carved vault above seemed old and quaint enough for the flitting wings of spectral swallows, the altar solemn and awful, the choral niche a lodgment for the hymn of God. Whenever the great organ began its beating drone, Cecilia's heart seemed like to burst with the ecstasy that sometimes filled it, or the burdened cry that seemed like a heavy stone.

To-day, when she had given "Amen," she rose and went into the choir, for when the choir-master, who also rang the bells, came down, they would go over a difficult Latin service, whose difficulties made it a mutual delight. Cecilia was twenty now, and it was almost a certainty that in another year or two she would marry the choir-master, and they would live forever together under the shadows of the chime. In the meantime, she was only a girl, who had never heard of gayety or romance, but half-shaped fancies beat about in her head and filled her with a great longing that nothing but her own singing seemed to satisfy and subdue. Her serious eyes, with a touch of sauciness looking out from them, grew sparkling as she went over and over the new Latin service, and her sweet voice soared up to the carvings and floated among them like the spectral swallows. Cecilia's voice was fitted to the music of the most sacred church; she could not think of it as twittering away at ballads and love-ditties. So it was consecrated to high and prolonged and fugue notes, and she toned it often by the bells.

"Good-bye for to-day, Cecilia," said John Ayres, the master, who struck the great keys above and pressed on the white ones of the organ below, listening with a true and loving ear to her voice as it followed on, loyal in its own key, firm and true, soft and sweet. It was the purity in it he loved, because it matched his own thought. He played on the stops of his own heart every day when he bade her good-bye. He always kissed her on the cheek or the forehead when they parted, and oftentimes on the tips of her small, even-nailed fingers as she sang, standing by him; but they were reverential touches, as suited the carvings, the great altar, and the long aisles. He might have longed to kiss her lips—any man might long to kiss Cecilia's lips; but John never had touched them, though they glowed in beauty near him like a cup near to a thirsty soul.

He went away and left her there, and she descended the spiral stair and went a step or two up the aisle, her half-face turned toward the side door. There was twilight throughout the church, even at noon, and it startled her as though it had been a gray and eyeless domino when a form rose and passed her. Then, as she turned to look in surprise, the stranger also turned, and she saw his pleasant black eyes looking down at her from his tall height. He bowed to her in a stately fashion, pushed the door, and then it gave a violent swing as he passed into the vestibule, settling into repose again with shorter and shorter swingings.

Cecilia took up her sewing where she had left it, in the acacia shade, and passing through a patch of grass and sunshine, went into the house. It was a strange spot of green and holiness, a strange, innocent life in the heart of the great city, both snatched from encroachments. The house was a clean, sweet, noiseless home, so still and so solemn that something struck the heart at the threshold. It was like a religion. There was Cecilia's own organ, and her books of sacred music; there was the cloth-of-gold she was embroidering with lilies for the altar; there were stately volumes of discourses and church histories; there was a vase of flowers, but the flowers also seemed solemn even in their fragrance.

The young girl, with the same silent step, passed on through several rooms, and opened the kitchen-door.

"Is brother yet in his study, Aunt Kizzy?" she asked. A woman as still as midnight was stepping to and fro in the little kitchen, where the fire even seemed to burn under its breath.

"Yes; speak to him, Cecilia," was the low-voiced answer. And then the girl's dark, waving hair contrasted with a dry, thin fringe round the bald head of a grave, thin man, who said a lengthy and impressive grace as they two sat down to the table; the woman, Aunt Kizzy, stood with folded hands behind them. It would have been a strange thing to a man who should step in from the rushing, buzzing thoroughfare just outside; but it was all Cecilia's life, and she had never known another.

She sat under the acacia again at evening, and the restless longing was in her eyes as she felt the cool, soft air of the sunset playing on her hands. This lonely life of hers was nursing a spark just waiting to burst into flames. Choir-master Ayres sat with her, and the same air of sunset played upon his strong-corded, masterful hands; but Cecilia communed with herself as though she had been alone.

"I would like to be a nun," she thought.

She did not know that a nun's life can only smother and never put out a longing. A girl's history, could it be truly written, what a fitful, fantastic, burning, racing, yearning heart—full it would be—even a simplest history! Sometimes such a grasping hungering, reaching out from it like a hand; sometimes such a wail of tenderness, filling it and swelling abroad; sometimes such a regret or such a memory, like a smile sweeping over it as a wave sweeps; and it is all just a tide of nature rising and falling within the life of every woman, beginning with her girlhood and ending with her breath.

John Ayres had been waiting these three good years for this girl to be fit in feeling for a wife; but he had waited in vain for the woman to wake, and still he would wait and watch, though gray hairs and wrinkles came.

"I must go and ring the chimes, Cecilia," he said, by and by; and she saw him, without a throb, pass over the path and enter the side door. Fifteen minutes later the bells began to tumble and throng about over her head and call into her ears, "Cecilia! O Cecilia!" and the master was weaving into them a rhythm of love that beat against her heart, but which, try as it might, it could not respond to or interpret:

"Cecilia—my love—my dear love—my lamb—listen—to the chime—of my soul!" sang John Ayres through the bells, and he closed his eyes as they filled with the fervent tears. "Come, sweet—my heart—oh, come—as Rachel came—and Ruth—and Esther—the Queen—and Mary the Virgin—and Mother of God. Listen, as I wake—as I ring—the bells—oh, Cecilia Wells—oh, bells—and bells—roll, roll—and toll—my heart—my bells—ring, ring—and roll—and bells—bells—bells—s-s-s!"

And over the roofs the message went and flew like a dove abroad, till it lost itself in little waves and rills of returning echoes. But it lingered about Cecilia, sitting there in the sunset, and something stirred and murmured in her thought; yet, alas! she failed to know it was because of John's yearning call. Take care, take care, Choir-master Ayres; Cecilia is trembling upon the edge.

Next day being a certain saint's day, Cecilia, in her gray gown and her close hat, glided early through the small side door to avoid meeting the people in the aisles as they came in. She sat down by a corner of the organ, feeling its protection against the other singers, and, drawing aside the fringed fold of the curtain, watched the throng coming steadily in. There were the rich and the poor, brushing each other's skirts; and the shabby genteel of poverty looked shabby and scarcely genteel, indeed, by contrast with the flowing silks and the dead lustre of broadcloths. Was it to have a bonnet with a plume and to wear ornaments that Cecilia longed? She looked down, and the deep breath she took stirred her. The organ began its drone and rumble, and she felt as though she could rise and soar. Something strange and new seemed hovering in the church. Her eye ran up the aisles, and she saw the man smiling and looking back at her who had startled her but yesterday like a domino. She almost thought a bird had brushed her cheek when she espied him.

Then she shut the curtain and stood beside John, and, with the other singers, began the responses; but by and by, in the impressive parts of the new service, her own voice soared alone among the carvings, playing among the swallows, whose shadows were always flitting and flitting there. Yes, she would be a nun, Cecilia thought; she would be a nun—and a happy spot like a fire gnawed within her as every moment she remembered those shining, pleasant eyes below. Were they yet turned upon that fold of curtain?—were they listening to her song?—were they speaking silently to her above the multitude?

When the great congregation had melted away she went down the stair, thrilling and fluttering at what she felt she should meet there. And oh! there were the shining eyes, the darkly-bearded face, the gloved hands waiting at the door. How he seemed to speak she did not know, but it was like her own singing to hear him talk.

When she went through the little side door again she was not the same Cecilia, for she had changed. A great cloud, all shining and beautiful on its under side, seemed to bend over her, full with a heavy joy, wherever she went. She walked on roses into the silence of the house, and that day took up another dream. A moment later the bells began "Ah, Cecilia, Cecilia!" and that new voice ran through them like a ripple of the chime, so that she dropped on her knees and said her prayers.

Next day, half-oppressed, half-joyful, she stole into the church, and, behold! the domino smiled, took her hands in his. She felt her breath and life drawing out toward him, and all her veins rushed to her lips.

"My child," he said, gently, "you do not know me. I am Manheim, the director. I come to hear you sing. You will more and more astonish me every day, and by and by you will astonish the world. The world shall be at your feet, and it shall rain successes upon you. Oh, I promise you. You shall study and sing, and by and by you shall sing at my theatre, where all the grand singing of the country is."

He was a man of middle age; but the hero of some women's hearts must always be of middle age. The trouble is, this middle life drifts away soon into old age, which, to romance, can never be heroic. He bent toward her, so graceful, so handsome, so kind, so free, so bold, as if he held himself back with a restraint, as if he would be and yet he would not be too free and bold. And Cecilia had known no such man as this. She had known only John Ayres and grave men of the cloth, like her brother.

And so it happened that she knew Manheim, the director. Some days now she forgot her prayers in the trembling uncertainty of meeting him; and when he did not come, she remembered them and tried to pray away her disappointment. And John Ayres kindled with hope.

One day, in her joy and leaping delight, she seemed to be singing her soul away; and that night, in the moonlight, she slipped from under the shadow and protection of the bells, and Manheim held her softly by the hand and whispered her as up and down they paced the street. He was like an intoxicating drink to her. In his power she was as a thistle-down in the wind. That old cry of hers, just to be understood, was hushed. Here, finally, was one who could read, understand, and satisfy.

She kept no record of the days, for she was dead to time, but it seemed to her months and months; and then she was told that in one more month she must be ready. She must bring nothing away but herself; but she must come out from the shade and silence of the church and her home, to find the director and the world waiting to receive her. Manheim bent above her with all her heart in his eyes, her sweetness, and tremble in his voice, her music in his soul—and she would go away with him, ah! yes, she would trust him all ways and till the end. Again, in the moonlight at the gate, she breathed "good-night." But the director laughed a low laugh, that was a caress of itself, and also passed within.

"Cecilia! little dove!" he whispered. The words ran through her ear like the rushing of violins. How strange to feel herself within his arms—to know it was his heart beating thus against her beating cheek, and then like bells to feel his kisses rain upon her lips! Here was her world, and here should be her life; just here by the director's heart—but her blood stopped then, as she remembered that these were not like John's kisses. His were angel's to these; for these were devil's, searing her thought and burning where they touched. Why, what was this monstrous thing, that had made her a living coal, from which the life was already dying? Suddenly she struck away from him, and her voice was vibrant with a fading emotion.

"I shall marry John Ayres!" she cried, under her breath. "Ah, yes—by and by, if you wish. Married or not, you shall be mine. It is you that I love."

A flood of knowledge swept in upon her—an insight into the baseness of his nature—an instinct that told her now what it meant. As by the lifting of a curtain, she saw the river upon which she had been drifting, and the dark waters into which it led. Fiercely she fought herself free of his presence. In that one moment she had come to hate, and running with swift feet to the acacia tree, flung herself in an agony upon its roots. And the sweet bells began to chant the pure and holy love of the choir-master.

"My sweet—my dear—my love—my Cecilia, sweet-heart, blossom mine—oh, come—my love—and listen—oh, now—the bells—they will tell—my heart—oh, Cecilia Wells—these bells—these chimes—my lily—my love—my sweet—oh, these bells—s-s-s!"

For the first time she seemed to hear the love in them. She had never half listened to the message they rung before; and with her dry, hot eyes pressed in her hands, as she had flung herself with her face in the grass, they bore such a burden to her ears as made her temples hammer against her fingers in her shame. In that one night, when her eyes were plucked cruelly open, how low she brought herself in her own mind! What tearless sobs burst their way from the depths of her tarnished soul! Under what reproach and revilement and scourging she buried herself!

And when, hollow-eyed, she rose from that night of penance and torture, she knew sin, and hated it; she had met temptation, and conquered it; but, all the same, her eyes had dwelt upon sin and temptation, and she felt so fallen. Could anything ever wash away that stain which, as it grew, had seemed so bright and beautiful? Ah, John Ayres, choir-master and bell-chimer at St. James, here now is Cecilia, the woman, awakened at last!

If ever a woman went to the church in humility to her prayers, surely it was now Cecilia. Yet she was better and stronger than before, for she had been through the fight, and the proof was that she did not know herself better. Her voice became filled with a wonderful fervor, and in itself it was Glória and Ave; it was faith and truth and laudation and penitence, and congregations bowed the head before it.

And every twilight, when she heard the bells, she abased herself. There was now no longing, lingering cry to be understood. There was just a prayer to be worthy of John Ayres, to hear always the pure tone in the bells, and to be able to forget forever the reproach and reminder they seemed sometimes to fling down to her.

And so, one day, to humble herself below the very dust, she waited beside the organ for the choir-master till the bells should be done. When he came he thought he saw a saint. Her eyes had deepened to the suffering in her soul, and round her hovered a suggestion of renunciation and the martyrdom of woman.

"John," she began, tremulously, as he approached, "there is a confession I wish to make to you, and when it is done you may cast me off. It is a story which I live over again as I tell it to you, and I writhe in spirit as I put it in words. I am not worthy of you; indeed, indeed I am not. There was no act of the body to condemn me, but I sinned in the spirit of the sin. Oh! forgive me while I speak."

Reverently and tenderly the choir-master took her in his arms. "I will not have you speak," he said, with the love of years in his voice. "Could I put my foot on the neck of my wife? Nay, you shall not speak. Not one can say he has not sinned; but the burning of the furnace maketh pure and clean. To God only open your heart and make your free confession. Not one of us but has been tempted; but to conquer temptation, that makes the hero." What a grand man was the choir-master in that speech!

The tears were springing over Cecilia's cheeks as she replied: "I could never have loved you half so well, John, had the sinful thought not startled me from dreams. I shall, I know, in after years be a better woman for this. I am prepared now for the holy, and the deep, and the strong love which before my nature was too dreamy and too weak to feel."

The carvings of the master's hand saw it all, and the spectral swallows seemed to hear it and nestle closer. The altar, with its cloth of lilies and gold, witnessed the seal the sacred majesty of the church seemed to place upon the second betrothal, and as though it had been a communion John Ayres took the kiss from Cecilia's lips.

One day of an after year Cecilia sat with a child's head in the hollow of her arm. Somewhere about her face a smile of sweet content had found its home, but whether it were on cheek, or chin, or mouth, or in the depths of hazel eyes, no closest search might tell. She had been singing a lullaby; and as but a moment before her voice rose and fell—her lovely voice, that was like the fragrance of a violet, had never made so dear a music.

And behold! the chimes began to ring:

"The mother—the child—my wife—my babe—my God—my bells—my child—oh, life—and death—and song—and chimes—oh, sing—oh, bell—and ring—oh, listen—oh, world—and turn to heaven—the poor—the rich—the weak and the strong—and the sick—and the needy—oh, the bells—the bells—the bells—s-s-s!"

And I say to you that her one glance at sin made of Cecilia a better woman, wife, and mother than ever she could have been without it.

KATE HEATH.

A POCKET PIECE.

In the hurry and leisure of literature, in the topics selected from the rag-bags of our ancestors (for there is nothing new under the sun), it has always seemed strange to me that the subject of pockets has not received more attention. Perhaps it has had its meed of thought when I was looking another way, as it were. In that case I am an unconscious plagiarist, and must receive forgiveness along with the mighty procession of my fellows. Especially does my subject-matter commend itself to my mind in the present day, when it has reached an importance equaled only by female suffrage and decorative art, with both of which it is immediately connected. At one time the period of pockets marked an epoch in the life of the boy or girl. The freckled, tow-headed youngster with his first pocket was a type of emancipation. It was then he began to live. New possibilities in the world opened up to him. He was like a poet with his fresh-baked rhyme, a young lawyer with his first case, a kitten who had caught its own mouse. He would almost forget his pockets' existence, and then all at once the sublime truth rushed on him again, and he plunged his hands into the olla-podrida of the magic sack and drew forth his marbles or what not, half expecting to see them put on an unfamiliar aspect, because they came out of the new, the delightful pocket. All these emotions followed in a greater or less degree the little girl with her first pocket, and until the period of her first long dress, or the boy's long-tailed coat; nothing usurps the golden recollection of the pocket.

But the times are out of joint now. Civilization-progress has brought uses and abuses, and among them that worst one, dressing children like grown people. They are no longer children—they are marionettes. And the first pocket is no longer a mile-stone in life, for these infants have pockets from the time they can use their hands intelligently. I vow I looked cautiously, the other day, over a flannelly, squirmy, six-days-old lump of flesh, not doubting that I could find, bidden away in the mass of lace and muslin which enveloped it, a receptacle of some kind to hold an infant mouchoir and a coral for teething. My neighbor's sturdy two-year-old comes in with his little dress perforated by pockets, and he wears an infinitesimal ulster, which has flaps and buttons, side pockets, front pockets, back pockets—which is, in short, a fac-simile of his father's. I look on the child with mingled awe and pity. Great heavens! how can a baby of two years appreciate a pocket? And when he grows older, what will there be left in life for him to enjoy? Nothing but measles and whooping-cough. Nay, even these solemn notches in the childish yard-stick do not seem half so deep as in times gone by. But from the first infantile ulster to cigar time, to side-whisker time, to dress-coat time, or to "lean and slipped pantaloon" time, the human masculine "never knoweth any lack"—of pockets. He revels in them, he overflows with them. He carries them as he does his head, and very often they are as empty.

The girl is limited in the pocket line; and those which she does possess are ill placed for comfort or convenience. In the present feminine costume I do not pretend to know where the pocket is. In fact, it isn't anywhere. It is situated according to the exigencies of the draperies or the caprices of the modiste, and nothing but the unerring and much-abused feminine instinct could ever find it without a clue. Reason would falter before the task. But certainly no object could be more pitiable than the careful woman trying to extract from her new overskirt the purse which she would not trust to her shallow sacque-pocket, while the impatient conductor waits grimly before her for "fare," and a sympathizing audience of both sexes watches the struggle. It is an agony which never loses its fascination to the lookers-on. Our fingers tingle with the desire to help the nervous martyr, and an involuntary sigh of relief breaks from our burdened hearts when her countenance says "Eureka." But when the gentle sex puts on the latter-day ulster, she flings defiance to the world on the score of pockets.

I went down town with pretty Flossy S—the other day, and it was beautiful to see the business-like air with which she took out her car-tickets from a tiny slit in her coat-sleeve. Said coat came down to her bronze boot-heels, and had a rugged, self-protecting appearance not to be sniffed at. What with the long coat and Derby hat—set well over her eyes—she was the most delicious travesty of masculinity it was possible to imagine. One could almost swear that the bulging pockets might hold a cigar-case or brandy flask. In fact, I thrilled a little when she put her hand into an inside pocket; but she only drew forth a portemonnaie, which was feminine enough to remove all previous doubts. Flossy's feminine—womanly as such a kitten can be; but she holds a condescending bearing toward her friends lately, which I believe is wholly due to her superiority in the matter of pockets; and I venture to see, in this straw, indications of the political weather: first, pockets, and then, the polls. The possession of pockets gives a certain confidence to their owner. It is a greater leveler, as regards the sexes, than all other sham fights over the suffrage problem. If woman ever comes to have a pistol-pocket, the question of her rights will be definitely settled, even if she had to stop her ears when she fired the pistol. Take away a man's pockets, and what a pitiful object he would become. Does anybody remember seeing a modest diner-out of years ago, fishing for a pocket-handkerchief in the tail of his dress-coat? And were not his contortions calculated to make one forswear polite society forever, rather than risk a like struggle? Reforms in this particular have taken place since then; but my example proves conclusively man's helplessness if he were limited in pockets. My pencil refuses to depict the ruth and ruin which would follow if he were deprived of them entirely. I don't profess to be able to give an historical résumé of pockets. Life is too short, and my brain too narrow; but I commend the topic to some more erudite wielder of the pen. Neither do I dare to say anything regarding the contents of the modern pocket, for that would be stepping outside my province. But if advice be of any avail, I would hint that it is well always to keep some silver to jingle a little, else you will fall into bad odor with your fellow-men.

THE INNER MAN.

Under the title of "The Brute's Revenge," Monsieur Emile Gondeau, a clever and eccentric author, has written for the Revue Moderne et Naturaliste some fantastic verses indicative of the end of all this gormandizing—showing for what we really lard our ribs:

Tu tapes sur ton chien, tu tapes sur ton âne,
Tu mets un mors à ton cheval;
Feroce ment tu fais un spectre de ta canne,
Homme, roi du règne animal.

You beat your dog, you blows the ass must take,
Your horse you bit and rein;
Man, monarch of the world of brutes, you make
A boggy of your cane.
You find a calf, and straight his liver fry—
With parsley deck his nose;
The steak, gashed from the patient ox's thigh,
Unto the gridiron goes.
Roast or (with capers) boiled the sheep appears—
The hare jugged—to your eye;
To capons you convert the chanticleers,
And Venus' doves to pie.
O tender pullet, cackling at the dawn—
O quacking duck sedate—
O gobbling turkey, ignorant that anon
Embalming truffles wait—
Upon them all you cast a baleful eye.
You spare not the spring lamb;
And the doomed porker reads upon his sty:
"Mene, Tekel, Peres, Ham!"
You fish the river, and you seine the sea;
The brook your trout-line feels;
Through you so many widower shad there be,
So many orphaned eels.
You obdurate sardines and soles shall find
To prayers they offer up.
Having in butchery breakfasted and dined,
On slaughter will you sup;
Massacre quail and woodcock in the air—
To salamis bring them down;
The while the cabbage cruelly doth glare
Upon the partridge brown!
'Tis not alone to feed, your bloody steel
Is aimed, nor at tame throats;
For you the bear, the beaver, and the seal
Are mines of overcoats.
You slay the tawny lion, 'mid the heat
Of Africa's desert red,
To make a humble carpet for your feet
Beside your lazy bed.
Murder is not enough—with torture fell
You your jaded sense revive:
"The rabbit," so your books on cookery tell,
"Pleads to be skinned alive!"
His carmine hue the lobster to assume
Boils in the bubbling pot;
And on your fork impaled to living tomb
The living oyster's shot!
But it shall come, the Day of Vengeance due,
The Night of Punishment,
When, underground, within four frail planks, you
Eternally are pent.
For you a recompense in kind shall wait;
Your crime shall breed its curse.
With joy the brutes shall pay you back your hate
That tired the universe.
The vilest of all creatures they will take—
That you would most despise;
The merciless worm shall go and windows make
In the orbits of your eyes.
On lip, tongue, palate, paunch, he'll feed his fill,
And on your skull devour
That which a week ago was Life and Will,
Pride, Fantasy, and Power!
The brutes will laugh to see the Man of Prey
Naught in the great All-become—
The Eater eaten, and a banquet gay
For the avenging worm.

Now that asparagus is fully in season, there is quite a discussion going on as to how it should be eaten—that is, the method of eating. Advocates are found for sticking a fork in it, and elevating it in this way to the mouth. Others maintain that the heads should be cut off. The general and proper method is to take the smooth, white stem in the fingers and abjure the aid of knife or fork. The latter method has its difficulties with some elderly people, however, and one old gentleman is well known who dots himself all over the face with melted butter in vain attempts to aim at the natural orifice. Properly grown, the asparagus shaft is white and polished as ivory, and the point of the shoot of a rich lilac tinge. Grown in this way it is infinitely superior to the sickly, spindling switches, with miserable apologies for pedestals to stand upon, that are cut when tottering consumptively six or eight inches above ground, barely able to sustain their own weight of bitterness and acerbity. It should be observed that the French, who grow the asparagus to the greatest perfection, generally cultivate it in trenches, and nurse it from its infancy with the utmost care. On the continent this esculent is, uniformly prepared by boiling in water until it is perfectly tender, and then served with a "brown butter gravy," or a sauce à la Hollandaise—eating the stalks, which are never cut at table, in the primitive manner with the fingers, and leaving the tougher base of the stalk. "To serve up green asparagus is to dishonor the table," say the French. Here are the details of an asparagus omelet that will be found very toothsome:

Boil half a bunch of asparagus, and cut the tops and tender part into half-inch lengths; season with a little salt, pepper, and butter, and put aside on the stove to keep warm while you make your omelet. Beat six eggs, whites and yolks together, with a teaspoonful of milk for each egg, a saltspoonful of salt, and a pinch of white pepper; brown two tablespoonfuls of butter on a frying-pan; pour your eggs in, and as soon as it begins to set at the edges turn them up and shake your pan to keep the omelet from sticking; it will be sufficiently cooked in five minutes; put your asparagus in, double the omelet, and serve immediately on a hot dish.

The French, says the London Queen, have the credit of being the best cooks in Europe, and although in this respect their merits may sometimes be overrated—and on excellent authority we are given to understand that they are on the wane—certain it is that we have learned much and may learn more from them as to thrifty and appetizing modes of serving dinners. From the Italians, too, we may learn that man does not live by meat alone, but that savory dishes of a most nutritive kind can be and are prepared from vegetable and farinaceous food. From the Germans we should perhaps rather learn about "dinners which ought not to be given," and we may look with surprise rather than with admiration at the curious medleys of food which they devour. But here again we may gather many a useful hint as to the variety of food, vegetable as well as animal, which can be placed, at a moderate cost, on the table of a middle-class household. Then with regard to the sweets, which almost any Hausfrau can prepare with her own hands, we are of opinion that in the matter of "Torte" and "Kuchen" the German would carry off the palm even before the French chef himself.

School-girls who eat slate-pencils and other brain food will be pleased to learn that the former are made in Cincinnati out of soap—that is to say, soap-stone. It is ground into flour, bolted, put into tanks with certain chemicals, and boiled. When reduced to paste, it is moulded into size by being forced through a round hole, rolled down an easy incline, cut to length, placed between sheets of zinc, and dried in a temperature of two hundred degrees Fahrenheit. Then they are put into a furnace and baked. When they are taken out and sharpened, they are all ready to copy examples out of a key, roll curls on, scratch the back of the head with, tickle the ear, or eat.

In Hours with Men and Books the morality of good living is thoroughly discussed, and the assertion made that "a man of the kindest impulses has only to feed upon indigestible food for a few days, and forthwith his liver is affected and then his brain. His sensibilities are blunted; his uneasiness makes him waspish and fretful. He is like a hedgehog with the quills rolled in, and will do and say things from which in health he would have recoiled. Sydney Smith did not exaggerate when he affirmed that "old friendships are often destroyed by toasted cheese, and hard salted meat has often led to suicide." Even so intellectual a man as William Hazlitt, writing to his lady-love, could say: "I never love you so well as when I think of sitting down with you to dinner on a boiled scrag-end of mutton and hot potatoes." Justly did Talleyrand inveigh against the English, that they had a hundred and fifty forms of religion and but one sauce—melted butter. The celebrated scholar, Doctor Parr, confessed a love for "hot lobsters, with a profusion of shrimp sauce." Pope would lie in bed for days at Bolingbroke's, unless he were told that there were stewed lamprays for dinner, when he would rise instantly and hurry down to table. Handel ate enormously; and, when he dined at a tavern, always ordered dinner for three. On being told that all would be ready as soon as the company should arrive, he would exclaim: "Den bring up the dinner, prestissimo. I am de company."

This is childish, but true:

When the little prattling baby is an hungered—
Just after he awakens from his nap—
Why should he look around, and call for mamma,
When the little fellow really wants his pap?

An Englishman, writing of table manners in the United States, says: "There is no conversation here, there can be none. I am every other moment interrupted by the pressing inquiry or injunction, 'Will you have some pickles?' 'Do have some jelly.' 'Try a piece of this brown bread.' No subject, however engrossing, can keep the persistent host or hostess quiet. You must answer whether you will have more meat, more potato, more jam, more pie, more tea."

Walter Savage Landor truly says, in one of his imaginary conversations: "Without the cooks there is no good digestion, and without good digestion no enjoyment of that which is falsely thought to be most remote from the dinner-table. From ill-concocted food rise ill-concocted ideas, and imagination is much indebted to that which she most despises."

A new beverage has been introduced into the polite and fashionable circles of London. It is called "rosy love," and is made of a simple infusion of cherry stalks. This cheering cup, says an English chronicler, is sweetened with quince syrup, topped by whipped cream, and iced. To the amiable mixture may or may not be added wine, and the result is a drink extremely nice and refreshing. It is served at lunch with Narbonne honey, Swiss or Aylesbury cheese, and brown bread and butter cut very thin, and enlivened by fresh water-cress. The Duchesse de Magenta has condescended to honor this novel species of entertainment with her approval, and invitations to partake of it are very properly issued under the name of "Ponche à la Maréchale" in her honor; though justice compels the admission that several of the republican ladies of France have looked upon it with equal favor.

Salads must be as old as the world, and possibly show that atavism in taste which must have belonged to prehistoric man. Does not Oliver Wendell Holmes tell us, somewhere, how the English groom, with a stalk of hay between his lips, recalls the time when his progenitors might have been herbivorous like horses? As to its derivation, the word salad may or may not come from salada, recalling sal or salt, something salted. "Hamlet," in his speech to the players, says: "I remember one said there were no sallets in the lines to make them savory." Voluptuous "Cleopatra" talks of her "salad days," and in Henry IV., "Jack Cade," when seeking "Iden's" garden, declares he went there after a salad "to cool a man's stomach in the hot weather." Be sure of it, Shakespeare knew all about salads, and loved them.

CXXXI.—Sunday, June 6.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Ochra and Tomato Soup.
Fried Trout. Cucumbers.
Chicken a l'Argonaut. String Beans. Summer Squash.
Roast Beef. Potatoes.
Angel's Food. Strawberries, Cherries, Apples, and Oranges.

TO PREPARE CHICKEN A L'ARGONAUT.—See No. 3, Vol. 1.

TO MAKE ANGEL'S FOOD.—Take half a box of gelatine and put it in one quart of rich milk; set it on the range until dissolved, then add six tablespoonfuls of sugar, and the yolks of three eggs well beaten; boil a few minutes. Flavor with wine or vanilla; stir in the whites of the eggs, beaten to a stiff froth; put in moulds to cool. Serve with cream. It is better to prepare this in a "bain-marie," as it is likely to burn,

OUR LETTER BOX.

The Mystery Explained.

DEAR ARGONAUT: I fear you are inclined to be just the least bit skeptical in regard to the future state of mankind. I am, therefore, inclined, in a sort of missionary spirit, to enlighten you; and if you will have a little patience, I will tell you all about it. Our bodies—which St. Paul calls a "temporal body, a temporality, a body pro tempore"—will be "raised" a "spiritual body." In the days of St. Paul—and, indeed, until the time of Franklin—little was known of the nature of electricity. St. Paul knew there was something spiritualizing the body that would not return with the flesh and blood to the earth "as it was," and he could only call it a "spiritual body." It is certain, now, that the body is a compound of bones, muscles, blood-vessels, and so forth, and the nervous system, made sensitive, if not sentient, by the soul, as its messengers to will and to do. Around and pervading all these, moulded to every form and feature, is the imponderable, imperishable body of electricity, with eyes to see and ears to hear—yea, a heart to love. To prove this, you have only to brush your hair in the dark, or to slide your feet upon the carpet, to enable you to light the gas with the tips of the fingers of your electrical body. When we "shuffle off this mortal coil," the soul, with its inseparable electrical body, enters upon its new existence. Death is like the drop-curtain of a theatre—when the little bell rings, off go the flesh and blood, which "can not enter heaven," and the soul, with its spiritual body (with its form, features, and seven senses), beholds the elysian fields and golden cities of the "place" prepared for us. Our mansions are ready with open doors. The gardens blooming, the groves vocal with songs of birds. The dear old body we have left behind us lies white, and cold, and still; our loving survivors, in tears, draw around it. They press the hand, but it gives back no sign; they kiss the pale lips, but there is no response. The tongue is silent, cold, and motionless. It is dead! It returns to the earth as it was, and the spirit to God who gave it. But whither do we go? Where is this "place" "prepared" for us? A great astronomer has said: "We may conclude that wherever the Allwise has exerted His creative power, there also he has placed intelligent beings to adore His goodness." Any star in the heavens might be prepared for the redeemed of earth as their probation here expires; but I will tell you where it is. It is Sirius, the largest and brightest star in the universe. It is in the constellation Canis Major. "It glows in the winter hemisphere," says Burritt, "with a lustre unequalled by any other star in the heavens." It is only twenty millions of millions of miles away; which the lightning-winged soul will travel in a day! The Romans sacrificed a dog to Sirius yearly, to appease its supposed anger. Virgil writes:

"Parched was the grass and blighted was the corn,
Nor 'scaped the beasts, for Sirius from on high
With pestilential heat infects the sky."

This is the "place" made beautiful past the conception of man. We know the velocity of light; it is one hundred and ninety-three thousand miles in a second of time. But what astronomer has been able to compute the speed of electricity? Hence, its adaptability as a body to the soul in its endless explorations of the universe. Immense as is the distance of Sirius from the earth, there are stars a million times further off—e. g., 900,000,000,000 miles from the earth! Thinkest thou the redeemed soul will be straitened for space and objects to occupy its eternity? But where will we be clothed? "Clothed in light," is the answer. You know a ray of light is a fasciculus, or bundle, of different colored threads, like a skein of worsted, red, yellow, orange, etc.—seven. A prism, or a rainbow, will show them all to you. Now the angels weave, with their fingers, these bright threads of light into rainbow-colored robes for the blessed. It is a labor of love, as a lady works slippers for a friend. Will you be good, Mr. Argonaut, and go to heaven? I dare not add an explanatory chapter to the Bible, but this revelation clears away all the mystery of the future state. B.

The Historic Muse.

The reason the ancients had their history at their tongue's end was, that it was done into poetry for them, and learned in that shape. We ourselves all recollect who the Great Marquis was because of the lines, "Come hither, Evan Cameron," etc., while we always tangle on William, Lord Russell, because we have no lines about him. As to the Carpios, though we set them right a score of times we fail to keep them so, all along of Mrs. Hemans's humming verse. I always muddle Naseby and Worcester fights, as I should not do had I first learned of either under some simple graphic form of narrative like the following:

FYTTE THE FIRST.

Near Naseby, in Northamptonshire, was played a royal venture,
Where Skippen, Cromwell, Ireton led the short-hair wings and centre.
The long-knairs ranged beside the king—Prince Rupert led their right wing,
With Langdale on the left to bear the brunt of Cromwell's lightning.

In vain those long-haired cavaliers, their royal standard raising,
Assailed the crop-eared musketeers, their God of battles praising.
Charges in vain the Palatine while thundering squadrons follow—
They charge a more than royal king who heats mere Stuarts hollow.

His pikemen, round him like a wall, bear hack the surge of battle,
And the gentlemen of England bolt, unsparing of their cattle;
Their king found business elsewhere—down southward, toward Dover;
King Cromwell drew the muster-roll, and called his saints' names over:

"Be-steadfast Ginger, Weep-not Fish, Replenish Great-head"— Here, sir!

"File-fornication Bucklehoofs"—All safe, and never fear, sir;
"More-fruit Blow-horn, Return-cocke, Lamentation Cancer, Thankful Crackshield, Wholesome Cheese"—We're every one at hand, sir;

"Go-before Drawsword, Experience Dust"—Experience has dusted;
"Redeemed Dandeyan, Tribulation Crump"—That crumpet's crust is dusted;

"Meek Downyhead, Livewell Barefoot"—Thy servant lives well yet, sir;

"God-be-glorified Drybread, Thankful Ashes"—He's thankful still, you bet, sir.

"Now, praise God who th' elect hath plucked from out the hand of Baal,
And pray he'll yield the Man of Sin to lie within our gaol."

They caught the man; in Whitehall wall they knocked a hole that led off
Upon a scaffolding, and there they hewed his sinful head off.

The above unpretending lines have a great deal more truth than poetry in them, as real history ought to have. And the queer names—every one of which is genuine—might kindle an interest in the subject of English surnames and their significations, than which I know no more fascinating topic. Or take an important episode in our own annals, e. g.:

FYTTE THE SECOND.

In the year of our Lord seventeen eighty-nine
The old thirteen States in an Union combine,
And their President primal elected—
Videlicet, George Washington—dignified soul—
Six feet one in his pumps, and as straight as a pole,
Just as every one had expected.

And again, in the year seventeen ninety-three,
Once more they elect him unanimously—
An occasion impressive and solemn.

His small-clothes were buff, his eyes a gray-blue,
His waistcoat gold-laced, while his hair in a queue
Hung straight down his vertebral column.

To run him in seven-and-ninety they plan;
When he tells them he is not that kind of a man,
And their slate is quite shivered in atoms.

While, sitting right down on that first third-term boom,
He afterward steps down and out to make room
For the bald, stout, and stumpy John Adams.

Now I affirm that there is as much of the real meat of history in those unpolished rhymes—the stuff that sticks by the ribs of memory—as in any chapter entitled "President Washington's Administration" in any school manual. Or suppose we want to impart an incident of local interest, such as the visit to this coast of Sir Francis Drake. Listen:

FYTTE THE THIRD.

Sir Francis Drake was a sailor bold
Who sailed the salt seas over
In quest of Spaniards, in quest of gold,
And aught he might discover.

Off Mazatlan a turtle he caught—
Off the Farallones a Spaniard,
Harpooned the first, the second fought
Till lashed a-lee with a lanyard.

He killed his Spaniards out of hand,
A way they had in those days—
Then went aloft and sighted land,
The same that we call Point Reyes.

He landed on a strip of beach—
No fences then, nor houses—
Below where Shafter's dairymen
Now feed and milk his cowses.

Sir Francis Drake soon sailed away,
Nor claimed he rancho after;
McMillan bought the grant of it,
And he conveyed to Shafter.

You remark at once how simple verse like the above may serve to impress its narrative on the plastic mind of youth, by connecting with it associations of a familiar even though homely sort. However, I am not proposing to write a history, but merely to show how school history ought to be written. S. S. G.

Sounds from Marysville.

Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Parks' compliments for Friday evening, May 21st, inst., at nine o'clock. Soiree dansante.

Mr. and Mrs. Parks outdid themselves in hospitality. The elite of the town were there. There was some singing, of course; that orchestra in Mrs. Goodwin's little white throat again being called upon, and again winning loud applause and its certain encore from clamorous hands, for

"When she speaks, you think each minute
Tis the thrilling of a linnnet;
When she sings, you hear a gush
Of full-voiced sweetness, like a thrush," that is simply irresistible. We noticed many familiar faces—among them the sweet, dainty face of Mrs. Bingham, née Lizzie Filkins. What a sweet, happy, joyous, loving, and lovable little woman she is anyhow! The party, by the way, was given out of compliment to Miss Lulu Parks—daughter of R. F. Parks, of San Francisco—and to Mrs. Bingham. We saw the kindly face of Mr. John H. Jewett, the fun-loving phiz of Judge Keyser—his judicial brow unrent for this occasion—the benevolent-looking Judge Belcher, and the happy faces of the wives of these and other gentlemen. But the heaving visage of Mr. W. C. Belcher, of San Francisco—"the wee and winsome Willie," as he is called, most attracted my attention. He reminded me of Hawthorne's old man, whose face was so sunny that when he went upon the streets the authorities were compelled to follow him up with a sprinkling cart. He had not been here for a long time, and, as he sometimes lived here, the hostess naturally asked him how long he intended to stay. "Never happier," his answer was ready on the instant: "Till three o'clock, madame, if you will permit me."

The warm spring days have come, and pretty little Marysville is dressed in her fairest garb to greet them. The air is redolent with sweets. Last Sunday, while the church-bells were making catholic the morning air, I slipped out of town to perform my devotions in the primitive way. Outside and all around—

The fields are bent
With a full content,
And the amber cups hold a precious scent
Of bread in the lustrous stalk;—
And the bright cherries hang over the wall,
And the bluebird echoes the yellow bird's call;
And the sun lies goldenly over all
As the happy rustics talk.

I pass on and wander up the bank of the Yuba—up past the places where the daisy-beds and the long, bright patches of grass were, up past the places where the hare and the antelope slept in the shade of its pleasant trees, and where flowers of every hue and shape looked down upon it from green and grassy banks that bordered it, for all of these places are now hurried fathoms deep under the debris of the miner's enterprise. Man forgot the beauty of nature, or rather did not choose to remember it, and to-day the trunks of blasted trees and long stretches of sand mark the grave of what were once the fairest, most fertile, and most valuable meadows in California. Equally mournful is the history of the river—an unwritten poem, worthy of reading over and over, striking in detail, and powerful as a whole—a poem of sadness, for it is made up of strange elements: waste, death, and deformity. All the hills that border on the stream are parts of the poem. Every winding ditch, every forgotten flume, every pile of boulders in the rugged gulches; every uncovered mountain breast, sometimes red with blood, sometimes white with death—all these are so many stanzas of the poem, full of vivid interest. Many a ruined and forsaken cabin is a paragraph, having for its lines the fragments of that earlier home life and industry which have come down to us in various but imperfect forms. Inscriptions, too, are a part of the poem—written with steel on the gray rocks on the hillsides, or cut in the trees that line the river banks. And the graveyards—the lone, forgotten graveyards, where nobody cares to weep—up on the rocky hillsides, in the broad glare of the sun; down by the pleasant rivulets hastening to the stream. Close by the stream itself, that sings an incessant requiem; sometimes two or three in a group, marked with no enclosures, having no tombstones to tell of the silent sleepers, with no flowers save those that God has given them, and with now and then a rough cross to mark the faith of the dead in his lifetime. Oh, all of these things are so many passages of touching pathos, that stir the heart-strings like the solemn sounds of a de profundis. For here is erected the monument to Nature, who lies buried here—slain by the hands of them to whose needs she ministered; and over her dead face is written this legend of tears and bitterness: "Ichabod! Ichabod!" OMNIUM GATHERUM.

MARYSVILLE, May 27, 1880.

The opening of the Hotel del Monte, at Monterey, will be celebrated this evening by a hop, a large number of guests from this city participating. The hotel is a marvel of elegance, convenience, and comfort; the surrounding grounds and drives very attractive, and the indications for a brilliant season all that the projectors could desire. In fact, Monterey and the Hotel del Monte will be the fashionable rendezvous for the summer months.

In a lengthy obituary notice of a prominent Western man, the leading local paper makes this remarkable statement: "The corpse was elegantly clad by direction of his devoted wife, and his casket was made to conform, as far as possible, with the comforts he was wont to surround himself in the home he had left."

ALL ABOUT THE WOMEN.

The spring suits of Chicago women are mostly for divorce.

The worst virago resembles a flower—she shuts up when she is asleep.

Bear in mind that a glove on the hand is worth half a dozen on an undecided bet.

King Theebau's mother-in-law tried to poison him recently. Now she sleeps in the valley.

The most intellectual women are not those who talk best, but who make others talk well.

A Nevada Indian maiden is going through life with the beautiful name of Drifting Goose.

Love is said by a late explorer to be "a little sighing, a little crying, a little dying, and a deal of lying."

There is a young woman in Arkansas so sweet that she has to wear a wire net to keep off the honey bees.

Alabama girls are the shyest about eloping. One of them waited till she was seventy-nine before she felt equal to it.

An Illinois woman who had her corset torn off by lightning says that the sensation was something like being tossed over a fence by a cow.

A young lady just home from boarding-school, on being told by the servant that they had no gooseberries, exclaimed: "Why, what has happened to the goose?"

Women have never forgiven Lady Mary Wortly Montague for saying: "The only satisfaction I have in being a woman is that I shall not be compelled to marry one of my own sex." Her sin is unpardonable.

They settle love affairs peremptorily in Arkansas. One young "lady" was incensed at the action of another, rode to her house on horseback, called her out, and plunged a Bowie knife through her throat.

Rogers did not like the wife of one of his friends. He explained that the Italian banditti wanted to carry off his friend, but his wife flung her arms around her husband's neck. "Rather than take her too they let him go," said Rogers.

A noted parson said last Sunday: "I have known well-dressed people who were good church-members, and poorly-dressed ones who were anything except Christians." And Mrs. Shoddington in her new hat cast a look of withering contempt at Mrs. Phillaber.

A Philadelphia man, just married, says that he was first induced to seek the society of his wife by the beauty of her arm. He adds that she presented a three-quarter view at the moment when the fascination seized him. She was washing the front windows, probably.

She asked him if he didn't admire the dust-brown tint of her hair, and he said he didn't know it was that color—thought it was more the color of cold roast lamb. There was such a sudden coolness in that room just then that she neglected to ask him to take his overcoat off.

A stepmother in a recent novel is presented in this light: "The mainspring of her character is an almost, if not wholly, insane craving for affection, which manifests itself in a complete indifference to the happiness and comfort of the persons who are unlucky enough to be objects of her troublesome love."

A Philadelphia lady is so opposed to anything suggestive of card-playing that she will not even have a deal table in her kitchen. And she wants to be translated, like Elijah, so that she may escape "shuffling" off this mortal coil. And she can't bear to hear any allusion to Gabriel's "last trump," and won't have a "tray" in the house.

James Smith hugged and kissed a girl against her will in a Galveston street, and she had him arrested. He was fined fifteen dollars, which he paid, and went home congratulating himself that he had got out of the scrape easily. But he was mistaken. His wife met him at the door with a rolling-pin, knocked him down, and pounded him until he was insensible.

To Miss Mary Anderson a Western poet has addressed some lines beginning:

"Fair flower of the lea,
And hearty rare,
Sweet wavelet of the sea,
Are you still there?"

A girl at Stenbenville, Ohio, aged sixteen, was horse-whipped by her father for receiving attentions from a young man. The girl's mother and a married sister interfered, and were themselves severely castigated. The affair caused a great sensation—in places. The man's wife declares she will leave him, which will deprive him of the benefit of twenty thousand dollars recently inherited by the wife and daughter.

A Louisville woman bought some Louisville and Nashville stock at thirty-eight. It advanced to forty-one, and she desired to sell out, but she had mislaid the certificate and could not find it. The price kept on rising till it reached one hundred. She employed a lawyer to try to obtain a new certificate, but the proceedings were delayed. At length she found the document, just as the stock was quoted at one hundred and forty-one, at which figure she sold, and then fainted.

THE SECRET OF THE EBONY BEDROOM.

I.—AFTER THE BALL.

It was eight o'clock of a dreary winter's day. Monsieur Lecoq, on special duty at the Grand Opera ball, was on his way west past the Grand Hotel when he met a policeman who informed him that there was "something up" in the Rue Canmartin. However much he merited repose, Monsieur Lecoq quickened his steps. But he had been anticipated by the ward commissary of police. A crowd was at the carriage gateway of No. 35, the mansion of the Count of Montfort Ste. Croix.

The first room on the first floor had been barricaded by a heavy piece of furniture which it had taken two powerful men to move back. The castors had been removed to prevent it being rolled away. Not a thing in the dining-room was disordered. The doors of a reception room were open, and a ball dress was spread over three chairs. In the sleeping apartment were the policemen, servants, and public commissary. The latter glanced around and recognized Lecoq with some relief in his eyes, but the new-comer did not return his salutation. He could not. Accustomed though he was to sights of bloodshed and crime, the present scene shocked him into silence and immobility.

The room was very large and lofty, hung with maroon, and paneled in ebony and gold. In the very centre lay stretched the lifeless remains of a beautiful young lady—the countess—only partly covered by a table-cloth, which she had clutched and dragged over her in her fall. The corner of the lips was still curled in a smile, as if to mock at the idea of the fate which had abruptly overtaken youth and beauty. The superb and sombre decoration, in the very latest taste of that day, was most appropriate to the picture. The boudoir door was open, and everything was topsy-turvy there. The graceful body had stiffened in a lace deshabille which had cost the Brussels nuns some years of spider-like toil. Her long, fair tresses formed a golden pillow under her head, and half-veiled a small sword-wound on the bosom—the egress of the blade, for she had been run through from behind. The carpet was crimson, and hardly betrayed the blood, but a white fox rug was horribly dabbled. A wax candle stood on the floor, nearly burnt out. A very long, thin rapier, with a chiseled bowl, whose place was vacant in a trophy of arms on the wall, lay on the rug. It was the count's ancestral sword. The bed bore no trace of a struggle there. Suddenly a little rosy froth effervesced on the lady's lips, which parted, and the eyes, if possible, stared a trifle wider. The cold air brought in by Lecoq had mechanically affected the corpse. But the servants started in terror.

"I have had no time to do anything," said the commissary, after the detective explained how he came there. "I have sent for a magistrate. Nobody is under arrest."

It was an appeal for him to begin the inquiry. The first thing manifest was that the murderer or murderers had not left the house in an ordinary course. The porter had let no one out since his mistress came home from the ball. The next to arrive were the coachman and the lady's maid, who had been to the opera ball also, but not together, and had not known of each other's presence. On going up stairs, they had heard footsteps in their mistress's room. The barricaded door had baffled them. The porter had helped the coachman to remove the block, and then all three had discovered the dead woman. But not a glimpse of her assassin.

At Lecoq's suggestion, they were put under arrest and guarded, separately.

"In fifteen years," said Lecoq, growing more and more serious as he found jewels and cash untouched, "I have met no crime so obscure."

They examined the servants individually, but their statements tallied. The countess was haughty, but not to her domestics. She could hardly have made an enemy in the house. She had given leave for the coachman—as her escort came for her in his carriage—and maid to spend the night out. The count had mining property in the Alps, and was at Geneva engaging an engineer.

"He should be telegraphed to at once," advised Lecoq. "Betsy, as they call you," he proceeded, to the tiring-woman, "did you see your mistress at the ball?"

"She did not go to the opera ball, sir," was the answer, "to my knowledge, but to the masquerade at the Spanish banker's—Hermanoz."

"Who was the gentleman who called for her?"

"She did not know. But the porter knew. The Marquis de Medranc's carriage had come, and had brought her back. She had gone up the staircase alone—alone, beyond a doubt."

"The marquis has the next house," observed the commissary. "Can we ask him to assist the inquiry?" Lecoq considered.

"The magistrate's order would do it. But let us risk it. Let Gerold request his presence."

Meanwhile, they resumed the search for articles from the apartments, other than those visible.

The Marquis de Medranc was prompt in responding to the summons. He was in evening dress. He was good-looking, and had been a fop a few years back. He was pale. He had heard the news from his servants, no doubt, or the crowd at the door would have enlightened him. He knelt down by the dead body a while in silence. But there was nothing unnatural in his not expatiating upon the dreadfully sudden death of his recent partner in the waltz. Every feature had been attentively regarded by Lecoq and the police official.

"We understand you accompanied the countess to a ball," began the latter.

"It was to Monsieur Hermanez's. My poor friend, whose husband did not wish her cooped up in his absence, requested my arm and carriage, and having spent the early part of the night, I brought her to her door. I went to my club, but I was too tired to play, lost a few napoleons, and came home."

"Did you see the lady to this door?"

"This? No, no! She would not even let me leave the carriage. I may say, whatever value the information possesses, that the windows were lighted up when I came home a second time."

"Can you form any opinion about this crime?"

"Really, I know so little about the Montfort family—"

"Excuse me, my lord," said Lecoq, with pretended bluntness, "but we know your lordship to be quite in the world of fashion. Who has been accused of being this poor lady's cicisbeo?"

"The Count of Montfort," answered he, testily, turning red after paling, "is a splendid fellow. She idolized him. Why, this will break his heart when he learns it. But who will impart the news?"

"That has been done," answered the official.

An hour after, the body having been placed on the bed, a magnificent mass of rare flowers came from the marquis, which Betsy, released as guiltless, arranged with taste.

By the midnight train and a cab driven at reckless speed, the count arrived. His wife, surrounded by the blossoms and lying upon black velvet in that gloomy room, seemed only sleeping. Betsy had plaited her long flaxen tresses. Gontran de Montfort strode up to the bed, having kept his countenance up to that moment; but then, nature having been overstrained, he fell on his knees, embracing the clay-cold idol, and sobbed her name. The servants repeated through the mansion, in a tone which testified to the rarity of the event: "My lord had tears in his eyes!"

In the morning Monsieur Lecoq called to say that he had been specially entrusted with the case.

"I am sorry to tell your lordship, though," he remarked, "that the affair is inexplicable so far. But we are bound to pierce the mystery."

The nobleman looked at him sadly, and answered:

"It is useless for you to look after the murderer of my loved one. He is no common criminal. I have no other aim in life now. And when I meet him, believe me, I shall not call in the law to execute him."

This speech seemed out of place on the lips of a Breton gentleman, a race noted for religious and law-abiding traits.

II.—BEFORE THE BULLETS.

Like all rich capitalists, Marquis Hector de Medranc found himself half ruined by the Franco-Prussian war. He hastened to Paris the moment the gates were opened, from his Italian retreat, and found his house property—nearly all centrally located—in good preservation. Absorbed in his preparations, he was in Paris on the 18th of March, 1871.

The marquis had hidden in his hotel of the Rue Canmartin. The gates were solid, his servants well paid. He heard the firing in the Parc Monseau with joy, as it betokened an advance of the government troops against the insurrectionists. It was at this juncture that a young woman in the red zouave dress of a vivandiere of Flourens' Avengers presented herself at the gates—her name, Assie Koragon. A Breton girl from his own estates passed her into his presence.

"My lord," said she, "I heard at the council of the Commune, in the Expiatory Chapel, that you are known to be here, and a detachment is on the way to take you out. They are enraged that you should have lived here a spy so long."

His laugh of contempt was cut short by one of those knocks at the guarded door which seldom come to noblemen's portals—either from a king's lackeys or the people's. It was a dozen musket-butts. Some one fired a shot from within.

"That's a fool!" cried the marquis; "against my order! Those men of mine will be massacred."

"And me, too," said the girl.

"Don't you tremble, my lass; the old fox has more than one gap to his burrow."

The listener smiled secretly, with unaccountable joy.

Meanwhile the door had been broken down. A dozen shots were fired. A crowd of men invaded the mansion. The girl clung to the gentleman in trepidation.

"Make haste! This way," he said.

There was a suit of armor on a panel. He pressed one of the hundred ornaments on the frames, and the whole panel turned round so as to disclose the countess's boudoir, of Montfort House. As soon as they entered there, the marquis closed the second panel.

They could hear indistinctly the uproar of the Federals seeking the fugitives.

"Hiss away, vipers! You have lost your prey."

But suddenly a powerful voice thundered on the other side of them in the ebony bedroom:

"Shut that door; we have enough here already."

"My father!" exclaimed the girl, joyfully.

"Koragon!" added the marquis, with equal glee. "So the Versailles troops have arrived already."

A gray but hale peasant, in rustic attire, but with a scarlet band on his left arm and in a military cap, appeared on the boudoir threshold, Remington rifle in hand.

"You see, father, I have kept my word," cried the girl, ranging herself by the new-comers and drawing a revolver.

"Betrayed!" exclaimed Medranc. "What! a Breton, who believes in the saints, on the side of these atheists and disrespecters of property and family!"

"My lord," rejoined the old peasant, by force of habit, "you are a Breton, but you forgot the saints when you displaced my son from his humble curacy; and where was your respect for property when you stole away the affections of Lady Montfort?"

"And where was yours for family when you murdered the poor lady here—here! in the night!" cried Assie Koragon, furiously. "Brothers, this is the murderer of the Countess of Montfort. He came in by this secret way and slew her because she rejected him. Slay him, or I myself will do it!"

"Fire!" cried Koragon. "Fire on a hater of the people!" A dozen bullets shattered his breast. But the volley was drowned by the tumult in the street. The regulars had taken the chapel, and were clearing the streets.

Half an hour afterward Count Montfort, colonel of the second battalion, Gardes Mobiles, entered the bouse, where he understood there had been fighting, but he noticed little damage. In the ebony chamber lay a huddled-up figure.

"A man shot!" cried the soldier, unconcernedly.

Gontran stooped over the body. A paper was pinned, as only a woman pins papers, to his tattered breast:

The Marquis de Medranc—shot for firing on the people, and for the murder of the Countess of Montfort.

Witness:

ASSIE KORAGON.

"Assie! My wife's fond sister. Medranc here, the murderer of my poor wife. This is the hand of retribution!"

The panel had flown open at the explosion of the guns. The secret of the ebony chamber was laid bare.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

In Memoriam.

On the bosom of a river
Where the sun unloosed his quiver,
On the star-lit stream forever
Sailed a vessel light and free;
Morning dew-drops hung like manna
On the bright folds of her banner,
While the zephyrs rose to fan her
Softly to the radiant sea.

At her prow a pilot—beaming
In the flush of youth—stood dreaming,
And he was in glorious seeming
Like an angel from above;
Through his hair the breezes sported,
And, as on the wave he floated,
Of the pilot, angel-throated,
Warbled lays of hope and love.

Through those locks, so brightly flowing,
Buds of laurel bloom were blowing,
And his hands anon were throwing
Music from a lyre of gold;
Swiftly down the stream he glided,
Soft the purple wave divided,
And a rainbow arch abided
On his canvas' snowy fold.

Anxious hearts, with fond devotion,
Watched him sailing to the ocean,
Praying that no wild commotion
Might the elements might rise;
And he seemed some young Apollo,
Charming summer winds to follow,
While the water-crag's corolla
Trembled at his music's sighs.

But those purple waves enchanted
Rolled beside a city haunted
By an awful spell, that daunted
Every comer to her shore;
Night shades rank the air encumbered,
And pale marble statues, numbered
Where the lotus-eaters slumbered,
And woke to life no more.

Then there rushed, with lightning quickness,
O'er his face a mortal sickness,
And the dew in fearful thickess
Gathered o'er his temples fair;
And there swept a dying murmur
Through the lively southern summer,
As the beautiful pilot came
Perished by that city there.

Still rolls on that radiant river,
And the sun unbinds his quiver
O'er the star-lit stream forever,
On its bosom, as before;
But that vessel's rainbow banner
Gleets no more the gay savanna,
And that pilot's lute drops manna
On the purple waves no more.

An Allegory.

When Eve had led her lord astray,
And Cain had killed his brother,
The stars and flowers, the poets say,
Agreed with one another
To cheat the cunning tempter's art,
And teach the world its duty,
By keeping on its wicked heart
Their eyes of light and beauty.

"A million sleepless lids," said they,
"Will be at least a warning—
The flowers can keep watch by day,
The stars from eve till morning."
O'er bill and prairie, field and lawn,
Their dewy eyes upturning,
The flowers keep watch from redd'ning dawn
Till western skies are burning.
Alas! each hour of daylight tells
A tale of shame so crushing,
Some turn as white as sea-bleached shells,
And some are always blushing.

And when the patient stars look down,
Their light on all discoverers—
The traitor's smile, the murderer's frown,
And lips of lying lovers,
They try to shut their saddening eyes,
And in the vain endeavor
We see them twinkling in the skies,
And so they wink forever.

The Patient Angler.

An Angler sat by an old saw-mill,
And angled away in the flowing rill,
Dreaming of fish that, traditions say,
Deep in those waters bide away;
Pickerel, perch, eels and bull-pout,
And, legend whispered, a speckled trout.
This last named fish must be taken on spec,
No man ever saw his head or his neck;
One man had seen the end of his tail
Going down stream like an express mail.

But to our tale. As I said before,
The patient Angler sat by the shore,
And the tools of his trade around him lay—
Hackles, dun, brown, red, speckled, and gray,
And flies artificial, of every hue,
Millers, grubs, and grasshoppers too;
And good old Walton's Angler Complete,
The fisherman's Bible, lay at his feet.
As thus he sat and angled away,
He gently spoke to this fisherman gray:
"Holloa! my friend, how goes the fight
With the finny tribes? Hadst e'er a bite?"
"Not yet," he sighed, and whispered low:
"I've only been here a day or so."

Time rolled on, and I passed that way;
There sat the Angler, old and gray.
The bormet had built a nest in his hat,
His shoes were the homes of the sportive gnat,
And yellow-jackets were coming to rest
Within the folds of his peaceful vest;
Earwigs, horseflies, and beetles brown
Were sporting around his snowy crown;
But there he sat by the old saw-mill,
Happy, contented, and patient still.
As thus he sat and angled away,
He gently spoke to this fisherman gray:
"Holloa! my friend, how goes the fight
With the finny tribes? Hadst e'er a bite?"
"Not yet," he sighed, and whispered low:
"I've only been here a month or so."

BOAT LIFE IN SIAM.

[A lady once resident in Siam has favored the Argonaut with the following interesting account of boat life in that vaguely known land.]

Before one can understand Siam and its people, it is first necessary to appreciate that the greater part of the country is one vast swamp, at least during October and November, at the close of the rainy season; only the highest knolls remaining entirely above the floods caused by both the rain and the sea. This, added to the clayey soil—which, during the rainy season, may be cracked and dusty one hour, and ankle-deep in mud the next—makes much road-making quite impracticable. The four parallel rivers, and the network of canals and bayous, are the natural highways of the country. Many of these canals are dry at low tide; consequently amphibians abound—alligators, caymen, water-snakes, water-rats, crabs, prawns, a little silvery fish which lies, apparently comfortable, on the mud in the broiling sun until the next tide, a lively creature resembling a lizard with only two legs, etc. The Siamese themselves are often called amphibious by foreigners, and certainly the lower classes seem as much at home in the water as the boys at Aden; and in boating, some say they are not equaled anywhere in the world. Many are born, live, and die in boats not twenty feet long. These people are not of a different race, as in China; the next month they may have rice-fields or fruit-gardens, or be house-servants of their masters or of foreigners. But men, women, and children of the lower and middle classes can almost always row and paddle.

The number and apparent variety of the craft on the river at Bangkok is bewildering to strangers, but the native boats are of a few classes—all being dug out of teak, that being almost the only wood used in the country. I have seen one skiff so small and light that two little girls were in the habit of carrying it to and from the river, some rods from the house; it was less than seven feet long, less than two feet wide, a thin dug-out, with neatly tapered ends, spread in the middle by steaming and driving wedges. There was a board, perhaps four inches high, along the top of the sides, else the side-centres—so spread—would have dipped water. In the stern was a seat, where the owner sat, carefully upright and motionless in body, plying a short paddle, sometimes entirely on one side. Boats like this, only from ten to fifteen feet long, are now seen everywhere, and are remarkably swift and manageable in the hands of the Siamese; but if a European ventures, ever so carefully, to set foot in one, it promptly tips over, and goes to the bottom in a trice. Chinamen sometimes manage them very well. Another kind is several inches above water, wider, with a loose deck. The gulf fishermen put their fish inside, and four men row standing, going with the rising tide twenty-five miles up the river, to Bangkok, each crew striving to be first at the fish-market, where their fish must be counted or weighed, and duties paid, before they can be sold. Gliding dimly through the morning fog, or silhouetted against the evening glow, on the broad, rippling river, these flat, bare boats, with the four sinewy, dark figures swaying in unison, are strangely fascinating. A similar boat has the deck taken off the middle. Another boat, still higher and wider, indeed almost oval in shape, drifts quite helplessly about, loaded with something for sale—Chinese earthenware, European lamps and drinking-glasses; cloths—white, blue, and Turkey red; small figured prints; Chinese ready-made clothing; boatmen's suits and hats; white jackets and Siamese waist-cloths; dark-green and orange arica-nuts; light-green cocoa-nuts or pumbeoes; neat packages of bright betel-leaf; piled high with great pale-red water-jars, shaped like the old Roman jars found at Pompeii; palm-leaf thatch, or bunches of grass for horses and elephants; salt firewood from the sea-shore; or sapan and rosewood for the ships. It looks impossible to tip these boats over, but why nothing ever falls off is a mystery, especially as all other boats push them about. In still another boat families live, and in a nicely-made variety of them the nobility formerly traveled, before steam-launches were imported. This style of boat may be from fifteen to twenty-five feet long, and four to six feet wide. The ends have a deck of loose boards; the central half is covered by a straight-sided, flat-topped house, of wood-work, or a barrel-shaped one of close basket-work, thickly covered with damar. The inside of this house may be open to the hull, except a bench on each side; or may be decked like the rest, with loose boards; other upright boards, sliding in grooves, close the ends, unless one end is permanently closed, with a round or square window scarcely more than a foot across. The easy, matter-of-course way in which men and women go from one end of the boat to the other through this window is astonishing. It looks impossible to a new-comer, but before he can say that the thing can not be done, out comes one foot, and then the head, and the whole supple Asiatic body glides through. They think it much easier than going over the roof, which is only about four feet from the keel and six feet long. Europeans and Chinamen sometimes vault on one end and slide off the other. This is very well on a flat-topped house; but the rounded, varnished roofs are not so easy to sit upon, especially as the boats are generally cranky. In this house, and between decks, are the family, and all their clothing, furniture and merchandise.

By observing one family for a day some understanding may be gained of their life. Yesterday they bought sugar-cane cheaply of a Chinaman (who must always have his poll-tax ready, just as in California); and at another farm-house they found a few plantains of a kind that are rare at this time of the year. They spent the night a mile outside of the city, for greater safety. The first part of the night the son sat up on the deck and watched for thieves, and sang in the moonlight. When the moon set he fell asleep. When the morning star rose the father rose also, and waked the son, who said he had not slept and had almost caught some thieves. It is now morning. The mother comes out. There is no trouble about her toilet, for the single garment which is essential is a cloth reaching from the waist over the front of the knees—alike for both men and women, and worn day and night. The man, finding the morning air cool, puts on an old white cotton jacket, and his wife wraps her shoulder-cloth around her; originally it was pink, but repeated washings in the muddy streams have made it mud-color. The younger children are not troubled with clothing. The tide is not quite high enough, and it is decided to breakfast now. Lifting some deck-boards, they take out the coarse, unglazed earthen fire-place, rice-pot and curry-pot, and the fire-wood or charcoal, and make a fire. They call that indispensable foreign luxury, matches, "wood-scratch-fire." The fire-place is like a very large plate, with a rim a few inches high running half-way around it. One bulb-shaped pot is set on the rim, and the other beside it; the rim saves heat and makes a draught. Steamers are sometimes used, or a kind of gem-baker, with a little cover, or waffle-irons—all earthen. A fish is caught, cut into lumps without dressing, and put in the curry-pot with a quart of water, a handful of peppers, and perhaps some astringent leaves or aromatic seeds. This compound is simmered a little, and the rice is steamed until it is white and a little softened; then the rice is dipped into small bowls, the curry placed on the top, and the thumb and first and second fingers of the right hand roll it into balls and put it in the mouth. Formerly the man ate first and alone; now, usually, all eat together. All wash their own bowls, then rinse the mouth and rub the teeth with the forefinger, and drink heartily. The oars are now brought out. They are long, with a piece across the small end, like the bottom of the letter L. One hand takes hold of this; with a loop of tough bark, called pace, the oars are swung and twisted on the oar-posts, about eighteen inches high, just inside the gunwale. There are two oars before and two behind the house.

The father takes the stern oar, managing the horizontal tiller with his foot. The long bamboos driven in the mud at stem and stern, to which the boat is fastened by a ring of pace, or an iron chain and hook, are pulled up, and they row away, standing much like Venetian gondoliers. Finding many market-boats, they wink at each other, and follow them to the floating market. A large, old traveling-boat is anchored there, and the owner pays a high rental to the owner of the land opposite for the right to levy a tax on the boats which swarm there in the early morning to sell fruit and vegetables. There is no small noise and commotion here from six to eight A. M. The boats are of the three kinds described, the larger ones anchored stern to the shore, the smaller ones drifting about; and very picturesque they are with their many-colored wares and tawny owners, and here and there a small awning or colored umbrella or queer Siamese hat. Moving warily in the crowd this family begins selling, but soon the sharp eyes of the market farmer discover them, and he orders them to pay the tax or leave—they choose the latter, and drift down the river. The children fret and are quieted with sugar-cane; the brittle bark is stripped off with a knife—the remainder is cut into mouthfuls, which are chewed till the juice is all extracted, and the woody fibres are spit out into the water. A foreigner coming up, observing the keen relish with which the whole family enjoy it, determines to try it; they see he is a stranger and set the price accordingly, and he goes away with two sticks a foot in length, for which he has paid the value of their entire stock. This piece of good luck so elates them that they must do something extraordinary; and the father and oldest boy determine to go to a cock-fight. They moor at a temple landing; the whole family plunges into the water, and have a fine frolic; when they have had enough of this, they stand in shallow water, and rub themselves with mud for soap, then rinse it off; the baby is well washed and taught to float—they sometimes swim before they can walk—then they scramble aboard. Dry cloths are then brought out, one is laid over the dripping garment, which is then loosened and falls around the feet. This cloth is eight feet long and two and a half wide, of dark, small-figured chintz, with broad bordered ends. It is first folded around, then the remainder is rolled into a broad strip which goes from the waist in front down between the knees and up to the back of the waist, where it is tucked in—except the end, which is allowed to hang like a tuft; the two sides in front being twisted and tucked in a strange fashion, and another tuft hangs there. They dress—according to their peculiar ideas of comfort and elegance—with a few twitches. Those who did not wash the mud off their feet as they came into the boat, now sit on the edge and swing their feet in the water till they are clean. The large piece of thatch or basket-work which has been lying on the roof is now dragged forward, until one end rests on the roof and the other is propped by a bamboo; and under this awning they sit—serenely, deliciously moist and cool. Cigarettes are smoked, and fresh quids of betel prepared. The hair is combed with a wooden comb; the parents wear their hair in the old style—that is, the head is shaved, except a large dense tuft above the forehead, and the woman has also an I-shaped lock in front of the ears; the children's hair is coiled above the forehead, but the young man wears his in the new fashion, parted in the middle, two or more inches long. They all use coconut oil for dressing the hair. Father and son now climb the landing, and take their way to the nearest cock-fight. The mother puts everything away, and leaving two children to take care of the boat, she takes the two youngest, the baby astride of her hip, and goes for a stroll in the markets. Returning, they unmoor, and drift down stream, selling most of their remaining stock. About sunset they moor for the night, bathe again, and have rice and curry; the latter made this time of fleshy, mucilaginous, and somewhat fragrant flowers the mother picked while ashore. Tired by their unusual walking, all sleep early and soundly. About two o'clock come the dreaded river-thieves, three or four men in a light skiff silently drifting alongside; the deck boards are quietly lifted, and the rest of the sugar-cane, and firewood, and rice-pot are transferred to the robbers' boat.

Imagine miles of river and canals swarming with every variety of the boats described, and other kinds undescribed—the foreigners' house-boats, usually painted white, made of planks, slow and heavy, but safer for the owners; steam launches and traveling-boats, of every imaginable size and style and many colors; canoes, covered in, the owner plying a long two-bladed paddle; ship's gigs, European sail-boats, post-boats, steam yachts, gunboats, ocean steamers, ships, barks, schooners—English, American, Italian, French, Dutch, Danish, Portuguese, German; lorchas, Chinese junks of all varieties, from a European model to the Hainan junk with high poop and vermilion bows—all with mat sails and bright flags and a great eye on each side of the bow ("no have eyes, how can see? no can see, how can go?"). All these give one some idea of the great mixed multitude of many nations which are always to be found in Bangkok. M. H. JONES.

SENSE AND SENTIMENT.

Frances Burney: Generosity without delicacy, like wit without judgment, generally gives as much pain as pleasure.

Anaxagoras: Nothing can be known, nothing can be learned, nothing can be certain, sense is limited, intellect is weak, life is short.

Bulwer: Nothing is so agonizing to the fine skin of vanity as the application of a rough truth.

Madame de Rémusat: No human passion is so easily aroused or grows so rapidly as vanity.

Bulwer: If ever the consciousness of strength is pleasant, it is when we are thought the most weak.

Bolingbroke: What a foe not only to life, but to all that dignifies and ennobles it, is time!

Winwood Reade: The passion for praise is innate in the human mind.

Jeremy Taylor: Friendship is like rivers, and the strand of seas, and the air—common to all the world; but tyrants and evil customs, wars and want of love, have made it proper and peculiar.

Colton: Nothing is so blind and suicidal as the selfishness of vice.

Herschel: Knowledge is not, like food, destroyed by use, but rather augmented and perfected.

Sterne: The Lord tempers the wind to the shorn lamb.

Landor: Men of high estate grow tired of contentedness.

Canning: Any man may be occasionally mistaken as to the means most conducive to the end which he has in view; but if the end be just and praiseworthy, it is by that he will be ultimately judged, either by his contemporaries or by posterity.

Hutton: What the mind is bent upon obtaining, the hand seldom fails in accomplishing.

Barbault: Most of the unhappiness in the world arises rather from disappointed desire than from positive evil.

Koran: A mountain may change its place, but a man will not change his disposition.

Emerson: A great man is the greatest of occasions.

Herbert Spencer: Volumes might be written upon the impurity of the pious.

Dr. Deems: It seems as though it would forever be impossible for us to determine how near a probability can approach a certainty without becoming identical with that certainty.

Goethe: One must weigh men by avoirdupois weight, and not by jewelers' scales; as, unfortunately, friends too often weigh one another in their hypochondriacal humor, and in an over-exacting spirit.

Froude: To the commonplace man the uncommonplace is forever unintelligible.

George W. Kyle:

Words are but words, and words are cold—
When many are written but little is told;
For a thirsty heart finds but little drink
Angling for words in a pool of ink.

Sir Philip Sidney: Youth will never live to age unless they keep themselves in breath with exercise and in heart with joyfulness.

Italian proverb: A good knight is never at a loss for a lance.

Longfellow: Look not mournfully into the past—it comes not back again; wisely improve the present—it is thine; go forth to meet the shadowy future without fear.

Madame de Staël: Frivolity, under whatever form it appears, takes from attention its strength, from thought its originality, from feeling its earnestness.

Addison: Mere bashfulness without merit is awkwardness; and merit without modesty, insolence. But modest merit has a double claim to acceptance, and generally meets with as many patrons as beholders.

Edwin Arnold: The thoughts ye can not stay with brazen chains a girl's hair lightly binds.

McCosh: The book to read is not one which thinks for you, but the one which makes you think.

Bailey: Great thoughts stand up like church spires 'mid village cots.

Emerson: Thought is the poetry of those only who can entertain it.

D'Aubigne: Ideas make their way in silence, like the waters that, filtering behind the rocks of the Alps, loosen them from the mountain in which they rest.

Bailey:

The beautiful are never desolate;
Some one always loves them—God or man.
If man abandons, God takes them.

Daniel Webster: Accompany your own flag throughout the world under the protection of your own cannon.

Byron:

The drying up a single tear has more
Of honest fame than shedding seas of gore.

S. J. Wilson, D.D.: Adhesiveness is a great element of success. Genius has glue on his feet, and will take hold of a marble slab.

Gough: Eloquence does not require mellifluous words and long sentences. It is often found in rough, uncouth garb, just as the lightning often gleams from rugged thunder clouds.

Bancroft: Style is the gossamer on which the seeds of truth float through the world.

Anon: From the woman's side we derive our intellectual faculties; from the man's we derive our moral.

Alfieri: Imperceptible is the line which separates the germ of our virtues and vices.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1880.

At this writing—Friday noon, and our hour of going to press—the grand Republican tournament at Chicago is in full and exciting convention, the political knights in the arena, lances in rest, and every visor down. Between the two great contending plumes—Grant and Blaine—there has been a series of tilts that presages the inglorious defeat of the Cæsarean crest. Grant will not a third time be nominated for President of the United States. This seems to be pretty generally conceded. The machine has been badly ditched in the preliminary work of the convention. Conkling and Logan, and the rest of the Grant manipulators, have been beaten at every turn. The following private dispatch from Chicago—the publication of which may be anticipated, however, by a nomination—gives an epitome of the situation:

CHICAGO, June 4, 12 M.

The whole drift of the convention is anti-Grant, and the sympathies of outsiders are in the same direction. A test shows Grant's strength to be less than two hundred and seventy-five votes. Blaine's leaders—Hale and Frye—confident. They have a splendidly organized fight. It is generally believed that Conkling can not hold his delegates, and that in any break-up Blaine will gain. The Grant programme is to weary the convention by balloting "all summer," if necessary. The hope is that Sherman delegates will prefer Grant to Blaine. Garfield is strongest as a third candidate. Edmunds is suggested, and will probably be the choice of the Grant delegates in a close issue with Blaine. I think Grant defeated. Am not sanguine of Blaine's nomination. PIXLEY.

The platform of the convention recites and extols as usual the deeds of the Republican party; points out the necessity for maintaining its principles and its control of the Government in the interest of human rights and material prosperity; declares against further land grants to railroads, or subsidies in any form; approves Hayes's administration, and arraigns the Democratic party for its past, as well as present, attitude, spirit, and purposes. The anti-Chinese plank, for the introduction of which the Pacific Coast delegations have assiduously worked, has been modified somewhat, to better suit puritanical notions; and is in the form of a declaration, substantially as follows: "While we offer a home to all who wish to cast their lot with the American people, yet we are assured by our fellow-citizens of the Pacific Coast that grave dangers arise from the unlimited influx of a strange people, who, without any sympathy with our civilization and free institutions, seek our shores, not for a home, but merely to get money to take back with them to the homes they left; and we therefore invite the earnest attention of the Government of the United States to a careful consideration of the evils arising from such immigration, with a view to make such treaties and enact such laws as will avert the dangers complained of." While it is the intention of our delegates to demand something more radical than this, it is doubtful if it is approved of by the convention. New England even shakes its head at the declaration, and can not understand or tolerate the idea of an anti-Chinese plank in the light of the "man and a brother" doctrine.

What seemed like a fair prospect of settling all the difficulties between the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and the Mussel Slough settlers has fallen through, under circumstances most lamentable and bungling. At the request or intimation of W. W. Stow, the well-known confidential attorney of the company, a meeting of the settlers was called, to see if they would agree to compromise upon a basis of twenty-five per cent. reduction from the graded price. After a long and hot discussion, the desire for peace prevailed, the meeting decided to accept these terms, and a committee was appointed to come to San Francisco to formally ratify them. It was natural to hope that the whole ugly business was thus settled. To be sure, Mr. Stow had explicitly stated that he had no authority to make an offer of compromise; but his relations with the railroad are such that no one could dream that the company would refuse to accede to a proposition which he intimated that the settlers should formally consider. Yet when the committee came to see Mr. Crocker, the proposition to settle at a discount of twenty-five per cent. was rejected, and they were informed that twelve and a half per cent. was the largest discount that the company would agree to. Thus was the opportunity of compromise defeated, and new bitterness added to the dispute. We do not wonder that the settlers feel that they have been trifled with. As for W. W. Stow, he occupies anything but an enviable position. Either he has been used as a cat's-paw, or he has been officiously and mischievously meddling. We are sorry this chance for compromise has thus been brought to naught, for the question is an ugly one. The railroad company has probably the legal right to the lands, and the law must be maintained even if it takes the whole power of the nation. But, on the other hand, there is certainly much to be said on the settlers' side. The lands for which they are asked to pay from sixteen to twenty dollars per acre is land which they have made valuable by hard labor. There is no doubt that at least the majority of them went on the land expecting that they would not be asked to pay more than two dollars and fifty cents per acre for it, even should the company succeed in establishing a title. In short, this is one of those cases in which something is to be said on both sides, and which, therefore, should be settled by compromise. According to their ideas, the settlers certainly went much more than half way when they agreed to pay three-fourths of the price asked, and it is questionable taste and policy on the part of the railroad company in refusing to meet them.

A most beautiful lot of official gophers have been unearthed in Kern County. Assessor, tax collector, auditor, and school superintendent are all charged with forgery and fraud. An investigation shows also that some of the ex-county officials are implicated. Accounts have been kept on shirt-cuffs long ago worn out or sent to the wash. No grand jury convened for two years. No check on anything, or supervision of anybody. The treasurer is the only man in the whole county who seems to have had any respect whatever for books or bookkeeping. It is said that these officials are less guilty of crime than amenable to the charge of ignorance and carelessness. A good excuse: a splendid excuse. One that will be appreciated by the taxpayer. One, too, that explains the splendid majority rolled up by Kern County for the new Constitution—and against fraud.

We have some remarks to address to that part of the people of this city which, not performing manual labor, is regarded and regards itself as constituting San Francisco; the people who, when they say to one another, "San Francisco has lost her grip," mean that they, the interlocutors, have lost their grip; who look on the Committee of One Hundred or the Council of Fifteen as representing them. The readers of this publication are found in this class; the Argonaut itself is an unit of it. Hence it now speaks as to brethren. We are talking to our own crowd. And if our premises are sound and our conclusions just, if our remarks are true—and we know that they are true—it behooves those to whom they are addressed to take them to their hearts; and if the seed, whereof they are but the expression, shall thereafter fail to bear fruit, the event will prove the worse for all of us. There has been trouble in this camp, and there is more coming. There will continue to be trouble until the cause of it is sought out and eradicated. Some man or some men among us are responsible for this trouble, and we need to ask the question—Who is he? or they? We need also a truthful answer to it—not necessarily for punishment, but necessarily for prevention. Who, then, is the responsible culprit among us? The Hebrew Scriptures have answered the question:

AND NATHAN SAID UNTO DAVID, THOU ART THE MAN.

It is upon ourselves—the responsible people of San Francisco—that the responsibility for our past troubles rests; and it is we ourselves who are responsible for those that are coming. It is due to the lowness of the plane of intelligence from which we have observed these troubles growing and ripening, or to the supine selfishness in which those among us who foresaw the end, withheld a staying hand. We have seen the decline of the power of law among us, and have aided it; and have so aided out of unadulterated cowardice. Separately and individually the few among us—still numbering some hundreds in all—who, as grand and petit jurymen, have been given the opportunity to act, have shrunk from acting, and shrank out of cold cravenness. They dared not. The one man who most conspicuously contributed to undermine our law, and whom we consciously abetted through fear of him, was the other day shot down in the midst. His shooting was the fruit of a law older than that of the Medes—more changeless than that of the Persians—viz., that when the written law faileth, society resolves back into its elements, and man becomes a law unto himself. Who, then, is responsible for that killing? The man who did it? He, indeed, is to answer for it; but we who are now seeking the recondite source and root of our ills need to go behind the Kallochs,

Draw the rolls of the grand and petit juries of the past ten years—the names of the responsible citizens who failed to indict and convict libelers, who out of fear of them failed to enforce the written law against them, and we have the names of those who, in very truth and fact, did shoot down Charles De Young. Theirs were the nerveless hands that dropped the pistol against his life. But our responsibility neither begins nor ends with the episode of a shooting; it extends wide and far from that event—both behind it and forward. Who are responsible for the Sand-lot, with all that it implies? The answer is, we ourselves—we, the people of property, of intelligence (as we think), and of education—as we call it: Though God save the mark! if we are to estimate the quality of that education by the fruits of it.

We—this educated class—saw Kearney discovered and created. He did not create himself. As he stands to-day, and as he has stood throughout, he is a mere product of the printing-press—produced as a speculation in aid of "our circulation," contributing to and enhancing the value of "our advertising columns." And we stood looking on. With the outcome of it plain to be seen—not a few among us plainly seeing it—we consciously abetted the transaction. We continued—the collective we—to buy our paper and advertise in it. We continue to do both still. Kearney, who is the Sand-lot, is to-day a portion of the stock in trade of at least one prosperous newspaper. Yet that publication could not live a day but for us; Kearney, the agitator, could not live a month but for it—or another like it. It will not do to try and hold Mr. Pickering or Mr. De Young to an exclusive accountability for either the agitation past, or that which is still to come. If the seller of goods is to bear an exclusive responsibility for all the consequences of his traffic, we need to reverse our systems of jurisprudence, and to fine the whisky-dealer standing behind his bar instead of the "drunk" standing before that of the police court. But this is not the practice or procedure that we recognize as fitting, whether to enforce the obligations of law or of extra-legal social observance. And our practice is right in principle. By every enactment of our Criminal Code, or the criminal codes of civilized peoples, the fundamental principle of accountability is one that places on our own shoulders—the consenting and abetting parties—a full responsibility for this agitation. It is our fault that it exists. The remedy lies within our power, and we have withheld it. We withhold it still. The fact that there will be a Sand-lot agitation and demonstration next winter depends exclusively upon the fact that at that time the Call will continue to be a remunerative property to Mr. Pickering, and the Chronicle to Mr. De Young. In this situation the agitation had its birth, has lived and moved, and now has and will continue to have its being. Nor are we—the collective we—in position to assume any attitude of moral loftiness toward Mr. Pickering or Mr. De Young. They both know their customers. They make their papers to sell, and do so successfully. We who buy them are no better than they reflect us. If we were, there would be an end to the matter; for the sources of the disease would die out. They are not thorns intruded into our flesh; they are part of the living organism. They were bred there—not imported. They are native. They are a symptom of disease, now become also a source of it: gangrenes—spreading and threatening—but their origin lay in a corruption of the blood. They now perpetuate and diffuse the poison whereof they first were bred; nor will it out until they shall be cauterized.

Things were not always thus with us. Time was, we had a grip—that same grip we now talk of having lost. Time was, we knew how to bring our law to bear. It laid hold upon an American Flag once, and laid its editor by the heels to cool them in jail. He had a Jolly Giant for his company. Thomas H. Selby was foreman of that grand jury. There was a man! We have not always been, as now, a divided crowd. Time was, we could pull together—whether for the common need or the common good. Gentlemen down town could and did once combine to build themselves a Merchants' Exchange that should be, as it is, an ornament to the town they felt proud of. Could they do it now? Are they as proud of that town now? More has been lost in these late bad years than can be measured in money. Mutual trust has been lost; public spirit, state pride, and civic fellowship have gone. The character is changed, and for the worse only. It has developed a petty, envious, and mean side that was not conspicuous among the men of '60. Yet many of us are the same men. It is we ourselves who have changed and have grown smaller. There was a time with us and a sense in which the lines were partially, at least, true, but are no longer so—

When none was for a party; when all were for the state;
 When the great man helped the poor, and the poor man loved the great.
 Now, Roman is to Roman more hateful than a foe.

And this hatefulness is a many-sided aspect of character that has been fostered and bred among us, watered and fed, of the steady detraction and calumny—the low and truculent tone—daily distilled into our ears, which have come insensibly to color and bias that habit of thought which constitutes mental attitude one toward another and each toward all. It is a miserable state of affairs. It is unworthy of grown men. It implies the spitefulness, the meanness, the cussedness of tea-drinking, scandal-mongering old women. It is not merely unmanly—it is disreputable. We challenge reference to the public expression of a single generous sentiment—a single elevated principle—a single unorded purpose in this city within the past two years. There has been not one. We repeat it, and challenge the proof. Nearly the whole wretched ten-years' story of the life of San Francisco, on its public or civic side, appears as a tissue of mean-spirited detraction, obstruction, distrust, or indifference. At the one or two crises of affairs, the people have risen resistlessly. The rich have contributed without stint to the need of the hour. But for this, it would have appeared that the entire active virtue that once inspired our civic life had died out of it. We have shown that enough of it is left for at least spasms of effort. But in the seat where we have seen Selby and Alvord and Otis, we now see Isaac Kallach. In that contrast may be read a partial measure of the kind as well as the amount of change that has been wrought among and in us. It is of the first-fruits time has borne us. What will be the next we are to gather?

In four months from this time the troop of Sand-lot tramps is to be again dealt with. It needs to be remarked that were a plague in the interval to remove Mr. Pickering, our evil would not be cured thereby. Disease gone chronic is not cured by such mere chance and happy accident. Besides, the happy accident is expected not to occur. The mischief would still remain. The blood will go on corrupting, as it is now doing. The gangrene will continue to spread, as it is now spreading. What are we going to do about it? And let us not rest too trustfully on the plan of allowing the humor to come to a head, expecting and intending then to apply the knife. The evil may be likened rather to a fire smouldering in our house, and which we will not be at the pains to stamp out until after it shall burst into flame. He needs to be more than a prophet who shall point out exact bounds where that flame will submit to be stopped. "Extinguish it in blood," answers one very young gentleman, whose hairs are white; he must be young, for it is plain he is intellectually in swaddling clothes. By all means, extinguish it in blood. But whose blood? Some gouts of blood have already been applied, and they were drawn from a most unexpected quarter! But these are fool's answers—to say, let the disease run its course, and when the crisis comes we shall find means to deal with it. Such are the answers we have allowed to satisfy us these years past, and crises have come, and we have found sweet means to deal with them! We beat the Tramps' Constitution, probably? or did it beat us? Instead of our finding means to deal with the crises, they have rather found the means of dealing with us. They are continuing to deal with us now. Another Sand-lot next winter lies dead ahead of us—one hundred and twenty days off, and day by day we are driving down upon it. We know how the men of '56 worked out their problem, and how they strangled the voice of the spoilers even while they punished the person. We know that were the printed voice of our agitation choked out of it, it would be resolved again into its elements of a harmless drayman, a smirched parson, and some tramps who would be taken care of by the police. We know that we have the sinews to take the mouthpieces by the throat, and squeeze the last wheeze and whistle of Sand-lot wind out of them. But the sinews "have lost their grip," and the Argonaut fears—and thinks it knows too well—that they will do nothing of the sort; nor anything else till they shall be once more strained in self-defense—less to assail the offending windpipe than to protect their own.

A rumor is current in the East that James Gordon Bennett is about to start a chain of two-cent morning papers, extending across the continent from New York to San Francisco, which are to have the benefit of the Herald telegrams and correspondence, and to be under the general management of John Russell Young. There is nothing improbable in this. It is the next step in the development of the newspaper business; and that James Gordon Bennett has not attempted it before is probably rather because that energetic individual has had enough irons in the fire than that he has not perceived the great opportunity for thus utilizing in new profits the enormous expenditures of his paper. The New York Herald has a larger and more profitable business than all of the other metropolitan newspapers combined. It has its own special correspondents everywhere, and spends enormous sums for special dispatches. But it only realizes in full the return for these expenditures within the comparatively limited area where it can be distributed on the morning of publication. Outside of that, the Herald's news becomes the capital of local papers. But a chain of Heralds in all the principal cities across the continent could all avail themselves of the enormous expenditure of the parent paper, and could in each city, with the advantage thus given, distance all competitors and concentrate the business just as the Herald has done in New York; while, in return, the income which they would yield would permit even more lavish expenditure for news. With intelligent management—and the younger Bennett has always shown great judgment in the choice of his lieutenants—there would be no risk at all in the operation. His means are amply sufficient; for not only does the Herald yield a net income of something like a million a year, but, outside of the Herald, Bennett is a very rich man. And these papers would not start as experiments, but with the whole weight of the prestige, organization, and machinery of the greatest newspaper in the country, and, in fact, in the world.

Whatever truth there is in this rumor, it is probable in itself, and certainly indicates the next step in the newspaper business. That business is being concentrated, just as railroad ownership is being concentrated, and the great local newspaper which has too great a start to permit local competition must in its turn give way to the great combination of newspapers. Nor do we see much to regret in the prospect. One great despot is better than a number of local tyrants. In all respects, James Gordon Bennett would be better than the Fitches, Pickering, and De Youngs who have so long tyrannized and bedevilled us. We would get an infinitely better paper in respect to news and literary ability, and, what is more, an infinitely cleaner paper—one which would be too great to deal in petty slander and backbiting, to put up petty jobs, and gratify petty revenges. And while there is something startling in the idea of a man wielding such a vast power, as there is in the idea of one corporation controlling such vast lines of rail as the railroad combinations now making will control, we are inclined to think that this concentration in the business of supplying news will but hasten a classification in journalism of which there are already abundant signs. In the little village, dry-goods and groceries, drugs and hardware, are all kept in a single store; but as the village grows into a city the selling of each variety of goods becomes a special business. So, too, in the infancy of journalism, news matter and literary wares are mixed together in the columns of the same paper. But the literary journal has already been differentiated from the newspaper, and in the natural course of development the paper of opinions must soon be distinct from the paper of news. We will no more think of a Republican or Democratic newspaper than we think of a Methodist hardware shop or an Episcopalian dry-goods store. Great papers of the Herald type, telegraphing the letters of special correspondents from all parts of the world, and reporting local events without color or bias, will furnish the news, while journals specially devoted to opinion will supply comments upon it. The change will be a healthy one. Let it go on. We shall be sorry to lose the wonderful editorials of the Call and the more ponderous lucubrations of the Bulletin, but even our regrets on this score will not stay the march of development.

At last a step has been taken in the settlement of the vexed question of water rates. Last Tuesday evening, by a vote of nine to three, the Board of Supervisors passed the Bayley water-rate ordinance, which reduces the cost to consumers twenty-five per cent., and puts that amount of the burden on the city, where more of it really belongs. And it is a wonder almost to those who have watched this water controversy for now these years and years that even this much has really been done. The inquiry into the equity of the matter has been attended with a deal of annoyance. Besides the unearthing of facts and working the labyrinth of figures, the committee—and Mr. Bayley, the chairman, in particular—have been subjected to a species of persecution that has anything but assisted to conclusions. And this, too, in the face of all the courtesies that could be extended to those having objections to offer. For as the chairman, in his remarks before the vote was taken, said: "We have invariably invited the public and the press, and latterly, since the publication of adverse criticisms by two of the journals of this city, have specially invited the gentlemen of the press, in order to place before us such information of which they might be cognizant as would be in the interest of this community. After waiting patiently for more than two hours without a person appearing, the committee adjourned. I do not propose to take up any time in discussing the motives of journalists who are so ready to criticise, but fail to face the issue as individuals when requested in the interest of the public."

But despite all these yelpings, and fault-findings, and misrepresentations, and attempts at intimidation, the committee have secured the bottom facts in this water business. Mr. Bayley has particularly distinguished himself in the business-like way in which he has informed himself and put the question. The most difficult task for the committee was to agree upon a definite basis of valuation, which was finally set at $14,500,000—some millions less than the actual cost of the works as reported by the experts. On this amount the ordinance intends to allow something like nine per cent. interest plus the operating expenses. This is claimed to be a fair and reasonable rate for this particularly hazardous investment. Regarding the plan of taking the market value of the stock and paying six per cent. on that, as the Bulletin proposed, Mr. Bayley declared "that it would be a practical confiscation; for every succeeding board would have to place a lower value in accordance with the decline of the stock, and ultimately the stock would be valueless." And further he argued: "I do not believe that the public expect anything of the kind. Among many of our best citizens, men who pay large taxes, will be found persons who have invested in this property, assured of its safety, and looking to a reliable revenue upon the investment. It would appear that they have some rights which should be respected, and I don't propose to arbitrarily take such action as will destroy the value of their property. The high rates heretofore paid by rate-payers have, in a great measure, been caused by the unjust system of discrimination, now happily abolished by the new Constitution; and, according to the opinion of legal minds, the city will no longer be deadheaded at the expense of consumers, and a more equitable distribution of the burden be inaugurated. Free water is a snare and a delusion, and is solely in the interest of property. The water furnished to the city, and the increased necessary expenditures of the company for fire protection—in the matter of the number of reservoirs, and their altitude for the required pressure, the increase in the size of their mains—all add to a considerable extent to the cost of water, for which the company must be compensated in some form; and, therefore, if not remunerated by the city, must inevitably be added to the rates of consumers. If half the people of the city were from some cause entitled to receive their water free, it would follow, as a matter of course, that the rates of the other half would be doubled. Out of a list of ninety-eight cities in these United States, seventy-five are paying directly for the water used for all municipal purposes and the extinguishment of fires. In one instance, property is taxed twenty-five cents on the one hundred dollars, and pays all the cost of water."

It is this same bugaboo of free water that has kept up this continuous warfare between the corporation and the people. There is no such thing as free water. It is, indeed, "a snare and a delusion." San Francisco is the only city to-day, even under the new ordinance, that escapes with one-fourth of the burden. London, a city supplied like our own by a private corporation, pays three-fourths of the cost of its water supply. The water rates there, as specified in the water clauses act, "shall be paid by and be recoverable from the person requiring, receiving, or using the supply of water, and shall be payable according to the annual value of the tenement supplied with water; and if any dispute arise as to such value, the same shall be determined by two justices." Imagine such a rule obtaining here. More than this, ten per cent. on the investment is allowed the corporation, and this interest in a market where rates only run from two and one-half to five per cent. Taking all these facts into consideration, Spring Valley has by no manner of means been liberally dealt with. The valuation of the works is far below their cost; the rate of interest allowed, according to the testimony of some of our best business men, is not what it should be for so hazardous a business; and property does not yet bear its just and proper proportion of the burden. But so long as the city has not been swindled or imposed upon, and inasmuch as the corporation is not in love with the provisions and requirements of the new ordinance, we do not know that there is any good and sufficient reason why both tax and rate-payers should not be thoroughly satisfied with what the Supervisors' Committee have accomplished.

Founded as the British civil service is, on the corner-stone of competitive examination, and free, as it is, from the baneful system of rotation, its practical workings appear altogether lovely—especially when clothed in the prismatic tints which distance lends. For example: The London Times says: "In November last, while the Indian Council was paying thirty-four to thirty-five shillings per ton for carrying rails to India, the Indian Peninsula Railway Company was only paying twenty-five shillings per ton. In other cases, discrepancies of five shillings per ton between the charges in government contracts and those of private companies are too numerous to mention." John Bull has evidently much to learn. It appears that these rails were actually carried. An American contractor would have had seventy shillings per ton, and would not have carried a rail. The retail spirit of this Indian fraud is not creditable to England. We fear that real talent is getting scarcer there. There is no imagination. The recent Glasgow Bank success was an effort of Scottish genius.

It appears that whatever Kearney is or is not capable of accomplishing, he is an experienced band at striking his adherents for coin. Last Sunday afternoon, after a profuse adulation of Judge McKimstry, and reminding his Sand-lot clients that the learned judge occupied his judicial position through the grace of Kearney (redivivus), he proceeded to send around his slouched hat, and collected therein $108.75 to take him to the Greenbackers at Chicago. But this not being sufficient, the agitator gave the Sand-lot lemon another squeeze, and lo! and behold $183.30—and not in greenbacks either. The third and last squeeze was a dry one.

SEVENTEEN YEARS.

All of seventeen years, you say?

Seventeen years since that winter's rain,
When, out in the church-yard, "clay to clay,"
Spoke to our souls, and life was pain.

And since that seventeen years, thank you,
Hath she not moved from her hallowed mould?
Hath not the spirit, well loved and true,
Stood by our sides, as in days of old?

Nay—we know not, we speak our thought;
But ere the words can be fully said
Our knowledge slumbereth, and is brought Face to face with that field of dead.

That was the husk, but sure it held
Something we loved that was not clay;
Something that stronger love compelled
Than human beauty to fade away.

And surely, somewhere, beyond the ken
Of this world's knowledge, that soul divine,
That hath passed so long from the haunts of men,
Will hold commune with this soul of mine.

Again we stumble, and knowledge fails,
Facing the silence of our hopes;
Facing the stillness that prevails
In the border land, where the spirit gropes.

Seeking some point of certain truth
From which to gaze on the years to come;
When this, my soul, will renew its youth,
And speak the thoughts that are now sealed dumb.

WHAT SECTARIAN EDUCATION CAN DO.

In a certain rustic village of Old England, fifty years ago—only fifty years ago—the value of sectarian education was fully illustrated. No doubt but very little advance has been made in that time, and the same primitive simplicity prevails there to this day. Indeed, sectarian education cherishes all these old landmarks.

It was a good-sized village of two thousand people. In America it would have two live newspapers, five churches, numerous schools, ward clubs, and lively politicians. But not so there. One little old church edifice, of five hundred years' standing, did duty in the most orthodox fashion. Its rector was the electric light of that community. He was at once the spiritual guide, the civil magistrate, the one official, scholar, and gentleman of that rare community. No lawyers lived nearer than the distant county seat; and the one doctor of the burg was only a sort of apothecary, who ventured to give advice to the poor. Even he bowed most obsequiously to "his reverence."

There was a school—sectarian, of course. It was cheap enough, surely. A two-cent piece was all that was required as a weekly payment. And yet the children of the poor were not there. They had not the money, or the time, or the clothing to go to school. The farmers', shopkeepers', and tradesmen's sons and daughters were there. The teacher was paid four dollars a week, and was a good, pious soul—promoted to that work because he had mastered the church catechism, the spelling of easy words, and the mysteries of the four first rules of arithmetic. He could make a pen, and write what you could read; but then he had a thousand copper-plate copies that were far ahead of anything that the best clerk in town could do.

He kept a praying-school. It was opened with prayer and closed with prayer. The church catechism was the one sole thing that must be learned. All tests, all promotion, all rewards for good conduct turned on that binge. In other respects, if the finished scholar could read the catechism, prayers, hymns, the Bible except the hard words, and do a sum in long division, he was reckoned a marvel of proficiency. The rector was lord of all in this school; he browbeat the master, and held the rod of respect and discipline over the heads of the scholars with so tight a hand that to be suspected of laughing at him behind his back was like the sin against the Holy Ghost—never to be forgiven.

The principal tavern-keeper of the place took a weekly paper, which he meekly sent unopened to "his reverence," that he might learn the news. He could not read it himself, though tolerably well up in the catechism. Then it was laid away for a chance guest, who might happen to have learning as well as curiosity. To all others he related what it contained, as detailed by the rector. The sectarian schools had done this much for the whole country. Oh, it was a nice, sleepy place, that little town! Six days a week, and twelve hours a day, did nine-tenths of that people over twelve years of age labor for their daily bread—some of them laboring quite as long who were less than ten. There was little labor-saving machinery then. Even the trades-people were up early and late at their counters. Sunday was a day of rest. The weary lay in bed; the ragged and dirty kept out of sight. The poor were glad to rest, or do up some needful work for which they had no time during the week. The church bell rang, and the pious and respectable walked to church. The rector knew them all, and not to be there, without having some valid excuse, was to live in a cloud of doubt, and to accept a lower rank in his respect during all the following week.

And, oh, how quiet were those Sundays! Not a sound above a whisper, save the church bell and organ and choir. Deserted streets; silent the market-place; hushed the mill. The very brook seemed to creep along as if afraid of being heard. Only the cows, pigs, and chickens did not know that it was Sabbath. The dogs and the work-horses did know. You would have thought the dogs knew the catechism, so humbly did they imitate subdued bumanity. But to the work-horses it was a real Sabbath; they kicked up their heels in the pastures, and made their glee resound all over the valley.

On such a Sunday, about noon—church being out—a singular individual entered the market-place, took his station near the town pump, removed his hat, and, after standing a moment, knelt down and began to pray. The people stood afar off, in wonder. Presently he resumed his feet, and began to sing with a loud and assured musical voice. It was a church tune, and so the people took courage, and gathered afar off, attracted by this strange conduct.

The singing done, he began, in a loud voice, to preach.

And they came closer; they listened, and he taught them in plain, blunt English. He was gray-headed, without beard, kind, and venerable. He wore a plain brown suit, with a broad hat; and so demure and gentle in his speech, and withal so impressive and eloquent was he that they were charmed and riveted to the spot. He said, in effect:

God is good. He is good and wise. It is not His will that one of His little ones should perish. He made the earth, and poured out the horn of plenty upon it. There is enough and to spare for all. Why, then, do your children lack bread? Why do you labor and toil, and taste not the good things, while others gambol and play and fare sumptuously every day? Why are the sons of toil in rags, while the oppressor is clothed in purple and fine linen? God is no respecter of persons. These are contrivances of men. They are not of God. The government is not of God. That poor old church is not of God, though built in His name. The rector who preaches there is not of God, though he is called "divine," and "his reverence," and makes long prayers. Were he of God he would ask for justice for you, for bread for your children, for right and brotherhood for all. Alas! he is not there for God. He is there for the tyrant and the oppressor—to excuse their wrong, to persuade you to patience under your miseries. He is no divine, but a part of the black and abominable scheme by which you are defrauded out of your inheritance, and your children are heggars. He dare not say that God is bad, and helps these tyrants; but he does tell you that the devil will get you if you rebel, if you are impatient, if you refuse to work and to starve. He would have you afraid to help yourselves to justice. But he is not afraid of the devil. Those who employ him are not afraid of the devil. They do all these wrongs, they pile all these miseries on you, and yet they are not afraid that the devil will catch them. Why should you be? In truth, there is no devil. There is only God, who is good, and knows all your trials and all your sufferings. Did you ever see a devil? Did you ever taste a devil? Did you ever smell a devil, save the devils of this world? Therefore, there is no devil to make you afraid. Be resolute for good. Stand up for right. Be temperate, frugal, industrious. Wrestle for your own in this world. Defend your children from the tyrant. Be men! There is no devil, and God is too good to condemn you for doing your duty.

He went on more at length in the same strain. The people marveled at his doctrine. It was new to them. Some said it was but Sabbath-breaking to preach out of church; and some were ready to stone him to death, as they did Stephen of old. In the meanwhile the constable of the parish had heard these words about the devil, and, hurrying off to the rector for orders, returned to arrest the itinerant vendor of this heretic specimen of sectarianism.

The poor man obeyed meekly, glad perhaps to escape the anger of the mob in the secure clutches of the law. After a night spent in the town jail, he stood before the august and reverend magistrate, even as Christ was led to the slaughter. He opened not his mouth, but waited patiently to see what might be charged against him. The rector listened to a host of witnesses. They detailed how he had asked if they had seen the devil. And the dominie glared at the culprit with true sectarian fire. He inquired if he had asked these questions meaning to infer that there were no devil. And when the culprit bowed his head in assent, the rector said it was enough, he had confessed his guilt. Addressing the prisoner, he said:

John Doe, the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England declare and affirm that Satan goeth about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour. These good lies of our sovereign lord the King, William the Fourth—God bless him!—are commanded to believe the same, on pain of his displeasure and of God's vengeance. It is a part of the law of the land so to believe. It is my duty as a spiritual pastor so to teach, and as a magistrate to guard and protect these honest lies from all heresy, schism, and rebellion. You have said, and do still say, that you have not seen the devil, meaning thereby to affirm that there is no devil; all of which is contrary to the pleasure of our lord the King, his crown and dignity. You are committed to the town jail for three months, as a rogue and vagabond. Amen!

The poor man was carried to jail. He was a species of Quaker, and bore his sufferings meekly. He spoke at last in his defense, but the rector was decided, and only commanded that he be removed.

It was soon noised abroad among that benighted people that a man had been sent to jail for three months because he had not seen the devil.

The constable and the school-master—who were oracles in their way, because they sometimes talked with his reverence—related at the tavern that night, among the farmers and the plow-boys, all the particulars of the trial.

"Six months, sir!"

"For not having seen the devil."

"Why, who has seen him?"

"Not I!"

"Nor I!"

"All liable to three months!"

So said the constable and the school-master. And forthwith the poor denizens of that sectarian-educated village began to contrive how they could escape this great condemnation. They went home, and the news spread. And forthwith stories began to arise of how this one and that one had really seen the evil one. They feared arrest if they did not give out some certain sign of innocence. And the devil was seen in all manner of shapes. He was a cat, a rat, a donkey, a goat, anything that was uncanny. And within a month, from all accounts, Satan had made himself busy and promiscuous in that neighborhood, till timid folks did not dare to stir out at night; for although those who had told the stories knew themselves to be merely inventing to escape the penalty, they seemed to think all the rest told the truth.

This was very satisfactory to the rector for awhile. It vindicated the faith. It gave the flat denial to the poor man he had condemned. But he was a sectarian, too, a graduate of a sectarian school, and not quite certain but that the devil was around, as stated. And the tales came so thick, were so stoutly maintained, and utterly undenied (who would risk three months by contradiction?), that at last it became "simply awful." For miles around each had his separate story of how the dark spirit had appeared. People were being driven out of their senses.

And still that poor man lay in jail, condemned now of all, and regarded as the fell demon whose stout denial had brought on them these infernal visitations.

In all that community there was just one young gentleman who rose above local prejudice and the sectarian school. He had traveled. He had been among intelligent cosmopolitan people. He interviewed the poor prisoner. He found him an enthusiast, and, like the rector, a sectarian. But of a different sect, that was all. He interviewed the rector, and found him just as intractable as the prisoner. They were both graduates of sectarian schools, and had no mercy, no consideration, no toleration for each other. The rector would willingly have dragged what he deemed a rebellious heretic to the stake. And the heretic would have died, denouncing his persecutor as a son of Belial and a servant of sin.

So the young man, having potent influence in London, wrote to the Secretary of State, pleading for the release of the street preacher. And the rector, true to his sectarian education, wrote to the Lord Bishop of Exeter, sitting in the House of Peers, to vindicate his course and assert the supremacy of sectarian rule. The bishop was also a graduate of a sectarian school, and showed how utterly it unfits a man for public business, or for any business requiring sound common sense. He rose in his place, and, understanding that the Secretary of State was about to release the culprit, denounced that officer as recreant to his duty, to the crown, to the church, and to God. He said that the thirty-nine articles were a part of the common law; to doubt them was treason, and to denounce them rank rebellion—first to the crown, second to the church, and third to God. The crown, that is the king; the church, that is the Church of England; and God, last of all. An orator from the school of science and common sense would have inverted this column. He would have said God, the church, and the king. But the sectarian always puts his idol first; his particular creed is above all.

And the noble lords were astonished. They were intelligent. They marveled at the stupidity of the rector, and they laughed at the ludicrous result in his benighted parish. They commended the good sense of the Secretary of State for ordering the release of—at worst—a harmless lunatic. The Marquis of Normanby observed that he had never seen his Satanic majesty, and if such law was to prevail, he should be afraid to appear in that section of England, lest he too should get three months in the common jail. Lord Melbourne, then in the first place in England, said he would have to confess to the same want of actual ocular proof that the thirty-nine articles were true. No doubt the bench of bishops were better informed, and had a more distinct understanding of the matter, for they stuck to these articles of faith with as much tenacity as though they were axioms in mathematics. They had perhaps seen the evil one himself. But for him, he must confess that that pleasure was yet to come. He was simply in the same condition as that poor preacher, and just as liable to arrest and chastisement. The great Duke of Wellington ventured to say that common people should be careful of their words, and by no means question the Christian religion, as established by act of Parliament. But as to this particular matter, he could not think it was an offense not to have seen the spirit of evil. He had been as far down in the dark valley of the shadow of death as most men, had seen evil and strife and death enough to appall the stoutest hearts; but the veritable devil himself had never met his gaze. It might be his misfortune, but he could not regard it as a crime. He thought the poor man should be released.

And so he was. The rector received a kind note from the Home Secretary to the following effect:

The Council desires me to express to you its thanks for your zeal in behalf of religion, as established by act of Parliament. But while we here in London are as rigid in our faith as you, in our wider contact with the world we have learned to respect the rights and the opinions of others, and to take a higher and nobler view of the convictions of others. It is not a crime, by the statutes of England, not to have seen the devil, nor even to assail the whole thirty-nine articles of the church. You must learn to distinguish between the rector and the magistrate. As a pastor of the Church of England we expect you to be strictly orthodox and sectarian. But as a magistrate you must rise superior to creed, to local prejudice, and sectarian bigotry, and administer the law with liberal, impartial, and kindly consideration. You will release your victim. Make him such amends as will make him feel that he has suffered no injury. Take occasion in your discourses to inform your deluded people that their fears are groundless, and these frequent visions of Satan the work of the imagination; and, as you value your commission, avoid the narrow path of the sectarian as soon as you step down from your pulpit. It is the hope and desire of the Council that every gentleman in the Commission of the Peace will divest himself of all bigotry, local prejudice, and sectarian animosity, and rise up into the higher atmosphere of common sense and justice.

And this event was a great educator. It let in light on that poor people. It cleared the air of ghosts, and visions, and hobgoblins. They began to explain, and they soon found that excited and ignorant minds can be persuaded to anything; and that sectarian education is the poorest possible defense against fraud and imposture of any kind.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 30, 1880.

K.

A white man was arraigned before a colored justice down in Arkansas the other day, on charges of killing a man and stealing a mule.

"Wall," said the justice, "de facts in dis case shell be weighed wid carefulness, an' if I hangs yer, taint no fault ob mine."

"Judge, you have no jurisdiction, only to examine me."

"Dat sorter work 'longs ter de regular justice, but yer see I've been put on as a special. A special hez de right to make a mouf at Spreme Court ef he chuses ter."

"Do the best for me you can, judge."

"Dat's what I've gwine ter do. I've got two kinds ob law in dis court, de Arkansas an' de Texas law. I generally gins a man de right to chuse fur hissef. Now, what law does yer want, de Texas or de Arkansas?"

"I believe I'll take the Arkansas."

"Wall, den, I'll dismiss yer for stealin' de mule—"

"Thank you, judge."

"And hang yer fur killin' de man—"

"I believe, judge, that I'll take the Texas."

"Wall, den, I'll dismiss yer fur killin' de man—"

"You have a good heart, judge."

"An' hang yer fur stealin' de mule. I'll jis take de 'casion heah ter remark dat de only difference 'tween de two laws iz de way yer state de case."

Spurgeon said in a recent sermon: "The worship of the golden calf is pretty general now. There is too much bowing and cringing before it in all classes of society. No end of dodges are tried to get a scraping of one of the creature's hoofs."

"I defy the lightning to strike me!" said an Indiana man during a thunder shower. Next moment a bolt of heaven's fire danced down the chimney and killed a dog for which he had paid $25.

FEMALE FRIENDSHIPS.

Sweeping generalizations are usually regarded as affording presumption of ignorance, and we can only conclude it is because man is profoundly ignorant of women that he is in the habit of making such round assertions concerning them. Few things appertaining to women have been spoken about with more confidence than what are called female friendships—the popular opinion being that they are hollow affairs, and are, as a rule, only a correct name for jealousy and intrigue and disloyalty. Indeed, to name a female friendship is to raise a smile on the face of a person who piques himself on being exceptionally sagacious. We must run the risk of incurring the pity of these superior persons by venturing on the opinion that true, sincere, valuable, and lasting female friendships are by no means rare. No doubt there are plenty of them that are frail, unreal, and very short-lived, just as the number of blossoms that bear no fruit is considerable. Yet the world is not, on that account, one barren fig-tree.

Rousseau shrewdly remarks, in his Emile, that the basis of friendship is not similarity of opinion, but similarity of sentiment. Nevertheless, very decided and notorious difference of opinion on subjects of importance will keep people so far apart that they never have a chance of discovering whether their sentiments are alike or not. This fact keeps many men in conditions of antagonism to each other, who, had they known each other earlier, would, in all probability, have become, from kinship of temperament, fast friends. If they become friends from the latter circumstance, before antagonism of mere opinion develops itself, they will probably remain friends after its development, unless one or other happens to be very cantankerous, and not a man of the world.

But the qualification we have felt bound to make with regard to Rousseau's first dictum serves to show that the chance of becoming friends from a similarity of sentiment is greater in the case of men, since most women have no opinions at all. In all the great and thrilling subjects of the hour very few of them take a genuine interest, and hardly any of them hold opinions concerning them with the passion, tenacity, and enthusiasm evinced by men. Accordingly, when women of kindred sentiments meet, there is no barrier of hostile opinion to keep them apart. There is nothing to prevent them from falling into each other's arms at once. Moreover, they have a host of trifles upon which they can expend their identity of tastes and feelings; and such friendship as we are speaking of is fed rather by community of feeling on a number of little things than by identity of sentiment on one great matter. Two female friends begin by talking together, sitting very close to each other, and finally still closer. Soon they will talk holding each other's hand. They go out shopping together; and before very long they arrive at such a stage of friendship that they would think it disloyal for either to choose a gown or purchase a bonnet without taking the other into her confidence, or asking her advice. In time, and often in a very short time, neither can do anything without the assent and coöperation of the other; and if they live in the same neighborhood, they are in and out of each other's houses all day long. The proximity of their homes does not render it superfluous for them to go and "stay with" each other every now and then, and, at last, we can only describe them by the words of "Cecilia," in As You Like It:

We still have slept together,
Rose at an instant, learned, played, ate together,
And, wheresoe'er we went, like Juno's swans,
Still, we went coupled, and inseparable.

Is this friendship? It is female friendship; and, we submit, it looks like the genuine article. It is surely Nisus and Euryalus in female form, if not quite Goethe and Schiller; and, as long as it lasts, it is a pleasing spectacle. We assert that it often does last a very considerable time; though, no doubt, there comes a moment at which it is imperiled. One of the friends at length excites the amorous propensities of some young swain, and it becomes an interesting question whether she is disposed to reciprocate the tender sentiment she has inspired. Then will it be made apparent whether the friendship is a real or spurious one.

Some persons appear to imagine that one of the offices of friendship is to speak unadulterated truth, however disagreeable, to your friends, to be always telling them of their faults, and warning them of their dangers. We may at once say, we are fully convinced that human nature is so constituted that it will not stand that sort of friendship. There are some things no true friends will say to you, even if they happen to think them; and friendship of the right kind will always put the most disagreeable truths in the least disagreeable form. When a girl is fallen in love with, and returns her lover's fancy, her female friend, if sound at heart, will not hasten to weigh the young fellow's qualities in a nice or exact balance, but will extend to him some of that leniency, and even some of that partiality, of judgment, she would display in his favor if he were her own lover, instead of the lover of her friend. Friendship shown at such a moment is not quickly forgotten; and sympathy from her friend, her particular friend, is what a girl most craves for, when she has once promised herself to a man. She wants some one to whom she can say everything, for it is plain she cannot as yet say everything to him.

Many a lover is a little bit annoyed at the female friendship which he thinks interferes with the exercise of his own rights, and the monopoly to which he deems himself entitled. But if he only knew that, when the "two friends" have their heads together, he is the subject of their colloquy, he would not be so foolish, and would away with his misplaced and ridiculous jealousy. If the female friend acts properly on the occasion, and shows herself judicious in her treatment of the other's lover, she probably saves the friendship even after the marriage has taken place. She is the first guest after the honeymoon; and her friendship for wife and husband assumes a permanent character. If she herself shortly becomes engaged, she too has a friend to go to, and a friend peculiarly wise; and she will be more than repaid for her own past amiability. Thus may be laid the foundation of even a quadruple friendship. We are aware that we have been taking a favorable and, perhaps, roseate view of the relation; but it is not an untrue one. There are other views more ill-natured, yet not absolutely false. We have preferred, however, on this occasion, to gaze upon the golden side of the shield.—London Truth.

INTAGLIOS.

Only a Line.

Only a line in the paper
That somebody read aloud,
At a table of languid boarders,
To a dull, indifferent crowd.

Market reports and a marriage,
And the reader read them all;
How could he know a hope died then,
And was wrapped in a funeral pall?

Only a line in the paper,
Read in a casual way,
But the glow went out of one young life,
And left it cold and gray—

Colder than bleak December,
Grayer than walls of rock;
The reader paused, and the room grew full
Of laughter and idle talk.

If one slipped off to her chamber
Why, who could dream or know
That one brief line in the paper
Had sent her away with her woe—

Away into lonely sorrow,
To hither and blinding tears?
Only a line in the paper—
But it meant such desolate years.

A Night Thought.

As I hear the hreath of the mother
To the hreath of the child at her feet
Answer in even whispers,
When the night falls heavy and sweet;

And the thought of the other dear ones
Comes down from their cradle above;
'Tis not with the spirit only
Of hope and confident love.

For over each head in the darkness
A hollow-eyed thing hangs near,
And I know that my treasures tremble
On a thread of gossamer.

O life! what art thou that holdest
What is more than life to thee,
By the tenure of thine own hours,
Thine own fragility?

And each breath is a sigh, that nearer
Brings the long farewell to me,
O life! thou shouldst be life truly,
Or else thou shouldst not be.

—F. T. Palgrave.

Decreed.

Into all lives some rain must fall,
Into all eyes some teardrops start,
Whether they fall as a gentle shower,
Or fall like fire from an aching heart.
Into all hearts some sorrow must creep,
Into all souls some doubting come,
Lashing the waves of life's great deep
From the dimpling water to seething foam.

Over all paths some clouds must lower,
Under all feet some sharp thorns spring,
Tearing the flesh to bitter wounds,
Or entering the heart with their bitter sting.
Upon all brows rough winds must blow,
Over all shoulders a cross be lain,
Bowing the form in its lofty height
Down to the dust in its cruel pain.

Into all hands some duty thrust,
Unto all arms some hordens given,
Crushing the heart with its dreary weight,
Or lifting the soul from earth to heaven.
Into all hearts and homes and lives
God's dear sunlight comes streaming down,
Gilding the ruins of life's great plain,
Weaving for all a golden crown.

In a Box.

I saw them last night in a box at the play—
Old age and young youth side by side;
You might know by the glasses that pointed that way
That they were—a groom and a bride;
And you might have known, too, by the face of the groom,
And the tilt of his head, and the grim
Little smile of his lip, he was proud to presume
That we men were all envying him.

Well, she was superb—an Elaine in the face,
A Godiva in figure and mien,
With the arm and the wrist of a Parian "Grace,"
And the high-lifted brow of a queen;
But I thought, in the splendor of wealth and of pride,
And in all her young beauty might prize,
I should hardly be glad if she sat by my side
With that far-away look in her eyes.

—J. W. Riley.

Just Too Late.

The dusky shadows filled the empty chamber,
And played at bo-peep with them where they stood—
Stood watching how, with each slow-dying ember,
Faded the old time and the ancient good.

Prone down upon the floor they sat; the fire
Cast a rich glow over her bended head;
And to himself, "What bounds to the desire
Tam cari capitis?" he softly said.

"What did you say?" she asked. "Nay, nothing—only
That when you go the world is cold and wide,
And I, I think, will be a little lonely."
Then they both ceased from words, and either sighed.

Out of the darkening corners now, grotesquer
Than e'er before, the shadows peered and peered;
And, one drew near, like some gray-hooded masquer,
Among his gayer fellows shunned and feared.

And, looking at her under furtive eyelids,
He saw her tender mouth droop, and mused there:
"Is it for me? Now if she raise those shy lids
And glance this way, I wonder if I dare?"

O faint and fearful heart! thine hour is over,
Which not for human doubt doth pause or wait:
"What, children! all alone?" Ah, foolish lover,
For life's supremest chances just too late!

THE WINES OF FRANCE.

The New York Tribune compiles a pleasant article on French wines and vineyards from a superb illustrated volume by Monsieur Bertall, entitled La Vigne—Voyage Autour des Vins de France, recently published at Paris. The author classifies the wines of France in three chief categories—white wines, blue wines, red wines—the French national colors. The white wines, says Monsieur Bertall, are wines of luxury and of exceptional use in ordinary life—from the Chablis and the Saumur, which moisten the oysters and enliven choice dinners, to the grand champagne, which sparkles in the glasses at diners de fête, and the grand Sauterne, which diffuses its golden amber radiance on festival occasions. White wines are the wines of the rich. Red wines are the French wines par excellence, the wines of custom and of good taste, those which especially rejoice the heart and the brain, enlarge the mind, and give everything a roseate hue. To them belong the warm and transparent color, and the delicate, elegant, and delicious bouquet. Blue wines are the wines of the poor, of the mechanic and the laborer. They are warm in the stomach, but sharp in the throat; they revive the body and the mind if taken moderately, but if drunk in excess they exasperate the vital forces and destroy the play of thought.

The question as to whether the red wines of Bordeaux or those of Burgundy deserve the first rank is an old one, and is no nearer a settlement than it was a hundred years ago. "Your wines are simple drinks for sick people," say the Burgundians. "Yours are head-splitting beverages," retort the Bordelais. "Ours can travel with impunity," say the first. "Ours improve marvelously with age," declare the second. Most consumers are like the president of a Paris tribunal—a fine epicure after the manner of Brillat-Savarin—who was asked at a dinner party, by the lady of the house, whether he preferred Bordeaux or Burgundy. "Madame," replied the magistrate, in his gravest tones, "this is a case which has occupied me for a long time, and which I am desirous of deciding; but I experience so much pleasure in examining the evidence on both sides that I postpone my decision from week to week."

The finest of the Bordeaux wines is the Chateau Lafitte, and close after it rank the Chateau Margaux and the Chateau Latour. These alone are classed as of the first quality. The second quality includes Larose, Rouzan, Leoville, and a dozen other brands less known in American markets. The third, fourth, and fifth grades in the Bordeaux classification include few names that would be recognized in this country. Probably the wines of these grapes are generally labeled for American consumption with names they have no right to. Below all these grades are three other classes, called, respectively, Bourgeois, Artisan, and Peasant wines. The Chateau Lafitte estate was bought by the Barons Alphonse, Gustave, and Edmond Rothschild in 1868, on the death of the Count Duchatel, for four and a half millions of francs. In ten years' the profits of the wine it produced returned the entire purchase-money to the new owners. The wines vary considerably in excellence and value from year to year. After the sale of the property there was an auction in the cellars of all the accumulated stock. The highest price was paid for twenty-one bottles of the famous Comet wine, so called from the fact that it was produced in 1841—the year of the great comet. It brought one hundred and twenty-one francs a bottle. The great variation in the value of Chateau Lafitte was shown by the sales of the product of recent years—wine of the year 1864 bringing eighteen francs a bottle, while that of 1863 sold for only seven. In good years the vineyards of Chateau Lafitte yield only one hundred and eighty casks of wine. The whole product, save what the Rothschilds reserve for themselves, is sold in bulk to a single wine-merchant, who disposes of most of it to the English nobility. Most of the so-called Chateau Lafitte sold in Europe and America is Bordeaux of the second or third quality, falsely labeled.

The king of all Burgundy wine is the Clos-Vougeot. A little before reaching Dijon [says Monsieur Bertall], the train from Beaune passes on the right a long hill-side bathed in sunlight, of mountainous aspect, but carefully cultivated. Upon its slope stands a huge, bare-looking structure, dominated by two massive square towers.

All at once the countenance of my traveling companion, usually so gay, assumed an appearance of exceptional gravity. He respectfully removed his hat.

"Uncover," said he.

I hastened to imitate him.

"But what for?" I asked.

"Salute the Clos-Vougeot," he replied, with earnestness, "the most precious gift heaven has made to our country."

It was an ancient custom, I learned. When a regiment passes on the road, the colonel orders the drums to beat and the troops to present arms. In fact, too much honor cannot be paid to this exceptional product of the generous soil of Burgundy. A tout seigneur tout honneur.

The Clos-Vougeot vineyard contains about one hundred and twenty acres, and gives an annual average yield of fourteen thousand gallons. It is probable, says the author, that at least ten times as much apocryphal Clos-Vougeot wine is sold as genuine. The chateau was built by a brotherhood of Bernardine monks in 1551, and remained in the possession of the order until the revolution, when it was confiscated and sold.

The best French white wine is the Chateau Yquem, the product of a vineyard near Pujols, in the Department of Lot-et-Garonne, the property of the Marquis de Lur-Saluces. Chateau Yquem, called by the people of the Gironde the king of wines and the wine of kings, is not a celebrity of old date. It began to be famous about the close of the last century, and is said to owe its excellence to particular processes in the making, introduced by an ancestor of the present marquis soon after he came into possession of the estate in 1785. Although the vineyards cover nearly five hundred acres, they have never produced more than one hundred and twenty casks of wine in a single year. So it is probable that most of the lovers of Chateau Yquem never tasted the genuine article in all their lives. The price of the new wine at the cellars averages about six thousand francs a cask. A cask of 1847 was sold in 1859 to the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia for twenty thousand francs.

A week of benefits is always uninteresting, notwithstanding the fact that each beneficiary selects that part which he or she thinks to be his or her best. Thus, Bishop very properly plays "Falstaff," since he has always shone his best as a Shakspearean comedian; Jeffreys-Lewis gives "Camille"—partly, perhaps, an experiment—and little Beaudet selects the "Lady of Lyons." She does not seem to have lost the idea of burlesque while abandoning opera bouffe. Does any one ever go to benefits? Time was when they were really rather popular affairs, but, like

"Merciless disaster,

They followed fast and followed faster," and came to be a decidedly unpopular form of entertainment. Therefore, the past week has not been one of thrilling interest. But the next? C'est autre chose. Neilson opens in Cymbeline as "Imogene," whom the commentators declare to be the most charming of the Shakspearean sisterhood. Every one remembers what a beautiful picture she made in her white page's suit in the cave scene, and though her "Juliet" is not a jot worn, perhaps it is good policy to commence with this delightful part. At the Bush Street, the delightful Pirates is to be withdrawn, and taken to the country, with Turner, Peakes & Co., and we are to have Boccaccio, an opera by the popular author of Fatinita, and we are promised a set of most enchanting costumes, and Emelie Melville is to be a boy again; which is very nice, although she seems to speak the truth in The Royal Middy when she sighs for a skirt. So we shall have quite a gala week next week in the theatres, and every one who has not gone to the country will be out again, and we shall see the boxes brilliant once more. And oh, how much brighter and better and more prosperous the poor theatres do look with a lot of rich people sitting around in all the glory of their war paint! BETSV B.

Some o'er-charged and sentimental chap indites the following lines in the New York Tribune to Adelaide Neilson, the fair creature now at the Baldwin:

A voice that mocks a laughing mountain brook;
A smile as swift as summer swallows fly;
And eyes that drain the beauty of the sky
To fill our hearts with but a single look;
But, lack of lovely words! For if I took
A thousand pages whereupon to try
To paint her perfect, yet my pen were dry;
For "Beauty," only, could adorn the book.
Still may you find her spirit hid in flowers,
Her womanhood in yonder steadfast star,
Her winsome graces in the wandering stream.
And, oh, thou perfect Poet of all hours,
Methinks I hear thee, saying from afar,
"This Rosalind is worthy of my dream."

Neilson disposed of some of her cast-off dresses and jewels in New York previous to her departure for San Francisco. It was her original intention to sell them here at the close of her engagement. Let us see what we missed. The sale of costumes realized $539, and that of the jewels, $2,243.50—in all, $2,785.50. A purple velvet dress with a trimmed skirt and over-dress was bought by a lady for $12.50. A "Beatrice" dress, pale green gros-grain silk, elaborately trimmed and embroidered in gold, excited considerable competition, and was finally sold for $47.50. An Indian cashmere dress was most admired, and brought $65. A handsome blue satin dress trimmed with swans-down, worn by Miss Neilson in the character of "Juliet," was bought by a dealer for $55. One of the costumes used in playing "Pauline" and "Lady Teazle" was sold for $29. It was a white gros-grain silk, embroidered with moss rose-buds in silk and silver. A white satin "Juliet" dress brought $16, and a green satin costume, with a gold-embroidered overdress, $17. One of the costumes worn by Miss Neilson in the character of "Julia," in The Hunchback, brought $23. The remaining lots sold at prices varying from $5 to $10. They included satin dresses, satin fronts, boy costumes, and veils. One of the boy costumes used in playing "Rosalind" went for $5. The sale of the jewels excited more interest. As each piece of jewelry was offered it was passed through the audience to those desiring to examine it. A colored gold bracelet with a pearl and diamonds brought $52. Another bracelet, colored gold with one diamond and fifteen pearls, brought $66. Considerable competition was stirred up over a pair of earrings with two pearls and twenty-two diamonds. The highest bid was $240. A gold bracelet sold for $27; a pearl and diamond lace pin for $35, and an elegant diamond star for $125. A wide gold bracelet, on which "the word" "souvenir" was inscribed with diamond brilliants, was sold for $185; a pendant with diamonds, pink coral, and pearls, $67. A ring with a large oblong sapphire surmounted with diamond brilliants brought the highest sum, $445. A pair of earrings, large turquoise and twenty-two diamonds, went for $320—the next highest price—and a bracelet to match for $210. A magnificent pendant, valued at $5,000, was offered on condition that a bid of $2,500 should be received. But as there were no bidders it was withdrawn.

A New Jersey colored man, whose wife had left, said: "She would come back if I frowed her some sugar, but I ain't frowin' no sugar, do you heah?"

A TELEPHONIC CONVERSATION.

As Reported by Mark Twain.

I notice that one can always write best when some one is talking through a telephone close by. Well, the thing began in this way. A member of our household came in and asked me to have our house put into communication with Mr. Bagley's, down-town. I have observed, in many cities, that the sex always shrink from calling up the Central Office themselves. I don't know why, but they do. So I touched the bell, and this talk ensued:

Central Office [gruffly]: "Hello!"
I.: "Is it the Central Office?"
C. O.: "Of course it is. What do you want?"
I.: "Will you switch me on to the Bagley's, please?"
C. O.: "All right. Just keep your ear to the telephone."

Then I heard k-look, k-look, k-look—klook-klook-klook-look! then a horrible "gritting" of teeth, and finally a piping female voice: "Y-e-s?"

[Rising inflection.] "Did you wish to speak to me?" Without answering, I handed the telephone to the applicant and sat down. Then followed the queerest of all the queer things in this world—a conversation with only one end to it. You hear questions asked; you don't hear the answer. You hear invitations given; you hear no thanks in return. You have listening pauses of dead silence, followed by apparently irrelevant and unjustifiable exclamations of glad surprise, or sorrow, or dismay. You can't make head or tail of the talk, because you never hear anything that the person at the other end of the wire says. Well, I heard the following series of observations, all from the one tongue, and all shouted—for you can't ever persuade the sex to speak gently into a telephone:

"Yes? Why, how did that happen?"

Pause.

"What did you say?"

Pause.

"Oh, no, I don't think it was."

Pause.

"No, oh, no, I didn't mean that. I meant put it in while it is still boiling—or just before it comes to a boil."

Pause.

"WHAT?"

Pause.

"I turned it over with a back stitch on the salvage edge."

Pause.

"Yes, I like that way, too; but I think it's better to baste it on with Valenciennes, or bombazine, or something of that sort. It gives it such an air—and attracts so much notice."

Pause.

"It's forty-ninth Deuteronomy, sixty-fourth to ninety-seventh, inclusive. I think we ought all to read it often."

Pause.

"Perhaps so; I generally use a hair-pin."

Pause.

"What did you say? [Aside] Children, do be quiet!"

Pause.

"Oh! B flat! Dear me, I thought you said it was the cat!"

Pause.

"Since when?"

Pause.

"Why, I never heard of it."

Pause.

"You astound me! It seems utterly impossible!"

Pause.

"Who did?"

Pause.

"Goodness gracious!"

Pause.

"Well, what is this world coming to? Was it right in church?"

Pause.

"And was her mother there?"

Pause.

"Why, Mrs. Bagley, I should have died of humiliation. What did they do?"

Long pause.

"I can't be perfectly sure, because I haven't the notes by me; but I think it goes something like this: Te-rolly-loll-loll-loll-loll-loll-loll, O lolly-loll-loll-loll-loll-loll! And then repeat, you know."

Pause.

"Yes, I think it is very sweet—and very solemn and impressive, if you get the andantino and pianissimo right."

Pause.

"Oh, gum-drops, gum-drops! But I never allow them to eat striped candy. And of course they can't till they get their teeth, anyway."

Pause.

"What?"

Pause.

"Oh, not in the least—go right on. He's here writing—it doesn't bother him."

Pause.

"Very well, I'll come if I can. [Aside] Dear me, how it does tire a person's arm to hold this thing up so long! I wish she'd—"

Pause.

"Oh, no, not at all. I like to talk—but I'm afraid I'm keeping you from your affairs."

Pause.

"Visitors?"

Pause.

"No, we never use butter on them."

Pause.

"Yes, that is a very good way. But all the cook-books say they are very unhealthy when they are out of season. And he doesn't like them, any way—especially canned."

Pause.

"Oh, I think that is too high for them. We have never paid over fifty cents a bunch."

Pause.

"Must you go? Well, good-bye."

Pause.

"Yes, I think so. Good-bye."

Pause.

"Four o'clock, then—I'll be ready. Good-bye."

Pause.

"Thank you ever so much. Good-bye."

Pause.

"Oh, not at all—just as fresh—Which? Oh, I'm glad to hear you say that. Good-bye."

[Hangs up the telephone, and says: "Oh, it does tire a person's arm so!"]

A man delivers a single, brutal "good-bye," and that is the end of it. No so with the gentle sex. I say it in their praise—they can not abide abruptness. —Atlantic Monthly.

THE MIDSHIPMITE.

"Well, that's a woman I pity! Get out of your easy chair;
Look out of the window—that woman in black, with glory of red-gold hair."
"Why does she carry a primrose cross, and what has her misery been?"
"She has only lost her child, my lad, and is going to Kensal Green."

We prate of our little troubles, we men of muscle and brain;
We curse if our pipes of peace won't draw, and howl
at the wind and rain;
And those of our band who scribble a bit are instantly down in luck
If they're stabbed in the back by an ignorant fool who hasn't a grain of pluck.

It's grim to feel you're honest—no doubt, possessing a soul to save—
When editors bribe some dissolute cad to hound you as cheat and knave.
"Tis God will winnow the false and true, who knows what our sins have been,
But think of poor innocent Margaret Gray, who is walking to Kensal Green."

What is her story? Well, light your pipe, and sit you down in your chair.
Two chapters: one, it is headed "Of Love," the other is marked "Despair."
I have seen some joy, but the Park at Knole was never in spring so gay
As when Margaret Welsh in Sevenoaks Church was married to Bernard Gray!

"Twas a runaway match in the Weald of Kent that was blessed by the parson prim;
His life was given to art—the stage, and hers was given to him;
Never a man have I known so pure, and never a girl
so brave,
As were married that day in Sevenoaks Church,
when the primrose covered the grave!

They talk of love in an empty way; but this was the crown of life
When Bernard seemed in a dream, and shook at the touch of his sweet-voiced wife.
Whenever they kiss'd, their eyes for love were brimming with tears of joy,
And the prize of happiness came next spring with the birth of their baby-boy.

What had they done to deserve God's wrath? In the old mysterious way
Death stretched his fingers out, and felt for the heart of Bernard Gray.
Life was too happy for him, poor lad! he'd been fading for years, they said;
And the mother and child were asleep one night
when Bernard Gray lay dead!

Down like an avalanche swept despair through the house where love had smiled,
Crushing the innocent mother alone by the side of her only child—
As you make your bed you must tumble down, is the rule of our worldly life,
And there wasn't a soul to pity the fate of the destute actor's wife.

For six long years, as I live 'tis true, in the midst of the city's din
She slaved and starved for her baby-boy, and her soul was free from sin;
And at last they said for the actor's child they had found on the stage a part,
So she said: "The gift that an artist gave I will dedicate pure to art."

They took him away from his mother, and her heart was sick and sore,
Though her baby-boy was the life and soul of Her Majesty's Pinafore.
Whenever the theatre rang with cheers and echoed with wild delight
A heart in the gallery shook with fear for the fate of the Midshipmite.

For the boy was odd, old-fashioned, and over-clever,
'twas said;
He was full of the strangest fancies, and complained of an aching head;
And one day, half in earnest, and possibly half in fun,
He asked, "Who will help us, mother, when the Pinafore's ceased to run?"

'Twas the close of a heartless winter that changed to a cheerless spring,
With wind in the east that struck with a chill the child at the draughty wing,
When the mother found, to her horror, the boy was too ill to sup,
And he said in his curious manner, "The Pinafore
run is up!

"Give me a kiss, my mother, and put me away to bed;
For my limbs they ache; I shiver; I've pains in my throbbing head.
I feel to-night so weary." And, out of his tene-feful store,
He murmured the airs, in a childlike way, of Her Majesty's Pinafore.

"Oh, say that you love me, darling!" she whispered,
pale with fears,
But he murmured "Hardly ever," as he kissed away her tears.
And then, as a nightmare vision the mind of a sleeper haunts,
He said: "You'll be kind to my cousins, my sisters, and my aunts."

On the ship that had been his playground he sailed to his rest at last,
With a cheer for his baby comrades, as he clung to the yielding mast.
And he moaned out, racked with torture, as the sand in the hour-glass ran:
"Well, in spite of all temptation, your boy is an Englishman!"

They buried the little sailor, quite close to his father's side,
Seven years from the day when in Sevenoaks Church
his mother was made a bride.
So, there's the story of that which is! God knows what might have been.
And this is the reason why Margaret Gray is walking to Kensal Green!

—Clement Scott.

Did you ever see a pretty girl with a neat waist basquet?

At the recent Royal Academy banquet Mr. Bret Harte did not make a great impression. Unlike the majority of his countrymen, he is not a fluent speaker. He read his speech, and did not read it well. His head being bent over his manuscript, his voice did not "carry;" except by those near his seat, it was not heard. The toast in reply to which Mr. Bret Harte was called upon to speak was "Science and Literature."

"I presume I am selected to answer to this toast as a native of a country which reads more English books and pays less for them than any other nation. [A laugh.] Certainly, representing as I do a free people—who of their own accord read four volumes of Tennyson to one of Longfellow [a laugh]—I might claim a hearing here. [A laugh.] But I recognize in your kindly greeting the same welcome extended to Hosea Biglow, Hans Breitman, Artemus Ward, and Mark Twain. [Cheers.] I recognize your appreciation of what is said to be distinctive American literature—a literature which laughs with the American skies, and is by turns as surprising and as extravagant as the American weather. [A laugh.] Indeed, I am not certain that these cyclones of American humor that cross the Atlantic are not as providential as the American storms that mitigate the austere monotony of the English climate. [A laugh.] For it has been settled by your reviewers that American literature is American humor, and that this American humor is a kind of laughable impropriety, more or less scantily clothed in words. It has been settled that you are a sober people, and that nobody in America takes life seriously—not even a highwayman—and that our literature is a reflex of our life. But I think that a majority of this Academy are kind enough to recognize some principles of art underlying this characteristic. And I consider that no higher compliment has been paid American humor than that the type of American drawn by your greatest English humorist has been supplanted by types drawn by Lowell, Artemus Ward, and Mark Twain. [Applause.]

How dear to my heart is the school I attended
And how I remember, so distant and dim,
That red-headed Bill and the pin that I bended
And carefully put on the bench under him!
And how I recall the surprise of the master,
When Bill gave a yell and sprang up with the pin
So high that his bullet-head-busted the plaster
Above, and the scholars all set up a grin.
That active boy Billy, that high-leaping Billy!
That loud-shouting Billy that sat on a pin!

The Parisian tells of a woman who found out a way to prevent wrinkles. She squeezed out the juice from the bulbs of several white lilies, until she had obtained about seventy grammes of liquid, to which she added an equal quantity of the best honey, and thirty-five grammes of pure white melted wax. These substances, being well mixed, formed a pomade, with which she delicately rubbed her face night and morning.

What two words in the English language have brought the most peace, comfort, health, and joy to the homes and firesides of America? "Hop Bitters" are these words.—Ed.

WOOD'S NEW STYLE GOPHER TRAP GRAND SUCCESS! GRAND SUCCESS!

One Thousand Dozen have been sold in the past year. One hundred gophers have been caught in a single trap in one week. They are now the best and cheapest trap in the world. Ask your merchants for them, and take no other, as this New Style Gopher Trap is the only one giving perfect satisfaction. Guaranteed to catch gophers when set according to directions where no other trap will.

Messrs. Baker & Hamilton: Please send me by mail three of Wood's Cylinder Gopher Traps. I like them. I had not set my last one for over fifteen minutes before I caught a gopher, and I caught quite a number with it. Having left it in my field, however, some one stole it, so I want you to send me three more. I enclose postage stamps, not having currency. Please register them; I enclose ten cents extra for that purpose.

Respectfully Yours,
ROBERT W. REEVE.

DIRECTIONS.—Wherever fresh dirt is thrown up, dig until the open horizontal hole is exposed, as shown in cut; then place the trap wholly in, and set a board at an angle behind the trap, and cover with dirt in such a manner as to form a dark chamber behind the trap, which the gopher tries to fill, and frees the spring.

Push the spring door back until it passes the end of the rod, which it will do only when the back end of the rod is close to the back of the trap; then also push down the front of the rod until the back end rises to the shoulder on the inside of the back door, on which let it rest but very little, that it may be set light, so as to spring easily. Set the trap with spring on top. Steel springs will always break more or less, particularly if small and under water or in damp ground, hence a quantity have been made for free distribution.

If your merchants do not keep them, you can obtain them from

VOL. VI. NO. 24.

SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 12, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

BY NARROW-GAUGE TO SANTA CRUZ.

Through the Mountains and the Redwoods to the Sundown Sea.

It was a Saturday morning in early June that I stepped aboard the Alameda boat for a run down through the mountains and the fragrant redwoods to Santa Cruz beside the sea. I had been often to the snug little town before. Sometimes by the sea-sick steamer that crawled—oh, so tediously!—down the uninteresting coast; sometimes by the roundabout rail route through the dusty bake-oven valley that ends just beyond Gilroy; sometimes by the San José and Santa Clara stages that climbed lazily up one steep slope of the intervening Coast Range mountains, to slide as leisurely down the other. All these routes involved a whole day of dust, and discomfort, and at times disgust. Now, leaving the city at 8:45, I was to lunch at the Pacific Ocean House in Santa Cruz after less than four hours' ride over one of the most perfect and picturesque little railroads ever built. Truly time works some very considerable wonders—and this narrow-gauge is not of the least. Along its entire length it is a picture. The boat—superb in all its appointments—trails along for a few miles across the bay, and up the Oakland Creek lands at a slip where the compact little train in waiting is promptly off for its destination. Straight ahead, across a bit of marsh, it enters a gap or gateway in the low-lying line of oak trees near the water's edge, and glides swiftly through the Encinal, by the bathing establishments and Schutzen Park, along the most beautiful railroad avenue in the world. Yes, the whole world can safely be challenged for a prettier railroad street than Central Avenue in Alameda—in the spring-time—from Schutzen to and beyond Park

THE NATURAL BRIDGE—SANTA CRUZ.

Street station. Gardens to the right, and the left, and all around; flowers that burst in the bud, and break the stems in their bloom, and fairly fling their fragrance; trees whose close and dark green foliage, and even growth and height, make a mat between earth and sky that gives the whole peninsula the look of a two-storied lawn; and through all this a long, wide pathway of glistening gravel with double lines of ringing rails. High Street station passed, and we are in the open country, almost at a bound. The drifting oaks, and swirling gardens, and waltzing flower-beds give place to well-tilled fields of tomatoes and potatoes and long rows of spinach and lettuce, wildly mixing themselves up with endless processions of young cabbages and gay caravans of carrot and onion tops. We have passed from the great flower to the great vegetable garden of the city, and the squares and rows and patches of salad green can be seen zigzagging and twirling over the black loam surface, and fading away into the distance of the bay on the right and the rounded hills on the left. Then there is a dash over a few trestles and creeks; and a swift coursing over a good road-bed by San Leandro, Russell's, Mt. Eden, Alvarado, and Hall's—all pretty little stations, with choice bits of hill and bay and plain landscape interspersed between; just such scraps of scenery as the French etchers so love to depict. A few minutes after ten the train pulls up under the covered depot at Newark, the town so extensively laid-out and advertised a few years ago. A splendid situation, and a place that has a future before it yet. From here the cars are off down the valley for San José like gazelles. The track is as straight as a string, as level as a floor, and the drive-wheels on the little engine—as a young Santa Cruz graphically and enthusiastically remarks to his mother—"just go woundy, woundy." Mowry's, Alviso—the old-time landing-place at the lower end of the bay; then Santa Clara, with its broad barley and wheat fields, and acres of strawberries and tree-fringed drives; and, finally, pretty and prosperous San José—the garden city. Here a few minutes' stop, the tumble of trunks and express packages; and then through and across the shaded and sprinkled streets, among the nicely laid-out and tended gardens, the road strikes to the right directly for the hills. It is a narrow iron thoroughfare over the fertile plain, through vineyards and grain-fields, and almond orchards of thousands of graceful trees. Just beyond Lovelady's station

Los Gatos—the wild cats—Creek is seen twisting its sinuous way along, and in a few minutes the station itself is in sight. This is the stopping-place for Congress Springs, up in the hills to the right. It is also the beginning of the really picturesque part of the ride. Here are to be seen the great six-mule freight-schooners with following trail loaded with lime and quicksilver, and one thing and another, from the Guadalupe and New Almaden mines. The hills have been reached. On either hand they round up and away, steep and scraggy with chaparral growth. The only pathway now is beside the bed of the Los Gatos, and, winding as only a narrow-gauge can wind, the road follows the purling water into the very bosom of the mountains. A few miles above Los Gatos there is a truss bridge across the stream, and the rounding of a point of rocks that makes as wild and rugged a picture as one could wish to see. Below the bending bushes fringe the water-way, and above the track the flume of the San José Water Works squirms in and out of the gulches like an immense black snake. Tunnel No. 1 is a hole in an abrupt ridge, through which, however, the sunlight now shines. Beyond the road runs, hugging the banks to the left like a timid child, till it reaches Alma, a station in a bit of a meadow in a spreading of the hills. At this point are petroleum oil tanks and a pipe-line that runs for some miles to an oil gulch to the right of the stream, where there are several pumping wells of a capacity, it is said, to keep supplied with crude petroleum the large refining works now in course of construction at Alameda point. Above Alma there are five miles of scenery that will just make you wild. Abrupt and instantaneous views; delightful ins and outs of the embankment; grassy slopes, and tiny meadows and vistas up and down the stream, where willows wind-whip the limpid pool, and boulders in froth and foam contest the waters right of way; ravines solid-full of wild blossoming lilacs, lavender streaking the mountain-side with fragrant stripes, and an atmosphere so invigorating and healthful that a last-gasp and thoroughly-resigned consumptive would be inspired to knock down and annihilate the incoming undertaker. In fact, way, way up on a hill-top, so far that it was a mere speck, one of the passengers pointed out to me from the rear platform of the train a cabin and a clearing. "There," said he, "lives a woman who only a few months ago was brought down from San Francisco so far gone with the doctors and consumption that she had to be carried. Her hold on life was by the slimmest kind of a thread. She had an idea that if she could get and stay on one of these hill-tops she would live. It was one of those cases where the husband wanted the woman to live. So he bought that place up there, and made the cabin comfortable.

WRIGHT'S STATION AND TRESTLES.

I helped take his wife up from Alma, and I didn't think that even a mountain-top would save her. But I'll be hanged if she isn't out and scratching around in her flower garden up there to-day, and she is going to live and get well. She says she don't want any more of the city, and is happy and conten minutes, changed for the heavy timber growth, and darker tints, and bracing atmosphere of the Upper Soquel. There pipe are evidences that they made themselves very comfortable therein. In another part of the grove are shown the remains tented where she is." The invalid's name was mentioned at the time, but the incident is sufficient to show the quality of the climate. Wright's Station, the next stopping-place beyond Alma, is directly at the mouth of Tunnel No. 2, and the point where the Los Gatos turns away to the left and the bold barrier of the mountain rises. It is rather an interesting place. Wild and rugged gulches here seam the steep slopes, and come down to meet the Los Gatos like the ribs of a great fan. Across the creek there is a long trestle leading to the station, and a grade that connects with the toll-road and Wright's Hotel and the Hotel de Redwoods far up on the mountain top. These isolated places are great resorts for sportsmen, for all over this county there are game and fish in their season in abundance. Just beyond the railroad trestle there is the saw-mill, and the boarding-houses, and the various shanties erected while the tunnel was building, located either beside the stream or peeping out from among the trees. The mouth of this, the longest tunnel on the line—six thousand one hundred and fifty feet, or about a mile and a quarter—is very unpretentious and innocent-looking. Like the diminutive dot on the fair face of the apple, it gives no sign of the great worm-hole of civilization that is boring its uncompromising way through the very heart of nature. The tunnel is heavily timbered throughout, has a slight grade each way for good drainage, and near the centre, where the oil seam was struck, the ever-escaping gas is caught in a receiver; and from an iron pipe a great yellow and red flame, twisting about like the arm of a demon, burns day and night in the darkness—its fitful flarings the very symbol of unrest. From the last car I watched it grow smaller and smaller and finally become a spark in an ebony setting. Out of the tunnel and we are on the other side of the mountain and in a veritable transformation scene. Direct from the darkness, the glad sunlight has a double value. Here the great redwood trees stand straight and tall and in a forest. The chaparral-covered hills have been left on the other side of the divide. The delicate shrubbery, and lilacs, and grass-greens, and semi-tropical climate of the Los Gatos are, in less than is a smell of the sea and the savor of salt in the air. Beside the tunnel's portal are ruins of a Chinese town; two cabins are stuck on the steep hill-side above the opening; and beside the track the stream once more, running now, however, toward the western horizon. At Christmas Gulch—so named by the surveyors in honor of their Christmas dinner—there is a Chinese camp that for picturesque arrangement and beauty of situation could not be surpassed. It is located on two sides of a triangular gulch, through the apex of which tumbles a mountain spring in a succession of clear cool pools. The tents are pitched directly into the steep hill-side, facing out, with a broad terraced walk running in front of them all, and crossing the stream at the intersection on a bridge of logs. The high embankment of the railroad forms the base of the triangle, and the enclosed area is a wild tangle of underbrush, through which the streamlet filters. Here the celestial, who are employed as wood-choppers and on the construction trains, eat and sleep and wrestle with each other in the long twilight evenings at dominoes and tan, with not the least appreciation of the beauty of their surroundings. Beyond this camp there is a primitive-looking saw-mill; and then, one and a half miles from the last underground exit, the locomotive whistles for Tunnel No. 3. This is constructed in the same manner as No. 2, is five thousand eight hundred feet long—over a mile—and penetrates the divide that separates Soquel and Bean Creeks. The run is now down the course of the latter stream, through the virgin forest to Glenwood, a station in a bit of a meadow. Here connection is made by wagon with the Magnetic Springs. Thence the road winds away among the trees again, by Dougherty's Mills, where great redwood logs are scattered about on the hill-sides like jackstraws, and piles of wood are corded up in every direction, through Tunnel No. 4—nine hundred and ten feet in length—to the waters of the beautiful murmuring little Zianthe; thence through ferns and redwood fragrance to Felton, the San Lorenzo, and the famous Big Tree Grove. Here the railroad has really something to brag of—a natural depot. An aisle between great stalwart redwood stems, whose tops look disdainfully down on the threads of steel, and the toy engine, and the pigmy passengers. But they shade from the sun all the same, and are dignified enough to be admired. In this grove there are eighty-five big trees, with a hundred or two in lower grades. The "San Lorenzo Giant," the big fellow who wears a great corset of cards from time to time to him by visitors, in height, with a more of a top—in a storm some is 62 feet in circumference 2 feet is 20 feet 8 inches, and the straight shin his first limb. a beautiful state of decay, the whole arrangement of the works can be plainly seen. Another attraction is the stump of a fallen giant that must have been forty feet in diameter, and in the main grove are burned-out trees that have a history and an interest. At this grove, or station, there is a hotel, and the place is fitted up with all the conveniences of a pleasure-ground. It is a very pleasant spot to spend a summer afternoon, or join in a picnic, or caper about in a moonlight dance. Everything is sweet-smelling, fresh, and free. All about the great grove is pretty, too. At one side flows along the San Lorenzo, and across it a rustic foot-bridge leads to points commanding beautiful views up and down the stream. A mile or so above is Felton with its flumes, and tramways, and lumber industry. In this neighborhood many parties from the city have selected camping grounds for the sultry summer months. North from Felton, between the Santa Cruz and the extreme Coast Range, and south from Pescadero, there is a vast unexplored tract of thousands and thousands of acres, called the Great Basin, a sombre solitude watered by streams that run down into the sea through an impassable gulch. In this wilderness there are to be found all species of game—bear, and deer, and raccoon, and wild-cats, and the streams are filled with fish. But back to the narrow-gauge. From the Big Tree grove, the route is now down the famous cañon of the San Lorenzo. We cross the river by a truss bridge, and along a curving trestle among the trees the train takes the right-hand bank for the run into town. We are but eight miles from it and the sea; but eight such miles as I never saw from a railroad train before. It is down grade all the way, and as the last car slides around the curves a series of pictures present themselves, any one of which would be worthy of a place on the line in the salon of nature's masterpieces. Charming bits of wood and water, rocky bluffs and densely wooded slopes, and gorges with the blue-green torrent tumbling at the bottom. Down we go through the short tunnels, Nos. 5, 6, and 7, and the powder works are seen in the flat to the left, with the white house of the superintendent perched high on the opposite bluff; and then over the mesa or plain where the cañon ends we catch a first and a grand view of the Long Branch of the Pacific, the blue, the beautiful bay of Monterey beyond; and while we marvel, and rhapsodize, and try to take it all in, there is a warning whistle for the eighth and last tunnel, of nine hundred feet directly through the loins of the town, and when again the light succeeds the darkness we are right at the depot, and in the very heart of Santa Cruz beside the sea. And how much more comfortable the trip has been than those of the past, when the journey had to be made by stage or steamer—both reaching the city late in the afternoon. As now provided with traveling facilities by the enterprise of the projectors of the South Pacific Coast Railroad, Santa Cruz is one of the best served and most accessible cities in the State. It has, as it were, a line all its own. You can leave San Francisco any day at 8:45 A. M., reaching Santa Cruz at 12:35 P. M., giving you the whole afternoon. At 3:30 P. M. another train leaves, reaching Santa Cruz at 7:20 P. M.; and Saturdays at 4:30 P. M.—long after business hours—you can take a late train, that will whirl you in the cool of the afternoon, and through the sunset and the twilight, and set you down beside the sea at twenty-five minutes past eight o'clock. From Santa Cruz you can leave on Mondays as early as 4:30 A. M., reaching the city at 8:50 A. M.; and on other week days at 6:03 A. M., and 2:37 P. M.; reaching the Market Street ferry-landing at 9:50 A. M. and 6:35 P. M., respectively. Sundays a train leaves San Francisco at 7:40 A. M., reaching Santa Cruz at 11:45 A. M., admitting of a few hours' stop at that we have for the nonce run away from. In the early evening all the places of business are gay; there is a flood of gas-light, and crowds on the sidewalks. The stores have prettily-arranged windows, and neat-looking shelves, and tasty displays of goods; and more than all this, the people are cheerful-looking, good-natured, and obliging. And this year they have really been enterprising, too. Determined not to be left in the lurch by their rival, Monterey, they have exerted themselves in the matter of improvements. One hotel has been remodeled and renovated, another has been enlarged, and the private boarding-houses have added to and improved their accommodations. Pacific Avenue has been macadamized its entire length; side streets have been smoothed for carriage-wheels; open and commodious street cars have been built for the beach lines; and, best of all, a new and superb drive—the Cliff Road—has been opened along the ocean bluff, around by the light-house point.

is of itself a recreation and a rest. Here, sitting in a phaeton, or reclining on the cliff sward—which, by the short-stemmed yellow daisies, appears to be upholstered with buttons of gold—one can see the great swell of the Pacific come in, lifting the beds of kelp and the mats of sea-moss, and either shaking itself into shreds and showers of spray, or else sobbing its very soul away in the little echoing caves. It all depends upon the mood of the salted waters as to its motion. Sometimes, though the day be clear, the white horses charge with a roar, and against the rocks get up the greatest kind of a boom for themselves. Then again, the rollers are good-natured and peacefully inclined, and lounge and loaf themselves out of existence, and croon soft little lullabies, and at night swing themselves in the moonlight like ribs of molten silver. Again, under the white shroud of the fog, they are petulant and sad, and moan with a voice born probably of some far away distress "deep in the bosom of the ocean buried." Still again, when the winds are abroad, and gales are on the war-path, and there is trouble and disturbance on the outside water waste, the waves, loosening the strings of their temper, lash the resisting shore with the besom of destruction and the venom of the storm. Then the whole coast trembles with the cannonading and concussion of the liquid great guns. The caves boom, and the great outlying beaches drip and roar, and the isolated rocks, where the sea-birds generally roost, are tufts of foam. Along the Cliff Road there is the shaking of a great curtain of spray that is broken just off the light-house, to reappear again at the rock point at the mouth of the San Lorenzo; thence by the points at Aptos and Soquel; then like a fleecy roll of cotton fading away down the scimitar edge of the bay. It is really fascinating to see old ocean in a tantrum. It reminds somewhat of the human disposition—now calm, passive, insinuating, attractive, and altogether lovely; then cold, repellant, uncompromising, aggressive, destructive, damnable—like people we have known. It is a splendid study. To those of you who go down to the sea for solitude, and who like to be alone with your own thoughts, and go wildly insane with your own imaginations, I cordially recommend this place for meditation. Here, with a book, in a sunny nook in the shelving rocks, you can think all the things possible to stimulated—not over-stimulated—thought. Here the weary can sigh, and the lover lie. Here you can put to yourself fairly and squarely the question: "Is life worth living?" and if it isn't, it is a splendid place to commit suicide. But even if not morbidly inclined, there is plenty to interest. The coast formation is a very light sandstone, and the constant chafe of the waters has worn it into every conceivable shape. The shore outline looks like a great comb. In the cliffs are all manner and sizes of caves, that can be explored at low tide. One of the largest runs entirely under the Cliff Road and out into a neighboring plain. Another crops out near the drive, with a blow-hole that sends aloft, when a strong swell rolls in, a stream exactly like that from the head of a spouting whale. There are pockets and seams and boom-holes everywhere. Further up the coast is Moore's beach, with arches to be seen at low tide, and natural aquariums, and all manner of curious inroads in the strata made by the sea. Still further along is the Natural Bridge—shown in first page sketch—and to which point it is, I believe, the intention to extend the road as soon as funds and the right of way can be obtained. When this is done, it will be an ocean drive that the people of Santa Cruz can refer to with pardonable pride, and one that for healthful atmosphere and varied interest, beauty, and extent of view can not easily be duplicated. Another improvement that ought to be made in the way of drives is the opening of what some call the Pogonip road, leading from Cowles by the limekilns, and along the crest of a beautiful ridge to a point on the Big Tree grade, just above the powder mills. At present it is a private way, and permission must be obtained to travel it. But some arrangement should at once be made to do away with its gates, make it public, and put it in condition. For it is as necessary to the bringing out of the beauty of the town and its surroundings as the Cliff Road to the enjoyment of the ocean shore. It is one of the prettiest short drives imaginable. Direct from the upper plateau of the town an easy grade takes you to the top of a ridge from which the flash and sheen of the ocean can be seen for miles and miles; then with gentle curvings, with a pretty wooded slope to the left, and a broad and generous and cultivated

The late train Saturday night gives all day Sunday in Santa Cruz, and the Monday morning train will get you back here in ample time for business. As to the cost of the trip, the excursion rates are exceedingly reasonable. Tickets, good until the following Monday, are sold from San Francisco and Park Street, Alameda, for:

From Santa Cruz, Aptos, and Soquel, and the Capitola camping-grounds, can be reached by rail quicker and cheaper and more comfortably than by any other route. So much for the new narrow-gauge, and its picturesque beauties, and its facilities for travel, and many recommendations for a pleasure trip. Now for Santa Cruz itself. For five successive seasons I have visited the town, and with its other summer visitors enjoyed the beauty of its surroundings, the invigoration of its sea baths, and the inspiration of its incomshowing here and there through the natural forest trees. Far away to the right, and across the broad expanse of bay, the Monterey line can be distinctly seen, with the range of hills running down to the Point of Pines. Straight to the south and east is the gap of the fertile valley of the Salinas, smoky in its great distance; while inland, to the left, the peaks of the Santa Cruz Range rise with ruffles of fog toying with the distant tree-tops, and shifting and drifting themselves into absolute nothingness. And then the sunsets! Viewed from this road, or from Graham Hill, or points still further up the cañon, they are as nothing that you have ever seen before. If the day has been a bit smoky, and the sea-breeze is not too strong, the conditions are especially favorable. First, tints of purple and hues of amethyst begin to tinge the horizon as hints of the glory blaze. Then there is a gradual blending and deepening of shades, a mighty mixing of all the ingredients of the atmospheric color-tubes on the great, broad palette of the ocean by the Master's hand; and then, when the canvas of earth, and ocean, and fretted sky are illuminated by the perfect work, the sun, shorn of his rays and shaped like a great golden orange, dips suddenly out of sight—literally rocked to his diurnal sleep in the cradle of the deep—then the twilight, and the cool, comfortable evening, and the night, in which there is a bonanza of sweet and refreshing sleep. The morning succeeds the night, and its early hours bring new attractions. Then there is a tingle in the air, especially if you are in the saddle, as you what is to be done with the crowds that will on Saturdays and Sundays seek the pleasures that this sanitarium grants. Last year, during Fourth-of-July week the town was so overflowing full that hundreds walked the streets all night, and there was a lively skirmish for something to eat. This year greater accommodations will be provided—but greater attractions will be offered. Santa Cruz boasts the fastest and best mile track in the State, and I understand that stock is being shipped there for running races all through the summer months. The fact, too, that the railroad ride alone is worth the whole cost of the trip will bring thousands. So I see, but one thing for the town to do, and that is to build a hotel as large and attractive as the swell affair across the bay. Santa Cruz is bound to be to San Francisco what Coney Island and Brighton beaches are to New York. All that is wanted to accomplish it is a little nerve, a great deal of public spirit and enthusiasm, and—a big pile of money. Everything costs, however, and enterprises of this kind can not be handled in a retail or conservative way. What has been done in other places can be done by Santa Cruz for half the outlay. For right at hand she has lime and lumber, with which to build; mountain streams and gushing springs, with which to water; and dairies and farms and fisheries, with which to feed. So if the town, in the race of watering-places, ever takes or accepts a secondary position, it will not be for lack of natural advantages to more than hold its own in any rivalry. For nature has certainly endowed it with from the teeming city that is a ninety-mile panorama—a cool, and picturesque, and pretty way, odorously with fruit and lilac blossoms, and fragrant with the aromatic breath of great tall trees. What more could be asked for?—what further desired? Certainly nothing, so far as surroundings and natural beauty are concerned. Naught for the summer sojourners to clamor for but those creature comforts for which, as a rule, they are always willing to pay—clean beds, towels, table-cloths, and napkins; plenty of well-cooked, wholesome food; fresh milk, fresh butter, and tranquillity. Given these, and there will flock to this accessible haven such a migration of the toilers in the great town as has never before been possible. metry and shape; young men and maidens seeking that opportunity for flirtation which their limited, and perhaps orthodox, home circle does not grant; widows in weeds, and old maids with memories to hold, and tongues to amplify and tell, all the stored-up gossip of city society segregated during the year; clerks and book-keepers and brokers' boys, and the indiscriminate throng, will, with the saved-up ducats of a wise economy, and a general shake of the cares and the scenes that generally environ them, all go down in the ought to be. Then the gardens are their gayest, and the rose-bushes are bouquets, and the climbing vines thrill in every tendril. But I forget the bathing. Great as are all the other attractions of the place, there is nothing so thoroughly satisfying as the sensation of the salt water when you take a header through one of the lounging rollers on the bathing-beach. It is a delight that is participated in by every nerve and fibre that comes in contact with the outly-

a liberal hand. It has a climate that is not only a tonic, but so tropical in its quality that it fairly smothers the gardens with flowers, grows flaming hedges of geraniums, shades with trees, bends low the boughs of the orchards, and stacks up the bearded barley and the heavy-headed wheat. It has ocean drives, and sounding caves, and pebble beaches, and shifting sands, and sea mosses as delicate and full of color as the loosened snood of a mermaid's hair. It has drives, little narrow-gauge cars to the sundown sea, and there, among the scenes that we have so superficially and imperfectly described, and in the full and complete enjoyment of the situation, they will—if they have any appreciation or style about them—fervently and earnestly and honestly thank God that they are alive. For, as a Mills Seminary girl would naively and pathetically put it, it's "an awfully awful interesting" condition to be in sometimes.

F. M. S.

IDEALLY UNATTAINABLE.

I am introspective. I am also intuitional and prehensive, knowing beforehand what is likely to take place; I dislike and can not tolerate subsequent persons who never know a thing till after it happens. Why is anybody subsequent? It would save a world of trouble if everybody were precursory, prehensive, prefatory, and foregoing, for then a great many unnecessary things that we do would be omitted, and all lives, all stories, and all histories would come right down to the naked, necessary facts, and be completed painlessly and to just as good a purpose. I take it—take what?—that in a story, the purpose of which is to develop characters, description of nature and her doings is out of place. You have a villain to work up; nature, you say, has made him tall and dark, or short, florid, and fat; what has that to do with his character? Two lovers meet—moonlight, stars like loving eyes looking down; lovers gazing into each other's eyes, clasping hands, laligagging—that is a pure Greek word, from lalein, to talk lightly and soft, and agein, to do. What of it? Souls, and it is in souls that love exists, and souls that you are after—they don't need hands and arms soft and white, do they? Oh, go to work and describe your characters and have done with it. It is men and women that interest us, not rain pouring in torrents, or the young summer lying panting and athirst in the bosom of the dale. Here my maid—my middle-aged widow—what is a whole-aged widow?—came in and said there was a gentleman in the parlor who would like to see me.

"Tell him that I will be down directly," said I, glancing at his card, on which was written "John P. H. Cassowary." So I ran lightly down stairs, humming a tune with a purpose, or I wouldn't have said that I hummed a tune at all. As I entered the room John P. H. Cassowary rose, and, bowing profoundly, said:

"Miss Agnes Maskelyne, I believe." I inclined my head gracefully, and said that I was she.

"And do I then behold at last her whom I have so long loved in silence; whom I have never seen before; whom I have never even heard of—yet whom I have loved passionately, aye, devotedly, for the last three months and twenty-seven days, not to speak of the odd hours!"

"Perhaps you do," said I; "I don't know. Sit down and tell me all about it. Perhaps you may be the gentleman to whom, though unknown and unheard of, all my spirit in its maiden freshness has been clinging wildly for about four months and a little over." We both sank into chairs.

There is no description or roundaboutness in this writing you will observe. It is all pure character and characterization. Souls, souls, dichotomy, und die Ausklärung der Ewigkeit des Unbewussten doch Wahren. Oh, often have I said that I would devote my life to one long worship of the genius of Goethe—when I find time, I shall do so.

As I have said, we both sank into chairs. Now, I am lean and lank and brown—no, not brown, but blonde—as is the ribbed sea sand. Mr. Burne-Jones would like me, and so would Mr. Dante Gabriel Rossetti. When I sink into a chair it is to some purpose. I don't tumble down, like an avalanche into a Swiss valley, but I fade away and blend my nature with that of the chair; so that when I am fairly seated one can hardly tell which is chair and which is I, except for the fact that I lend length and a certain tenuity to the general appearance, giving it a spidery outline which is beautiful and graceful almost beyond toleration. Having blended myself with the chair, I put my eye-glasses on, and reiterated:

"Now, tell me all about it."

Mr. Cassowary gazed upon me with his soul in his eyes. "Yes," said he, "I feel that you are she whom I have now been seeking for the long length of time which I have mentioned. And you—how is it possible that so far-removed a being, one whose thoughts are as gossamer as the web the spider weaves his way along; you, all whose intuitions are of the most charmingly vague nature; you whose soul is as limpid as a lake lying in the sunlight—how, I say, is it possible that you should ever happen to think of me?"

"You do not answer my question," I replied, "but in the long run that is neither here nor there. As I have sat in the solitude of my chamber in the evening after pa has gone out, I have often, I presume, thought of you, for, unless I am greatly mistaken, you are the creature of my dreams. It matters not what business you may be in or who are your backers. If, as I take for granted, you are he for whom I have longed at the midnight hour—why, that is all I want."

"Ah!" said he, burying his face in his handkerchief. "Ah! who can tell! Because I have sighed for and dreamed of you, and because now at last I have met you, who shall say that you are the being that I was after? Are you unattainable, for instance?"

"I do not know," said I. "Sometimes it seems to me that I am unattainable, and again I have my doubts." Of course, I feel all those Heine fantasies that most girls feel, and dream my vague dreams, but did it never occur to you, who have known and loved so long the quality of woman that I am, that perhaps after all I am an unusually playful bubble on the ocean of existence? I am and I am not. 'Tis the old story. What do you make of it, anyhow?"

"Now I, for instance," replied Mr. Cassowary, "am a practical person, and have long been in search of the ideal. You, my pet, my pride, my only joy, are one of the women whom I take to be unattainable, and hence is my interest in you. Do I love you? Of course I do. Now, to use the common expression, will you love me? I ask you, as a mere question of curiosity, will you be mine?"

"Well," said I, "that depends altogether upon whether or not you are acquainted with some higher thoughts. I do not care for you personally, but I thought that perhaps you were my ideal. What do you know, think, and feel?"

Poor fellow! I felt sorry for him. When thus put to his trumps, what do you think he said? He murmured something about a lost ideal; and when I explained to him that if I were really unattainable I was lost to him, he flopped right over and began to reverse the picture upon me, saying that I had avowed that he was the unattainable. Presently, of course, I grew disgusted with him, and to this very day—would you believe it?—we remain unattainable to each other.

I am growing old and my hair is falling out, but still I dream of that young man who might have been mine if, unfortunately, we had not both been dreaming dreams.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

Prayer of a pious Italian who is playing 4—11—44 in the lottery of the morrow:

"Kind heaven, grant that I may win the capital prize, and I solemnly vow that I will give half of it to the poor. But, if you have any doubts of my honesty, distribute to the poor their half yourself and give me the second prize."

In the morning by the bright light the careful housewife discovers that a great majority of the contents of a keg of cognac deposited in a pantry has leaked out upon the floor.

"Justine," she says, with some severity, to the bonne, "your room is right alongside of the pantry. You must surely have heard the brandy dropping during the night?"

"Yes'm; but I thought it was only the vinegar!"

The uncle Thomas to his nephew, young gummy, who burns to make one end.

"See we, which loveth thou the better—of Alice Durand, who is pretty but poor, or of Jane Dumont, who is ugly but rich?"

The gummy, with a sigh:

"I love better Alice, but I prefer Jane."

On learning that the undertakers of Avignon have struck, Calino exclaims:

"What I must advise the people of Avignon to do would be to do no more dying until the strikers give in. Just let them hold out a few weeks and they'll bring the undertakers to their senses."

"Why is it you never go to see old Drinkhard any more?"

"Oh, the road home is so abominably long."

"It isn't any longer than the road there."

"Oh, but it is; the road there is straight, coming home it is crooked—n'a ram's horn."

A worthy banker has separated from his wife, who is recklessly extravagant. Presently he falls ill and she sends to inquire after his health.

The maid is ushered into the dying man's chamber, and begins her message: "My mistress has sent me to ask—" "For how much?" says the dying man, with a sigh.

An honest peasant presents himself at an employment agency in search of work.

"Any children?" says the employer.

"Two, monsieur."

"Minors?"

"Not yet, monsieur; they are not old enough, but they drive the coal-wagons down in the levels."

A lady was speaking of a one-time admirer of hers whom at the present she does not admire at all.

"Don't mention him to me," she cries; "I have no patience with him. He has such a sinister look—the face of a—" "

"Oh, no; I would not be so unjust as that. Of an ex-convict, let us say."

In a capital case before the criminal court the counsel for the defense desires to call two witnesses not yet subpoenaed.

"Does my learned brother think," says the court, "that they can help us to ascertain the truth?"

"Oh, certainly; I'm sure of it, in fact," cries the counsel; "I haven't had any communication with them whatever."

Amateur criticism at the salon:

"Ah! how faithful a likeness this portrait of my father is! What a pity it shows but one side of the face."

"Ah, how beautiful painting is. Am I not right to always tell papa I would much rather learn painting than drawing?"

"In this portrait there is a purity of lines, a savoury of tones that reminds one of Horace Vernet's battle-fields."

General B. not long ago was invited to address the pupils of a military school. Said he to them:

"At school nothing ever conquered me—neither geography, neither history, geometry, or topography; and I have become a general of the highest rank in the army. And that shows what awaits you all, if you work well!"

A speculator says to his fond bride:

"Good-bye, sweet love, till dinner time. If stocks go up you shall have that coronet of diamonds."

"And if they go down?"

"Then we will borrow five francs of your brother."

A workman who asked a large manufacturer for employment, said pitifully:

"Monsieur, I have fourteen children."

The manufacturer, who is a political economist, shrugged his shoulders, and answered:

"In your situation it is absurd to have so many."

This remark was heard by the manufacturer's son, a boy of eight years. Several days later he was walking with his father, when a poor little girl begged charity of them, saying:

"I have eleven little brothers and sisters."

The boy gave her a sou, but, moved by ideas of political economy, said:

"In your situation how dare you have so many as that?"

A lawyer meets one fine evening the judge who that morning had ruled against him and made him lose a case, and can not restrain himself from addressing to the magistrate sundry discreet reproaches.

"You are right," says the judge. "Just after my ruling I suddenly reflected that the decision of the court of appeals was not in favor of the plaintiff, but against him. However, with a warm squeeze of the hand, 'don't let any one know about it; I'll make it square with you the next time you have a case before me.'"

HEBE HEARD FROM AGAIN.

HOTEL DEL MONTE, Monterey, June 10.

At last the people of the Pacific Coast have a seaside hotel which throws most of the Atlantic caravansaries into the shade even. But I take it for granted that your readers have perused the many descriptions of this elegant establishment which have from time to time appeared in the newspapers, and that they would only be indifferently well pleased with a repetition. Let me say, however, that, to my liking, the Hotel del Monte is the prettiest, breeziest-looking, and most handsomely furnished watering-place house in the United States. It is situated so delightfully, too, in a grove of pine and oak; and the sun shines so gloriously into every part of it; and the atmosphere is so pure, and soft, and elastic; and there are so many walks and drives, and other means of recreation and enjoyment, that I doubt not, when its superior attractions are widely known, and the unrivaled equability of temperature of the location is made apparent to the Eastern valetudinarian, this hotel will be a winter Mecca as well as a summer resort, and fashion and frolic, good living and good cheer, will bere hold high carnival from January to December. Standing upon the veranda of the new hotel Saturday night last, the delicious evening air impregnated with the breath of harvest and of aromatic shrub, my mind wandered back to those periods more than a century ago, when, upon the decline of some fair day, Father Junipero Serra strayed, with violin in hand, among the very trees through which the bewitching diminutendos of Ballenberg's rendition of the ecstatic "Beautiful Blue Danube" now chase each other like lights and shadows for mastery. How could I help comparing the melancholy strains of that old fiddle to the musical crash and dash of "Whoa Emma"? I can see that old Christian standard-bearer, in my mind's eye, cadaverous-looking and ily-clad, bending over some new dogma of sacred ceremonial, with only the ghastly gleam of a puny tallow-dip to add honor to a scene not calculated, at best, to inspire poetry; his only hope or ambition being, outside of his calling as preceptor to sluggish souls, to some day gaze upon a splinter from the Holy Cross, or to kiss the stone that contains the sacred footprints of the noble Nazarene when he met St. Peter on the Appian Way, or touch the steps of the mansion of Pilate, down which the suffering Saviour descended after judgment. The Hotel del Monte was formally opened on June 3d—the one hundred and tenth anniversary of the arrival at this harbor of Father Serra and his companions. On the evening of the 5th instant the initial hop was given, which was well attended. With good music, sweet flowers, and lovely women, all components were attendant for felicity, and accordingly measured grace of festivity ruled the hour. It was an entertainment, indeed, to gaze upon bud and blossom, and those fairer human flowers whose combined excellences Milton so glowingly depicts in the portraiture of their common mother. (Some shabby chap will add: "Yes, that's all very well; but Milton was blind." Well, I don't care if he was.) Your readers will want to know who are here and who are coming. Well, Colonel J. P. Hoge's family is here, comprising Miss Bella, Miss Blanche, Miss Octavia, and Charles J. Hoge, of San Francisco; besides these are Mr. L. B. Wetherbee—of the Mercantile Library—Mr. C. J. Foster, Mrs. Thomas Magee and family, Miss English, Mrs. W. A. Stuart and son, Miss Annie Pedler, Charles Miller and family, I. Levi and wife, L. Dinkelspiel and family, A. L. Tubbs and family, Mrs. J. Barron, Mrs. B. C. Truman and daughter, D. Cahn and family, S. F. Gashweiler and family, and several gentlemen whose names I have not learned. Among those who have secured apartments, and who will shortly arrive, are the following: E. L. Freeman and family, next Tuesday, the 15th; Mrs. G. G. Smith and family will arrive to-day, Henry T. Scott and family on the 15th, Drury Melone and family on the 19th, Mrs. A. Greenwald and family on the 25th. Among others who have engaged suites, and who will occupy them some time between the 19th and 26th, are R. M. Graves and family, H. Schmiedell and family, Mrs. Peters, A. E. Head and family, F. F. Low and family, Captain Lawton and family, Doctor McNulty and wife, S. P. Dewey and wife, William E. Brown and daughter, Mrs. Hall and two daughters, and others. The management has made arrangements for music for hops every Saturday evening, and for other evenings if agreeable. The ball-room is spacious, being thirty-six by seventy-two feet, and will only be used for dancing; it lights up very beautifully, and is nicely ventilated. There will be no liquors sold on the premises, a place for that purpose having been erected at a convenient but proper distance from the hotel. A stable that will house sixty horses and as many carriages is in close proximity. HEBE.

CXXXII.—Sunday, June 13.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Soup—Bouillabaisse.

Broiled Squabs, on Toast.

Green Peas, Asparagus.

Beef à la Mode, Saratoga Potatoes.

French Artichokes—Mayonnaise Dressing.

Raspberries, Whipped Cream, Sponge Cake.

Fruit Bowl—Apricots, Cherries, Apples, and Oranges.

TO MAKE BOUILLABAISSE.—The real Bouillabaisse is made in Marseilles. They make many imitations of it in other parts of France and on the continent; but, like Welsh rarebit prepared out of Wales, it is inferior to the real.

Put a gill of sweet oil in a tin saucepan, and set it upon a quick fire; when hot add two onions and two cloves of garlic sliced; stir, partly fry them, and then take from the fire. Put also in the pan three pounds of fish, such as halibut, turbot, sea-bass, rock-cod—of all, if possible; but at least two kinds—also a dozen mussels taken from the shell. The fish is cut in pieces about two inches long, and rolled in flour. Add one gill of white wine, a bay leaf, two cloves, two slices of lemon, the juice of a tomato, salt, pepper, a pinch of saffron. Cover with cold water, and set the pan upon a brisk fire. After half an hour add a teaspoonful of chopped parsley; boil ten minutes longer, and it is done. Cut some stale bread in half-inch slices, fry them golden brown, and put them into a soup tureen with the fish, and strain the soup over.

There are an hundred ways of making a bouillabaisse. There are also about as many ways of spelling the same.

BLUEBEARD AND FATIMA.

A True Story from the Record of our Swell Society.

"If I go," said Fatima, firmly, "I must have a new dress." Bluebeard raised his newspaper two or three inches higher, and pretended not to bear; but when he started down town half an hour afterward, and stooped to touch his wife's cheek with his traditional ultra-marine whisker, she said, carelessly: "What about my dress, dear?"

"Your dress?" with well-feigned indifference. "For Mrs. Alfalfa's party," murmured Fatima with a sigh. "Haven't you something you can make over?" said Bluebeard, as an ominous wrinkle crept down between his eyes. "Where's that green silk? You always looked well in that. Why you certainly have plenty of dresses. It's hard times, I tell you—darned hard times. I don't see how we'll come out of them, either."

"I have not been anywhere for so long," said Fatima, patiently, "that my dresses are beyond fixing. They are all too soiled to do anything with. It would not be good economy to spend money on them."

Bluebeard wriggled as if he were an eel in a fish net. "Well, well, we'll talk about it some other time; I have to meet a man at the office at nine o'clock. I guess you can get up something out of what you have," and he was gone.

After Fatima had heard the cook's daily report, sent the children to school, written an acceptance to Mrs. Alfalfa's invitation, gone to market, ordered the coal which Bluebeard forgot, and done seven hundred and seventy-one other things, she set about looking over the faded party wardrobe. Sickness, and Bluebeard's cuckoo-song of hard times, and his lack of interest in society, bad kept them out of the world for several years—long enough to wipe even their memory from the minds of their acquaintances. Now, there was a certain pathos in resurrecting these souvenirs, but, oh, how shabby they looked!—how old-fashioned! Fatima's heart sank within her. She turned them over, and planned and plotted, until Bluebeard came home and found her in the midst of the chaos.

"Well, here's finery enough, I should think, for half a dozen women."

Then Fatima tried to convince him that, plan as she would, the result would only be "a dowdy thing, like a pieced quilt." "Perhaps we'd better not go at all," she said at last.

"Oh, yes, we must go. You accepted?"

"Yes, but—"

"Well, I'm mixed up with Alfalfa in some business affairs, and I have to keep on good terms with him. I thought you wanted to go. How much do you want for a new dress?"

"I can't tell exactly until I decide on the material," said Fatima, wearily.

"Will a hundred dollars do?" Fatima looked at him with a queer little smile, which he intercepted on its rapid retreat. "Two hundred? That ought to be enough."

Fatima was silent. She knew that Mrs. Alfalfa's party would be the event of the season, for which every woman had saved all her splendor; and Fatima was womanish enough to desire that at least a modest halo should be shed from her own attire. It was not vanity or extravagance; it was a natural, feminine pride, which Bluebeard would have missed in her sooner than would any one else. Fatima was so used to this wearisome farce of begging for what ought to have been freely bestowed, that she went through it mechanically.

"There are twenty other things beside my dress," she urged. "If I went to parties often, I would have these things. But it has been so long—"

"Well, we'll see about it." And Bluebeard buried himself in the evening paper.

"But there is such a short time," pleaded poor Fatima.

"Oh, hang it, can't I have a few minutes' peace? It's a pity a man can't be let alone when he comes home after working hard all day. Get what you want, and send in the bills—I'll have to stand it." And, having made Fatima feel perfectly comfortable and satisfied, he again immersed himself in his political bath-tub.

I pass over Fatima's trials for the next few days. Knowing that Bluebeard was amply able to gratify her most expensive whim, it was a little—just a little—hard to haggle and cross-question and economize, lest the dreaded bills bring down wrath on her head. But at last the time and the dress came.

"A pretty big price to pay for that thing," growled Bluebeard. "Why didn't you get some other color?—something like that dress Mrs. Esterlee [a pretty widow] wore to dinner here. That was very simple, and yet rich."

Fatima smiled. "It cost four times as much as this."

"Oh, nonsense!"

"But she told me the price."

Bluebeard still looked incredulous. "Well, come along. It's time to be going. Confounded bore having to, anyhow." And that was the beginning of the end of Mrs. Alfalfa's party from Fatima's outlook.

* * * * *

"You've seen it all now, haven't you? Isn't it about time to be going home?"

Bluebeard delivered these queries in a tone something between a snarl and a growl. They had been at Mrs. Alfalfa's about half an hour, and already he looked longingly toward the outer door. Poor little Fatima had not had time to see whether her friend Rose Mary's dress was made over or new, or whether Mrs. Lobelia's diamonds were as large as report said they were. She had just begun to enjoy herself. It was like coming into a new life to meet her acquaintances, to see the sparkle and shine, to feel that there was a world outside her castle walls. But Bluebeard tapped his foot impatiently, and followed her everywhere like Mary's lamb, until she turned reluctantly away to bid her hostess farewell.

"Going?—so soon?" said Mrs. Alfalfa, with her pruned-and-prisms smile; and then Fatima put on her wraps, was bundled into the carriage rather unceremoniously by her liege lord, and they drove off with the passionate wailing of "flute, violin, and bassoon" following them afar. Fatima checked a sob, and turned it, by some feminine manipulation, into a sigh.

"What's the matter? Are you sick?" mumbled Bluebeard, with his hat over his eyes.

"I wish we could have stayed just a little longer," said a tremulous voice from the corner.

"Well, why didn't you stay? I was willing to stay as long as you liked; but I don't see what pleasure there is in that sort of thing. Those rooms were infernally hot, and every minute somebody poked his elbows into your ribs. I don't see why a man will try to put twice as many people in his house as it will hold. There's no enjoyment in going to such a place—not a bit."

"Well, why do you go?" retorted Fatima, with a spurt of spirit.

"Go? Why I go to please you." And before the magnificent audacity of this assertion Fatima quailed and was silent. She did not care or dare to say, "You miserable old humbug, you insisted on our accepting this invitation because you wanted Mr. Alfalfa to grind one of your rusty axes. You never do anything for my pleasure unless under protest. You made me so uncomfortable by your impatience while we were there that it took all the nice out of the entertainment." Fatima did not say any of these things, because, in the first place, she knew from experience the folly of arguing with such an inconsistent iconoclast as a tired, sleepy man. She was a gentlewoman, and she would not quarrel. Moreover, she did not allow herself to think out these things squarely. They only flitted through her mind in a vague way. Lastly, she knew that Sister Anne (who made her home with them) was coming back from a visit on the morrow, and Bluebeard disliked Sister Anne. Fatima had to break the news gently, and coax the tyrant into amiable acquiescence; so she gulped down her tears, her regrets, her pride, all in a mouthful, and changed the subject to one which would please her fastidious audience of one.

"Ah—h—this is a good deal better than going to parties, isn't it?" grunted Bluebeard, after a struggle with the boot-jack. "Home is the place after all."

Fatima surveyed her figure in the glass—the dress which had cost her such vexation, and the elaborate coiffure; and she thought that the game was scarcely worth the candle.

The next day brought Sister Anne and a house divided against itself, for Bluebeard could not understand why Fatima should need any counselor or confidant beside himself, any more than he could know why she wanted to stay longer than half an hour at a crowded reception. His mind was so big that he could not squeeze it down to a size which could grasp these infinitesimal facts; so he dragged Fatima away from her fête, and made himself as obnoxious as possible to Sister Anne, who was considered charming by everybody except Bluebeard. It was always when Sister Anne was there that he scolded the servants, found fault with Fatima, lectured the children, and set his foot, so to speak, on any kind of table-talk; or he sulked perseveringly, as only a man can sulk. At any rate, he made of himself a vast social extinguisher, which shed gloom over Bluebeard Castle. And what sight could be more pathetic than Fatima struggling against the inevitable, trying to be cheerful, to hide Bluebeard's faults from Sister Anne, and turn away the sardonic wrath of that impetuous sympathizer? She was glad when Sister Anne went away on another visit, although she loved her so dearly. And Bluebeard never thought it necessary to apologize for his outrageous behavior; on the contrary, he put on the air of a martyr, and would not "come round" till Fatima conciliated and flattered him into negative good-nature once more. For, no matter what went wrong, Fatima must always be cheerful. No matter if stocks were down to zero, with assessments and Bluebeard to match—no matter if the children, or Bluebeard, or even Fatima herself were sick—no matter what sorrow, or grievance, or private worry she had—she must be bright and happy. Had she not a comfortable house and respectable clothes?—servants, a carriage, a husband? What more could any woman want? Nothing, of course.

And she must have been wholly free from duties of any kind, else why would Bluebeard so persistently declare the fact of her having nothing to do. "Anybody can keep house," said Bluebeard, grandiloquently, "you only need to be systematic." Bluebeard's home was always in order, his guests were always gracefully entertained. His favorite dishes were always on the table, and as—according to Bluebeard—Fatima did not look after these things, he must have had some benevolent fairy godmother who played housekeeper just for fun. When Bluebeard came home at night he sat down on the easiest chair in the most comfortable room in the house, and, after finding fault with every dish at dinner, he smoked his cigar, and then lay down on the lounge and slept till bed-time. The Bluebeards never went to any place of amusement, because Bluebeard thought amusements a bore, and after all, to a dutiful wife, what entertainment could be surpassed by the sight of the recumbent and easeful husband? What concert could be equaled by his vigorous snore?—now crescendo, now piano, now tremolo. It was certainly very weak and selfish of Fatima to wish for other pleasures. In fact, I'm not sure that it was not actually sinful.

Sister Anne usually spent her evenings in her own room, since, if she and Fatima talked together, their conversation seemed to disturb Bluebeard; and the dear girl's delicacy was rewarded by hearing Bluebeard rate Fatima about so much gas being used unnecessarily. When Bluebeard first met Fatima he was charmed with her gay little, artless ways. He knew she was not clever, but he disliked clever women. He knew she loved society, but he liked it himself then. And when Fatima promised to be his, he would have given her his heart's blood. He was her slave. He loved her whole family; he begged Sister Anne to come and make her home with him; he promised her the life of a princess in Queen Fatima's court. A rose-cloud came down, and tinted earth and sky alike. It was beatific. I wonder if Sister Anne, in her attic room, ever thought of all this. I wonder if Fatima, sleepily watching Bluebeard's slumbers under the mellow drop-light, ever turned her glass of Time backward, or wished that she might shiver it altogether and scatter its sands. Perhaps they did: neither of them were very clever, but they were women, and women think queer thoughts sometimes.

Whether Fatima ate, or drank, or had Bobo's hair cut, or went calling, she felt that the eye of her master was upon her. Every motion was made a point of interference; but woe betide Fatima if she so much as ventured to inquire about any of Bluebeard's commercial speculations. "I never tell my wife anything about my business," he said, royally. "I don't want women gossiping over my affairs." So Fatima never knew positively whether they were on the verge of bankruptcy, or rolling in riches.

When Fatima was first married, she was a proud, sensitive little creature, who shrunk from an unkind word, and asked no favors. But fifteen years of steady "nagging" had hardened her, had made her sullen. Once she was the soul of truth; but fifteen years of fault-finding had driven her into equivocal and outright deception. She was not strong enough to defy Bluebeard. In fact, there was nothing to defy; for he considered himself a model husband. And I am not sure but he was an average one. He never came home to Fatima with besotted face and unsteady legs, as did some other Bluebeards she knew; he did not intrigue with adventuresses, as did still other Bluebeards. But he wore Fatima's soul out by rubbing on it his own miserable, old grumpy soul; and that was bad enough. And as there was nothing to defy, she learned to endure. The ill-temper and selfishness of a heartily ill-tempered and selfish man make about as good a school wherein to learn endurance as can be found, for a woman who once loved the aforesaid man, and who is tied to him by law, by pride, by honor, and whose wrongs are untranslatable. There are a few things which compensate partly for the suffering which is every woman's heritage; and if these things be denied her, it is indeed a poor sort of life which she holds.

Bluebeard went into the secret chambers of Fatima's heart "just as he pleased;" he read her letters; he craved her very thoughts; but he did not even give her the key of his deadly closet. Fatima had never been jealous, had never been curious, and she did not try to know what grinning skeletons might hang there. To be sure, there was no sbiny scimeter hanging over her head—only one weary day after another, when she dressed, shopped, called, and smiled, and went her round of duties, and knelt down to Bluebeard because he suffered her to live—because he gave her enough to eat and wear, and let her wait on him. There was only a never-satisfied hunger for sympathy, and unselfish love, and generous praise.

Fatima was not afraid that her head would be cut off; she only feared she might not be strong enough to do her wifely duty as her conscience wrote it down day by day. Behind her lay fifteen wasted years; before her, endurance. And Sister Anne, sitting in her watch-tower, could not help her; could not see even a dust out of which might rise the good brothers hurrying toward Fatima and deliverance. Sister Anne had to endure, too, so many things, that she grew to question sometimes the propriety of living at all; and, as she was a loving sister, she felt Fatima's wounds along with her own.

But one day Bluebeard, toiling in his office to find Plutus face to face, fell stricken by an impalpable shape—a mysterious something which the minister, preaching his eulogistic funeral sermon, called the hand of Divine Providence; which the doctor called serous apoplexy; which a materialistic friend called a debt to Nature. The orders of which Bluebeard was a member framed black-rimmed copies of their cut-and-dried "resolutions;" and society sent funeral wreaths and notes of condolence; and the widow put on deep mourning, as did Sister Anne also. It was found that Bluebeard, contrary to all precedent, had left a goodly sum behind him, and made Fatima sole legatee. Poor little Fatima! she had been so carefully shut away from all practical knowledge that she was as ignorant of bonds and stocks and realty as Selim, the baby. After the house was cleared of the funeral flowers, and the first shock was over, a tiny wave of reaction came into Fatima's heart. Neither she nor Sister Anne could realize that they might sit down to breakfast without a jangle of harsh reproof. The newly acquired liberty was too broad to be appreciated all at once, but gradually it spread into a comfortable sense of relief. No, I am not hard-hearted; neither was Fatima when she blossomed again into something like her old-time joyousness; neither were the children, who did not even feign any grief.

Nobody was sorry when the cloud of dust lifted and disclosed the good brothers galloping up the road, or when they battered down the castle door and cut off Bluebeard's head with his own curved and glittering blade. We all applauded mightily, and thought it a very fine story. And who shall cast the first stone at Fatima when I say that she was bewildered by her sudden freedom, and let her wealth slip through her fingers all too easily, while her sons sprang up into fast, foolish young men, and made Fatima sometimes unhappy. All Fatima's wealth could not bring back her lost years; but she and Sister Anne enjoyed the world pretty well; and the memory of Bluebeard, and the hours of misery he had caused her, faded away together, and she remembered nothing but that she was free.

But Fatima has learned to know a Bluebeard whenever she sees him; and the other day, when Mustapha and his wife were dining with her, and Mustapha was telling one of his inimitable stories, Fatima said, wiping the tears of laughter from her eyes, "Oh, Mr. Mustapha, I wish I could have you at every dinner-party I give. Is he always so delightful, Mrs. Mustapha?" And that lady hesitated just an appreciable instant before she replied, with a smile: "Oh, yes, of course." Fatima's very face clouded as she noticed the minute's pause, and she murmured to herself, "Bluebeard!" And then Mrs. MacCarty, who lives in the alley round the corner, came in to wash, and tried to hide the bruises on her arms, which Mr. Mac had sportively tattooed thereon with a broken table-leg, in one of his "jamborees." Fatima looked at her wistfully, and sighed "Bluebeard." She sees homes which are the fulfillment of her girlish dreams, but she has not yet ventured to build one for herself on the ruins of Bluebeard Castle. However, the chroniclers never wrote what became of Fatima the First after her rescue, and neither can we tell what our Fatima may find in the life which is before her, to make her remember that there are husbands who are not Bluebeards, and wives who are not Fatimas.

SAN FRANCISCO, June, 1880.

KARIN BRENDT.

Very few politicians who begin well enough know where or how to end a speech. The place where the audience says "Sit down" or "Shut up" is considered by many as a proper place to finish.

WHEN WE WERE IN QUARANTINE.

The good ship City of Peking left San Francisco in the midst of a big small-pox scare. She brought back with her another and a bigger one. How it came about no one could tell, for the amount of virus laid in at Yokohama was enough to cleanse Chinatown itself. The Japanese have but recently discovered the virtues of vaccination, and, although small-pox is not a pestilence peculiar to them, they have, with their usual eagerness to be up with the times, and their usual thoroughness in their way of doing things, started a virus farm in Tokio. Rather an odd pursuit the raising of virus, but that it was good virile stuff every one on board will testify. There were perhaps eighty of us in the cabin, and it is safe to say that we were not more than one week out of sight of beautiful Fusiyama before there were seventy-five as fine large scabs floating about the ship as ever delighted the medical faculty. Scabs is not a pretty word, but that is what they called them, and that is what they were. Every man, woman, and child was on guard. Nothing less than a yard and a half was deemed a respectful distance for conversation. Any one who dared to talk or think of anything but vaccination and small-pox was deemed an unfeeling brute. Spooning of all kinds ceased absolutely. The captain and doctor were asked at distractingly frequent intervals if the danger were passed, and every time that Captain Morse thought any one a little uneasy, he went below, and got vaccinated again. It satisfied the passengers, and did not seem to trouble him. The area to traverse was something vast, but when we got ashore he must have been pretty thoroughly carved and tattooed with Tokio's latest product. As for the Chinese, they kicked and howled and protested, but they were held down and vaccinated willy-nilly, until at last, one fine day, it fell that not a soul of perhaps three hundred on board had escaped the saving knife.

It was at this juncture that the Chicago man—who ever went anywhere that there was not a Chicago man on board?—with that shrewd attention to business which distinguishes these people, suggested that it would not be a bad idea to collect the vaccinations, mount them as scarf-pins, and sell them in the Grain City as Japanese curios. The collection was not made. Every man took too great a pride in his individual vaccination. Jealousies arose because some scars were bigger than some other man's scar. Wagers were made, and pairs were frequently seen to seek the seclusion which the cabin granted to decide the vexed question.

But at last fevers, and peevishness, and all the attendant ills of vaccination disappeared. People hob-nobbed with each other, walked side by side without words of warning, and all went merry. Old sailors began to sniff the land. The ship was made deliciously clean to come into port. Paint and tar and other dreadful stuff glistened everywhere. Nobody could be clean but the ship—but that mattered little. The deck was slippery as ice, with its cleaning, and no one dared go near the rails. We held the perpendicular painfully but cheerfully, for all this care and trouble meant home. And at last, on a beautiful, clear Sunday afternoon, we steamed through the Golden Gate with not a soul on board with so much as a cold in his head, so far as any one knew. We all actually crowded over the quarantine officer when he boarded us. With most good-natured disdain we suggested that he pursue the second course of General Jackson's men. And we of California, who saw our friends in another tug ten minutes away, turned to them with outstretched hands and shouts of welcome, only to be dismayed by the yellow shadow which fell on their faces from the quarantine flag, which we turned to see going up at the fore-mast. It is an ugly flag in itself. Ugly? Nasty is the only word which applies to it. It is more menacing than the pirate's black flag, with its death's head and cross-bones. It means anything which is foul and pestilential. Its very yellow is unlike any other yellow in the world—it is so much more vividly, so much more rabidly yellow. But no one knows how ugly, how nasty, how awfully yellow it is till it floats from their own ship. We were indeed in quarantine.

How childish impressions stay with one. I had read once in that far-away time some story of the long Mediterranean quarantines, and some of the effects of the big, unfamiliar word lingered with me yet. It suggested pestilence, and lazaretto-houses, and horrible things without end. We all felt as if we had been accused of some dreadful crime of which we were innocent, and the mere thought of being imprisoned made us beat the bars impatiently. The quarantine then promised to be only for one day, in order that the stipulated time might expire after the putting ashore of a suspected case in Yokohama. There was some mild wrath expressed, some peevish discontent, and a generally unsettled state of affairs. We could not devote ourselves to anything in particular. Even the poker game flagged, and the whist-players did not meet for their rubber. But the real human nature of the multitude did not come to the surface till next morning.

What a very odd feeling it is to be aboard a ship which is going nowhere, yet the routine goes on—breakfast, lunch, and dinner, turn in, turn out, games at night, deck promenades through the day—yet nothing is as it has been. All the familiar noises have stopped; and in the strange stillness caused by the stopping of the machinery all the sounds become intensified. The babies squeal with a shriller shriek, conversation seems to be carried on at a higher pitch. You catch drifts of marital confidences, you hear whisperings, you know the very sound of your neighbor's brush on his teeth. It is very unsafe for any one to talk about any one else. Therefore it came to pass that next morning, before any one was up, we all knew that a sailor on board had broken out with small-pox. He had passed muster the day before, but this morning he had gone to the doctor, lifted a hyperion lock from his brow, and disclosed a fine line of pustules. Then how the mild wrath disappeared. How the passengers cursed him; how they railed at him; how they questioned his right to have the small-pox at all. He was put off in a small boat, in a pitiless, tearing rain-storm; and he pulled an oar like a good one, poor fellow; but, owing to some piece of red tape missing, the boat was not allowed to land, but lay in the bay in all the storm for hours. We could see him from the deck, and we all took turns at the glass—marine glass—and anathematized him, and hurled vindictive conversation at his unheeding ears, and told him it served him right, and did and said all manner of foolish things. They were obliged, finally, to put back to the ship for provisions, and the sick sailor very discreetly wrapped himself in a sail, although the small-pox was still located under the hyperion lock and invisible to us. We hung over the rail, a solid phalanx of eighty, as near to the disease as we could get on that wild April day, and indulged in a series of apostrophes to the sick sailor, which in the matter of invective were quite Macaulayan, but were otherwise unworthy of preservation in English literature. But the sailor could not have heard them, for he continued in the most malicious manner to have the small-pox. When the vocabulary of abuse was exhausted, the first day of quarantine had passed.

Meantime our friends had come down upon the sea in tugs many times. Our welcomes were roared at us across an angry chasm of water several yards wide. We were obliged to shriek our deepest emotions across this billowy waste. The whole eighty hung over the rail every time anything came alongside, and listened with most flattering silence to every word uttered. As soon as the tug departed, seventy-nine of them asked the other, one what was the news, as if they had heard nothing. It was an excellent arrangement, for it made conversation. People went about button-holing each other, and asking each other, in the most confidential manner, "When do you think we shall get off?" The questioner was quite as irresponsible in the matter as the questioner, but people seemed to derive a certain amount of comfort from finding out other people's opinions.

The second day it began to look as if we were to stay a long time in quarantine. Then the passengers directed the batteries of their wrath against the people of California. The tumultuous emotions aboard divided themselves off something in this manner:

- 1st, The captain and officers;
- 2nd, The business men;
- 3rd, The travelers;
- 4th, The nervous woman;
- 5th, The nervous woman's husband;
- 6th, The ladies;
- 7th, The midshipmen;
- 8th, The missionaries;

The captain and officers tried to present a cheerful front, and smiled constantly in a ghastly marionette sort of manner. It was not cheerful. The captain made many and many a trip forward, with an anxious look in his eye, to know the worst, if there were any worst. There were no more hyperion locks worn. Not a bang on board. People took pains to wear their hair combed straight back from the brow, like the bric-à-brac poets of the new school. The business men eyed Telegraph Hill with a vindictive look, as if it represented the entire State. Their fury was something tremendous to look upon.

"What do the people of California mean by detaining me from my business?" they cried. "I have a peanut contract in Fiddletown, or a life policy in Gravetown, or a divorce case in Bridgetown waiting for me, and every moment is precious. What is it to me if the people of California get the small-pox? What right have they to detain me from my business to prevent themselves from getting it?"

Then the travelers, the real globe-trotters, fumed: "What right have the people of California to stop me in order to prevent their getting the small-pox, when I had counted on being in Yosemite on a certain date? I will not go to their blessed old Yosemite at all, and see how they like that. When do you think we will get off?"

Then the nervous woman cried: "Oh, how can I endure life in this dreadful place, and with such a horrible lot of people on shore who won't take the small-pox—the nasty, mean things!"

Her tears fell fast on the remains of a pâté de foie gras. A wreck of succulent, tender asparagus stems (worth perhaps a dollar a stem in that weather) lay before her. She was just annihilating a strawberry as big as a plum, and a fresh Charlotte Russe awaited her delicate attention. This was the sort of fodder with which the unhappy Pacific Mail Company sought to make the quarantine endurable. "I always heard that the Californians were a dreadful race of people," she cried, through her nervous tears. "I knew they killed each other every morning, and carried knives and stocks, and raised big beats, but I did not suppose they were barbarous enough to have a quarantine. When do you think we will get off?" The nervous woman's husband spent considerable time on deck railing at the people of California for not putting the flags on the shipping at half-mast because his wife's nerves were a-twitter.

Then the ladies began their attack. The idea of these barbarians of the West daring to detain them on account of the small-pox! They had always heard the women of California were a year behind New York, and two years behind Paris anyhow. It was an outrage, and they would never pass through California again. Now!

Then there were the midshipmen. Eight of them hung over the port-rail, gazing city-ward, and asking if the top of the Bush Street Theatre was visible from Mission Bay. The Royal Middy was running full blast, and they might not see it. Some of the pictorials illustrating it had been their reading matter all the way from China, and to know that it was just a half hour away and they might not go to it, made life in quarantine very hard.

Then came the missionaries. Poor, patient souls, not a word escaped them of murmur from first to last. He is the butt of jokes, the subject of all good stories, and the stories are legion. He is a creature apart. Indeed, while both in China and Japan the foreign residents are obliged to live in districts apart from the natives, the missionaries have districts to themselves, and mingle but little, if at all, with their Christian brethren. The custom, peculiar to all people who live by the gospel, of having very large families, is strictly adhered to in the East. The Conference at one time gave the missionary $100 per year extra for every additional child. But one fortunate fellow raised a family of fourteen in such an incredibly short space of time that they were obliged to recall him, and they have ever since reduced the extra salary to $60 per year. Our missionaries had their quivers as full as did Rogers of Rhode Island, but they never raised their patient voices in complaint.

The third day all hands directed their batteries of wrath against the Pacific Mail Company. The next time they were all going home by the Indian Ocean, and they actually gloated over the paralyzed and shattered condition in which the Pacific Mail Company would be left if seventy-five people, through many coming years, should transfer their patronage to the "Messageries Maritimes." But they desisted for very shame as the cheery, if anxious, face of Mr. Williams appeared alongside three or four times a day to tell us of what was being done for our release. It did not at all detract from the dignity of his appearance that he was surrounded on such occasions by boxes of limes, oranges, apples, bananas, asparagus, crisp lettuce, meats and fish, ice cream—everything, in fact, that makes life a very nice affair on shore, and quite endurable in quarantine. "Lone-Fisherman" looking fellows were constantly floating through the gangways with these goodies. It began to dawn upon people by and by that these things cost the company something, and they changed their tactics. Besides, we had a new sensation. A Japanese boy, who had been acting as nurse-boy in the cabin, had been a subject of great interest to the children coming over. He was so deeply pitted with small-pox that the babies used to amuse themselves by poking their pudgy little fingers in the pits to see how far they could go. On this day the Japanese boy was discovered to have a pimple. The whole ship was in arms. The Jap was sequestered and put in the smoking-room, to await the coming of the health officer and quarantine officer. Every one gave up hope. It was the small-pox, of course. People usually had it only once; but a man who had spent two days in Japan told us that the Japanese were liable to be taken down with it any moment, any number of times, and in the most unprovoked manner. A pall of despair settled on the ship. The Japanese boy was kept in confinement until it was officially discovered that all he had was a cold sore.

Their next day's attack was upon the Board of Health. A firm conviction had rooted itself in their minds that the Board of Health was composed of Denis Kearney, the Rev. Mr. Kallach, and the editor of the Morning Call. They would listen to nothing else. It was useless to assure them that Denis Kearney was in the House of Correction. They would not bave it. They raved and railed and tore till night, when they suddenly concluded to pursue a peaceful policy, and they sat down and drew up a most rational, sensible, and pathetic appeal to the Board of Health. This course acted like a charm. Definite action brought peace to their turmoilled emotions. In a half-hour after the meeting there was heard once more the popping of corks, the buzz of conversation, the flip of the cards on the saloon tables. Next morning one wrinkle of care relaxed in the captain's cheek, and he was heard to growl, in a deep bass, aside:

"Thank heaven, they are beginning to have some fun. The champagne and the beer gave out last night, and a requisition is the first thing on the programme this morning."

But peace came at last, and neither champagne nor beer brought it. All those long days many things had been brought to us all through the pouring rain—books, magazines, papers, candies, caramels, flowers, music, Jews-harps, everything but bicycles. At last it chanced that some great mind provided us with a box of fifteen-puzzles. Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad. But this was a homeopathic instance. The people were already mad, and the fifteen-puzzle cured them. A great peace fell upon every one. There was silence as on a phantom ship. Groups of two and three sat around on the hawseers, puzzling away at the blocks. Groups of three and four held the benches, similarly employed. In all the well-known nooks and crannies of the deck the busy students of the puzzle were solemnly and silently evolving its mysteries. Down in the saloon every table was filled with preoccupied-looking people, who did not know you as you passed by. A few who had the entrée to the captain's cabin strayed in there, to secure utter quiet and seclusion; and it was frequently whispered that the brave old tar himself had been seen wrestling with the puzzle. The dinner gong beat almost in vain, till clamorous nature asserted itself.

After dinner, which was gulped down with undue haste that we might return to 13, 15, 14, habit made us look toward the Pacific Mail dock, where we had cast so many longing glances through so many long days. What was this coming over the waters to us like a fairy boat, with its circle of glancing lights? There were Rembrandt shadows and Flemish lights falling on familiar faces as she rounded the stern of our big ship, and we felt that we had indeed come back from the effete civilization of the East as we heard once more the familiar strains of Pinafore—

"Over the bright blue sea Comes Sir Joseph Porter, K. C. B."

The faces of friends looked strangely unreal in the conflicting lamplight and moonlight; and could this shadowy, lamp-lit, poetical-looking barge be the black, smoky tug we had learned to love to welcome? The night has a strange power of transforming to beauty, and surely nothing was ever more beautiful to that band of weary voyagers, with whom hope long deferred had made the heart sick, than this moonlight serenade on the water. The well-known voices of the Bohemian Club chorus sounded never sweeter or richer than then. When they sailed away amid the fizz of rockets on their own little boat, and the blue fires on our big ship outlining our tall masts against the moonlit sky, they sang "How Can I Leave Thee?" We did not want them to, and we wondered how they could, but they had brought a delicious whisper with them that we were to get off next morning.

What a merry humor we were all in then. A punch was brewed which was unexampled for strength and flavor. Every one drank everybody's good health. Speeches were made by people who never got on their legs before. Songs were sung by people who never sang a note before. "Auld Lang Syne" was given with as much spirit as if we were all the oldest of friends. All the small jealousies and divisions of a long sea-voyage disappeared. There were no cliques or whisperings. We had crossed the sea together from a strange land, which was home to none of us. For almost a month we had lived together, fed at the same table, slept under the same timbers. The ship had been our mutual home. But from the moment the first foot touched the wharf next morning we parted, to meet all together never, never again.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1880.

Every great achievement costs a sacrifice. We lost a knight, but we checkmated a king. And the game is ours. The Republicans of the United States resented the idea that the existence of the party or the life of the nation depended upon one man. They were justly suspicious of the trio who marshaled the forces of Grant. The party had become restive under the lash of Conkling, Cameron, and Logan, and anxiously awaited the supreme moment when they could overthrow and defeat the self-constituted "bosses" of the Republican party. It would have been a grave and fatal mistake to have nominated Grant. A campaign that depended for its success upon whipping in unwilling adherents would indeed have been a cold, spiritless, and unsuccessful one. General Grant could never have been elected to fill a third Presidential term. It was the mistake of his life that he did not adhere to his intention never again to become a Presidential candidate. He lost the grandest opportunity ever presented to a human being to make himself the most devoted and patriotic as he is now the most renowned citizen of this republic. He is the victim of his friends, as he always has been since he entered the arena of politics. He became identified with that most hateful and odious thing in politics called "the machine," and allied himself most unfortunately with those who most unscrupulously pull the wires. He will never again be presented to the American people as a candidate for any political office. The so-called third-term bugbear is dead—dead and damned forever.

The "electric" James G. Blaine, with his quick eye, strong heart, and ready will, with a wisdom superior to his adversaries, brilliantly plucked victory from defeat by suddenly joining the scattering forces of Sherman, and literally naming the nominee. It was a bold, dashing, characteristic, and successful move, and serves very materially to assuage the grief and solace the sorrow of his warm-hearted but deeply disappointed followers. James G. Blaine may never be President of the United States, but, like Henry Clay, he will ever be the idol of his party. He is eloquent, bold, audacious, and heroic in debate; he has that splendid courage which arises from conscious strength. He has a noble and manly bearing, and a magnetic presence that inspires his comrades and followers with his own courage. But his very power was an element of weakness in his candidacy for the Presidency. No famous orator was ever elected President. No famous advocate ever became a calm and dispassionate judge. The advocate must be quick and ready; the judge must be slow and deliberate. The advocate is forced to act under the fire of passion and amid the beat of conflict; the judge must coldly and judiciously balance conflicting arguments. The advocate must be a partisan; the judge must never be a partisan. So, throughout life, we are confronted with the stern fact that a limit is set upon the capacity of even the greatest human mind. Blaine is a formidable advocate, a great debater, but he does not possess a calm, deliberate, methodical mind. He is what he is—a "Rupert of debate," a gallant "plumed knight" of the arena. Like all great party leaders, he must be content with the glory of the arena, and must set a limit to his ambition. Paraphrasing the noted saying of Henry Clay, Blaine may well ejaculate: "I would rather be great than President."

That superior Anglo-Saxon wisdom that in this country so often breaks through the meshes of partisanship, rises above self-interest, sacrifices individual preference, and in spite of all influences does the right thing at the right moment, asserted itself at Chicago, when the National Convention nominated General James A. Garfield. Of course, it was entirely unimportant. The delegates did not go there to nominate

Garfield. They nominated him not because they wanted to, but because they were forced to. When it was ascertained that the stolid forces of Grant would not yield, but were intending to follow the example of their illustrious leader, viz., to "fight it out on that line" if it took "all summer," then it was, and not till then, that it became necessary to choose the most available candidate. Sherman was a methodical financial man, without an ounce of personal magnetism, and had entered the field as a contestant against the two principal candidates. Of course, he could not be thought of. Edmunds hailed from a sure Republican State, and nothing could be possibly gained by nominating him. Washburne "made Grant." There was a suspicion that to nominate him would be to re-inaugurate "Grantism." Garfield had not antagonized either of the contending factions. His judicial temperament had shielded him from the poisoned shafts of malice; his upright conduct from the envenomed tongue of scandal, and his kindly manner and modest bearing from the bitter fruits of envy. He had the advantage of at least a brief record as a soldier, and a by no means limited experience as a legislator. The possession of these qualifications of "availability" made General James A. Garfield the nominee of the Chicago Convention.

The ratification orators and the morning papers have already most vividly pictured and rapturously dwelt upon the "noble career" of "the humble canal-boy," who has so suddenly developed into "the renowned soldier, the great statesman, the eminent scholar, and the finished orator." One ratification orator (we believe it was the Rev. Hallelujah Cox) said: "Grant is a renowned warrior. Blaine is a great statesman and orator. Sherman is an accomplished financier. But Garfield is a warrior, a statesman, an orator, and a financier all in one. I wonder that we had not thought of him long ago." It is indeed astonishing what a reservoir of facts these orators have stored away in their imaginations, and how soon they trot them all out. It was really "electric" to see the Post and Alta and Chronicle handspring into the Garfield line. It was better than any emotional drama we ever witnessed to behold the bitter and vindictive howlers for the "old soldier"—the boys in the post-office and the custom house and in office generally, who ran with the Grant "machine"—so readily drop their idol and fall enthusiastically into each other's arms. Aside, however, from these wild expressions of padded enthusiasm (which are perhaps essential to whoop up the party), there is every reason to believe that the nomination of Garfield is a "clean" one. He is a moderate, conservative, and scholarly man, and undoubtedly represents the very best type of American statesmen. But let us be careful about saying too much for him at the start. Wait until the Democratic detectives have shadowed him and ferreted his tracks from his cradle to his nomination. Wait until the reporters have interviewed all his neighbors and his neighbors' wives, and secured his family history. It will be time enough then to indulge in panegyrics.

We say this, not to throw a wet blanket, or cool the fire of patriotism, or rake to life again the embers of strife so happily covered out of sight; but to caution against the "boom." We are free to admit that we do not like the boom. It is a noisy, and an interesting, but a misleading thing. Like the long loaded ratification gun, it is generally a flash of powder behind a very big wad, resulting in a smell of sulphur and a deal of smoke, but it hits nothing. It may kick the gunners to death, and by a premature explosion scatter the whole platoon of patriots where they can not even vote, but there is not in the enemy's camp the thud of the solid shot. No! the boom has not a good history. Grant "boomed" all over the world—away from Philadelphia and back through the Golden Gate. He "boomed" into Chicago "the first citizen of the republic," and "boomeranged" out again a defeated candidate. Four years ago, we "boomed" for Hayes with all the noise in us, and all the whoops in the throats of the Invincibles. And when the pie was opened, and we were all prepared to sing, behold a majority of the popular vote for the other man. That we secured the upper crust does not affect the "boom." We "boomed" against the new Constitution, and when we were perfectly sure that we had everything our own way, the tramps stood in the streets and "boomed" our figures back at us—with insolence. We "boomed" Kallach into the Mayor's office, and Kearney into the House of Correction, but could not get the one out again, or keep the other in because of the Superior and the Supreme Courts that we did not elect. All our "booms" have been bad. Politically the Democrats can beat us at the business. They understand its philosophy better. While we pay for halls, and torches, and bands of music, and impecunious orators, and put on all the style, they are just vulgar enough—in this State, at all events—to crowd up to the polls and vote early and often, putting their loose change "where it will do the most good." Their "boom" is generally on the last day. So, while we believe that the Republican party is the party, and that its nominees will win, we desire to caution against the "boom." For there be "booms" and "boomerangs." The time to shout is after the battle—not at the first flash of the skirmish line. There is hard and earnest work ahead.

There is a most refreshing and conspicuous absence of the "bloody shirt" in the National Republican platform, as well as an equally painful and conspicuous absence of a distinct and well-defined national policy. Even among its achievements no allusion is made to the "million lives" consecrated by the Republican party to saving the nation. We are also spared the harrowing recital of the "brutal outrages" perpetrated by the still "unrepentant" rebels against the "innocent and helpless colored people recently held in slavery." The platform commences by calling attention to the work of the Republican party in "restoring the national credit," and reducing the national debt (the exact figures being set out in the platform). It next affirms: 1st. That the national credit must be preserved (whether by the payment of our debts in gold, silver, or paper does not appear). 2nd. That this is a "national government," and not a mere "confederation of States." 3d. That popular education must be encouraged and guaranteed by the national government. 4th. That the Constitution should be so amended as to "forbid the appropriation of the public funds to the support of sectarian schools." 5th. That the tariff should be so adjusted as to "discriminate in favor" (?) of American labor; that no more land grants shall be made to aid in the construction of railroads; that polygamy, like its twin sister slavery, must die; that American citizens must be protected everywhere; that the water-courses must be developed, but that no subsidies shall be voted to private corporations; that the soldiers who fought for and saved the nation should not be forgotten, even though fifteen years have elapsed since they saved it. 6th. That unrestricted Chinese immigration is an evil of "great magnitude, and involves the exercise of the treaty-making power to restrict it. 7th. That the administration of Hayes has been an honorable and efficient one. 8th. That the Democratic party is inspired by no patriotic motives, but solely by lust and greed for office and patronage; that the Democrats are mere obstructionists; that they have devised fraudulent election returns; tried to unseat legally-elected members of Congress, and attempted (in Maine) to occupy seats of trust and honor given to others; that by vicious methods they have attached partisan legislation to appropriation bills; that they have "basely endeavored to obliterate the sacred memories of the war, and overcome its inestimable results." It is tolerably safe to say that the Democrats, in their national convention, will, in the most solemn and decorous manner, perform the same literary service to the country, and in even stronger language, if possible, declare their adherence to the same set of principles, with the exception of that clause which declares that this government is a "nation," and not a "confederation." The Democratic doctrinaires will have to exert their utmost skill to draw a declaration on this point which will please the northern war Democrat and at the same time satisfy the Southern States-Rights disciple of Calhoun. But, after all, who cares for platforms? As Tom Shannon well said: "They are molasses to catch flies."

IN MEMORIAM.

GEORGE COOLE CORHAM.

Politically, he was a little Black and Tan.

The eyes of the nation are upon the Democracy. The unexpected nomination of Garfield by the Republicans has swept from the field all the "dark horses" of the Democratic party, and has made it necessary for them to present a man of equal prominence, character, and ability. The Democratic party is not overloaded with Presidential material. They can not afford to enter the race with an unknown candidate against Garfield. He is entirely too strong and pure for the smirched and hackneyed Tilden. He has already demonstrated his ability to beat Thurman in Ohio. Hendricks is a relic of the past, and is out of the question. Bayard, who is really a scholarly statesman and an upright man, unfortunately hails from the small and insignificant State of Delaware, which does not count sufficient electoral votes to make him available. He could only have been useful in the event of Grant's nomination to attract the anti-third-termers from the Republican ranks. These are the base and vulgar considerations which control the political managers in selecting Presidential candidates. The choice of the Democrats is therefore literally limited to Horatio Seymour, of New York, and (from courtesy, we add) Stephen J. Field, of California. The latter, however, has not the ghost of a chance of securing the nomination, for various reasons, among which are his noted record as a duelist, making him a dangerous candidate, if not a "bad man from Bitter Creek" to his adversaries. Seymour might possibly carry New York against Garfield, handicapped as he may be by Arthur, the friend and protégé of Conkling—the man who "actively engaged in political matters," in violation of Hayes's Instruction No. 1. After all, it is not quite so bad to "actively engage in political matters" as to steal the public revenue.

No charge of corruption has ever yet been made against Arthur, which leads us to remark that a man may form very bad political alliances and yet may be an honest man and a "good fellow," as instance the case of General Grant and other distinguished Republicans—as well as many extinguished but highly aristocratic Democrats.

"I will tell you," said a friend of the Argonaut, discussing the Chinese question from the Eastern standpoint, "who is the coming man: John is the coming man." And he proceeded to marshal the facts that are making the struggle for life so very hard to the laboring classes throughout Christendom; and then to argue that the combination of qualities possessed by John—his industry, patience, intelligence, docility, and unmatchable frugality—conferred on him the foremost position in the race. If the race were one run against hunger (as it is in some countries—a race that John has run for generations on his own soil) the proposition would be quite true. In that race he is qualified to distance competitors. But in America the race is not run against hunger. There is bread for all, and to spare; nor bread alone, but cheese and potatoes and meat. That is not the kind of struggle that goes on on this continent, or that need be expected for generations to come. The struggle among ourselves is one of bettering our condition; not one of sustaining life by securing a sufficiency of food. We have not only no apprehensions on that score, but every individual distinctly proposes to himself the securing of superfluity beyond even tobacco and beer—the acquisition of landed property and funded stocks. Now, when it is argued that John is the coming man, the meaning is that John will have come to the exclusion of other men—that is, that he alone, in his sphere, will possess the land. But that conclusion could only follow if it were true that the plane of existence on which the competition is proceeding is one on which John alone is qualified to survive. But this is so far from being the fact, that in truth nineteen-twentieths of our Christian fellow-creatures exist—and exist hopeless of any amelioration in their condition—on a plane so far below that represented by a wage of one dollar a day in California, that it is difficult to express the distance except by using terms that would appear extravagant.

The brother of a German friend of ours, who has lately cut short a visit he was making in the old country, writes from New York that the immediate motive of his return was to escape the scenes of misery there, which he was unable to ignore and powerless to relieve. We who speak English are apt to hear a good deal of Irish misery, which is of an exuberantly vocal sort anyhow. Meantime, there is a worse famine in progress, dumbly, in Silesia. But we must not select scenes or periods of famine in order to get an idea of the real condition of a population. They are to be seen under their nearly average aspect. That of the unhappy Irish cottier is too familiar to need repetition. But here is a companion sketch from a German pen that will be novel to more of our readers:

The customary fare of the rural laborer is altogether insufficient to keep a man in health and working condition. Mashed potatoes and guaré (whey cheese), hardly ever any fat, with sour and badly baked rye bread, and not an over-abundant supply of that, has for years past been the customary fare. * * * The mid-day meal is just ready. Potatoes, boiled in their skins, are turned out on the table; beside them lies a herring and salt on a wooden plate. The noise made by a wooden clapper on an iron plate in the courtyard of the manor has just announced dinner-time. The laborer enters, and the meal is taken sitting or standing. In reply to questions, we learn that the man earns five pence a day in summer and six pence a day in winter.

This writer—a German—insists that this is no exceptional case, but that the widespread misery of the laborers has escaped public notice on account of its chronic character. And this sort of a peasant, after his transplantation to America, quite naturally develops into a Workingman who scorns to work for a dollar a day (that is to say, for just ten times as much as he ever before earned in a day); perhaps rises to be a leader, like Steinman, or goes to the Legislature, elected by a constituency of his kind. So long, however, as it remains true that Europe has on hand some millions of the white material, eligible to American citizenship, whose condition is truthfully pictured above, it will be premature to pronounce John Chinaman the coming man merely because he is able to support existence on a plane of privation unknown to American experience.

If the real aim is to protect American labor by the exclusion of competition at the hands of a "degraded population whose wants afford no criterion of the necessities of the American laborer," then there are other foreign treaties that need revision besides the one negotiated by the late Mr. Burlingame. We do not, of course, think that the time has yet come for a change in that part of our national policy which invites free immigration from Europe; but at a time when it is proceeding at the rate we now witness, it is instructive and profoundly suggestive to examine the prospective fellow citizens in their native cabins. We read that in the countries whence much of this immigration proceeds, there are threatening political heresies abroad and doctrines dangerous to society and the state. Might it not be as well to give some attention to their importation—like small-pox—into this country, and erect some trifling barriers around our institutions against this political yellow fever? Meantime, and while we continue in all earnestness and zeal to oppose the influx of John, it is needful from this time on to take especial pains to drop all cant on the question, and refrain from supporting our policy by any considerations that are capable of being advanced with superior force against that portion of the immigration from Europe which is justly described as both degraded and dangerous. For that immigration will be allowed to continue, and we can not hope to establish a discrimination against John unless upon grounds that are peculiar to himself. Our real conflict re John is with transcontinental sentimentalism; and, in order to convert that, we must coerce its judgment even against its will. To coerce its judgment, we must take care not to forge any weapons that can be successfully turned against us. The hideous and grotesque denunciation that has been lavished on John among ourselves, to fire the popular heart, has now survived its usefulness, and had better be hidden away along with Doctor O'Donnell and his favorite and kindred objects of disgust and horror. Atlantic sentimentalism inspects John, and doesn't disgust worth a cent. It does not find his person smelling bad—as it does some other people of the superior races. It does not find him drunk. In short, it can not be persuaded nor will not be persuaded of John's unfitness as an immigrant except on a few high political and social grounds. The sooner argument is raised to that plane and kept there, the better it will be for the cause. We are inclined to beseech most of our contemporaries to abandon it at once.

The historian has done but imperfect justice to one large and influential class among all modern nations—viz., the tramp. The career of the privileged, the learned, the artisan, the peasant classes since the crusades is fairly known to us—its record is at least accessible. Yet down all the course of that dark human current we catch but imperfect glimpses of one blacker stream—the tramp: sometimes as little more than a thread, and at others welling up from the depths in threatening volume, to be overmastered and submerged again. There have always been peripatetic artisans, migrating laborers, Gypsies, adventurers in many sorts; but no one of these is the tramp. Laborers by thousands cross the Irish Sea to England every harvest-tide, and they tramp it, but are not themselves tramps; they are, in fact, the antithesis and reverse of the tramp. While the personal habits, material condition, and intellectual equipment of all other classes have been revolutionized, those of the tramp have stood unchanged. He remains

* * * one
Whom time, nor season, nor storm, nor sun,
Nor the gentle dew, nor the grinding heel,
Has ever subdued or made to feel.

He is not the mere vagabond—he is nothing half so harmless, or picturesque, or engaging. But, having now sufficiently distinguished some of the classes from which he stands apart while sharing with them the single habit of bodily translation, let us lay resolutely hold of his ill-savored person and inspect him. There is the more need, for that he will be found to make one of the "dangerous classes," perhaps the most dangerous of them all—being willfully what he is, and incorrigible, and usually keeping himself on the hither side of the criminal code.

It is not worth while to go back to the peasant revolt under Wat Tyler, or to Jack Cade's insurrection, for a specimen. While the feudal system was in act of falling, there were radical changes in the tenure of land and the organization of industry; and no doubt many a "valiant beggar" and "sturdy rogue" sat in the stocks, or was whipped at the cart's tail, who would have settled to honest work could he have found it. We may begin an investigation within the scope of times essentially like our own—after the old had already been torn down and the materials worked up and consolidated in the new. Daniel Defoe has caught a tramp for us of the date 1704. "I affirm," he says, "of my own knowledge, that when I wanted a man for laboring work, and offered nine shillings a week to strolling fellows at my door, they have frequently told me to my face they could get more a-begging. There is nothing more frequent than for one to work till he has got his pockets full of money, and then go and be idle or perhaps drunk till it is all gone, and perhaps himself in debt; and ask him, in his cups, what he intends, he will tell you honestly he will drink as long as it lasts, and then go to work for more. . . . The reason why so many pretend to want work is, that, as they can live so well on the pretense of wanting work, they would be mad to have it and work in earnest." Is not the picture complete? Do we not know him—this unkempt, unwashed, hard-drinking citizen? A gang of sixteen of him will accompany three out of every five threshing machines in California from next month till November. From nightfall on each Saturday the boss is willing to give them money, till the following Monday morning, they are howling drunk, or lying in the road, under our blistering summer sun, sleeping it off. Do we not meet the machine and its rig, when shifting quarters, the header-wagons strewed with the screaming, fighting crew? At the season's end all arrears are paid up at one of our thrifty inland villages, and there the pack abides in debauch till the season's wages are spent; then tramps to the city to swell the mob of "unemployed workmen" fed by charity, bunking at free quarters, endangering peace, threatening order, and destroying prosperity. He has not changed one feature in one hundred and eighty years. The remedy then proposed, and at last faithfully applied, was, that he should not be fed till he had worked for it.

The presence of the tramp was anticipated and early provided for in these American colonies. Idleness, lying, swearing, and drunkenness were visited with various penalties and marks of disgrace. "John Wedgewood, for being in the company of drunkards, to be set in the stocks. Thomas Petit, for suspicion of slander, idleness, and stubbornness, is sentenced to be severely whipped." But the country was too spacious for the natural tramp to develop fully among ourselves till within recent years. At any earlier period, the condition of things so obviously afforded no sort of excuse for his existence, that it is safe to say his presence would not have been tolerated. With all the West open to him, and at a time when the Genesee valley and all Ohio were still a part of that open West, so anomalous a nuisance as the tramp must have been anywhere abated by summary process. But as the nation has grown bigger it has grown unwieldy and helpless. Vermont (or New Hampshire, we are uncertain which) alone among the States appears to have had the nerve and the public virtue to take the tramp firmly in hand. She convicts him of vagrancy, and then, with equal goodness of heart and sense, sets him to work in a channel profitable to the State. He is decently lodged, fed, and at the end of his term turned loose with some few coins of his own earning. As a consequence, there are reported to be no tramps in that wise State any more. But during the period that we in America remained free from the pest, England had to go through the experience of Luddite and Chartist riots, with their incidents of wrecked machinery and blazing ricks; to put them down with bloodshed, and transportation, and infinite loss from disorganized industry. At length the taint in our own blood came to a natural head in the great tramp riots, for which the railroad strike served merely as an opportunity. Of this episode in the history of free and self-governing America, a wise and friendly foreign critic remarked that it was the one supreme misfortune of this century that had befallen the cause of popular liberty in Europe.

But whatever steps other States may take, we in California, and in a special sense we in San Francisco, can not blink a particular phase of the tramp question which we have made permanently our own. Our adopted system of agriculture is such (and it will not change) that some thousands of tramps—tramps by habit and in grain—will be discharged from work at the end of each harvest season, to winter in this city. They will arrive penniless—having riotously away their wages—and therefore to be provided for. Some equivalent of the expedient of the "Bush fund" will be a recurring necessity. Instead of giving a dollar a day, a half-dollar is ample. The end and aim of the fund should be to furnish, in exchange for work, and on no other terms, food and shelter—not beer and tobacco. Half a dollar will provide the first. It is not a bad idea to provide extensive premises where these men can bunk-down. Those at least might be under police supervision, but beyond that the city, through its ordinary municipal machinery, can not be trusted to have anything to do with the business. If it were made city business, not one dollar a day, nor yet two dollars, would long content the "unemployed workman." Having got his hand into the public purse, he would emulate others and plunge in to the elbow. Yet the only alternative appears to be to provide the funds, as has been done in the past, by private gift. Certainly this method is wrong in principle, and likely to prove unequal and uncertain in practice. There appears to be but one other alternative, viz., the Vermont plan. But, granting there were nerve enough and public spirit enough in San Francisco to attempt putting it in practice, that plan is not open to us; for we have not any system under which to apply this large stock of labor profitably to public uses. A considerable change must be wrought in our own temper, and as a result of that change, a considerable improvement must take place in the quality of the men we put in office, before it would be judicious to entrust them with all the powers that are essential to any thorough remedy for our tramp nuisance. Recognizing this, then, as the plain state of affairs, it will probably appear to all that the best course open to us—the only safe course—will be to continue as we have begun, raising annual "Bush funds" for our winter contingent of tramps. If the matter be taken in hand in season, and with system, the money may be made to go twice as far as heretofore. Circumstances indicate that the field of operation should still be our park.

One of the gratifying features of the Chicago Convention was the prominence gained by the Pacific Coast delegations, and particularly that of California. Heretofore the Pacific States have had but scant courtesy in national politics. Now, however, it is beginning to be realized of some consequence.

TRAY, SEVEN, ACE.

A Moscow Romance of the Faro Table.

[FROM THE RUSSIAN OF ALEXANDER SERGIEVITCH POUCHKINE.]

"What! Did you bet on the red all the evening?"

"Yes, I rarely change my play."

"You are the most impassive gamester I have ever seen."

"What do you think of Hermann, then, for self-control?"

He never in his life touched a card or made a bet, and yet he will watch us play till morning, such is his love of it."

"True," said Hermann, "it interests me, but I never play."

This dialogue took place at the quarters of Naroumoff, a lieutenant of hussars. It was late. Play had been heavy, and potatoes deep.

"Ah, well," cried Tomski, "Hermann is in the engineer corps, and therefore economical—that is all. But for a curiosity, just look at my grandmother, the Countess Fedotovna. She is rich, she is a woman, and she is eighty years old—yet she never plays."

"It is indeed strange," said Naroumoff, "but what is the reason?"

"Listen, and I will tell you. You must know that sixty years ago she was at Paris, and created a furore by her beauty—they called her the Muscovite Venus. Those were the good old days, just before the fall of the monarchy in '89, when every one, ladies and all, played at faro. One evening she lost a large sum to the Count de Provence, the king's brother. On her return she took off her patches, disheveled her hair, and, thus tragically prepared, informed her husband of her ill luck. My defunct grandfather (peace to his ashes) was a species of financial secretary to his wife. He feared only her and the devil—the last the least. But when she confided to him the amount she had lost, he almost rose to the ceiling, flew into a terrible passion, and refused to pay a single franc. My grandmother acted like a woman of spirit—she slapped his face, and passed the night in another chamber. The next day, however, she returned to the attack. Tears this time. But it was useless. Her long-suffering husband declared that she had already wasted half a million, and it might as well end one time as another.

"Fortunately for her, an idea occurred by which she did not fail to profit. There was at that time in Paris a certain strange individual who was known by the name of the Count de Saint Germain. You have doubtless heard of him. He was looked upon as the Wandering Jew, and was reputed to possess the secret of the philosopher's stone, and of the elixir of life as well. Despite the mystery surrounding him, he was much sought after, and was universally liked. Well, she wrote to him, requesting him to grant her an interview. The old gentleman hastened to her house, and found her plunged in despair. She related to him her misfortune, the cruelty of her husband, and begged him to assist her. After reflecting a few moments, Saint Germain replied:

"Madame, I can easily lend you the money you require, but I well know you will have no peace until you repay me. I do not wish to extricate you from one dilemma only to plunge you into another. There is but one course open to you—you must win the money back again."

"But, my dear count," said my grandmother, "I've already told you that I haven't a franc."

"You do not need money," he replied; "listen"—and then he confided to her a secret for which any one of you, gentlemen, would give ten years of his life."

All the young officers listened with intense interest. Tomski paused a moment, lit his cigar, and continued:

"That evening she went to the queen's game at Versailles. The Count de Provence was banker, the game faro. She told him some feminine fib or other for not having yet paid her debt, and then began to play. She staked a large sum on her first card—she won; she doubled it on the next—she won; the third time again she doubled—again she won."

"Pshaw—pure luck!" cried one of the officers.

"A fable," said Hermann.

"But," said Naroumoff, "if you have a grandmother who possesses secrets like that, my dear fellow, why don't you induce her to confide in you?"

"That is the devil of it," replied Tomski. "She had three sons beside my father—desperate gamesters all. Not one ever succeeded in gaining the knowledge they so ardently desired. But you remember my uncle, Count Ivan Ilitch?—he was a favorite of the old lady's. Well, one day he lost to Zoritch three hundred thousand roubles. He was reduced to beggary. The old countess took pity upon him, and, after exacting a pledge upon his honor that he would never play again, she told him the mystic series of cards. He sought Zoritch, and demanded his revenge. His first bet was fifty thousand roubles,* his second—but it's five o'clock, gentlemen; time to break up. You all know how it turned out—he ruined his opponent, who blew his brains out. My uncle never played again."

The old Countess Fedotovna was seated in her chamber, before the mirror. Her maids surrounded her, holding rouge, powder, and patches. The ancient belle had no longer any pretensions to beauty, but she retained the habits of her youth. Her "companion" was engaged in fancy-work.

"Grandmother," said a young officer, as he entered the room, "I have a favor to ask," and he stooped and kissed her withered hand.

"What is it, Paul?"

"I want to present one of my brother officers, and to beg an invitation for him to your next ball."

"Bring him to the ball, and present him there. Were you at the princess's last night?"

"Yes; a splendid affair—we danced until five o'clock. What a charming creature is the Countess Eletzki!"

"Oh, my dear Paul, you are easily pleased. You should have seen her grandmother, Princess Petrovna! She must be very old now."

"The Princess Petrovna!" cried Tomski, unwittingly, "Why, she's been dead these seven years!"

He checked himself immediately. Lisabeta, the companion, was signaling to him. He had forgotten that it was forbidden to speak of the death of any of the countess's aged friends.

*A rouble is about seventy-five cents.

"Dead!" said she, "well, well! I did not know it. We were ladies-of-honor together, when we were girls. I remember the first time we waited upon the empress—" and the old lady sighed as she thought of her vanished youth and beauty. Then, her mood changing—"Paul," said she, "talk with Lisabeta while I am dressing. Tisanka, where is my snuff-box? Help me to get up, Lisabeta," and the old countess passed behind the screen.

"Who is this officer you wish to present to the countess?" asked Lisabeta Ivanovna. "Is he in the engineers?"

"No—in the hussars. His name is Naroumoff. But why do you ask?"

The companion smiled, but did not answer.

"Well, I must be off. Good-bye, grandmother. Good-bye, Lisabeta. Why did you ask if he was in the engineers?" And, smiling meaningly, the young officer withdrew.

Lisabeta Ivanovna sighed, and recommenced her work.

The young girl's life was an unhappy one. To eat another's bread is always bitter, but who could paint the miseries of companion to a lady of quality? When she made the tea, the countess abused her because the servants stole the sugar. When she read to her, the countess held her responsible for the author's dullness. When she went out with her, the countess scolded her if the weather was bad. Often she would retire, after a day of misery, to her little room, and weep bitterly over the affronts she had endured.

One morning, a few days before the scene just related, she was seated at her window, working, when she perceived a handsome young officer gazing at her from the street. She averted her gaze, and applied herself with redoubled assiduity to her work. After a few moments she looked up, and he was still there. For some time he continued to gaze at her window, and finally disappeared. The next day he was there again. The day after, as she and the countess were about getting into the carriage, she saw him standing, muffled in a large fur cloak, watching her. His bright black eyes followed her every movement. Lisabeta smiled, despite herself. From that moment a correspondence of glances was begun.

Hermann (for the reader will have guessed that it was he) had a small fortune, but for an officer was poor. In order to preserve himself from debt, he had resolutely determined never to play, and lived within his income. He was very ambitious, and very taciturn. Under his reserve, however, smoldered the most violent passions. He possessed great self-control, and, though a born gamester, he never touched a card. He often passed feverish nights before the green cloth, devoured by the passion for play, but never indulging it.

The story of the Count de Saint Germain's three cards had made a vivid impression upon his mind. He could think of nothing else.

"Ah," he said to himself, "if the old countess would only tell me her secret—if she would but tell me the names of the three winning cards! I must be presented to her—I must gain her confidence. She is eighty-seven years old—eighty-seven. She might die this week—she might die to-morrow—and her secret with her!" And he dug his nails into his palms as he thought of it.

But he was a man of iron will, and did not falter in his determination to possess himself of the secret. He observed the pretty young girl who served as companion to the countess, and resolved to use her as a tool to further his ends. Not for a moment did a thought of the misery he might cause her make him falter. He used every means to open a correspondence with her. He bribed the servants. He confided notes to the modistes who waited upon the countess for orders. At last his perseverance was rewarded—Lisabeta answered him. Her first letter was a somewhat cold note, chiding him for his rash persistence. But the ice was broken. His protestations of love were soon reciprocated, and at last she consented to a rendezvous. With the rashness which timid women sometimes have, she appointed the countess's house for the place. In her letter she said:

"This evening there is to be a ball at the German ambassador's. We will remain there until two o'clock. As soon as we start for the ball, which will be about eleven, the servants will immediately retire to their quarters. But one will remain, the footman at the door, and he will probably be asleep. Enter as soon as you see us leave, and mount the stairs. If you find any one in the antechamber, ask if the countess is at home; the answer will be that she is not, and you must resign yourself and go. It is not probable that you will meet any one, however. When you are in the antechamber, take the door to the left, and you will find yourself in the countess's boudoir. There, behind a tall screen, you will see two doors: one opens into a closet, the other upon a staircase, which leads to—"

Hermann's eyes glared like those of a beast of prey as he read the note. Already he saw dancing before his eyes the heaped-up gold and bank-notes, the cards, the green cloth of the gaming-table. He saw himself in imagination sweeping in fantastic treasures such as he had never dreamed of. He awaited with feverish impatience the arrival of the hour.

At eleven o'clock he was waiting in front of the countess's door. The night was stormy; the wind moaned fitfully; the lamps gave forth an uncertain flicker upon the falling snow and the deserted street. From time to time the footfall of a belated passer-by sounded upon the stones. But Hermann felt neither wind nor snow. At last the carriage appeared. Two lackeys deposited the muffled form of the countess within it, and following her came the lithe figure of Lisabeta, as she sprang upon the step. The slam of the door smote his ear, and the dull sound of the wheels as they rolled over the snowy street. The footman shut the carriage-gate, the windows became dark, and silence soon hung over the household.

Hermann approached a street lamp, and by its feeble glimmer examined his watch—twenty minutes after eleven. It was past the hour. He opened the gate and entered the vestibule—no footman there. With a firm step, he mounted the grand staircase, and found himself in the antechamber. On the floor lay a snoring servant. Passing quickly by him, Hermann entered the countess's chamber.

Before a little altar in the corner, covered with images, burned a perfumed lamp of gold. On the walls hung portraits, attired in the fashion of fifty years before. One—that of a handsome man in uniform—seemed to follow him with its cold gray eyes as he moved about the room. Hermann resented the look involuntarily, and then smiled at his folly. On the mantel stood porcelain vases and a marble clock; about the room were scattered countless bijoux. He passed behind a screen at one side of the room; there were the doors. He opened the one to the right; it was the staircase which led to the room of the poor girl who loved him. He opened the one to the left; a closet revealed itself, into which he stepped.

The minutes crept slowly away. The house was profoundly silent. The great clock in the hall struck twelve, and its echoes died away. Hermann waited. One o'clock. His pulse beat slowly—he was calm. Two o'clock. Silence. Then came the distant rolling of carriage wheels. For the first time he felt some slight emotion. The carriage rapidly approached, and the servants, warned by the sound, hastened to receive their mistress. Three maids entered, and lighted up the boudoir; a moment after, the countess appeared, preceded and followed by lackeys with lights.

Hermann eagerly watched what was passing through the slightly opened door. The old lady fell into an easy-chair, and the maids began to remove her ornaments. Then Lisabeta passed immediately in front of him. He could have touched her as she passed. He heard her light footstep on the stairway; he heard her door shut to. For a moment he felt something which in another man would have been remorse, but he stifled it. His heart was stone.

The maids continued to remove the countess's ball-dress. When they had taken off her wig, her diamonds, her patches, and her brocaded gown, and replaced them with a wrapper and cap, she looked a little less hideous.

Like most very old people, she was troubled with sleeplessness. Therefore, instead of going to bed at once, she had her chair wheeled before the fire, had the lights extinguished, and dismissed her women. The flickering fire-light fell upon her yellow, wrinkled face, as her head nodded from side to side, and its vacuous look revealed the absence of thought. But suddenly her expression changed; her lips trembled, her eyes lighted up. The figure of a man appeared between her and the fire.

"Fear nothing, madame," said the stranger, in a hoarse whisper, "fear nothing. I do not wish to harm you. On the contrary, I come to beseech you to grant me a favor."

The old countess looked at him in silence, as if she did not understand. Thinking that she was deaf, he placed his lips to her ear, and repeated what he had said. Still she was silent.

"You, madame," continued he, "can assure the happiness of my life without the least trouble to yourself. You can tell me the names of the three cards that—"

He stopped. Her lips moved. She evidently understood him.

"It is a jest," said she, "I swear to you it is a foolish jest."

"No, no!" cried Hermann, passionately, "it is no jest! Think of Count Ilitch and his gains—"

He stopped again. The countess's working features seemed for a moment to betray some emotion, but only for a moment.

"Why do you wish to keep this secret? For your grandsons? They are rich already. Besides, they would not profit by it. They are born debauchees, and had they the devil himself at their orders, they would die beggars. I know the value of money—the secret would not be thrown away upon me."

The countess remained dumb.

Hermann threw himself at her feet. "If your heart be human, if you have ever loved, I implore you to tell me this secret! By all that is holy in this world or the next, I beseech you, tell me!"

The countess remained dumb.

"Stay—perhaps some awful sin stains your soul. Perhaps you have made some compact with demons to obtain this secret. If so, bethink you—you have not many years to live. I am ready to assume with the secret all its pains—ready to take upon my soul all its sins. Speak—speak, I implore you!"

The countess remained dumb.

Gnashing his teeth, Hermann leaped to his feet. "Curse you, old hag!" he cried, drawing a pistol from his breast, "speak you shall, or die!"

For the second time the features of the countess displayed some emotion. Her aged head trembled—she extended her hands feebly, as if to ward off the weapon—she fell back in her chair.

"Enough of this!" cried Hermann, brutally clutching her arm, "for the last time—will you speak or no?"

The arm felt strangely limp and lifeless in his grasp. He approached, and examined her face by the light of the fading fire. A look of haughty determination was upon the withered features, but the eyes were dim. Anna, Countess Fedotovna, was stark and dead.

* * * * *

Three days after this scene the obsequies of the countess were celebrated in the Cathedral of Vasil Blazhennoi.* Hermann entered. Although he felt no remorse, he could not deny that he was her assassin. Faith he had none—superstition had forced him thither. He fancied that the dead woman would exercise a malign influence over his life if he did not appease her manes by assisting at the funeral. The cathedral was crowded. The body lay upon an imposing catafalque, under a velvet canopy. Around the bier were gathered the three generations of her numerous family. No one wept—tears would have been considered an affection. The countess was so old that her death had long been regarded as probable at any moment.

After the funeral oration, the relatives and friends defiled slowly around the bier, to look upon the features of the dead woman. Hermann, also, advanced. He reached the catafalque, mounted its steps, and bent over the coffin. He recoiled, with a stifled cry. He fancied he had seen a movement of the eyes of the corpse, and a mocking smile play over its cold lips.

All the rest of the day he felt a most extraordinary uneasiness. At the restaurant where he took his solitary dinner he drank deeply, contrary to his custom, in the hope of shaking off the gloom which oppressed him. It was in vain. The wine only inflamed his imagination, and gave new activity to his working brain. He walked the streets of the city until he was exhausted, then returned to his quarters. He threw himself upon the bed, fully attired, and in a few minutes a leaden slumber settled on him.

*St. Basil the Beatedified.

When he awoke, a flood of moonlight streamed from the window to his bed. He looked at his watch. It was half-past three. He could sleep no longer. He began to think on his failure to obtain the secret, and of the escape of the old countess to the other world, bearing her secret with her.

Suddenly he looked up. He thought the door was moving. Could it be his servant? No—not at that hour. The door slowly opened, and he could dimly distinguish, in its background of darkness, a figure in white. The figure advanced toward him, with a gliding motion. It reached the yellow band of moonlight. It entered the moonlight. Hermann's hair rose upon his head. It was the countess.

"I come against my will," slowly said the apparition; "but by your will it is that I am forced to come. Tray, seven, ace—played one after the other—these are the cards. Farewell!" The figure glided toward the door. As it reached the door, it turned, and Hermann fancied he could discern in the darkness its mocking smile.

* * * * *
Tray, seven, ace! Tray, seven, ace! This was the secret. The words were branded upon Hermann's brain. He could think of nothing else—he could dream of nothing else. The cards appeared in a myriad mystic forms. He saw vast forests, whose nodding branches wove themselves into trays. Mighty cities reared themselves before him, whose gothic gates were strangely like to sevens. Monstrous aces dangled from the skies like spider-webs. The clock ticked "Tray, seven, ace."

There was at Moscow a famous faro-bank, frequented only by the rich. The banker was named Tchekalinski. His life had been passed at play, and he had amassed an immense fortune. His magnificent house, his excellent wines, his elegant manners, had succeeded in attracting to his doors the golden youth of Moscow. They deserted the ball-room for the gambling-hell; they neglected the smiles of beauty for those of the fickle goddess Fortune.

Naroumoff was in the habit of frequenting this place, and Hermann requested him to conduct him there. They passed through a number of rooms, filled with obsequious servants. All were crowded. Generals and diplomatists were playing at whist. Young men were extended upon divans, smoking Turkish pipes. At last they reached the main room. At a long table in the centre was seated Tchekalinski, dealing faro, surrounded by a score of players. He was a man of about sixty, with a noble head, crowned with snow-white hair. His countenance shone with good humor and good living. During a pause in the play Naroumoff presented his friend. The banker greeted him with a brilliant smile, bade him not stand upon ceremony, and commenced another deal. The bets were numerous; the deal lasted long. At its close Tchekalinski began shuffling a new pack for a fresh deal.

Hermann deposited a check upon the table.
"What!" cried Naroumoff, laughingly, "at last, O man of iron, you have yielded to the temptation! Well, I wish you good luck."

"How much?" said the banker, peering at the check, "I beg your pardon, but I cannot see the figures."
"Fifty thousand roubles," replied Hermann.

At these words all eyes were fixed upon the young officer.
"He is mad!" thought Naroumoff.

"Allow me to observe, sir," said Tchekalinski, with his polite smile, "that your play is somewhat heavy."
"I know it," said Hermann, with a slight sneer, "you can decline to play against me, if you wish."

"That is not my desire," said the banker, with a still sweeter smile, "but you will pardon me for saying that when I play for such large sums I prefer to deal with the money before me. It facilitates calculation."

Hermann drew from his pocket a bundle of bank-notes, and placed it upon the tray. The banker examined the notes with a glance, and began to deal. To the right came a ten, to the left a tray.

"Tray wins," said Hermann.

A murmur ran around the table. For a moment the banker's brows contracted, but his smile at once reappeared. He placed upon Hermann's pile of notes a similar pile.

"Do you leave it there?" he asked.

Without replying, Hermann placed the entire sum upon the seven. Tchekalinski dealt. To the right a jack, to the left a seven.

"Seven wins," said Hermann.

The usually impassive banker was evidently ill at ease. He counted one hundred thousand roubles in notes, and placed them upon the mass of wealth.

The news had spread through the gambling-hell. The old men had left their whist, the young men their divans. The servants had quitted their posts. A throng of feverish gamblers and bedizened lackeys surrounded Hermann and his silent opponent. The young man placed the two hundred thousand roubles upon the ace. A profound silence reigned throughout the room.

Tchekalinski prepared to deal. His hands trembled, despite himself. To the right, an ace; to the left a queen.

"Ace wins," said Hermann, extending his hand toward the money.

"I beg your pardon," said the banker, in honeyed tones—"I beg your pardon—ace loses."

Hermann glared at the cards. On the banker's pile was an ace; on his, the QUEEN OF SPADES! He shuddered, and turned sick. He fancied he could see in the painted face upon the card the features of the old countess, and her malignant smile.

"Curse her!" he shrieked, "curse the old hag! May ten thousand devils torture her lying soul!" His voice died away in a hoarse scream. He foamed at the mouth. The banker made a sign to the servants, and they advanced and removed him.

Tchekalinski smiled his most brilliant smile upon the assembled gamblers. "Make your bets, gentlemen," he said, and began to shuffle the cards.

In the Ouboukhof Asylum for the Insane, at Moscow, is a very old man. He is known only as "No. 17." He is harmless, but will reply to no questions put to him. He repeats incessantly, day after day, year after year, the words: "Tray, seven, ace—tray, seven, queen; tray, seven, ace—tray, seven, queen."

SAN FRANCISCO, June, 1880.

INTAGLIOS.

The Two Brides.

I saw two maids at the kirk,
And both were fair and sweet;
One in her wedding robe,
And one in her winding-sheet.

The choristers sang the hymn,
The sacred rites were read,
And one for life to Life,
And one to Death was wed.

They were borne to their bridal beds,
In loveliness and bloom;
One in a merry castle,
And one in a solemn tomb.

One on the morrow woke
In a world of sin and pain,
But the other was happier far,
And never awoke again.

Roses and Thorns.

The young child Jesus had a garden
Full of roses, rare and red;
And thrice a day he watered them,
To make a garland for his head.

When they were full-blown in the garden
He called the Jewish children there,
And each did pluck himself a rose,
Until they stripped the garden bare.

"And now how will you make your garland?
For not a rose your path adorns."
"But you forget," he answers them,
"That you have left me still the thorns."

They took the thorns and made a garland,
And placed it on his shining head;
And where the roses should have shewn
Were little drops of blood instead.

A Subterfuge.

"What is a beso, Will?" she said,
As from her book she raised her head,
A look of deep perplexity
Ruffling her brow's convexity.
"A beso, Mary," Will replied,
As he stepped softly to her side,
"Means something very tinglish;
Implying contact osculate
Of things opposed, yet duplicate.
Producing a peculiar thrill
And slight paralysis of the will."
"You're teasing me," she answered him;
"I'm vexed at you. I'll go ask Jim.
Now, really, Will, if you do know,
Please tell or show me—don't act so."
"Well, I will show you then," he said,
"The meaning of the word you read:
A beso is—there, just like this—
It's only Spanish for a kiss."
The silly geese—what pains they took!
And beso was not in the book.

—Anon.

A Lovers' Quarrel.

I could not hear all that they must have said;
But as I sat beside the little stream
I watched them part, with just one angry word.
She passed me quickly, with a down-drooped head,
Red cheeks, eyes flashing with a scornful gleam,
A hasty step, as by deep passion stirred;
She did not turn, nor look back where he stood,
But vanished quickly in the thick green wood.

I watched him sigh, then noted how he gazed
At her retreating form; he whistled low
And softly to himself; in deepest thought
He whispered, "Is she vexed?" then was amazed
That 'twas in truth she really meant to go.
He looked once more, as if indeed he sought
To bring her back, but on she went that day;
Then he went, too—but 'twas the other way.

They never met again; but oft I see
The girl, a woman grown, come by this seat,
And gaze into the stream with tear-worn eyes.
And then I wonder why such things should be—
If she had turned her head, or stayed her feet,
Life would have altered, love's bright, sunny skies
Shone o'er her ever. 'Tis but things like this
That form our lives, and make our woe or bliss.
—All the Year Round.

Tit for Tat.

"Good mornin', Miss Katie," said young Mickie Fee,
"Good mornin', again; it's yourself shure I see,
Lookin' bloomin' as iver. But Kate turned away
As she said, 'Mister Mickie, I wish you good day.
You're a heartless desaver—now don't spake a word!
Pretty tales about you and that Norah I've heard.
You know you danced with her the day of the fair,
And praised her gray eyes and her very red hair.
You called her an angel; quite in love with her fell;
And at night when you parted you kissed her as well!"
Then young Mickie gave a sly wink as he said:
"I desaved her, my darlin'—this way turn your head—
Yes, faith, I desaved her; my darlin', it's true;
For I shut both my eyes, Kate, and fancied 'twas you!"
Yes, that's what I did;
Katie, it's true:
I shut both my eyes,
And fancied 'twas you!"

"Well, I've no time to stay, so good-bye, Mickie Fee.
You may desave ber, but you don't desave me:
I'm not to be blameyed, Mick, a word in your ear:
You had better be off, for my dad's comin' here."
"Oh, your dad's comin', is he? That's not him I see
Now bobbin' behind that old blackthorn-tree?
For it's Paddy Mahon!" "Oh," said Kate, with a sneer,
"You've got your eyes open at last, Mickie dear.
And shure you are right; 'tis my own darlin' Pat,
So take my advice, Mick, and get out of that;
For he's comin' to court me. Now listen, my lad:
When that boy kisses me, oh, won't you be glad!
For when his lips meet mine, why, what will I do
But shut both my eyes, Mick, and fancy it's you?"

That's what I'll do
Mickie, it's true:
Shut both my eyes,
And fancy it's you!"

WINE GROWING—SELECTION OF VINES.

Experience has demonstrated that the best "all round" vine for red wine is the Hungarian Zinfandel—by which term we mean the best for white as well as red wine, as well as for blending with others, and for depth of color when properly handled; moreover, like Scyras and Hermitage, it makes itself at home nearly equally well in hot situations and comparatively cool ones; and, on the whole, it is a reliable bearer. And in this place one feels tempted to express regret that its produce should be called—as it is universally—"claret," instead of by the name of the vine. But on this matter of nomenclature we shall have a good deal to say on a future occasion. This particular vine, however, might justly find a place in every Californian vineyard. The white wine made of it has already proved, as a last season's wine, superior in its keeping properties to a considerable number of other white kinds. Of the selection of white varieties, it is more difficult, at present, to speak with safety, because situation and climate have so marked an effect both on them and their yield. We speak now from observation, information, and analyses of many samples during two years. For districts such as Sonoma, Napa, and all others of like climate and exposure, the three best have proved to be Riesling, Flaming Tokay, and that one of the Chasseltas family which yields the wine called Gutedel—a product second only to Rhenish hock. Now, for such climates as those of Fresno, San Bernardino, Los Angeles, and the sunny hills and valleys of the south generally, beyond the Zinfandel we have hitherto seen none superior to Berger for firm, light, white wine. All through these dry, sunny districts may be found a home for Spanish and Portuguese varieties. And if ever a gallon of real Manzanilla is to be grown in the State, Fresno is the place. There, both day and night, for months together, when the grapes are ripening, the climate is all that could be desired—probably equal to that of the hot, sandy plains of San Lucar or the Alemejo. But at present the suitable vines are not known to be in the country, at least the best of them. The Mission is certainly one; so is Pedro Jimenes, if the true vine be here. But Temprana, Palomino Blanco, and Doradilla can nowhere be heard of; and until they shall have been introduced and brought into bearing, no one can tell whether the wine will prove to be like true sherry or not. Thus much is certain—many thousands of acres have been planted with those varieties in South Australia, and have been in bearing for more than a quarter of a century. They bear prodigiously well, and enjoy a climate even greater than that of Fresno; yet to this day not one gallon of their must has turned out to resemble any known variety of Spanish sherry. That Palomino Blanco and Temprana yield a delicious wine, which ripens rapidly, is certain, but it is not Manzanilla. The characteristic bitterness of that prince of wines is lacking altogether, and frequently the color also.

The white wine made here and called sherry—for the most part a hot, poor, highly-branded article—is a very caricature of Spanish sherry. Among the useful teachings of the Board of Viticulture we expect to find that of accurate nomenclature of vines and wines. Meanwhile, experience might instruct vintners, for their own advantage, that the vignerons of the colony of the Cape of Good Hope received their chance of a market all over the world by insisting on calling their white wines "sherry." The expression "Cape sherry" is a by-word in every good wine-cellar the world over; and it is certainly not inferior to California sherry. All that we have said of sherry, mutato nomine, may be predicated of port. The port-wine grapes are not in the State, and so port wine can not be made.

Lying before us is one of those exhaustive investigations into the wines of Spain and Portugal by the most experienced of wine students, Mr. J. B. Keene, of the English Customs Department, London. Until within the last three years, when he was sent to investigate adulterated teas, nearly all his public life has been devoted to that one work. The present report covers 1,265 samples, of which 554 were Spanish and 457 Portuguese. Now, the reader of this article will do well to ponder over the following sentence, and, for the credit of the State, act in the spirit of it, keeping their wines pure and natural, and not the deleterious stuff so often met with:

Of the total number of Portuguese wines, 381 were in their natural state, having, so far as I could discover, no trace of added spirit, while 49 were evidently fortified, some having as much as 40 or even 50 per cent. of proof-spirit; of the red wines, 318 were natural, and 25 fortified; of the white, 63 were natural, and 24 fortified. Those from the district of Porto (the Alto Douro) were the lowest strengths of any; none belonged to the category of what we are accustomed to call port wines.

The average of strength, including both the fortified and the natural, is only 26.72 of British proof—or alcohol 15.26 per cent. Plenty of the natural wines of this State far exceed those figures. The above may seem a digression, though not so in reality. If there be a good sale in the Eastern States for artificial port and sherry, let them be as like the original as possible—at any rate, let them be made from the Spanish and Portuguese grapes of the kinds alone used for wines of those names. No more useful work could be done with a part of the three thousand dollars, just voted by the Legislature for experiments at the university, than the procuring of cuttings from Spain and Portugal, and causing them to be planted at several dissimilar localities, besides the nursery at the university. Cuttings must be obtained, not seeds. Seeds are sure to be hybridized; such is the fault of the Mission vines. They belong to the Beni-carlo family, but are not pure.

He saw a petite and handsome young lady coming down the street, whereupon he began to admire and to stare at her in a way entirely new to the lady. It proved, on closer inspection, to be his wife in a new spring suit. He was so disgusted at his disappointment that he threw an orange peeling at her, and walked away in an opposite direction. It simply shows the power or habit some men have of adapting themselves to all manner of circumstances.

The first almanac was printed in 1460 and 1880 contains several of the same fresh and that appeared in the first number.

How very strange it is that an Italian writer who lived his little life out half of a thousand years ago, and even then got into the world haphazard, being but "a light o' love," as the Irish would say, should have such an enduring fame. Giovanni Boccaccio! The name has not at any time a strange sound, and within the week has become as familiar as the mayor's; for Boccaccio himself is disporting in tights and tunic at the Bush Street Theatre, and Boccaccio, filtered through a Shakspeare's transmuting fancy, reigns at the Baldwin Theatre. Honest Will Shakspeare! How well he knew what he did not know, and went to the Italians for the pith of his tales whenever the manager called for a new play; how the critics would annihilate him if he lived to-day with charges and proofs of plagiarism. As for the story-writers themselves, they have died out of the memory of man long, long ago. And if, of them all, Boccaccio's fame alone be yet green, it is because—model though he be of wit, satire, and elegant simplicity of diction—every one in his time has been forbidden to take the big red-backed hook down from the shelf. The primeval taste for forbidden fruit yet lingers on the palate.

You must have seen Cymbeline, and do not like the play, I know. Pruned and trimmed and cleansed and readjusted as it is, it is yet sometimes ineffably tiresome. It would not be safe for any but a superlatively beautiful woman to attempt to bring it out of the closet. Charming as the character of "Imogen" may be—wifely, womanly, dog-like in constancy, Griselda-like in patience—it is yet, after all, but a posing part. Through two acts—nay, three—"Imogen" has little to do but stand about the stage in graceful attitudes and look beautiful; no woman who walks the boards can do thus much more satisfactorily than Adelaide Neilson. But she can also do more; and in Cymbeline one grows actually impatient, waiting for her to begin. For it is in the lighter parts of a play that Adelaide Neilson's faults—she not being "one entire and perfect chrysolite"—are most conspicuous. She is essentially a tragedienne. Her passions are attuned to high pitch. She is cramped for room on the little stage at Baldwin's. She learned her stride, perhaps, at Old Drury, for she can cross the Baldwin in three steps; and when she begins to plunge straight down the stage in one of her headlong courses, you can see every one in the line, from the orchestra leader to the man in the mezzanine box, shrink involuntarily as if to get out of the way. She carries you with her in these whirlwinds and gusts, and when she has a shock you have it too. Did you watch the house as she read "Posthumus's" cruel letter to "Pisanio," the other night? When the bolt struck her heart, and she went down like a shot, every one in the audience jumped as if he had been hurt, too. And yet it could not have been unexpected. A woman reading her death warrant, signed by the bands of a husband whom she loves and suspects herself to be loved by, is not apt to retain any extraordinary degree of self-possession. A faint is the most natural thing in the world under the circumstances. But who else faints as Adelaide Neilson does? She becomes on the instant as limp as a piece of worn satin ribbon. She falls as noiselessly as a tiny avalanche, and as prone as the dead. She does not seem to cast a fainting horsepoe beforeband. She does not take an inventory of distances and probable bumps. She does not bend in sections, like a pocket rule. She falls as one might under a heart-thrust—suddenly, unresistingly, and without forethought or reckoning. Here's a lot of talk about a faint; but then the faint is one of Miss Neilson's pieces de resistance. She has quite a stock of them. You have seen the ready tears rise to her great black eyes, and roll in big beads down her cheeks. They were there when "Pisanio" raised her from the ground, and she cried, realizing between them that that "drug-damned Italy had outcrafted" "Posthumus," who, by the way, was very much of a cad in any case, and did not deserve to be upheld by such a woman. Miss Neilson is excessively stagey. Her voice is not exceptionally fine, and as an elocutionist she does not so widely excel. But she is as beautiful as any woman needs or has any right to be. She is the most thoroughly trained actress on the stage. No woman better understands the grace of drapery. Her tears are big and real, and honor any demand. Her faint is like the falling of a snow-drift. She is as fervid as a south wind in the tropics; she has a delightful way of storming you into surprise; and a stage embrace—well, one would be apt to drift into breakers, speaking from an adjective point of view in attempting to describe it. See that small wonder that any one sits patiently through a Neilson night, even though the performance drag when she is off the stage, as Cymbeline inevitably must. Of course her best scenes are her repulse of "Iachimo," and the receipt of "Posthumus's" cruel letter to "Pisanio." But it is worth waiting simply to look at her as "Fidele" in the cave scene. In all the glitter of gems and gewgaws, in all the trailing satins and rich stuffs which she so well knows how to wear, she is not so irresistibly beautiful as in the simple white tunic of "Fidele." As for her timidity, in this scene, it is exceedingly natural, proud, undaunted "Imogen" though she be. Any woman of fiery spirit will defy a king and court, and go uncomplaining, for sake of the man she loves, through countless tribulations, but she is always afraid of a dark place and a bugaboo. You can not terrify her with trials and sacrifices, but she will run shrieking at sight of the barrel of an unloaded gun, and turn pale with fear of the edge of a blade, if she carry the knife in her hand. There was something, therefore, comfortably real about Miss Neilson when she came down off her tragic stilts to play this bit of timidity in the most real sort of way. The company gave most excellent support, notably Bishop as "Cloten"—a character which Halliwell says must have been "taken from life, it is so daring a flight for an author to take without precedent." And are we to be afflicted with Compton throughout the entire season? He is a magnificently incompetent young man, whose distinguishing features, so far as may be gathered from his "Posthumus," are a strapping pair of legs, and long, depending Moorish moustachios. Possibly he had a cold, for he displayed no voice; and perhaps he is an amateur, for he does not seem to know very much about acting.

Talking of amateurs, have you been to the amateur carnival at the Bush Street Theatre? What a jolly time of it they must have, such a lot of them together. What would become of Boccaccio, were it not that it is magnificently mounted and costumed, and that Miss Emelie Melville carries the opera—if opera it is to be called—upon her own shoulders? For Max Freeman has failed to help her this time. His "Pietro" is really too loud and too hoisterous to be agreeable. The stage itself is quite a picture, with its quaint and curious costumes, and with nothing—anachronisms and all—more than two or three hundred years out of the way, and that, from our distant point of perspective, is a mere trifle. There are very few of us capable of quarreling over the fashions of the fourteenth century as compared with those of the sixteenth. In any case, there was nothing which really looked very much out of place but a great, green carpet-bag; and perhaps, indeed, Giovanni Boccaccio himself carried just such an one when he went traveling. At all events, the little Bush Street Theatre looks eminently historical just now. Emelie Melville, with a courage which does not usually distinguish a blonde, has tinged her skin to a dark Italian swarthinness, and, if she does not look the handsomer for the stain, looks at least more picture-like. Her philosophy on these points is eminently sound, as she proved with her Titian locks in the Pirates. People are always calling for novelty, but a familiar face changed is more fascinating than a new one. I remember once reading a magazine story of an impressionable young man, sojourning at a watering place, who fell in love with a series of young ladies of various complexions, who all turned out to be one young woman who rejoiced in the possession of a set of wigs, which she wore as fancy dictated for the purpose of concealing her own red hair. This, however, was before fashion had made red hair a crown of glory. As for Miss Emelie Melville, this simple change made so much talk that I believe some people actually went to the theatre to see how she looked in red hair. Miss Melville's costumes in Boccaccio are rich and handsome, and she looks well in them. The music brings into play her lower notes, the richest and sweetest in her voice; and some of the music is extremely pretty. In fact, all through the first act the music is simply delightful, and the curtain goes down on a well-pleased audience. The second act is inexcusably bad; the third insufferably stupid. The opera has been much condensed since the first night, and surely no text ever offered fairer field for cutting. It is but kindness to the amateurs and to the public to have clipped their wings in their ambitious flight. There is, first, a Miss Mulbach who seems to have an at-home feeling on the stage, but who can not sing. Then there is a Miss Danforth who requires prompt extinguishing as an actress, but who has two or three contralto notes. Then there is a Miss Gerrish who is similarly endowed, but who, between the dazed expression of countenance and the extraordinary arm movement with which she signaled her operatic debut, seemed to be going about in a high wind. Then there was a Mr. Florence J. McCarthy, as the bills definitely put it, who hovered between two harrowing uncertainties, as to whether he was engaged as baritone or bass, and settled definitely on neither. There were a few lesser lights floating about, who seemed to be breathing unfamiliar air, but they were not sufficiently prominent to be amusing. However, when these people were permitted to lose their individuality in the chorus, they sang excellently well, and the concerted music of Boccaccio is something delightful to listen to. The first act is worth the price of admission. After that the music declines—in quantity at least—and the dialogue becomes prolix, and abounds in double entendres. It is reported better since the cutting, but in any case it is not clean. I have heard more than one say that no other artist in her line on the stage could play the part of this prince of rakes with so much modesty as Emelie Melville does. To say truth, she makes the part as clean as a white page. Perhaps the illusion is assisted by the appearance of "Fiametta," who, though the original was a very naughty princess indeed, appears in the hands of Miss Gracie Plaisted like a little child. Miss Gracie Plaisted is a tiny little woman, with a tiny little voice, which she uses very well, and who may be remembered in A Trip to the Moon. Her marvelous self-possession was the theme of general comment at that time, and it has not left her. In addition, she has a candid way of inviting an encore, which is only excused by the fact that she does sing very sweetly. They have dressed her in a charmingly simple style, and she is just the foil for the dashing "Boccaccio." Go to see it. The first act will induce you to enjoy the second. But see the third. In any case, the stage and people are well worth the seeing. It is so much easier and pleasanter and more vivid than to read a chapter or two from history. And, beside, you should see him, for he is an old friend, and in his new guise you will find him a delightful fellow, this same "Giovanni Boccaccio."

The Zeitska Institute.

The graduating exercises of the Zeitska Institute held at the Metropolitan last week were very complete and successful. The attendance of guests and relatives and friends of the pupils was large, and the programme varied and interesting. Four young ladies graduated and received their diplomas—Miss Emma Spinney, Miss Mollie Coleman, Miss Lola Rodriguez, and Miss Sarah Platscheck. The salutatory, an essay entitled "First Impressions," was read by Miss Spinney; a French essay, "La Californie," by Miss Rodriguez; "Die Dichter Deutschlands," a German essay, by Miss Platscheck, while Miss Mollie Coleman presented as the valedictory an essay on the "Monuments of Time." The other exercises, consisting of music, recitations, and the presenting of prizes and diplomas, followed. After the set programme at the Temple a serenade was given at the school building to Madame Zeitska, under whose intelligent management this private and fashionable academy has been so popular and successful. It was a graceful tribute to an accomplished lady—one in every respect deserving and appreciative of the compliment. The next term of the Institute, which has now something like one hundred and twenty-five pupils, begins some time in the early part of July.

A curious gaming case has lately come up in Paris. Mlle. Gibert is a gambler, passionately devoted to her cards, and not ashamed of her passion. She is well to do, and in her spinster boudoir, in the Rue Richemance Mals, has many a little game for the benefit of certain dear friends of her own sex and tastes. Up to a month or so ago these games were restricted to hazard, baccarat, and the like. Then noticing that her guests wearied of short cards now and again, Mlle. Gibert invested in a superb roulette wheel and lay-out. Somehow or other, the police got wind of this, and one afternoon a descent was made on the place, and a dozen aristocratic ladies, including the proprietress, marched, like so many ignoble felons, before a magistrate. The zealous police got a bluff at the very start, however. It was proved that Mlle. Gibert's game was a strictly private one; that its only patrons were the most intimate friends of the hostess, and that such close acquaintances who called were not permitted to enjoy it unless it was agreeable to all the parties. Moreover, Mlle. Gibert's losses effectually disproved the charge that she ran her establishment for purposes of gain. She is notoriously unlucky, and her passion costs her the bulk of a handsome income. There being no law against any one's playing games of chance for their own private amusement, the fair prisoners were released with an abject apology. Having ascertained that the charge against her was based on information furnished by a lady whom she had denied the privilege of playing, Mlle. Gibert has instituted suit against her for slander.

A Chicago reporter lately went one afternoon to "do" a cattle fair, and at night to "finish up" a grand hall. The next morning the office was besieged by thirteen enraged husbands, seven big brothers, and dozens of sisters, cousins, and aunts, each holding a copy of the paper, and pointing to this paragraph: "Miss Alice B., a beautiful blonde heifer, cowbell, and diamonds, etc. Miss Betty C., charming brunette, pink silk, and pearls; second prize; short horn. Mrs. Sarah Eliza X., a beautiful matron arrayed in Durham satin, embroidered in Alderney pink, cowbell set in diamonds, real lace, and weighing 1,039 on the scales; first prize, $500." The rest of the report was similar in style.

Colonel Higginson says of Mrs. Jackson: When some one asked Emerson, a few years since, whether he did not think "H. H." the best woman-poet on this continent, he answered, in his meditative way: "Perhaps we might as well omit the woman;" thus placing her, at least in that moment of impulse, at the head of all. He used to cut her poems from the newspapers, as they appeared, to carry them about with him, and to read them aloud. His especial favorites were the most condensed and the deepest—those having something of that kind of obscurity which Coleridge pronounced to be a compliment to the reader.

A young fellow tried to scare a Brooklyn widow by appearing to her as her husband's ghost. But as he was in the house before twelve o'clock at night, and didn't appear drunk, she detected the fraud at once, and thumped the intruder on the head with the fire-shovel.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Love's Symbols.

Pass the butter gently, Mabel,
Shove it lightly through the air;
In the corner of the dish, love,
You will find a nut-brown hair.
What fond memories it awakens
Of the days ere we were wed,
When upon my good coat collar
Oft was laid your little head.
Lovingly I stroked those tresses
In the happy days gone by;
Now I strike them every meal-time
In the butter or the pie.

The Simple Truth.

The sun comes up and the sun goes down,
And day and night are the same as one.
The year grows green and the year grows brown,
And what is it all when all is done?
Grains of sombre or shining sand,
Gliding into and out of the hand!
The fisher drops his net in the stream,
And a hundred streams are the same as one,
And the maiden dreams her love-lit dream,
And what is it all when all is done?
The net of the fisher the burden breaks,
And the dreaming dreamer always wakes!
—Boston Advertiser.

The Complex Truth.

The tide comes in and the tide goes out,
And a hundred tides are the same as one;
For who can say what I'm writing about?
And what is it all when all is done—
But dipping my pen in ink—and then?
Oh, nothing but taking it out again.
For people must read a great deal of rot—
And rubbish and rot are the same as one.
They may as well read what I write—why not?
But what is it all when all is done?
Some lines of type, and a metre rough,
And not an idea in the whole of the stuff.
—Harvard Lampoon.

Rough on the Old Man.

An Oil City boy, whose old father
Is an able attorney at law,
Was telling some chums last evening—
With many a loud guffaw—
Of the show. "And," said he, "I'm going.
I don't care Adam Forepaugh."

A Slight Misunderstanding.

A young lad rang the door-bell
Of a newly-married pair.
"Don't you want a boy?" he said,
Shyly pulling at his hair.
"Want a boy?" she repeated;
"Why, you impudent scapgrace!"
And she gave the door a slam
In the youth's astonished face.

Kathleen, Brace Up!

"Kathleen Mavourneen, the gray dawn is breaking;
The horn of the hunter is heard on the hill!
If you do not arouse after all of this shaking,
I'll dose you with water—b-vk thunder, I will!
Oh, hast thou forgotten no breakfast awaits me?
Oh, hast thou forgotten my work at the store?
You know when I'm late how the gov nor berates me;
Then Kathleen, dog on it—oh, heaven, a snore!"

The Circus Parade.

The circus! the circus! The throb of the drums,
And the blare of the horns as the band-wagon comes,
And the clash and the clang of the cymbals that beat
As the glittering pageant winds down the long street.
In the circus parade there is glory clear down,
From the first spangled horse to the mule of the clown;
And the gleam and the glitter and glamour and glare
On the days of enchantment are glimmering there.
For here are the banners of silvery fold,
Caresing the winds with their fringes of gold,
And their high-lifted standards with spear-tips aglow,
Are the helmeted knights that go riding below.
Here's the chariot wrought of that marvelous shell
The sea gave to Neptune, first washing it well
With its fabulous waters of gold, till it gleams
Like the galleon rare of an argonaut's dreams.
And the elephant, too, with his undulant stride,
That rocks the high throne of a king in his pride,
That in jungles of India shook from his flanks
The tiger that leapt from the Jujube banks.
Here's the long, ever-changing, mysterious line
Of cages, with hints of their glories divine,
From the little barred windows, cut high in the rear,
Where the close-hidden animals' noses appear.
Here's the pyramid car, with the splendor and flash,
And the goddess above, in a fluttering sash
And a pen-wiper dress; oh, the rarest of sights
Is this Queen of the Air in cerulean tights!
Then the far-away clasp of the cymbals, and then
The swoon of the tune ere it wakens again.
And the capering tones of the gallant cornet
That go dancing away in a mad minuet.
The circus! The circus! The throb of the drums,
And the blare of the horns as the band-wagon comes,
And the clash and the clang of the cymbals that beat
As the glittering pageant winds down the long street.

BAD VENTILATION.—The bad air of workshops, court-rooms, and places of amusement poisons the blood no less than if the same poison were taken into the system by eating or drinking it. To expel this poison with certainty and celerity, Hop Bitters should be taken.

POMMERY & GRENÔ (SEC) CHAMPAGNE.—There is considerable discussion just now regarding the best brands of champagne. Out of the controversy the celebrated Pommery & Grenô (sec) seems to come the favorite. It has many claims to the first place. It is the favorite of all the gourmets in Europe and the Eastern States. The quality of this wine is guaranteed by the manufacturers to meet the demands of the most fastidious. If you do not use it now, sample this superb brand. Fresh shipments have lately been received by the agents in this city, and the orders that are being received and filled every day are pretty good indications that among consumers this wine is meeting with deserved appreciation.

We have received from H. P. Hubbard, of New Haven, Conn., a copy of Hubbard's Right-Hand Record and Newspaper Directory, a work giving, in alphabetical order, towns in each State, with population, papers in the same, with circulation, space for recording contracts, and other data valuable to advertisers. The work also contains a complete list of all American newspapers, and a list of the leading journals of the world. As a book of newspaper ready reference it is indispensable. Price, $1.50 with card, and $2.50 with board covers.

In Heine's eyes Madame De Staël was "the passionate woman in all her turbulence of soul, a veritable hurricane in petticoats, sweeping through our peaceful Germany, and everywhere exclaiming rapturously, 'What a refreshing stillness breathes over this land! How delightfully cool it is in your woods! What reviving perfume of violets! How peacefully the green finches warble in their German nests! You are a good and virtuous people, and can have no idea what corruption of morals prevails among us in the Rue du Bac.'"

VOL. VI. NO. 25.

SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 19, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE LOVERS' RENDEZVOUS.

A Striking Chapter from Zola's "Rougon-Macquart Family."

Leaving Plassans by the Roman gate on the south side of the town, after passing the scattered houses of the Faubourg, one finds one's self on the road to Nice, and on the right a vacant space, known under the name of Saint-Mittre.

Saint-Mittre is an elongated square, separated from the highway merely by a strip of worn turf. On one side is a lane which terminates in a cul-de-sac, and is bordered by a row of dilapidated huts. At the left and rear it is shut in by two moss-grown walls, over which wave branches of the tall mulberry-trees on the great estate of Jas-Meiffren, which has its entrance lower down in the Faubourg. Thus shut in on three sides, Saint-Mittre is like a square which leads nowhere, and which is only crossed by pedestrians.

Formerly this spot was a cemetery under the protection of Saint-Mittre—a Provençal saint much honored in the country about. The old inhabitants of Plassans, in 1851, talked of having seen the walls of this cemetery standing for years. For a century this spot had been used for interments, until finally the authorities of the town were compelled to open a new cemetery on the other side of the town, so full had this one become, and Saint-Mittre was abandoned and overgrown with crisp dark grass and weeds. The soil—which could never be upheaved by shovel or pickaxe without bringing to the surface human remains—was appallingly fertile.

From the highway, after May rains and June suns, the herbage was seen overtopping the walls; while within it was like a sea of dark green with dashes of strangely brilliant flowers, while the damp earth smelled of the decaying humanity which nourished this rank vegetation. One of the curiosities of this old burial-ground was a huge pear-tree with gnarled and twisted branches, laden yearly with enormous fruit which no housewife in Plassans would touch. Everybody spoke of the gigantic fruit with disgust, except the school-boys of the Faubourg, who were troubled with no such scruples of delicacy, and climbed the walls at twilight to steal these pears long before they were ripe.

The glowing life of these trees and this herbage had long since devoured all the dead bodies in the old cemetery of Saint-Mittre; and now as one passed along by the wall, only the penetrating odor of the wall-flowers was to be perceived, and this had been the case for several summers. About this time the town awoke to the fact that this property was lying idle, and they wished to utilize it. They tore down the walls, rooted up the grass, and cut down the pear-trees. Then they proceeded to move the cemetery. The bones they dug up were heaped in one corner, and for a month the children alternately grieved over the loss of their pear-tree, and played ball with skulls, and some of the older lads went so far as to be guilty of the very poor jest of one night hanging tibias and femurs on all the door-bells in the town. There was a constant repetition of this scandal, of which Plassans still preserved the tradition, until the bones were thrown, all together, in a great ditch in the new cemetery.

But in the provinces such labors are executed with strange slowness, and the inhabitants for many days were regaled with the sight of a huge cart, transporting human remains as if they had been loads of plaster.

This cart traversed the length of Plassans, and the wretched cobble-stones of the streets jostled out bits of bone and handfuls of rich earth all along the road. Not the smallest religious ceremony took place. It was merely a slow and brutal cartage through an insensible town.

For many years this ancient cemetery was looked upon with horror. Open to all comers on the side of a great highway, it was soon again overgrown with wild flowers and grass. The town had expected to sell it and to see houses erected upon it, but they found themselves mistaken—the remembrance of the carts laden with human bones weighed like a nightmare on the people; or it may have been simply the indolence of the provincial, and the reluctance they always feel in undertaking new enterprises. At all events, the town kept the land, and, after a time, seemed to lose the desire to sell it.

The authorities did not even fence it in. Any one entered it who pleased, and by degrees all the inhabitants of Plassans became accustomed to this empty corner—wore narrow paths across it, and sat on the grassy banks. When the paths were well defined, and the beaten earth was gray and hard, the old cemetery looked like a public square badly cared for and neglected.

For more than thirty years Saint-Mittre has had a most peculiar appearance. The town, too indifferent and sleepy, finally let the land for an absurdly small rental as a lumber-yard. At this very day huge beams lie here and there on the ground like broken columns, and are a perpetual joy to the children, who clamber over them with unweary activity, and play there the livelong day.

Another thing which gives to this spot a character of its own is, that all birds of passage, all wandering Bohemians, establish themselves there. As soon as one of those mansions on wheels, containing an entire tribe, reaches Plassans, they settle themselves on the area of ground known as Saint-Mittre. The place is rarely empty; there is always some band of wild, fantastic-looking people—tawny men, withered women, and beautiful children, living a strange out-of-door life—boiling their pots in the open air, eating nameless things, washing and drying their ragged garments, quarrelling and fighting—dirty and poor.

The old burial-ground, where once the bees buzzed around the gaudy flowers in the glaring sunlight, has thus become a noisy spot, resounding with the sharp voices of children and the quarrels of the wandering Bohemians. A saw-mill of primitive construction in a sheltered corner served as bass to the sharper tones, and for hours two men worked it with the regularity of machines.

From the old tombs, warmed by the hot suns, rose damp odors, and in all the country about Plassans there was not a place so quiet, so peaceful, and so solitary.

One Sunday evening, about seven o'clock, a young man passed, entered Saint-Mittre, keeping close to the wall, and emerged near the saw-mill. It was early in December, 1851, and excessively cold. The moon was at the full, and had the excessive brilliancy peculiar to winter; the saw-mill lay silent and motionless, flooded in this white light.

The young man stood still for a few moments, and looked about him doubtfully. He held, half-hidden by his overcoat, a musket, whose muzzle, turned toward the ground, glittered in the rays of the moon. He pressed the musket close to his breast, while he intently examined, one after the other, the black shadows projected by the piles of timber. They were almost like a checker-board in their regularity.

In the centre, on a bit of bare and level ground, stood the saw-mill, like some monstrous geometrical figure roughly drawn with ink on paper. The beams and logs—in this wintry moon, in this frozen stillness—had more than a vague suggestion of the dead in the old cemetery.

The young man looked about him. Not a human being was to be seen. The solitude appeared absolute. Several dark shadows in the distance disturbed him, however; but, after another investigation, he hastily crossed the lumber yard and reached the alley running along the wall. There his feet made no sound as they trod the frozen grass. He seemed more at ease, and no longer appeared to fear any danger. He ceased to conceal his musket. The moon, shining between piles of boards, lay in strips of light at his feet. All—light and shadow alike—was buried in profound slumber, sweet and sad.

Nothing could be imagined more peaceful than this path. The young man traversed its whole length. At the extreme end, where the walls of Jas-Meiffren make an angle, he stood still and listened, as if for some sound from the next grounds.

Then, hearing nothing, he stooped, thrust aside a board, and hid his gun amid the pile of timber. In this corner an old tomb, that had been forgotten in the days when the cemetery had been moved, made a comfortable seat. Rain had worn away the edges, and moss and lichens were slowly invading it. But in the moonlight the remains of an epitaph engraven on the face of the tomb were to be seen:

"Cy—gist—Marie—morte—"

Time had effaced all else.

When he had concealed his gun the young man, listening, but still hearing nothing, stepped upon the tomb. The wall was low, and he stood leaning upon it. Beyond the row of mulberries he saw only a plain of light. The Jas-Meiffren estate, flat and treeless, extended under the moon like a huge web of unbleached linen, while, a couple of hundred yards away, the house and its outbuildings lay in silent whiteness.

The young man fixed his eyes on this last with evident anxiety. The village clock struck seven, slowly and solemnly. He counted each stroke, and stepped down from the stone with an air of mingled surprise and relief, and took his seat with the air of a man resigned to a long period of waiting. He did not seem to feel the cold. For a half hour he sat motionless, with eyes fixed as if dreaming. He had taken his seat in a dark corner, but as the moon rose higher it touched his head and brought out each feature of his face.

He was not more than seventeen, and wonderfully handsome, of vigorous build, with an expressive mouth, and the delicate skin and coloring of his years. His face was thin and long, and chiseled as by some powerful sculptor. The high forehead, the arch of the eyebrows, the aquiline nose, the well-moulded chin, gave to the whole head a singular vigor, which as years went on might become too pronounced; but at this hour of puberty the sharpness of outline was softened by the down on cheek and chin, and by a vague childishness of expression. The eyes were velvety black, and very gentle in expression, imparting sweetness to this energetic physiognomy. All women might not be attracted by this youth, for he was far from what is usually called a handsome fellow; but his face was so full of energy, so sympathetic and strong, that the girls of his province—those warm-blooded southern girls—dreamed of him whenever they had seen him pass their door on July evenings.

He sat, musing, on the tombstone, unheeding the moonlight now shining full upon him. He was of medium height, and somewhat squarely built. His arms were muscular, and his hands were those of a workman already hardened by labor. His feet, encased in stout leather shoes, looked large and strong. All these members, and even his listless manner of sitting, indicated that he belonged to the people; but the carriage of his head, the flash in his eyes, told a clever observer that he revolted against the stultifying manual labor which was already beginning to round his shoulders. His mind was quick and intelligent, but weighed down by his race and his class; one of those exquisitely tender natures that suffer in not being able to cast aside their outer husk. Thus, in spite of his real strength of character, he seemed timid and uneasy—ashamed of his own incompleteness, but not knowing in what way to finish himself, if we may be allowed the expression.

He was a brave fellow—ignorant and enthusiastic—a manly heart guided by boyish reasoning abilities—self-sacrificing as a woman, and courageous as a hero.

He was dressed in pantaloons and jacket of ribbed velveteen. A soft felt hat, pulled down a little in front, threw a light shadow over his brow.

When the half-hour struck from the neighboring clock he started. Discovering that he was bathed in the full light of the moon, he looked anxiously about him, and with a sudden movement retreated into the shadow; but his train of thought was hopelessly lost; he realized that his feet and hands were like ice, and became impatient. Again he stood upon the tombstone and scrutinized the Jas-Meiffren estate, where all was silent and vacant. Then, not knowing what to do to kill time, he descended, took up his gun once more from amid the pile of boards, and amused himself with that.

This gun was a long and heavy carbine, which had doubtless belonged to some smuggler. By the thickness of the butt end, and the dimensions of the barrel, it was easy to see that it had once carried stones, and had since been altered by some country blacksmith.

The youth ran his hand up and down his gun caressingly, put his finger into the barrel and examined it carefully; by degrees becoming fired by youthful enthusiasm, in which there was a touch of childishness, he shouldered the gun, and stood like a conscript going through his first drill.

The clock was on the stroke of eight. He stood thus for several minutes, when all at once a voice, soft and low as a sigh, came from Jas-Meiffren:

"Are you there, Silvère?" asked the voice.

Silvère dropped his gun, and leaped upon the flat tomb. "Yes," he replied, in a voice that was equally low; "wait a moment; I will help you."

A young girl's head appeared above the wall. The child, with singular agility, had climbed like a cat into the trunk of a mulberry-tree. By the rapidity and ease of her movements it was easy to see that this strange path was not new to her.

In the twinkling of an eye she was seated upon the edge of the wall. Then Silvère lifted her in his arms, and placed her on the turf; but she resisted.

"Let me be!" she said, with the air of a child playing some romping game; "let me be; I can get down myself."

Then, when she stood fairly on her feet, she continued: "You have been waiting for me a long time, have you not? I ran so fast that I am entirely out of breath."

Silvère did not reply; he seemed in no laughing mood. He took his seat by her side, saying, gravely: "I wanted to see you, Miette, and would have waited all night for you. I leave to-morrow morning at daybreak."

Miette saw the gun lying on the frozen grass. She, in her turn, grew very grave, and murmured: "Ah! you have decided then; and there is your gun."

Then came a long silence.

"Yes," answered Silvère, in a trembling voice, "that's my gun. I preferred to leave the house to-night. To-morrow morning Aunt Dide might have seen me take it, and that would have worried her. I intend to hide it somewhere here, and come for it just as we start."

As Miette seemed unable to take her eyes from this gun, which he so foolishly left full in sight, he took it up, and slipped it again among the boards.

"We learned this morning," he said, as he seated himself again, "that the insurgents of La Palud and of Saint-Martin-de-Vaulx were on the march, and that they spent last night at Amboise. It has been decided that we shall join them there. This afternoon a band of workmen from Plassans left the town; to-morrow all the others join their brothers."

He uttered the word "brothers" with boyish emphasis. Then, with increasing animation, he continued:

"The conflict is inevitable; but right is on our side, and we shall triumph."

Miette listened to Silvère, looking before her with wide-opened, unseeing eyes. When he ceased speaking, she said: "It is well."

And at the end of a moment she added:

"You told me so; but I hoped—I could not but hope. But now it is decided."

They could say no more. This quiet spot breathed the most intense melancholy. The only moving things were the shadows thrown by the swaying branches of the mulberry-trees over the moonlight which flooded the grass. The group formed by the two young persons on the tombstone was as if sculptured from marble.

Silvère slipped his arm around Miette's waist, and she leaned against his shoulder. They exchanged no kisses. She gently submitted to his brotherly embrace.

Miette was wrapped in an ample brown cloak with a hood. This garment fell to her feet, and enveloped her entirely, so that only her head and hands emerged.

The women of the people—peasants and work-women—still wear in Provence these large mantles, which they call pelisses, and the fashion of which dates from time immemorial.

Miette had thrown her hood back. She lived out of doors, and never wore a hat or cap. Her well-shaped head stood out against the wall, whitened by the moon. She was a child, but a child who was soon to become a woman. She was just at that charming hour of indecision when the frolicsome child is transformed into the girl.

At that time there is always with all adolescents the delicacy of an opening bud—the full, voluptuous lines of womanhood are indicated in the slender, childish form. Some girls at this period develop too hastily; they grow tall and thin, like weeds or unhealthy plants.

But for Miette—for all those who are rich in blood and who live an out-of-door life—it is an hour of grace and sweetness which is never theirs again. Miette was thirteen, and though tall and well-grown, no one would have thought her older, so radiant was her face with childish gayety.

Thanks to the climate and to the healthy life she led, she was rapidly becoming a woman. She was almost as tall as Silvère, and like him would not have been called beautiful by the majority of people. No one could have thought her ugly; but she was odd in her appearance, and totally unlike most young girls.

Her black hair was superb, growing in heavy masses over her brow, and falling in rippling waves upon her shoulders. It was so thick that she did not know what to do with it. She twisted it in several coils, each as large as a child's arm, and massed these coils at the back of her head.

She had little time to think of her coiffure, and it often happened that this enormous chignon, hastily made without a mirror, had a certain classic grace.

Seeing her with this mass of hair, and the short curls on her forehead and on her neck, it was easy to see why she always went bareheaded—unheeding rain and cold.

Her low forehead, her large, somewhat prominent eyes, her short nose, with wide, expanded nostrils, the somewhat full but scarlet lips, might have seemed defects taken one by one. But in the pretty round face, each detail formed an ensemble of remarkable beauty. When Miette laughed, throwing her head back, and leaning a little toward the right, she resembled an antique Bacchante, with her firm, full throat, her cheeks rounded like a child's, her beautiful white teeth, and her massive hair, while her face, bronzed by the sun, had on certain days and in certain lights almost a soft amber tint.

A fine black down gave a light shadow to her upper lip. Manual toil had begun to deform her little hands, which would have been, had they remained idle, adorable and dimpled.

Miette and Silvère sat for a long time in silence. They contemplated the unknown future, and, in their fear and dread of the morrow, they pressed closer to each other. Both fully realized the uselessness and cruelty of any audible complaint, but the girl was the first to speak, and in one phrase revealed their mutual and paramount anxiety.

"You will come back?" she murmured, with her arms around Silvère's neck.

Silvère, not daring to reply lest he should weep with her, kissed her on her cheek in a brotherly sort of way. They then relapsed into silence.

Miette shivered. She was no longer leaning against Silvère's shoulder, and felt excessively cold—colder than ever before in this deserted spot, where she and her friend had spent so many peaceful hours.

"I am cold," she said, drawing up the hood of her pelisse. "Shall we walk?" asked the young man. "It is not yet nine o'clock."

Miette remembered, with a pang, that this was the last of the evenings for which she lived through long weary days.

"Yes; let us walk," she replied. "Let us go as far as the mill; I can stay with you to-night as long as you choose."

They left their seat, and stood in the shadow of a pile of boards. Miette opened her pelisse, which was quilted in small squares and lined with scarlet cotton, and threw one end of this full, warm mantle over Silvère's shoulders, wrapping him as well as herself in the same garment. They each passed an arm around the other. When they were thus confounded, as it were, and had drawn the pelisse around them so that they were one shapeless mass, they began to walk slowly toward the road, no longer afraid of being recognized in the clear moonlight. Miette had wrapped Silvère in her cloak, and he had submitted to her doing so—in a matter-of-course way, as if the pelisse had often before rendered them the same service.

The road from Nice, on the two sides of which extended the Faubourg, was bordered in 1851 with century-old elms—huge giants, half-decayed, but too full of vigor to be then replaced, as was the case by the city authorities not long since, by small plane-trees.

When Silvère and Miette reached these trees—the shadow of whose monstrous branches was thrown all along the sidewalk—they met several black figures moving silently in the shadow of the bouses. These were lovers wrapped in one mantle like themselves.

This fashion of walking is peculiar to these towns in the south. The young men and girls, belonging to the people—those who intend to marry each other some day, and who wish to see each other and exchange a few kisses previously—are often at a loss how to do so. Were they to meet in a room they would soon be the talk of the town. Nor have they time in the evening to fly to the solitude of the country.

They have, therefore, adopted a third plan: they wander through the Faubourg, the vacant lots, the winding lanes—all the places where there are few people to be met; and, as all the inhabitants know them, it is considered advisable to make themselves unrecognizable, and so wear those huge mantles which will shelter an entire family. Parents make no objection to these walks; the rigid morals of the provinces do not seem to be alarmed by them, for it is distinctly understood that the lovers never seat themselves, nor linger in any of the corners.

Nothing can be more charming than these lovers' walks, nor more characteristic of the south. They are absolute masquerades, full of expedients within the reach of the poorest. The girl has but to open her mantle, which is an ever-ready asylum and concealment for her lover. She hides him next her heart, as the little bourgeoisie hides her gallant under her bed or in her wardrobe. Forbidden fruit has here an especially delicious flavor: it is eaten in the open air amid indifferent spectators. The certainty of being able to embrace each other with impunity before the world, to spend whole evenings in each other's arms without any risk of being recognized, or of having the finger of scorn pointed at them, is especially precious. One couple is a brown mass precisely like the next, without the smallest individuality. To the belated passer-by, who catches a fleeting glimpse of these moving shadows, it is simply Love that passes—nothing more. Love without a name! Love that one guesses at, rather than sees.

The lovers feel themselves, as it were, at home. They talk in lowered voices, and oftener walk for hours in silence, happy in being wrapped in the same folds of cloth.

This is at once voluptuous and innocent. The climate is the only guilty party, for it invites lovers to an out-of-door life. On lovely summer evenings no one can walk through Plassans without discovering in each sequestered alley or sheltered corner a hooded couple. Certain places—Saint-Mittre especially—are peopled with dark dominos, loitering slowly along in the sweet dewy silence. They are like the guests of some mysterious ball given by the stars. When it is too warm for pelisses, the girls turn their upper skirts over their heads; while in winter they laugh at frosts and chills. And Miette and Silvère walked on the road to Nice without remembering that it was December.

The young people crossed the sleeping Faubourg without exchanging a word. They were absorbed in the charm of their proximity to each other. Their hearts were very heavy, for their parting was near at hand, and the present moments were at once bitter and sweet.

Very soon the houses became more scattered. They had reached the end of the Faubourg, on which opened the avenue of Jas-Meiffren—protected by a huge gate, between the bars of which could be seen a long row of mulberry-trees.

After leaving Jas-Meiffren the highway descends gently to the valley, which serves as a bed for a little river—the Viorne—which is a brook in summer and a torrent in winter.

On this December night the land, freshly turned over, lay gray and dark in the moonlight, while the rush of the Viorne was all the sound that disturbed the great peace of the country.

Miette's thoughts returned to Jas-Meiffren, which they had just passed.

"I had great difficulty in making my escape to-night," she said. "My uncle was shut up in his cellar, where I think he was burying his silver, for he seemed terribly frightened this morning at what he heard."

Silvère held the girl with a firmer grasp.

"Keep up your courage," he said. "The day will come when we can see each other at all times and seasons."

"Ah!" murmured the girl, sadly, "you are more courageous than I. Some days I am very sad. It is not that I am dismayed by the hard work that is imposed upon me. On the contrary, I am sometimes glad that my uncle is so stern. He was right to bring me up as a peasant girl. Sometimes I believe myself to be accursed, and then I wish I were dead. I think of—you know what I think of."

The child's voice broke here, and she sobbed convulsively. Silvère interrupted her hastily—almost harshly:

"Hush!" he said; "you promised never to think of that. It was not your crime."

Then he added, in a gentler tone: "We love each other, do we not? When we are married you will never be unhappy."

"I know," murmured Miette, "that you are good, and that you will help me. But I am afraid, and at times even rebellious. It seems to me that a great wrong has been committed toward myself, and then I feel wicked. I can speak openly and frankly to you. Each time that my father's name is uttered, I feel myself grow hot all over. When I pass the children in the street, and they call out after me, 'There goes the Chantegreil!' I am furious, and would like to beat them."

She relapsed into gloomy silence, which she broke with these words:

"You are a man—you own a gun and can use it! You ought to be very thankful."

Silvère allowed her to speak without interruption, and then said, in a sad voice:

"You are wrong, Miette; your anger is unworthy of you. You should not rebel against justice. I am going to fight, it is true, but I have no private vengeance to gratify."

"Do you think I am happier than yourself? If my grandmother had not brought me up what would have become of me? With the exception of Uncle Antoine, who is a working-man like myself, and from whom I have learned to love the republic, all my other relatives act as if I were a disgrace to them, and look away when I pass them."

He became excited as he spoke; he stood still in the middle of the highway.

"God is my witness," he continued, "that I neither envy nor hate a human being. But, if we triumph, it may come to pass that I shall have some truths to tell to these fine gentlemen. Uncle Antoine knows all. You will see when we return. We will then live free and happy!"

Miette drew him gently on. They resumed their walk. "You love your republic very dearly," said the child, with a piteous effort at a jest; "do you love me as much?"

She laughed, but with some little bitterness. Perhaps she thought that Silvère found it too easy to leave her.

The youth replied, gravely:

"You are my wife. I have given you my whole heart. I love the republic—you see—because I love you. When we are married it will bring us much happiness, and it is to secure this happiness that I am going away to-morrow. You do not advise me to stay at home, do you?"

"By no means," answered the girl, eagerly; "a man should be courageous—courage is a splendid thing. Forgive me for being jealous. Would that I were as strong as you; you would love me more then, I am sure!"

She was silent for a moment, and then added, with artless innocence:

"Ah! how gladly, how eagerly will I embrace you when you return."

These words touched Silvère profoundly. He took Miette in his arms and kissed her cheek. The girl struggled a little, with a faint laugh, but tears were in her eyes. The country was spread before them, cold and cheerless. On the left, upon a slight elevation, stood the ruins of a wind-mill. This was the point which the young people had fixed on as the limit of their walk. They had moved on, with hardly a glance to the right or the left. But when Silvère had kissed Miette, he looked around and saw the wind-mill.

"I had no idea we had come so far," he said. "It must be half-past nine; we must return."

Miette made a wry face.

"Let us go a little further," she urged. "Only a few steps. Come—"

Silvère put his arm around her waist with a smile, and they moved slowly on. They no longer feared observation, for, since passing the last houses, they had not met a living soul; nevertheless, they were still enveloped in the pelisse. This pelisse seemed their natural nest—it had sheltered and hidden them for so many happy evenings. The soft folds reassured them, and narrowed the horizon at which they looked, relieving them from that sensation of isolation which weighs down human nature so often when a wide extent of field and sky is seen.

It seemed to them that they carried their house with them, enjoying the landscape as through a window.

They ceased to talk; they held each other's hands, and uttered an occasional exclamation. Silvère forgot his republican enthusiasm. Miette thought of nothing except that her lover was to leave her in an hour for a long time—perhaps forever. They still moved on, and reached the little path which led from the highway to a village on the banks of the Viorne. They did not stop, although this was the spot where they had determined to turn back. They pretended not to see this path, and it was several minutes before Silvère said: "It is late, and you must be tired."

"No, I am not tired. I could walk leagues with you in this way," answered the girl; and then, in a coaxing voice, she added: "Can we not go to Saint-Claire? Then we will certainly turn."

Silvère, lulled by their measured pace, slept with his eyes open, and made no objection. They walked on at a slower pace than before, putting off the evil moment when they must turn their faces homeward; for this was the signal of their cruel separation. The slope of the road was very gradual. The valley is an extent of meadow land, running to the Viorne along low hills, called the Saint-Claire meadows. "We will go as far as the bridge," now said Silvère.

Miette laughed gayly, and threw her arms around her lover's neck with a hearty kiss.

The long avenue of trees led just where the hedge begins, and two enormous elms stood a little apart from the others. From this point to the bridge was less than four hundred yards, but the lovers took more than fifteen minutes to walk this distance. In spite, however, of all their tardy movements, the bridge was reached at last. There they stopped. Miette and Silvère had walked a good league. They looked down as they leaned over the bridge. The Viorne, swollen by the recent rains, ran swiftly past with a dull, continuous roar. Up and down the banks they could see the black lines of trees. Here and there a ripple caught the moonlight, and looked like the glittering scales of some monstrous fish. The young lovers knew this place well, for on warm July evenings they had often come there in search of cool breezes, and spent hour after hour among the willows on the left bank.

Miette looked longingly toward the opposite shore. "If it were only warmer," she said, "we could rest there a while." Then, with her eyes still fixed on the place she had learned to love so well, she added: "Do you see that dark spot, Silvère? That is the place we sat on last Corpus Christi."

"Yes; I remember," answered Silvère, in a low voice.

It was there he first ventured to kiss her on the cheek, and this remembrance, gave them both pain and pleasure. They saw, as by a flash of lightning, the happy evenings they had spent together. And even as they dwelt on the Past, they thought of the unknown Future; they saw themselves walking side by side through life as they had walked on the highway—wrapped in the folds of the same pelisse.

Then, eyes looking into eyes, they smiled.

Suddenly Silvère lifted his head, and throwing back the pelisse he listened intently. Miette, much surprised, imitated him, without understanding why.

They heard a confused noise among the hills amid which wound the road to Nice. It was the rattle of many wheels and wagons. The roar of the river drowned this noise for a time. But it soon grew more distinct, and the heavy tread of a body of troops was distinguished. Suddenly a black mass emerged from among them, and the "Marseillaise" burst forth, sung with inconceivable and formidable fury.

"It is they!" cried Silvère, enthusiastically.

He began to run, dragging Miette with him, until he reached a slight eminence crowned by a clump of young oaks, upon which the two climbed.

The young girl, when they were safe in this spot, looked sadly down on these men, whose distant voices had been enough to tear her lover from her arms. It seemed to her as if the whole body of troops was now between her and him. They were so happy only a few moments before—so closely united—so alone in the soft moonlight; and now Silvère did not even seem to know that she was there.

The band swept on. Nothing could be imagined more superb than the irruption of this mass of men on the dead and frozen peace of the scene. The highway was a living, rolling torrent, that seemed exhaustless, and the air was full of the voices of this human tempest. When the last battalions appeared, the "Marseillaise" filled the sky and echoed through the valley. The whole country shivered, as it were, and repeated the notes of the national hymn. The very trees and bushes joined in the chorus, and the wide valley seemed peopled with invisible crowds who joined in the chorus of the insurgents—all along the Viorne, in every mysterious shadow, hidden voices caught up the refrain with indignant anger. The whole country clamored for vengeance and liberty! While the little army descended the hill-side, they continued to sing until the very stones under their feet reverberated.

Silvère, pale with emotion, listened and looked.

"I thought," murmured Miette, "that they would not go through Plassans."

"The plan has been changed," answered Silvère. "We were to have marched by the Toulon road, leaving Plassans and Orières on the left. They left Alboise this afternoon, and must have passed Tulettes in the evening."

The head of the column had by this time reached the young people, and the small army was characterized by more order than one would expect in a band of undisciplined men. The quotas from each town formed distinct battalions, and must have numbered some three thousand men.

As they defiled past Miette, she instinctively drew closer to Silvère, and leaned her head against his shoulder. Her face, framed by the hood of her pelisse, was very pale, and her eyes were fixed on this rapidly moving crowd and on the strange faces transfigured by enthusiasm, whose mouths were filled with the avenging cry of the "Marseillaise."

Silvère, feeling her tremble at his side, leaned over her and whispered in her ear the names of the various contingents as they presented themselves.

The column marched in lines of eight. In front came tall fellows with square heads, who looked as strong as Hercules. The republic had in them blind and intrepid advocates. They carried over their shoulders huge axes freshly sharpened, whose steel glittered in the moonlight.

"Those are the wood-cutters from the forests of La Seille," said Silvère. "They have formed themselves into a body of sappers. Upon a sign from their chiefs, these men will hew down the gates of every town between here and Paris, just as they would the old cork-trees on the mountain sides."

Behind the wood-cutters came a band of workmen, with heavy beards browned by the sun. "The contingents from La Palud, which was the first bourg to rise," whispered Silvère. "Those in the velvet jackets are the charcoal-burners from the mountain gorges. Those huntsmen there knew your father, Miette. They have good arms, which they know how to use. Ah! if all had as good; but the workmen, you see, have only clubs."

Miette did not reply. When Silvère spoke of her father, her cheeks flushed angrily, and she watched the men with a feeling of strange sympathy. From this moment she seemed feverishly excited by the words and music sung by the insurgents.

The column swept on, as if blown by the mistral. To the people from Palud had succeeded more workmen in blouses, among whom many bourgeois in coats were to be seen.

"Those are the men from Saint-Martin-de-Vaulx," resumed Silvère. "That bourg was the next to rise after La Palud. The masters joined their workmen. They are rich men, Miette—men who could live comfortably at home, and who yet risk their lives in the defense of liberty. Look, Miette! those men who have a red scarf tied around their left arms are the chiefs."

"And here come the insurgents from Alboise and Tulettes! I see Burgat, the blacksmith. How fast they go!"

Miette leaned forward, choked with emotion. At this moment a battalion better drilled and better disciplined than the others came in sight. There was a suggestion of a uniform in their blue blouses and red scarfs around their waists. In the centre was a man on horseback, having a sabre at his side. The greater number of these soldiers had guns or old muskets, once belonging to the National Guard.

"I do not know who those are," said Silvère. "The man on horseback must be the chief of whom I have heard, and he has gathered up his men from various places."

Behind this battalion came groups of ten or twenty—all wearing the short jackets of the peasants. They brandished pitchforks and scythes as they sang; some even carried shovels. Each hamlet had sent its men.

Silvère named them with feverish excitement.

"The contingents from Chavanoz," he said. "There are only a few of them, but they are strong fellows. Uncle Antoine has told me all about them. And look! there is the curé. I heard he was a good Republican!"

"Look, Miette," he continued, in feverish haste; "Rosan! Vernoux, Corbière, Saint-Eutrope—ah! child, the whole country is with us! Look at those men. Look at their arms—they are as hard and black as iron! Here come the smugglers from Roches-Noires! More scythes and pitchforks—more men from the country! Sainte-Anne! Castel-le-Vieux! Estourmel! Murdaran!"

His voice was strangled in his throat by emotion. His form seemed to expand, as with eager face and nervous gesture he pointed out these people to Miette, who still clung to his neck as she leaned over the road. This mass of wild faces—these boys and old men in their strange garbs and stranger weapons—affected the girl like an impetuous mountain torrent. It seemed to her sometimes as if they no longer moved, as if they had been run over by the "Marseillaise" itself, by that hoarse melody with its formidable echoes. She could not distinguish the words; she heard only the continuous roar, the vibrating notes—sharp as arrows, that seemed to pierce her very flesh.

This tumult of revolt—this appeal to Conquest and Death, with its bursts of anger, its burning longing for liberty, its marvelous mixture of massacres and enthusiasm—woke strange echoes in her heart, which swelled with the voluptuous anguish of a virgin martyr who smiles under the lash.

Miette was a mere child. She had turned pale at the approach of the multitude, and wept at its coming between her and her lover. But she was courageous and of an ardent nature, easily fired into enthusiasm. She was quite ready now to snatch a gun and follow the insurgents. Her white teeth looked larger and sharper between her red lips, suggesting the fangs and the eagerness of a young wolf.

As she heard Silvère hurriedly name the contingents, it seemed to her that they moved more rapidly with each word he uttered. She grew dizzy as she watched this crowd, swept on as it were by a tempest. She closed her eyes, and hot tears rolled down her cheeks.

Tears also stood in Silvère's eyes.

"I do not see one of the men who left Plassans this afternoon," he murmured.

He turned to find the end of the column, still in the shadow. Suddenly he cried out, with triumphant joy:

"There they are! They have the flag! The flag has been entrusted to them!"

He seemed eager to join the insurgents, but at this moment the troops stopped. Orders ran along the column. The "Marseillaise" died away, and only the confused murmur of the crowd was heard.

"Do you think a man can run a circus and be a Christian?" asked the serious man. "Well, I don't know—yes." "Do you think Barnum, for instance, can go to heaven?" "I think he has a good show," was the rather equivocal reply.

Death-bed remark of an economical man:

"I have never smoked in my life; where, oh, where is the money I have saved on my cigars?"

OUR OWN POETS.

A Thought.

My friend and I sat down at lunch,
Our spirits gay, though minus punch;
The fruit as luscious, tempting pile
As ever grew on Indian isle.

I said to Gus: "We'll now divide
These pears, and eat the sunny side;
But cast the shady side away—
The shadow doth the soul dismay."

"If thou'rt my friend," he quick replied,
"Life's shade and sunshine both divide,
And each take half, for sweetness cloys—
Even gold itself requires alloys."

MARYSVILLE, June, 1880.

O. G.

In the Month of June.

Such a wealth of bird and bee and blossom,
Such a gleam of butterfly and brook,
Amethystine sky and dreamy mountain,
Grassy slope and willow-bowered nook.
Flowers look up to greet the sweet sky's blueness,
Birds fly down to kiss the dewy green,
Up and down, around, across and over,
Trails the summer robe of nature's queen.

Hints of new-mown hay float down the hillside,
Sweet wild roses light the thicket-gloom,
Wind-waves sweep with swift and fairy lightness
O'er the tranquil fields of emerald bloom;
Up the cool ravines the wild-dove's cooing
Mingles with the sighing of the breeze,
Far across the plain the landscape glimmers,
Through the leafy vistas of the trees.

Trailing berry vines and ivy creepers
Deck the dusty road in gay attire,
Blue-bells ring a merry chime of summer,
Scarlet-runners set the woods on fire;
While above the scene, in lofty grandeur,
Mount Diablo stands in deathly calm,
And, while yet I gaze, a something thrills me—
Nature chanting one melodious psalm.

At the Coffin of Our First-Born.

From the German.

These six small boards, a pillow at thy head,
A wreath of flowers, a sheet as white as snow,
Is all, my child, that forms thy little bed;
Alas, my son, and must I think this so?

My darling son is dead, to be no more,
And never more with babbling words shall come
To meet me, laughing, at the open door,
Or break the silence of an empty home.

In all my dreams there was a place for thee;
In all my plans the faith of parent's love;
And every hope in life was dear to me,
Or future good I thought thee worthy of.

"He's gone forever!" say the bitter tears
I now feel coursing down my fevered face;
And gone the hopes and dreams of coming years,
Yea, all enclosed within this little space.

And you too, kneeling there, once loving bride,
Arise—before this coffin let us stand;
Come take the place you once held at my side,
That I, as then, may clasp your cherished hand.

As, happy once, we at the altar stood,
To be through life in joy and sorrow true,
And one to be, through evil and through good;
So let us here the vows of then renew.

And here, alone, within our silent home,
No two have ever stood in bolier place,
Or has a deeper language ever come
From lips of priest than speaks this silent face.

Indeed, here are the tapers and the flowers,
And here as altar stands our dead child's shrine.
Let us recall the vows that then were ours:
"My sorrows shall be yours, and yours be mine."

Farewell, my son—one more—ah me! 'tis so!
But mother, see—how peacefully he sleeps.
Come take the parting kiss, the last below—
Poor heart! she loves the child—she stays and weeps.

Love's Subterfuge.

As the scared bird—in striving hard to hide
The tiny nest that holds her little brood
From rash intruders on the solitude
Where dwell her unfledged songsters, open-eyed—
Even as she, fluttering from side to side,
With feint of wounds, and falls oftentimes renewed,
Still points the place of her solicitude
By now and then returning to its side—
So Love would seek to throw us off the scent
By subtle feints of coldness, well assumed
To blind our eyes to his objective goal;
But watch him well—in spite of blandishment
Straight to his mate his course will be resumed,
Unerring as the needle to the pole.

To Ianthé.

Two gems, let fall by hands from Paradise,
In the clear East amid an age agone
Shone out as stars alone in God's own skies,
As broke the world in splendor into dawn.

Made by the mighty angels passing sweet,
Their tender gaze for earth too perfect seemed,
Till jealous genii, with swift flying feet,
Tore them from out the casket where they gleamed.

The saddened world no more their radiance knew;
Until the gods, in answer to our cries,
Have brought them back from skies of distant blue,
To gleam and burn within your slumberous eyes.

SENSE AND SENTIMENT.

Bulwer: Saint Anthony has shown that women, however angelic, are not precisely that order of angels that saints may safely commune with.

Anon: The grand essentials to happiness are something to do, something to love, and something to hope for.

Helvetius: The men of sense—those idols of the shallow—are very inferior to the men of passions. It is the strong passions which, rescuing us from sloth, can alone impart to us that continuous and earnest attention necessary to great intellectual efforts.

Anon:

Where'er a hatchment we discern,
A truth before ne'er started,
The motto makes us surely learn
The sex of the departed.
If 'tis the husband sleeps, he deems
Death's day a felix dies—
Of unaccustomed quiet dreams,
And cries: "In celo quies."
But if the wife—she from the tomb
Wounds, Parthian-like, post tergum,
Hints to her spouse his future doom,
And, threatening, cries "Resurgam!"

Dr. Latimer: The great merit of philosophy, when we can not command circumstances, is to reconcile us to them.

Bulwer: He knows little of the human heart who imagines we can not do a good action; but, alas! he knows still less of it who supposes that we can always be doing good actions.

Helvetius: We resemble those vessels which the waves still carry toward the south when the north wind has ceased to blow.

Cowley: We expose our life to a quotidian of frigid impertinence which would make a wise man tremble to think of.

Chateaubriand: If it be true that no one is a prophet in his own country, it is also true that no one is well appreciated but in his own country.

Lord Shaftsbury: There is a great difference between seeking to raise a laugh from everything, and seeking in everything what justly may be laughed at.

Rousseau: It is not permitted us to degrade one single soul for the sake of conferring advantage on others, nor to make a rogue for the good of the honest.

Ouida: There is no shame more bitter to endure than to despise one's self.

Bulwer: Repose is the poorest of all delusions; the very act of recurring brings about us all those ills of self from which, in the turmoil of the world, we can escape.

Madame de Rémusat: Success is easy to the powerful; they must needs be very ill-natured or very blundering when they fail to please.

Empedocles: All philosophical and religious systems must be unreliable, because we have no system by which to test them.

Xenophanes: It is impossible for us to be certain, even when we utter the truth.

Draper: Forms of government have very little influence on the population, but policy may control it completely.

Bolingbroke: The priests remind me of the muses of Jupiter: they make a great clamor in order to drown the voice of their god.

W. Reade: Such is the imperfection of human nature that extreme love is counterbalanced by extreme hate; every virtue has its attendant vice, which is excited by the same stimulants, which is nourished by the same food.

JUNE, 1880.

TAC, M. P.

Thirteen hundred and forty immigrants arrived from Europe yesterday.—TEL., 15TH JUNE.

Let us enter a manorial village, in which an old nobility, strongly conservative and pious, and taking an active part in various benevolent societies, resides. Do you doubt that these hovels are inhabited? Let us enter one of them. The walls have partly fallen down, the roof is leaky all over, the broken windows are stuffed with rags, the woodwork is disjointed and threatens to fall down; but proceed, and don't mind stooping. The clay floor is frozen hard now, but it shows the footprints of softer times. It would be dark but for cracks in the wall, which admit snow and light. Is this smoke? No, it is steam coming out of the room. I open the door. The floor inside is of the same material as in the passage, with the difference of a few puddles. A ragged female figure comes toward us in the dense fog, followed by three or four half-naked and shaggy-headed urchins. She is not startled, but she stares at us. * * * "But, man, this is perishing! The white frost on the wall is finger thick." With the hoarse laugh of an idiot the man replies: "I have tried everywhere; have not found it better anywhere, but worse somewhere." The repair of the hovel is not his business.

It is enough to say that it contains facts which will warrant the conclusion of the medical officer of the Privy Council, Mr. Simon, that the state of the health of the peasantry is a disgrace to the civilization of England. Thus we find instances in which individuals of both sexes, children and adults to the number of ten or more, are huddled together within the precincts of one small room; we find families consisting of four adults and five children pent up in an apartment eleven feet by nine by six feet five inches at the highest point; the whole family having a less allowance of cubic space than is allotted to a single convict. We find fathers and mothers, young women with their hasty children, and young men, packed together within four narrow walls; while it is almost needless to add that the means of water supply, of ventilation, and of drainage are to be found at the lowest point of deficiency in these miserable one-roomed hovels.

The existing laborer is worse off than his predecessor at the time when Arthur Young described his circumstances about a hundred years since, but when his condition is contrasted with that of his ancestor five hundred years ago, the deterioration is still more striking. * Professor Rogers observes, with truth, an artisan may rise to be a master, a mechanic to be an engineer, a factory operative to be a capitalist; but no English agricultural laborer, in his most sanguine dreams, has the vision of occupying, still less of possessing, land! From the period of early manhood, when he comes into full play as a laborer, he may go on in the same unvaried round from week to week, from month to month, from year to year, without having made one step in advance, gained one inch of ground above the level he started from, until the time when, his strength exhausted by toil, and his earnings having yielded no provision for old age, he retires from the field upon a weekly pittance from the Union, the last stage between his life of labor and his rest in the churchyard. This may be thought a sombre picture of the English farm laborer; hut, making allowance for fortunate exceptions, it is not an overcharged one.

Of the conscription system you speak in terms of approbation. If your boy should live to be seventeen years of age; if you should have lived with more than common frugality to educate him handsomely; if he should be a fine, promising lad, of excellent habits, great application, correct deportment—your pride, your joy, your cheering prospect; and the conscription should come and take him, and if even money could not ease him, then, probably you would think differently of the system. Oh, that is a miserable consolation that he will come home at thirty-five or forty. Two-thirds perish, while those who reach the term continue, or had better continue, because they are afterward good for nothing else.

This state of affairs is rather binding on the operative. The law of supply and demand is a thing of beauty, indeed, but proves to be a joy only for a season. The demand arising in the operative's stomach does, indeed, go on forever, but his law of supply runs for only eleven years at one stretch. So he, too, comes to America, goes vigorously to work, and then vigorously on a strike; and if he possess "the gift o' the gab very gallopin'" it is not surprising he should turn out a Wellock, or air his gifts on a Sand-lot—to the confusion and loss and bedevilment of the great Yankee nation, that accords him the privilege. It is scarcely fair to blame Steinman and Wellock and Kearney, and such humbugs, for being what they are. They are not different from thousands and tens of thousands of their fellow-countrymen whom we have chosen, and still choose, to make fellow-citizens of our own. We can not hold them blameworthy for accepting the invitation that we ourselves extend. It has been contended in times past that a proffer of the suffrage was needful in order to induce immigration. We need only to turn our eyes and inspect the condition of these people at home, then ask if they need any inducement to come among us, beyond the assurance of food, and enough of it—enough and sumptuous in kind beyond their wildest dreams in the native cabin? The question answers itself.

The census of 1880 will, it is supposed, show a population in the United States of fifty millions—say forty-five million whites, and five million colored. To this number it is estimated that some four hundred thousand whites, mostly adult, may be added by immigration the current year—an increment, taking adults only into consideration, of about one and a half per cent. The rate of increase of our population independent of immigration is about two and a half per cent. per annum. That is to say, the natural rate of increase of the white population already in the country is double that of the present unprecedented immigration. As our population has doubled since 1850, an immigration of four hundred thousand now is equal, as a percentage, to one of two hundred thousand then. There are other points to bear in mind, some of which are rather effectively—not to say startlingly—put in the article "America," Encyclopædia Britannica, ninth edition, as follows:

Its amount in 1850 was.....	22,000,000
In 1875 it will be.....	44,000,000
In 1900 it will be.....	88,000,000
In 1925 it will be.....	176,000,000

A population of one hundred and seventy-six millions spread over the territory of the United States and Canada will only afford an average of forty persons to the square mile—about one-seventh of the density which England now exhibits, and could occasion no pressure. But let us suppose the rate of increase after 1925 to fall to two per cent., the period of doubling will then be thirty-five years.

In 1960 the number will be 352,000,000
In 1995 the number will be 704,000,000

Suppose the rate again to decline to one and a half per cent., which scarcely exceeds that of England and Prussia, the period of doubling will then be fifty years.

In 2045 the number will be.....	1,408,000,000
In 2095 the number will be.....	2,816,000,000

After some further discussion, our authority examines into the ability of the new world to sustain a population. The course of reasoning pursued appears to be a valid one—its data derived from experience. After rejecting from the total area a superficies of four million square miles, as not adapted to support life, he finds left a total of ten million square miles of useful soil—viz: “about four million square miles, each capable of supporting two hundred persons, and five million seven hundred thousand square miles, each capable of supporting four hundred and ninety persons. It follows that if the natural resources of America (both North and South) were fully developed, it would afford sustenance to three billion six hundred millions of inhabitants—a number nearly five times as great as the entire mass of human beings now existing upon the globe.”

Overwhelming as this generalization and its figures appear to be, they are demonstrably within, and perhaps far within, the mark. Without entering on any detail, it is enough to say that the recorded histories of Sicily, Granada, Asia Minor, and Syria prove that the soil of California alone, after deducting for its southern deserts and mountain areas, is capable of supporting all of thirty million human beings. We are, in fact, justified in assigning a higher figure.

Whatever opinion the Argonaut may entertain regarding the Sand-lot Mayor, it can not but do him the justice of admitting that in his message accompanying the signing of the water ordinance he has shown himself not only thoroughly informed of his subject but honestly disposed toward both the community and the corporation. His views on the question of the city paying its proper proportion of the water tax are so eminently sound, and so in keeping with what we have from time to time written on the subject, that we really feel encouraged in seeing our chief magistrate traveling—in one thing at least—in the right direction. Discussing the theory of the ordinance and reviewing the principles governing the regulation of rates, the Mayor says:

“With the conclusions I agree in the main, with the exception of the sixth : That the rates of the city should be so fixed and established as to yield about one-fourth of the revenue of the company, and that the payments made by the city should not increase the revenue of the company, but should be allowed upon existing rates to consumers, so as to reduce the same twenty-five per cent. I think the city should bear at least one-half of the annual cost of supplying water to San Francisco and its inhabitants, and that the rates of rate-payers should be correspondingly reduced. The rate-payers use water only for domestic purposes. The city uses and requires water not only for its public buildings, but also for protection against fire, flushing sewers, watering streets, and irrigating parks. It receives more than one-half the cost. The intention of the new Constitution was to do away with the discrimination in favor of property which existed under the old system, for it provides that the Board of Supervisors shall fix the rates of compensation to be paid by the city as well as its inhabitants. This was the general construction when the new Constitution was under discussion. Its justice has since been recognized by the community at large, and has been expressed in political clubs and conventions, and in party platforms. For these reasons I have been disposed to withhold my signature from the proposed ordinance, in the hope that your honorable board might reconsider the matter, and relieve rate-payers still further by compelling the city at large to assume its just proportion of the burden.

* * * * *

"In conclusion, permit me to express some views which may lead to a solution of the water question. This subject has been agitated for the past five years, and has resulted in injury to the city, as well as to the company. It is time that it was ended. It appears that the business of supplying water is hazardous in its nature, that it is subject to competition, contingencies, and risks, which entitle it to a liberal rate of interest. It is also apparent that the Spring Valley Works are, as the investigations of the past few years have demonstrated, and as Colonel Mendell terms them, the natural system of supply for San Francisco; that although other schemes are practicable, yet that it would cost, as Colonel Mendell shows, as much or more to supply from some other source what Spring Valley now supplies; that Spring Valley has sources of supply sufficient for 1,300,000 people, and that its supply can be increased with less expenditure than by these schemes. These are great natural and acquired advantages, which give Spring Valley great value. Of what avail, then, is it to assert that they cost a trivial sum, or that they are worth only an inconsiderable amount, in the face of these facts? What folly to quarrel over the difference between $11,000,000, which the city offered to give, and $13,350,000, which the company offered to take, when the fact is indisputable that a duplicate system can not be inaugurated without a probably greater expenditure than either amount. The value of these works is a fact, and the community can not deprive the company of that, either by assertion or regulation, for the Constitution provides that property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.

"I believe the people are sick and tired of a strife which has been kept up mainly by interested parties, and in which the people have been the principal sufferers. There is a straightforward and manly course to be pursued in this matter, which must commend itself to every citizen whose interests do not unduly prejudice his judgment. It can not certainly be a difficult matter to fix the value of the Spring Valley Water Works. This could be done by a commission chosen, one by the city, one by the company, and a third by the two thus chosen, or the city and company might agree on some unexceptionable expert, such as the Hon. Jas. B. Eades, for example, the decision in either case to be final.

"Then there are one or two other honorable things for the city to do. The first is to buy the works. This proposition I have already elaborated. The second is to agree upon the rate of interest the company should receive on its property. This, as I have shown, will depend on the certainty and security of payment. No doubt the company would consider six per cent., under some circumstances, a better rate of interest than ten per cent. under the present. But when the rate is fixed, then let a tax be levied on property, as it is everywhere else, for the payment of at least one-half the amount, and thus reduce the price of water to poor consumers at least one-half. It is astonishing and monstrous that immense houses containing millions of dollars of property, on which thousands of dollars are annually saved in insurance by the water company, should pay no more annually toward its expenses than a poor man must pay for water necessary for his family use. It is wrong and an outrage that vacant corner lots, which are made valuable because adjacent property is protected from risks of fire by the water company, should pay nothing for such protection, while the men who have improved their lots and added to the property of the city should also be made to pay for those who refuse to make any improvements, while at the same time they are relieved from any tax for so great a public use.

"There is only one sensible thing for the masses of the people to demand, and that is, that property should pay its proper share for water; in which case, and in which case only, the people can secure relief. It is our only practicable method, and I commend it to the attention of the people at large as a wiser and better method than a useless and endless controversy with a company which ought to be—and if we treat it fairly I believe will be—operated in the interest of the city and for the benefit of the citizens."

ALL ABOUT WOMEN.

A Vassar girl who has been studying spelling reform has discovered that Phtholognyrrh should be pronounced Turner. Phth, as in phthisis, is T; olo, as in colonel, is ur; gn, as in gnat, is n; yrrh, as in myrrh, is er.

"Mrs. Gill is very ill;
Nothing will improve her,
Till she sees the Toolerees,
And gallops through the Looover."

Here is a postscript to "a society" letter: "You have heard, I dare say, that my daughter is going to be married. If you are thinking of sending her a little wedding present, I think she would like diamond stars for the hair best."

There is a colony of seven thousand men and boys at Monto Sancto, in the Greek Archipelago, where not a woman or female domestic animal has set foot as far back as history records—and "the men there are pious and happy."

Robinson Warren, of St. Clairsville, Ohio, had always been so submissive under the domination of his wife, that when he finally nerved himself to protest against her clubbing their child, she caught up a handy revolver and killed him.

A demure Philadelphia girl, aged eighteen, is under arrest for bigamy. She has three living husbands, all of whom she has married within two years. When asked why she had done this, she said: "They were all good fellows, and they coaxed me so."

Miss Wilson is a Delaware heiress and beauty. She fell in love with a farm-hand, because she deemed him heroic; but when they eloped, and he ran away from her across the field at the approach of her pursuing father, she concluded that she had overrated him, and went back home contentedly.

Those professional beauties, Mrs. Wheeler, Mrs. Langtry, and Mrs. Webster, have been delighting the eyes of men by appearing respectively in Mrs. Freake's tableaux vivants as Mary Queen of Scots, Effie Deans, and Amy Robsart. The Freake is one of the leaders of London society, and the whole affair was of the swellest description.

In Brooklyn, recently, an injured husband explained in court that his wife hurt his feelings by larruping him with a leather strap in presence of amused bystanders, and on the same day a clerk in a drug-store brought suit against a young woman for scratching his face and punishing him severely with her fists behind his own prescription counter. Verily these Brooklyn girls are on their muscle.

They were playing a game they call euchre. She held both bowers and the king, and he two aces of other suit, but she was a novice at the game. A young man who was teaching her looked at her cards, and warmly exclaimed, "What a lovely hand!" She looked him straight in the eyes, and murmured, "You may have it, if you want it." All the rest of the evening he wondered if he was the victim of a leap-year proposal.

The Empress Elizabeth of Austria and Queen of Hungary made a public speech in Pesth, the other day, in aid of the Red Cross Society, for the support of soldiers' widows, orphans, and mothers. She is mentioned as looking superb—"the queenliest of queens"—in a long, tight-fitting black robe, trimmed with Bordeaux velvet, and a "Gainsborough" hat crowned with heavy feathers. The little speech, which was admirably delivered, with regal haughtiness, tempered with womanly sympathy for the cause it treated of, concluded with the words: "Forget for an instant that I am your queen, and consider me merely as a woman pleading to women in the cause of women." It was greeted by her audience with deafening cries of "Eljeu! Eljeu!"

Mrs. Enright has been put out of her house in Philadelphia. The Elevated Railroad Company had beaten her in the courts, and received authority to pull down her house. She determined to assert her rights as an American woman and property-owner. She refused to remove her household goods, and defied the contractor and his men. She would not allow the men to enter by the front door, so they were forced to mount to the roof by the next house. They knocked down the chimney, tore off the roof, and cleared the way to the front room on the third story, which was occupied by Mrs. Enright and her daughter. This was the first day's work, and the woman sat in her rocking-chair from morn to eve, looking grim and very mad, but she would not budge. The next day work was resumed, and by noon the third story was cleared away. After dinner the men battered down the front door, tore out the window-sashes, and reduced the wood-work on the first floor to bare walls. Meanwhile Mrs. Enright and her daughter sat in their rocking-chairs on the second floor, front, and held the fort. The second floor, back, was then invaded, and the kitchen utensils and other furniture were piled up on the sidewalk. But the garrison still held out, faithful unto death. The second floor, front, was next attacked; the rear partition was demolished, the flooring above was removed, and the front wall was toppled over, brick upon brick. But the women would not surrender. Mrs. Enright sat in her rocking-chair, knitting at the rate of forty stockings an hour, and receiving the moral support of her daughter and their sympathetic neighbors. The fight was watched with interest from the street, and the garrison was loudly cheered by the by-standers. But the enemy was ruthless. The stove, the bedstead, the table, and the trunks were carried into the streets. The walls and ceiling were down. There was nothing on the second floor but the five chairs and their contents. Mrs. Enright was asked to take herself off. She would not budge—no, never! nor man nor brute should put her out! The workmen began to tear up the floor. Then the garrison gave in. Mrs. Enright retreated with her friends to the stairway and looked for a dray. She spoke not a word. She had done what she could. She was crushed.

THE INNER MAN.

"To cookery we owe well-ordered states
Assembling men in dear society.
* * * beneath the earth lay hid
The precious salt, that gold of cookery!
And when its particles the palate thrilled,
The source of seasonings, charm of cookery, came.
They served a paunch, with rich ingredients stored,
And tender kid, within two covering plates,
Warm melted in the mouth. So art improved!
At length a miracle, not yet performed,
They minced the meat, which, rolled in herbage soft,
Nor meat nor herbage seemed, but to the eye,
And to the taste, the counterfeited dish
Mimicked some curious fish; invention rare!
Then every dish was seasoned more and more,
Salted, or sour, or sweet, and mingled oft
Oatmeal and honey. To enjoy the meal
Men congregated in the populous towns,
And cities flourished, which we cooks adorned
With all the pleasures of domestic life."

Coffee-houses—the apt hoodlum calls them "bun rackets"—are epidemic in this community just now. Montgomery Street has half a dozen of them, all flourishing. Of these there are a few whose attendants are young women—modest, rather pretty, and neatly dressed. These places are an outgrowth of dull times. They undoubtedly keep many persons out of bar-rooms at lunch time, and, in their inexpensive way, the best of them cater to a very respectable portion of the community. London was the first city in Europe to formally open very similar places. Coffee is supposed by some to have been the chief ingredient of the old Lacedemonian broth. Its use was not known in England till the year 1657, at which time Mr. D. Edwards, a Turkey merchant, on his return from Smyrna to London, brought with him one Pasquet Rossee, a Greek of Ragusa, who was used to prepare this liquor for his master every morning—who, by the way, never wanted company. The merchant, therefore, in order to get rid of a crowd of visitants, ordered his Greek to open a coffee-house, which he did in St. Michael's Alley, in Cornhill. This was the first coffee-house opened in London.

Did you ever eat shark-fin? The very idea is, possibly, awful to your virgin contemplation—an indirect sort of cannibalism, in fact. But the fins of notorious or suspected man-eaters were not comprehended in the query. The question remains: Did you ever eat shark-fin? and to that plain question may be added, Did you ever eat skate or squid? If not, why not? If yes, did you like it—them? Here is the latest New York contribution to this interesting culinary controversy:

"Madame," said Bob, the sea cook, "it's just nonsense about turning up your nose at shark-fins. I shouldn't say that a dish of fins all alone would be very good eating, but as I have cooked them many a time they are first rate. The Chinese, who has no end of cooking sabe, makes them into stock. Them Scotch as goes over to China to make their fortunes in the big tea-houses is much given to shark-fins. Just you take two or three pounds of shark-fins and soak and clean 'em, and put 'em on to boil with vegetables; and you have a stock for a barley-soup as would make you forgive the bloodiest shark that ever lived. I have seen many a shark banging up in the market at Palermo—not big ones, say not above three feet long—and trade on a Friday was lively in 'em. When one of those Napoleon fellows went to Iceland—it was just about when Dufferin was there—I was a-cruising along them latitudes I seed many a shark hanging up in the houses, to be eaten. Now, just you tell those Ichthyophagous fellows to sail into shark-fins, and if they don't want to hire a Chinese to cook them, let 'em call on me. Then there is skate. Why, there is parts of skate which is the best eating in the world. You don't eat the middle of it, but off of a skate of eight pounds you can cut just beyond the side fins, say four pounds of the whitest, nicest meat you ever eat. All sea fish is firm and solid, and skate is of this kind. You just boil it and eat it with a white sauce, and it will be found to be something between a halibut and a sole. I see skates with their heads turned inside out in the market sometimes—to be made fun of. It's a shame to give the go-by to as good a fish. If them Coney Island caterers had any sense, they would buy skate and cook it, and put down the name of it on their bills of fare, and there are plenty of foreigners as would eat them, and the taste for skates would come to Americans then. Now there is your squid. Because it has long arms, and a beak, and two glaring eyes, people are afraid to eat it. Is a lobster such a handsome thing after all? I don't mean to say that you are to eat them awful big things as is found in the Bay of Fundy, with arms thirty feet long, but a good-sized one, some foot long altogether, is as delicate as can be. It isn't, of course, everybody that can cook squid. Maybe those ichthyophagous fellows had better call on a Spanish cook for that dish. If he knows his business and serves it right, with the natural juices, it should come up chocolate-colored, and it has a taste midway between crab and lobster. Why, don't you know that on the coast of France and Spain, where sardines go a-begging, squid in oil—put up in tin boxes—is a delicacy?"

In the chirography of the late Dr. Doran (the entertaining analyst, and learned analyst, of the stage) the author of The Philosophy of Handwriting "discerned suggestions of good after-dinner and antique jest." Part of this is true discernment, for the worthy doctor was a doughty trencherman; yet he wrote some of his best anecdotes between the courses.

A French lady lectures her American sisters about furnishing their husbands with the food exactly suited to their habitual occupations and habits of body and mind. She insists that the intellectual men of France are more wholesomely fed; but, judging by what a good many Frenchmen write, it might be fair to infer that very often their dinners do not agree with them.

Izaak Walton: "My honest scholar, it's now past five of the clock; we will fish until nine, and then go to breakfast. Go you to yonder sycamore tree, and hide your bottle of drink under the hollow roof of it; for about that time and in that place, we will make a brave breakfast with a piece of powdered beef with a radish or two, that I have in my fish-bag. We shall, I warrant you, make a good, honest, wholesome, hungry breakfast. * * * Now let us say grace and fall to breakfast. What say you, scholar, to the providence of an old angler? Does not this meat taste well? and was not this place well chosen to eat it? for this sycamore tree will shade us from the sun's heat." Scholar: "All excellent good, and my stomach excellent good too."

The writer minds him of one al fresco luncheon that nothing in kind has ever made colorless by contrast. Until he shall climb the golden spiral, or attain permanent retirement among the most exclusive of the Stocktonese, he will remember that mid-day breaking of a long fast with something of the rapture only poets know and printers understand. A favorite trout stream in early May—with enough of freshet in its pulses to make its color a little less than limpid, and its volume a trifle too full for the measure of a brooklet's waistcoat—was the reward of an early morning drive after a hasty, lamp-lit breakfast. Maldab, Grebdeins, and Shub had visited the Galquid a year before, and knew the music of its every ripple. The writer was a stranger, and the least of the party with rod and line and leader. The day's sport would fill a long chapter, though never so condensed. It is with the luncheon that this curt sketch must rest content. At one o'clock the four met under a great alder that shaded a still pool, a broad shallow, and twice the breadth of mossy bank beyond. A mound of clean sand, flecked with columbine, and clover, and ribbon grass, lay at the roots of the alder, and the writer reclined thereon, while his more practical comrades prepared the meal. Shub had found enough wild strawberries to fill the unoccupied half of his fishing basket. He had spread a layer of ferns and grasses over his thirty trout, and the fruit, small but of prime flavor, came to table fairly tingling with deliciousness. Grebdeins had prepared two dozen troutlings, all small, but the better for that; and the grand chef Maldab, wrapping these in the broad, aromatic leaves of the thimble-berry, laid them upon the flat surface of a large stone, about which a fire had been burning some ten minutes. There was a huge loaf of bread, oval in shape and nearly all crust; a demijohn of claret, some slices of bacon; that was all. But such an "all"! The trout were done to a turn; the bacon, the bread, the wine seemed perfect; and the berries "crowned perfection with roses," as Grebdeins very neatly said. But possibly even the keen relish of that luncheon of luncheons would not be so vividly remembered by the writer if he had not fallen asleep in the pleasant shade, and awakened to find himself with the hot afternoon sunshine painting his defenseless nose, with twenty thousand red ants meandering the complex pathways of his clothing, and with twenty thousand points of sting upon his lacerated body. Al fresco luncheon, purely so considered, is delightful; but, as the great Maldab remarked: "It's the after-clap that counts, my boy."

The following description of Lord Roscoe, dining in Chicago before the nomination, is by an anti-Grant hand of decided opinion and evident gastronomic appreciation:

I saw the great man eat to-day—
With form erect and tall,
I saw him stalk with pompous walk
A-down the dining hall.
With motion grand he waved his hand,
Without a word or sound;
The dusky waiters round him rose
Like mushrooms from the ground.
As cold and silent as a clam
He sank into his chair,
And munched his mutton and his ham
With a majestic air.
His look was stern, his gaze was bold;
And it seemed strange to me
How one great man could gulp and hold
As many things as I.
I thought how odd it must have seemed
To see him nimbly run
When a Canonchet midged once
Pursued him with a gun.
I thought, as one by one I saw
The dishes come and go,
That he who dines on ducks to-day
To-morrow may eat crow.

The last device to get rid of the poor little noisy sparrows which abound so in our squares is to eat 'em. They are described by a serious writer as very good in the cooked state, and "superior to any game bird that graces our tables in delicacy and sweetness of flesh." That doubtless accounts for the high reputation of the reed-birds that Baltimore epicures smack their lips over. They are only sparrows in disguise.

A writer in the London World has this to say of the "Globe Trotters' Dinner" that took place in London recently: "It was a great success. The idea originated with a friend of mine, whom I may call A. B. C., who, when he left London for a trip round the world in October, 1878, determined to give a dinner on his return to his companions and any others he knew and met on his journey. Fourteen sat down to dinner, and the host was able to account for all his friends but three. One man only arrived in the afternoon; two were prevented coming at the last moment, having already reached England, but deaths of relatives prevented their putting in an appearance. All kinds of languages were indulged in, and, all circumstances considered, the travelers' tales were not too outrageous. The chef at the Junior Carlton did his best, and the dinner was universally voted very good. The bird's-nest soup, the shark-fins and the curries—especially the frogs—were all that they should be. All the party, ten of whom were Englishmen, three American, and one Dutch, were friends of the host, and most of them were public-school and university men."

We had a taste of hot weather lately, and we are likely to have more ere the season wanes. Now, although the heat makes one rather shrink from hot dishes, and seek to support the inner man on fish salads, cold bouillon, and other light things, it is well to remember that it is injudicious to lower the constitution by being too sparing of solid food, and thus render one's self a more easy victim to the malarious complaints which haunt all cities—more or less—in summer.

CXXXIII.—Sunday, June 20.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Mock Turtle Soup.
Fried Soft Shell Crabs.
Beefsteak à la Bordelaise.
Lyonnaise Potatoes, Lima Beans, Tomatoes.
Roast Veal.
Cucumber Salad.
Charlotte Russe, Strawberries.
Fruit Bowl—Apricots, Cherries, and Bananas.

TO FRY SOFT SHELL CRABS.—Cut the ends of the small leers off, take off the gills and tucks, wash and drain well upon a cloth. A few minutes before serving dip them one after another in two eggs beaten as for an omelette, then in crumbs of pulverized cracker, and fry them in very hot grease, not too many at a time; serve very hot upon a napkin, garnish with parsley and pieces of lemon.

INTAGLIOS.

The Evening Star.

Along the grassy slope I sit,
And dream of other years;
My heart is full of soft regrets,
My eyes of tender tears.

The wild bees hummed about the spot,
The sheep bells tinkled far,
Last year when Alice sat with me
Beneath the evening star.

The same sweet star is o'er me now,
Around the same soft hours,
But Alice moulders in the dust
With all the last year's flowers.

I sit alone, and only hear
The wild bees on the steep,
And distant bells that seem to float
From out the folds of Sleep.

My Love and I.

A little while my love and I,
Before the moving of the hay,
Twined daisy-wreaths and cowslip-balls,
And caroled glees and madrigals,
Before the hay, beneath the May,
My love (who loved me then) and I.

For long years now, my love and I
Tread severed paths, to varied ends;
We sometimes meet, and sometimes say
The trivial things of every day,
And meet as comrades, meet as friends,
My love (who loved me once) and I.

But never more my love and I
Will wander forth as once together
In spring-time, in the cloudless weather,
Or sing the songs we used to sing,
Some chord is mute that used to ring,
Some word forgot we used to say
Amongst the hay, before the May,
My love (who loves me not) and I.

From "Sir Launfal"

"June may be had by the poorest comer."

And what is so rare as a day in June?
Then, if ever, come perfect days;
Then heaven tries the earth if it be in tune,
And over it softly her warm ear lays:
Whether we look, or whether we listen,
We hear life murmur, or see it glisten;
Every clod feels a stir of might,
An instinct within it that reaches and towers,
And, groping blindly above it for light,
Climbs to a soul in grass and flowers;
The flush of life may well be seen
Thrilling back, over hills and valleys;
The cowslip startles in meadows green,
The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice,
And there's never a leaf nor a blade too mean
To be some happy creature's palace;
The little bird sits at his door in the sun,
A-tit like a blossom among the leaves,
And lets his illumined being o'errun
With the deluge of summer it receives;
His mate feels the eggs beneath her wings,
And the heart in her dumb breast flutters and sings.

THE FIRST GRAND BALL IN YOSEMITE.

We were camped on the bank of the Merced River, about a mile above the hotels in the Yosemite Valley. There were four of us—Mathew, a man from Visalia, a university student, and the writer. Mathew and I were traveling companions. We had started alone from the City of Oaks, had camped and cooked together, fought mosquitoes at Grayson, swam the sloughs of the San Joaquin, and sweltered in unison upon the great alkali plains before reaching the cooling Sierra. The man from Visalia and the student had joined us in the valley, and together we dwelt in harmony in two canvas tents beside the river, and in front of the great Yosemite fall.

All in all, we were very bappy. Above and below us on the river were campers from San José, Stockton, and other parts of the State, and in every camp except our own there was a pretty girl. The valley teemed with Hebes in bloomers, and a jollier crew never waked the echoes of that wild paradise. They flirted, rode astride, raced and tumbled about on the ground like kittens, and there was no dare-devil enterprise too spicy for them. At night they would sometimes invade our camp en masse, and the student was in his glory. He had a guitar, and could sing, and he possessed a faculty of making love to four or five girls at one time which filled the man from Visalia and the writer with envy.

For ten days our felicity was complete. These were in the good old times, when but one wagon road led into Yosemite Valley, and when a white shirt was a rarity and a Saratoga trunk a sacrilege. Men went to Yosemite to get rid of the smoke and the noise of the city, and to free themselves for a season from the conventionalities of society. In huge boots and blue shirts, unshaven and unshorn, they stood face to face with nature, and went away better men for the interview. These days were coming to an end, however. A new wagon road leading into the valley was about to be opened, and we were destined to witness the inauguration of a new era. Fashion and dress and the frivolities of conventional life were to invade nature's last stronghold and take possession.

It was thought, however, by the residents and pleasure-seekers in the valley, that this was a fit subject over which to rejoice, and a day was fixed for a grand turn-out and celebration, to be crowned in the evening by a dance at one of the hotels. Every one was invited to participate, and a flutter of pleasurable expectancy reigned in the various camps. We were the only exceptions. On the evening before the celebration we sat around the camp-fire—all four of us—silent and gloomy. The river ran gaily past, and the last rays of the setting sun lit up the great fall, which hung like a golden cloud against the wall of rock above us. The voices of happy stragglers could be heard, laughing and caroling through the valley, and everything seemed out of tune with our dejected spirits. The student, who was the saddest man of the four, was the first to break the silence.

"Well, boys," he remarked, "in the language of an eminent divine, 'what are you going to do about it?' The stage came in this afternoon loaded down with kid-gloved swells from San Francisco and Sacramento, and a new hatch will doubtless be in to-morrow. They will probably try to make the ball to-morrow night such a high-toned affair that a man without a white shirt and a calf-skin gaiter will stand no chance."

"If I was Governor of California," said Visalia, "I would demolish every wagon road leading into the valley. I would make it a penal offense for a man to bring in a Saratoga trunk, and I would sentence any man who should mention or wear or ever make any reference to a white shirt, while in this valley, to eat Mat's biscuits for six months."

Mat, who was slicing a side of bacon at the time, quietly wiped his knife on the leg of Visalia's pantaloons, but said nothing.

"Do the girls know our situation?" I asked.

"No, but they take it for granted that we will be at the dance," answered the student. "They are all going; but I doubt not, from certain little asides I overheard to-day, that they are nearly as deeply troubled about this subject of dress as we are."

"A girl does not need any clothes," blurted out Visalia, "or at least a ribbon, a spray of fern, or something of that kind is all that is necessary to make her look charming; but look at us;" and he glanced around the circle. And, indeed, we were a hard-looking set. With slouched hats, gray shirts, and brogan hoots, with faces unshaved, and the dirt and dust of the road still adhering to us, we looked like pirates. A familiar way that Mat had of wiping things off on us was also beginning to show its effects upon our persons. The student had three distinct impressions of the bottom of the coffee-pot in the middle of his hack, and I was literally painted. This was in consequence of a grudge which Mat bore me, because I ventured at one time to remonstrate with him for attempting to clean the frying-pan on my trousers leg. A roar of laughter was the result of the mutual inspection.

"Something occurs to me," said the student, when we had once more resumed our gravity. "I believe I know where there is a white shirt."

"Where?" came in an eager chorus.

"The guide—that Dago who took us up to Glacier Point yesterday—be told me that John Muir, the geologist, gave him one last spring. He probably has it yet."

"Can you get it?" we asked.

"I will try."

"I think," said Visalia, knitting his brows and speaking very deliberately, as if trying to recall some isolated fact from oblivion, "I think I know where there is a black coat."

We were all attention.

"I saw one," he continued, "down at Hutchinson's a few days ago, in the cook's room, banging near the window; I believe I can reach it if it is still there."

"Magnificent!" exclaimed the student, in utter obtuseness to the real significance of Visalia's remark; "all we want now is a pair of pants."

Before we went to sleep that night it was decided that, on the following day, each man should start out on a foraging trip, the results of which were to be shared equally between us. To me was assigned the duty of providing a pair of pantaloons, and my instructions were to beg, borrow, or steal, but not to come back to camp without them, under pain and penalty too originally vicious to mention. I succeeded, however, without resorting to desperate measures, and was the first to get back to camp on the following day with my prize. Mat came next with a vest and a large green necktie, and lastly Visalia and the student put in an appearance, each with a bundle of some description under his arm. We compared notes, and found that we had enough to dress one man.

It is unnecessary to state where the articles came from, or to describe the uproarious time we had that evening around the fire, relating our foraging experiences, and trying to get a fit out of the heterogeneous articles we had secured. The pantaloons had evidently been made for a giant. They came clear up to the student's armpits, and there was then, as he remarked, room enough left in them to accommodate a bale of hay. The shirt and vest worked very well; but the coat which Visalia had secured was short and narrow, and absolutely refused to cover up the great folds in the voluminous pantaloons, and its sleeves did not reach much below the elbow on the smallest man among us. Taken as a whole, the outfit looked best on Visalia, and it was consequently decided that he should go in and take the first dance, the rest of us awaiting our turns outside.

About nine o'clock we went down the river and crossed over the bridge into the town. Everything was life and motion. The hotels and stores were lighted, bombs were bursting, and everybody in the valley—Indians included—was out in his best war-paint and feathers. A temporary dancing floor had been laid near one of the hotels, enclosed by canvas and evergreens, and a band stationed within sent music out into the night to mingle with the murmur of the waterfalls. We could see the shadowy figures of dancers through the canvas, and hear the patter of little feet. What made it all really unbearable was the discovery that the town was full of swells, in claw-hammer coats and kid gloves, who were going in and out from the dancing-room, and making themselves merry with young ladies on whom we believed we had a primary claim.

Visalia was, however, equal to the emergency. He took our blessing and left us, disappearing through the door of the tent. For half an hour our suspense was fearful, and then a baggy shadow flitted past on the canvas, and we knew Visalia had found a partner. A few moments afterward he made his appearance, looking savage and desperate.

"What is the matter?" we asked.

"Nothing, nothing," he replied, "it's your turn next, I believe, governor," addressing the student, and he began to divest himself of coat and vest as rapidly as possible.

The figure cut by the student when he had donned the garments which Visalia threw him was something indescribable. I have never been able to understand how he had the moral courage to go into that ball-room, and can only account for it on the supposition that he did not know what a fright he was. Visalia forgot his ill-humor, and lay down on the ground to laugh, and Mat and I suffered as we never have suffered since. The student, however, was not to be dismayed. He threw himself into the breach, and we lost sight of him. We imagined that we heard a smothered laugh as he passed through the door, but we forgave the claw-hammers, knowing that nothing human could bear the sight unmoved. We could hear, however, from our position outside, that the titter which greeted his entrance gradually grew into a laugh, and we were in momentary expectation of seeing an animated pair of pantaloons bounce out through the open door and come tearing along through the darkness to our hiding-place among the rocks.

Nothing of the kind happened, however. The student was made of different stuff. He had gone in to have a dance, and he proposed to carry out the programme regardless of consequences. Marching straight up to one of the prettiest girls in the room, a lovely camper in our neighborhood, he asked her hand for the set which was forming, and she promptly rose and took her place beside him on the floor. "The act of that brave girl," as the student afterward expressed it, "should live in history, for it averted a tragedy. If she failed me, I had fully made up my mind to kill every smirking claw-hammer in the room, and I knew I could count on Visalia for a helping hand."

When the music started up, we could see fellows slipping out through the door, holding on to themselves as though stricken with colic, and a pent-up yell would occasionally ring out on the night air like a cry of agony. The figure was soon ended, however, and the student returned to us flushed and happy. It was my turn next. I was not possessed of the audacity of either Visalia or the student, and trembled at the ordeal before me; but there was no honorable way out of the dilemma, as we had entered into a solemn compact to stand by one another. I declined, however, to don the unmentionables in which the student and Visalia had figured, contenting myself with the shirt, coat, and green necktie.

My advent in the dancing-room, like that of my predecessors, was greeted with something more than a smile by the loungers around the door; but, to my surprise, the ill-concealed derision drove away my timidity and filled me with a species of desperate confidence. It excited my resentment, and enabled me to understand the incomprehensible audacity of the companions who had gone in before me. On reaching the inner sanctum, my first encounter was with a charming creature named Smith. We had made each other's acquaintance the day before in under the Nevada Fall, and were on the most friendly terms. She did not even glance at my brogan hoots, but held out her hand, with a bewitching smile: "Why, Mr. Cornelius, how late you are!"

"I had a little business," I faltered.

"What a shame that you should be so formal in Yosemite! Here is Miss Nasturtium, who has been looking for you all the evening."

At this instant the lady in question detached herself from the arm of a claw-hammer, and saluted me. "Where is Mr. Visalia?" she asked. "I thought I saw him here a while ago."

"I really can not tell you, Miss Nasturtium," I answered. "I expected to find him here."

"And what has become of the student?" chimed in Miss Smith, glancing hastily around the room. "I have not seen him for half an hour. And your friend Mat has not put in an appearance this evening. I thought you four were inseparable."

"Mat fell into the river on the way down," I stammered, groping desperately about for some plausible escape from my dilemma, "and he had to go back to camp to change his clothes."

"It's funny," said Miss Nasturtium, "that Visalia told me nothing about that when we were dancing together. But I noticed that he was a little excited."

By this time a little knot of lady campers had gathered around me, and I noticed that some of them were exchanging knowing glances and whispering in a suspicious manner. They were beginning to see through the co-operative clothes business.

"Mr. Cornelius," said Miss Smith, advancing toward me in a coquettish manner, and laying her hand on my arm, "what a pretty green necktie you have on! The student wore one just like it when he was here."

"And what a nice, stylish coat you have!" chirped in another. "Mr. Visalia wore one of the same cut, and with the same candle-grease stain down its back when we last had the pleasure of his company."

"And what a nice—" But I saw "the jig was up," and did not permit Miss Nasturtium to finish her sentence.

"Listen, ladies," I said, "and I will acknowledge the corn. The boys are outside in the brush. This suit of clothes which you see before you is a combination affair, and we are trying to work it on the installment plan. Think gently—pity our affliction. In the name of the best we could do, be merciful—be—"

I was never allowed to finish my speech. A merry peal of laughter cut my words short off, and immediately there was a rustling and scampering, and in less than three minutes a committee of four or five bewitching creatures stood around me in nubias and wrappers, and sternly demanded that I should lead them to the hidden retreat of my companions.

Resistance was useless, and I complied. I will not tell you of the scene that followed, for I can not. Suffice it to say, that the boys were dragged from their hiding places among the rocks, and marched into the ball-room, in all the glory of their mountain attire. I retained the good clothes, however, and John Muir's shirt, and was happy. But the claw-hammers—they were the maddest fellows you ever saw. The girls would hardly notice them. And when "Home, Sweet Home" announced that day was breaking about the brow of old El Capitan, we marched off up the river, arm in arm, to our camp, proud and satisfied that for one night at least we had been "cocks of the walk." A master said to his servant: "You are a fool, my friend!" "Pardon, sir," said the servant, "am I your friend because I am a fool, or a fool because I am your friend?"

AN OLD WOMAN'S REVERIE.

"In our course through life we shall meet the people who are coming to meet us, from many strange places and by many strange roads; and what it is set to us to do to them, and what it is set to them to do to us, will all be done."—MISS WADE, in Little Dorrit.

Hovering near the verge of old age, I feel that I am a haunted woman—haunted in troublous dreams by night, but most in sleepless dreams by day, by the people that swarm in the past. As the long march goes on, and the days drop away, the faces known but yesterday join the train and smile and mouth and nod at me, mocking with the rest, or, pitying, look or turn at me calm eyes, deep as the wells of memory. No pain, no joy, no love, neither regret nor sigh for the might-have-been, disturbs me now; for, assuredly, the people appointed me to meet I met, and only what was appointed me to do I have done. Yet ever am I dully haunted by the spectral, jostling forms, and I hear a distant murmur, as of voices that call me away, away to the past.

I hear my mother singing a hymn, that, through the distance, falls into a quaver, and, again, it is just a thin thread of melody; but oh! it is so sweet, as I see her swaying to and fro in the old rush-bottomed chair, rocking me to sleep. I see the sisters and brothers, that one by one came into life, and, at intervals, fell into the grave; and I see the things they were appointed to do to one another before they died. I see that James gloated over getting the better of John, that Jane envied Rachel, that Frances with her impatient tongue bred discords. But now I can see that these sins were appointed them to bring them low; for, long before the last breath came, they had each grown humble through seeing the lapses in their lives.

Sometimes, when I am half nodding, shadowy lips seem to babble at my ears, and the figures flit like shadows between the lids of my closing eyes. I see a girl in a white dress I saw in girlhood but once, and that when I, too, was a child; and I hear her laugh as she gave me a rose plucked from her May crown. Yet it was given her as one deed in her life to pluck that rose for me, that for once, at the beginning, we might be brought near. That was the first link in the chain, and I see now the second link forging.

It was a long, long time in the forging. Years came and went, and I grew a woman, and all the time there had been this and that one appearing and disappearing; staying a week, a month, a year; talking, laughing, unconsciously busying themselves at the link; helping along the must-be in my life as unconsciously I helped along the was-to-be in theirs. Then of a sudden, one evening, in the midst of light and music, one of them touched my hand, and snapped the second link upon the first, and in a moment of time I was making the round of the room upon the arm of the stranger who had been introduced. Now I see, waiting upon that moment, all the acts of others that one after another had unknowingly conspired toward it, and they seem to be leaping and tumbling over each other, and spanning the chasms of incident, and every act and deed holds his brother by the hand, because one purpose thrills each.

The name of the stranger was Valentine Rede. The next day I met him with his friend in a crowd, and his friend was my friend, who thus, out of his own will, having played the stepping-stone between us, was swept away, and we two were left together. It was but a glance, a smile, a word or two, and the day was gone. And then a rose seemed to have unclosed above the days—a glowing, passionate red rose, that shed over me its glow, and its passion, and the red of its own heart. The days came in a sweet dawn, and opened into a splendid noon, then sank into the hush of wondrous twilights, and each illumined my love. I was young, and in my rapturous hands I held my love as in delight, and in it I steeped the heart that lay on my lips, till it had taken all love to itself, and was heavy and drunken with the wine of its fullness. Oh! my love was ripe and fair and rich, like a pomegranate almost fallen from the bough. Had it been less beautiful and sweet it could not have served.

And now I hear the voices that then seemed filled with malice and anger; but as I listen now it seems they were laden with pity and sadness. Each was agent, whether it had influence large or small. Like the pushing of waters, they surge and toss about, and bewildered, I see myself trusting to a hollow branch. Vague murmurs against Valentine Rede assail my unbelieving ears, but through it all, "Trust me, my darling" comes like a wave of comfort, that ebbs and flows through my heart yet.

What years I clung to the hopes renewed alone by the letters of our separation! Even now I know he loved me, and that I, in my suffering and the purity of my love for him, was appointed and set aside as a sign unto him alone, even as others have daily suffered to work out my life as it was bound to be lived. He could not fail to know how I stood as a shield between him and the reproach that every tone flung at him, and that must have been the iron that entered his soul. My heart was tossed about like a shuttlecock between hope and dread, and I tried to know beforehand what lips were about to say, that I might close them ere they said aught against Valentine Rede. But in the end my heart shuddered and stood still, as through all it had been appointed to shudder and stand still; for with my blinded and yet clear-seeing eyes I read the letter—his last letter—that is the golden link of the chain.

"Through your devotion and your sacrifice," it said, "the blackness of the road I have traveled is open to me, and at right angles I leave it here to strike across fields to another. After the light your love has shed upon me I can not do otherwise than turn my life, but to begin an honest man I must give up the woman of women, the one thing pure I have taken into my heart. I could not enter heaven and keep you, because the very keeping of you would make me so base a man that I could never rise above this level. How hard it has been for you to work out my salvation by the light of your faith and truth I know, and, dear love, God knows. Be assured in his own good time God will give you the recompense. Dearest than wife, farewell! Man never had love greater than mine for you. It has in it all fealty, all tears, all sacrifice, all belief, all present, past, and time to come."

If ever one thing shines bright through the years that golden link shines, and with all romance fallen away from me like the shackles of youth, I thank God who set me one side to love and to suffer that the shining link might be wrought. I see the people that afterward came and did the things that brought about my home, my husband, children, new loves, new ties, new sacrifices, but not one so hallowed and so purified as the love once known, but now unknown. I felt its influence in the gentle mood born of the patience I had learned; in the self-denial I had received, of the resignation forced upon me; in the tenderness for others which came of the bleeding of my own heart. So I knew also that the chastening hand had not been laid upon me in vain.

And then, after many years, as out of the people of the past, into my life stepped the girl who had plucked the rose and given it me from her May crown; and she had been the wife of Valentine Rede. As I had married, so had he. Without one thought of disloyalty toward the husband I have put away in the grave, I wonder, dully, did he love her as of old he loved me? Did his hand close upon hers just so tenderly, and did his eyes follow her with the light that I remember? As she sits opposite me there, her busy fingers at the needle, I am idly thinking that the fact of her being Valentine's wife perhaps made her smile so sweet and her face so winning, even in her age; for by something invisible we are knit together, and, as she leans upon me, so do I depend and rest upon her, and in all the days there is not the tremble of a jar. Sometimes my heart exults and shouts to itself because it was my love that brought him where light from heaven shone upon him. But then there comes a soft little hum in my ears, that I know for the voices of my children playing with their father, and I think, in awe, that it has taken the love of many people to bring me through my life.

Oh! it is a strange, strange thing to live! How humble the faults I started with have made me; and oh! what blessings my fellow-creatures have bestowed upon me! Bless God, in spite of all, that my time for working and being worked upon is almost spent. I have done as was appointed. I have lived, and shall die. I have suffered, grieved, rejoiced, hoped, and I sit here, almost an old woman, looking calmly to the end.

KATE HEATH.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 10, 1880.

Jules Saussa, a Frenchman, has published a romance—a romance in a double sense—entitled Société des Mouchards, the action being laid in France, Italy, Zulu-land, and the United States. He pays a delicate compliment to New York City by calling it the rendezvous of all the scoundrels in Europe. One of his most striking personages is a Mrs. Pitt, aged eighty, remarkable for two fangs, like a wild boar's, and an insatiable appetite for what he names le todd, composed of much whisky, little water, lemon, and sugar. She keeps a fashionable boarding-school in Louisiana, and drinks so freely every evening that she is carried to her room by a muscular servant especially employed for the purpose. She is very fond of a certain Major Dick, also a devotee of le todd, who addresses her "in true American fashion," as "Old Mule" and "Ancient Romantic Brain." He constantly uses the favorite oath of the country, "God me damn," and when he is particularly affectionate to Mrs. Pitt sits down by her, and puts his feet in her lap. A woman is here always addressed, if married, as "Mistress," and, if single, as "Mrs.," while a man is addressed as "Master" or "My Gentleman." A lady should, in writing to one of the other sex, call him "Honorable Sir," or "Respected Gentleman," and sign herself "Your devoted Scuitor," or "Your truly respectfulest." Saussa introduces us to two very pretty Ohio girls, Jinifer and Betsy, one of whom habitually rides wild horses through her native town, bareheaded, and the other, donning trousers and high boots, goes forth to hunt rattlesnakes. Most Americans carry, we are informed, a Bowie-knife in their boot, and rich Southerners are always accompanied by two negroes to fan them. Notwithstanding the custom of going armed, the average American is not necessarily very fierce, and there are natives who, so far as known, have never killed a single man. Different habits characterize different States. In Minnesota, for example, young women of position enter corn-fields during the season to gather red corn, and after a wedding ceremony has been performed, all the invited guests set to peeling apples, the object being to see who can peel the most in a given time. In several of the States west of the Mississippi, which is ten thousand miles long, and empties into Lake Superior, ladies of the best society spend weeks at a time in the Rocky Mountains, hunting and killing grizzly bears, and wear necklaces of their claws as trophies of their prowess. Every American will recognize this faithful delineation of national scenes and manners, and will wonder how a Frenchman could have been so accurately accurate.

It may not be generally known that a hornet can not sting a person if the person fills his lungs with air and retains it while the hornet is on his flesh. This is a theory promulgated by a Detroit philosopher. We don't know how he made the discovery, but it is his own, and he deserves all the credit due to so important a principle in science. He demonstrated it to a few skeptics the other morning. He held a hornet by its back in his right hand. The experiment was made on the back of his left hand. First he inflated his lungs until he swelled up like a toad, and the fearful strain on his face showed the pressure he was carrying. Then he applied the hornet. Then the great volume of air in his lungs shot out in one grand discharge, accompanied by a yell that caused each skeptic to leap clear from the ground, while the hornet sailed heavenward with one eye closed reflectively. It is not known what produced a miscarriage of the experiment, but it is likely the experimenter did not have the right kind of air.

Here is something to scratch your head over. A very curious number is 142,857, which, multiplied by 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, gives the same figures in the same order, beginning at a different point, but if multiplied by 7 gives all nines:

142,857 x 1 = 142,857
142,857 x 2 = 285,714
142,857 x 3 = 428,571
142,857 x 4 = 571,428
142,857 x 5 = 714,285
142,857 x 6 = 857,142
142,857 x 7 = 999,999

Multiply 142,857 by 8 and you have 1,142,856. Then add the first figure to the last, and you have 142,857, the original number, with figures exactly the same as at the start.

SHORT SELECTED STORIES.

The late Rev. George Trask, the temperance and anti-tobacco lecturer, was one of the extreme men. But in one instance he had wit enough to work himself out of a dilemma into which extravagant statements had brought him.

At one time he addressed a large and attentive audience, and, among other things, said in his lecture that no man habitually using tobacco and whisky could expect to live more than five or six years after beginning to use them.

And so earnest and positive was he in his address, and so attentive his audience, that at its close he confidently challenged any reply, and invited any questions on the subject. After a moment's silence a man rose and said:

"I like what you have said, Mr. Trask, but I would like to ask one question. One of my neighbors is an old man, some seventy-five years old, and he has used tobacco and whisky—all he could get—ever since he was thirty-five years old; that is, for some forty years. How do you reconcile that with what you said, that a man using both tobacco and whisky couldn't live more than five or six years?"

Mr. Trask was somewhat startled, and, to gain time for collecting his thoughts, began asking some questions:

"How old did you say this man was?"

"Some seventy-five years."

"And he has been using both tobacco and whisky ever since he was thirty-five?"

"Yes, using them constantly and freely."

"Well, what kind of a man is he? Does he seem to take much interest in business, or in anything that is going on?"

"Wa'al, no, I don't think he does."

"Does he seem to love anybody?"

"Wa'al, no."

"Does he seem to hate anybody?"

"No, I don't think he does; he seems sort of indifferent to everything."

"Well," said Mr. Trask, who by this time had gathered up his wits, "your old man has evidently been dead for some forty years, and the only mistake you've made is that you did not bury him."

Amid the shout of laughter that rose upon the answer the audience broke up, and Mr. Trask was relieved.

When a Western editor was sitting in his office one day, a man whose brow was clothed with thunder entered. Fiercely seizing a chair, he slammed his hat on the table, hurled his umbrella on the floor, and sat down.

"Are you the editor?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Can you read writing?"

"Of course."

"Read that then," he said, thrusting at the colonel an envelope, with an inscription upon it.

"B—," said the colonel, trying to spell it.

"That's not a B. It's an S," said the man.

"S; oh yes! I see! Well, it looks like 'Salt for dinner,' or 'Souls of sinners,'" said the colonel.

"No, sir," replied the man, "nothing of the kind! That's my name—Samuel H. Brunner. I knew you couldn't read. I called to see you about that poem of mine you printed the other day, on the 'Surcease of Sorrow.'"

"I don't remember it," said the colonel.

"Of course you don't, because it went into the paper under the infamous title of 'Smearcase To-morrow.'"

"A blunder of the compositor's, I suppose."

"Yes, sir, and that's what I want to see you about. The way in which that poem was mutilated was simply scandalous. I haven't slept a night since. It exposed me to derision. People think that I am an ass. Let me show you. The first line, when I wrote it, read in this way:

Lying by a weeping willow, underneath a gentle slope.

That is beautiful, poetic, affecting. Now, how did your vile sheet present it to the public?

Lying to a weeping widow to induce her to elope.

Weeping widow, mind you! A widow! Oh, thunder and lightning! This is too much!

"But look a-here at the fourth verse. That's worse yet.

Cast thy pearls before the swine, and lose them in the dirt.

He sets it up in this fashion:

Cart thy pills before the sunrise, and love them if they hurt.

Now, isn't that a cold-blooded outrage on a man's feelings? I'll leave it to you if it isn't."

"It's hard, that's a fact," said the colonel.

"And then take the fifth verse. In the original manuscript it said, plain as daylight:

Take away the jingling money; it is only glittering dross!

In its printed form you made me say:

Take away the tingling honey; put some flies in for the boss.

By George, I felt like braining you with a fire-shovel! I was never so cut up in my life. There, for instance, was the sixth verse. I wrote:

I am weary of the tossing of the ocean as it heaves!

It is a lovely line, too. But imagine my horror and the anguish of my family when I opened your paper and saw the line transformed into:

I am wearing out my trousers till they're open at the knees!

That is a little too much! That seems to me like carrying the thing an inch or two too far. I think I have a constitutional right to murder that compositor; don't you?"

"I think you have."

"Let me read you one more verse. I wrote:

I swell the flying echoes as they roam among the hills,

And I feel my soul awakening to the ecstasy that thrills.

Now, what do you s'pose your miserable outcast turned that into? Why, into this:

I smell the frying shoes as they coast along the hulls,

And I peel my sole mistaken in the ecstasy that whirls.

I must slay that man. Where is he?"

"He is out just now," said the colonel. "Come in to-morrow."

"I will," said the poet; "and I will come again."

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[Though time and the telegraph have put the late Republican Convention pretty well into the past, the following correspondence from Mr. Pixley will be found particularly interesting, giving, as it does, not only the inner workings of the great political machine, but facts and details that have escaped, or been inaccessible to, the ordinary news-gatherer. The letters have been arranged under their date of writing, the mails having failed to deliver any in time for last week's issue.]

Chicago, June 5.—When this reaches you, the result of the convention will be pretty generally known, the candidates selected; and, whoever they may be, the nation, through its length and breadth, will be aroused to clamorous manifestations of enthusiasm in their behalf. Let no one think that the Republican party has, in any sense, been divided, or that it will in any degree relax its earnest efforts to hold its power upon this government. We of California, in the isolation of our position, have no idea of the strength of the Republican party organization, or how deep it has laid its foundations in the hearts and homes of the American people. There has been an idea that it might be well, perhaps, to allow the Republican party to go into a minority; that it had done things it ought not to have done; that it had followed leaders it ought not to have followed; and been brought under influences that had demoralized and injured it. I have found my own mind drifting in this direction. When I saw some of the meaner reptiles crawling to the top of the political structure, where they lay, fat and insolent, basking in the sun of office; when I saw the vile crowd of very foul party blackguards that, by some unkind providence, had been allowed to become leaders in the party; when I found these poisonous toads squatting at the party ear, and whispering to death every ambitious, honest, decent gentleman who would not get down upon his belly, and with them crawl in the dust; when I remembered how shamefully honest party service had been recompensed by the party leaders, I somehow felt that if the party could be cleansed and regenerated in no other way than by turning through its foul stables the somewhat impure waters of Democracy, it would be well. Since I have sat in convention I have enlarged my conceptions of the situation. California is but an outlying province of this great nation. It is but a small potato in the teeming hill of States. We are but a fly upon the great revolving wheel; and the wheel will continue to go round with undiminished speed, whether we remain upon it or fly away. I am convinced that away down in the heart of this great nation there is embodied a sentiment of love and gratitude to the Republican party that is not only ineradicable, but is strengthening. I have seen the representatives of all the States and Territories of all the land coming together in this national council, and have witnessed an enthusiasm and devotion to the Republican party that I did not fully estimate for its strength. This convention will be memorable. It has within it the leading statesmen and representative men of the nation. The good feeling and harmony so far seem unlikely to be disturbed, and, whoever may be the Presidential candidate, it now seems as though its ranks would present an unbroken front to the enemy. I have no time to give you an account of any of the details of this convention, but my portfolio is full of notes, and I shall carry away in my memory enough of stirring incidents to inspire many a paragraph. I have daguerreotyped upon my mind this convention in all its details. The magnificent hall, with its great auditorium filled with eight thousand spectators, every eye bright with intelligence and glistening with enthusiasm as it looked down upon as splendid a body of men as ever gathered together. Great statesmen and distinguished orators; great generals, that led armies in battle; men of the people, representing the great middle class of labor and industry; men distinguished in professional life; men of great wealth and genius. On the roll-call of States are the names of those who are the mainsprings of our national action, and upon whom rests the guidance and direction of the vast machinery necessary to govern forty-five millions of people—representatives of a republic grander in its extent and greater in its aims than any within the historic age.

Last night I witnessed a scene I shall never forget. For a week past there had been gathering in this great, beautiful city of Chicago delegates from all parts of the country. On my arrival on Sunday evening, the streets and hotels were thronged with an excited multitude of eager partisans. From Maine to southernmost Texas there had gathered and was gathering the Republican army. It came in clubs from all the great cities, with music and banners and badges. It poured in from the country in squads, and, gathering in groups and clusters, it moved through the streets and surged through the corridors of Chicago's great hotels. In the centre of every group was an orator, warmly, noisily, and sometimes angrily advocating the claims of his favorite candidate. All Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday—all day Friday to a late hour of the evening—the nerves of every delegate had been strung to utmost tension. Upon the result of contested delegates hung the hopes of many anxious politicians. There were secret councils, midnight caucuses—there were plotting and counterplotting. The two first days had witnessed the preliminary skirmishing of the two factions into which the convention had divided—Grant and anti-Grant. The Grant cause was championed by the three great Senators. By a common consent, the Blaine wing was given the place of honor in the fight, and it was gallantly handled by the magnificent leadership of Hale and Frye. The courtly and magnificent Senator of New York, on the first opening of the convention, walked down the centre-hall with calm and stately stride, bowing his blonde head, and bending his graceful form to the applauding audience that rose to receive him with great demonstrations of delight. Then came in the black knight of Illinois—the dark and dangerous Logan, with his visor up; his bright, black eyes took in the audience with a smile, as cheers went up. He tossed back his night-black hair, as the war-horse tosses his tangled mane when he goes into battle. Cameron, leader of the Pennsylvania clans, was cheered. Small and nervous, he called the convention to order, and since has made no sign. For two days and a half the giants had it all their own way. The cool sarcasm of Conkling was overmatched by the deliberate earnestness of Hale, and the incisive oratory of Frye. Logan, Garfield, Henderson, Boutwell, Conger, Joy, Spencer, and Emory Storrs had for three days held the contest. Logan had spoken by the hour. Conkling made twenty-three speeches in the three days. The fight was over the admission of the Illinois contested delegates, when our Creed Haymond obtained the floor, and was first of all the lesser men to enter the arena of debate, and was the first to engage the now black and scowling Logan in a personal encounter. It was a brief and brilliant passage at arms, and the victory did not rest with the Senator from Illinois. It brought the California delegation into notice, and we all swelled with a little pride to think that California had finally found a delegation, one man of which was not compelled to sit dumb in the overawing presence of Eastern politicians. The Illinois Senator, smarting from this unexpected glove flung so fairly in his face, in the evening session called up, by special question, the chairman of the delegation, and again he got it upon his royal nob, since which time he has let the Californians severely alone. When the chairman of the California delegation, having explained how the State Convention and the District Conventions were organized, and concluded by saying that they were instructed as a unit to cast their vote "first, last, and all the time for the distinguished Senator from Maine for the nomination of the party as its Presidential candidate," such cheering and such prolonged enthusiasm, renewed from time to time, bursting out again and again, the audience in the galleries, the officials upon the stage, the Blaine delegates in convention, all uniting in the uproar made a scene rarely witnessed. But now to the incident so far of this convention. Mr. Emory Storrs, of Chicago, was speaking, referring in a splendid peroration to General Grant; the Grant men in the hall caught the epidemic of enthusiasm, and seemed to all spring to their feet at one impulse. Such a mad scene, such insane enthusiasm, was never witnessed; such a wild yell was never heard; hats, canes, umbrellas, and handkerchiefs were waved. Such stamping, clapping, cheering, shouting, the stately and dignified Conkling standing upon his bench, waving the shield of New York upon a pole above his head. This continued nearly half an hour. It seemed as though it would never stop. Finally it lulled, and one of our strong-lunged Californians, Duke of San Joaquin, got in his work by shouting, "Three cheers for Jim Blaine!" and then the fun commenced. What before had been a murmur became a roar; what had been a rivulet became a booming torrent. Hats were flung aloft. The whole gallery was a sea of tossing handkerchiefs, and such yells, shouts, howls, and hurrahs; such clapping of hands; such beating of boot-heels. One woman on the stage went frantic, and shook her umbrella and her petticoats in uproarious madness; I think she hugged Hoar, and I saw one man hug the Goddess of Liberty. Then by a common impulse the shields upon which were blazoned the names of our States were seized and carried to the centre. For a time California was held highest and tossed wildest by the enthusiastic Duke, till finally some taller Maine man, with a longer pole, sent the shield of Maine above them all. Then again the uproar deepened, and thus, in the wildest and most frantic excitement, this staid convention of grown men spent almost an entire hour.

Chicago, June 7.—In this letter I send details of the fight over the Chinese resolution, and the struggle we had to secure its insertion in the Republican platform. I had supposed that we in California had so educated the people of the East upon this question, that we should experience no difficulty in obtaining the insertion of a resolution expressive of our views, and that the passage of an anti-Chinese immigration law through both houses of Congress, and the prominence given to that legislation by the President's veto, had called the nation's attention to it. And so it seems to have done, but only to arouse antagonisms against our views. To our utter surprise we found the convention against us—not an indifferent opposition, but an active feeling. Some of the New England delegates had made their contests against Blaine because he was with our people upon this matter, and they came prepared to fight the insertion of a plank against the Chinese exclusion policy, and at one time it seemed that the best thing we could accomplish would be to accomplish nothing, and be content to have a platform that was silent upon this question. We called the entire coast delegates together—Washington Territory, Idaho, Arizona, Oregon, Nevada, and California—and found ourselves a unit upon the proposition to have a resolution in the platform. We appointed a committee to formulate one; met again, and agreed upon it; choose our committee-men on resolutions with reference to this question. In the general committee, our delegate, Judge Payne, made a good fight—General Edwards of Nevada, and Mr. Brentz of Washington Territory, aiding him in intelligent and forcible speeches; and they won the victory by sending the resolution thus formulated by us to a sub-committee with instructions to insert. This sub-committee was Messrs. Edwards Pierrepont of New York, Robinson of Connecticut, Phelps of New Jersey, Emory Storrs of Illinois, and Payne of California. At Judge Payne's request, I personally followed up the committee, as we found a determination in the sub-committee—in spite of instructions—disposed to insert a milk-and-water nothing. Mr. Pierrepont was against us upon the expressed admission that he knew nothing about the matter, and was only willing to advise Congress to take "proper" action, in view of the importance urged for it by "our friends" of California. I was indignant at his ignorance, and did not hesitate to tell him so. Finally he agreed to report our resolution. Then came in to the room of the committee Mr. Phelps of New Jersey, who had drawn a resolution of his own. It did not mention the word "Chinese," but was otherwise strong, and was capable of being interpreted our way; and this Judge Payne and myself formally agreed to accept, and withdrew with the distinct understanding that it should be so reported to the general committee. The following morning Judge Payne informed us that it was not so reported, and that the milk-and-water resolution of the milk-and-water Pierrepont was inserted. Perhaps you can imagine our indignation. The army swore terribly in Flanders. The delegation met, and we resolved that this thing should not be. We all went to work, and each in his own way. Some coaxed, some argued, some swore. I leave your readers to guess who got the maddest, raged the most, and swore the loudest. We made sheet-iron thunder roll through that convention for about one hour. I went before the committee, and, to my utter surprise and indignation, found not only Mr. Pierrepont's milk-and-water resolve in his own handwriting, but in another resolution a clause authorizing the Chinese to become citizens and to vote. Then, as the parrot said of his fight with the monkey, "we had a hell of a time." The convention was at a temporary recess awaiting the report of the committee, and it gave us the opportunity to storm. We threatened the Blaine delegates that Mr. Blaine should not get one vote from the Pacific Coast; that we would make a fight in open convention; that we would denounce the sub-committee with treachery, and its chairman, Mr. Edwards Pierrepont, with a dishonorable misrepresentation, a dishonest suppression of the Phelps resolution, and that we would appeal to Mr. Phelps himself for proof that the sub-committee had violated its agreement; and we further threatened that, if baffled in our efforts, we would take down the shields bearing the names of our Pacific States and Territories, and in formal procession march out of the convention—and we would have done it. This, of course, created a commotion. Not only were the Blaine men justly alarmed at such a possible defection, by which he would have lost twenty-four votes, but Republican leaders were alarmed, and stated that such a demonstration would destroy the Republican party. Senator Conkling came to the delegation for personal explanation of the trouble. The California delegation had already made its impression upon the convention by its replies to Logan. Mr. Haymond was regarded as a speaker who had force, and a quarrel over the Chinese resolution was deprecated by all the moderate men of the convention. Every man of our delegation was active, angry, and resolute to eliminate the Pierpont "slop" from out the platform. We succeeded, and with Mr. Phelps of New Jersey I agreed to what now stands as the Chinese resolution. It was the best we could get. It was all we could get. The coast delegates all think that we have achieved a victory under the circumstances, and that we do not deserve unkind criticism because the resolution is not as full and resolute as public opinion upon our coast would desire. The provision admitting Chinese to full citizenship was also stricken out. It is amazing—the ignorance and prejudice upon this question. Puritan sentimentality and commercial greed lay at the foundation of dense and impenetrable idiocy, and there was no other or better way to secure any consideration of this Chinese question in a Republican Convention than the one we took.

Chicago, June 9.—The convention has concluded its labors, and, in my judgment, a great national peril has been avoided. The sentiment that lay deepest in the hearts of all men of intelligence and patriotism was that of opposition to the third term. As a question of policy it was the one that most affected the minds of all those party leaders whose personal fortunes were not bound up in Grant. This ghost has been laid forever, and not again in the immediate future will any President, or any organized party, dream of the possibility of ignoring this tradition of our country, or endeavor to avoid the binding force of an unwritten law as sacred as the written Constitution of our fathers. This convention has accomplished important results. The great party chieftains have been rebuked, and the "boss" business has been slaughtered and its body hid from the public gaze. Not soon again will any party leader endeavor to make himself President. It was Conkling and Blaine four years ago. It was Grant and Blaine this time; and, in spite of organization, bureaus, money, and concerted effort, the people in convention have had their own head and nominated not the best man on either occasion. The adoption of the individual as against the unit rule will leave future delegates free to exercise some little personal discretion and judgment in the performance of their delegated duties. The settlement in favor of district representation as against State representation divides the power, and distributes it away from the great political centres in cities to the country. This destroys the great party proconsuls—men like Conkling, Cameron, and Logan—who stride over their States like some huge Colossus, compelling all lesser men to crawl as pigmies beneath them. Not again will the imperious blonde of New York deem it within his power to dictate a solid New York delegation through a State convention; not again will the Highland chieftain—a chieftainship of inheritance—attempt to marshal his clans in direct opposition to the will of an overwhelming majority of the people of Pennsylvania; and not again will the swarthy Logan endeavor to spread the darkness of his southern Egypt all over the great State of Illinois—not again make the mistake attributed to him by Creed Haymond, of thinking himself the State, and it may perhaps convince him that Illinois is large enough to hold two great men. This triumvirate of senators has been beaten and humiliated. When the convention opened, the arrogance of this trinity was immense; as it proceeded, they had, by defections and by the decision in the Illinois case, lost each a third and one the half of his party following—New York and Pennsylvania by revolt, and Illinois by a decision that stamped upon Logan a premeditated bolt and a tyrannous usurpation and abuse of political power. When the convention ended, they had not made a point. They had been checked in debate, out-voted, and out-clamored. Logan was brought in suppliance to his knees before the convention in order to defeat Washburne for Vice-President. Even the sop of the Vice-Presidential Arthur, thrown to New York in a weak spirit of generosity, did not please Conkling; and, after being forced by his delegation to accept the nomination of Garfield, he went home with the arrow in his heart. This Congressional interference in party affairs, and the insolent dictation of the party satraps, is inconceivably humiliating to every independent and resolute man; and I, for one, am glad that it is broken and forever destroyed. It was pitiable to see the delegates of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois—all, all honorable men—wearing the iron collar, which had plainly inscribed upon it that they had been elected as thralls to these Saxon lords. It was pitiable to see the "white niggers" and colored gentlemen of Missouri, Kentucky, Texas, Mississippi, Arkansas, Alabama, and the Carolinas chained and manacled, and driven by the party lash to do the bidding of the masters who owned them. Before our delegation sat Alabama with Clayton, and Arkansas with Dorsey, as political party-drivers; and all over the house this Southern constituency, that had everything to receive and nothing to give, kept step to the music of the lash. It was in bad taste. It was not becoming, this effort of a solid Democratic South to force upon an almost united Republican North a candidate it did not want, and one it knew it could not help to elect. If the nomination of a candidate had been left to the delegates of Republican States, Mr. Blaine would have been nominated upon the first roll-call of States. As it was, Mr. Blaine's friends made the nomination of General Garfield, and it is a good one. His opponents made the nomination of Chester A. Arthur, and it is a bad one. However, the nomination of Mr. Arthur makes it impossible for Senator Conkling to lie down in the traces, or to sulk in harness, or to balk. He and his friends are challenged upon their loyalty to the party to see to it that New York casts her vote for a Republican President; and only in this view of the situation is the nomination of Mr. Arthur one politic to have been made. The enemies of General Grant—if he has any—must be more than satisfied. Contrast his position now with that of the day when we of San Francisco went out and escorted him within our golden gates with a fleet of ships—such a convoy as never monarch had, such a welcome as no king returning to his native land ever received—the guns of our forts thundering from their blazing throats a loud-mouthed welcome, banners streaming in the golden sunset of that gorgeous evening, our city blazing with light, flags of welcome waving under the breath of our hundred thousand joyous throats, proud to welcome to our shores from his trip around the earth the first gentleman of the world. Now, having been dragged in stormy politics through thirty-six ballotings, he emerges a beaten candidate, a defeated politician. He has been used. His friends in this conflict were not the men who asked him to violate a national tradition, and, in his ambition, do that which Washington deemed wrong, and which no President dared attempt. His ambition and his fame have culminated. His has been a remarkable career, as he has been a remarkable man. He went up like a blazing rocket; and there in the blue vault he might have stood transfixed, a brilliant star, and all his countrymen below would have ever looked up to him with admiration and with gratitude. But, alas! a syndicate of great politicians and great bankers beckoned him to come down and do their bidding. He assented in ambitious hopes of a loftier flight. He came down a stick, charred and broken, and he will never again be so lifted up. I am not glad that General Grant has been humiliated, but I am glad that the third-term tradition has not been violated, and that the country has not received the hurt of his nomination. F. M. P.

We mentioned last week that all canting on the Chinese question had better be given up. That is, it will be better for the cause that no considerations be brought forward to sustain it that admit of a complete answer. The real struggle on this issue is to come off in the next Congress, and we may rely upon it that each false argument will be refuted. Most of the favorite arguments of our demagogues are of this sort: (1.) The first refers to the over-crowded and often noisome condition of their dwelling in this city. The answer is, that the worst we can allege of the Chinese quarter has been or is matched in the great cities of the East; that the corresponding dens there are mainly tenanted by foreigners; that these facts can not be admitted and are not admitted to constitute ground for excluding the immigration of any race or color; that they are held to constitute and do constitute a reproach solely to the city which tolerates them, and not to their victims; that in all that has been shown up on this head, San Francisco is proclaiming only her own shame, as New York once proclaimed hers in showing up the horrors of the Five Points, and London hers in exposing the ulcer of the Seven Dials; and therefore (in conclusion) the whole matter is irrelevant to any question of immigration, and tends to establish no conclusion, except that San Francisco has the art and duty of self-government yet to learn. (2.) The second argument is, that the Chinese work for a lower rate of wages than will suffice to support a white citizen. Historically, and as matter of existing fact, this statement is untrue. That the Chinese would be willing to work for wages that would not fitly support a white operative we firmly believe; and that, should their influx be unrestricted, a time would arrive when the white competitor would be crowded out, we are prepared to maintain; but that the market wages for Chinese labor in California have ever yet fallen to the range at which many white American operatives are glad to work, is the reverse of the fact. Therefore, in the coming argument, this allegation had better not be made, for it will be disproved. (3.) A third argument is, that the Chinese acquires no interest in our political or social institutions, as evidenced by his not becoming a citizen and by his herding apart to himself. The answer is, that he has not been permitted to become a citizen, and this answer will be apt to be accompanied by the retort, that if he had been, such blatherskites as are now lifting their voices against him would have been working for his support. This retort will sting, for every hearer will know it to be true. The argumentative force of the allegation that he holds himself socially aloof is fully disposed of by the reply—so does the colored man. (4.) A fourth point made against the Chinese is, that since they do not acquire a literary knowledge of our language, reading neither our books nor our newspapers, they assimilate nothing of the genius of our institutions or national character. The answer to this is twofold. First, that they are excluded from our free schools where they might learn, although they pay their share of the tax toward their maintenance; and, second, that they do in fact exhibit a decided eagerness to learn (according to the means open to them), which is one means of improving their conditions.

Here we pause. It is needful to remind rational Californians that the American nation has recently had an experience which it will never forget, in the course of which it was made thoroughly familiar with the four arguments above cited. With immaterial modifications of form and application, they did duty in the pro-slavery debate for more than a generation. When the great game was played in which they were played out, the nature of the struggle was such that they were played out once and for all. They were played out to stay; and, for any use on the other side of the Rocky Mountains, they are deadlier than Julius Cæsar—for he has done smelling, and they haven't. The whole humanitarian sentiment of this great Yankee nation is wrapped up in just such propositions as those four. Every time that either of them is brought home to an Eastern mind, a peg is driven in the coffin of the cause. He recognizes it at once as an old friend with a new face—to settle whom once before he fought and bled and wrapped himself in the American flag; and from that moment he becomes more or less fervently and fanatically pro-Chinese, where before he was merely indifferent. It would be hard to select more effective pro-Chinese literature for Eastern circulation than the average Californian editorial and stump speech. With every sentence uttered the humanitarian back gets up higher and higher. Earnestly and zealously as we have fought this fight from the first opening skirmish, it is trying to see it given away by every bawling blatherskite from the platform he calls his stump, and every babbling nincompoop from the chair he calls his tripod. We have no hesitation in saying, here and now, that this issue can not be won before Congress and the country unless it is supported with some intelligence and sense, and, above all things, with candor and good temper. Nor are we at all prepared to admit that this is equivalent to saying that it can not be won at all, while we are keenly alive to the fact that, in these respects, we are frightfully overmatched by the other side. For one thing, the question has become a matter of feeling with us, while with them it is little more than one of theoretical policy or abstract sentiment. Therefore it is far the harder for us to keep our temper, and to preserve that patience which is our only hope for quickening the massive, inert ignorance, and reshaping the warped conscience with which we have to deal.

The first step toward enlightening those fifty millions of people (that is a good many people, few of whom really know anything, or care more, about California) on the subject of the Chinese, should be to learn something about them ourselves. As to any real, accurate knowledge of the Chinese character—seen truthfully, both as to proportion and perspective—there is perhaps as little of that in San Francisco as in any place on the face of the earth. Yet when we come to make our speeches in Congress, the East has hundreds of people who, if we lie, will detect and expose us; if we ventilate the gross and purblind ignorance that forms the staple of Californian editorial, will detect and expose us. Very seriously we say it—that line of industry is played out. We have made a noise over the question till our big neighbor has consented (in the interest of peace and quiet) to give us a hearing. He is prepared to fold his hands next winter, in his large, heavy, and—speaking generally—not ill-informed way, and give us our hearing. What have we to say for ourselves? We are making the disturbance; what is our trouble? As the East views the case, it is we—not John—who originate the hubbub. Now, what have we to allege against that quiet man? John's counsel—the humanitarians, zealous, unselfish, honest, and well prepared—are standing by to hear our complaint, and in due course to argue, to answer, and endeavor to refute it. And the fact that the East is misinformed as to some aspects of the case, and imperfectly informed as to others, that it does entertain some prejudice, against all of which we have to enlighten, to combat, and to overcome, enforce our need of self-restraint and careful preparation. Under such circumstances, and in such a court, the ridiculous futility of both blatherskite and nincompoop is piteously obvious. Our complaint, then, must be drawn temperately as to spirit, accurately as to form, truthfully as to substance. It must then be supported with skill, knowledge, patience, and good temper. Are we prepared with a case of that kind?

The Democratic National Convention is getting to be of little interest. Tilden will rest his claims on justice, and the series of questions beginning: "Was I not once elected President of these United States? Am I not rightfully President now?" He will be answered in the negative. Seymour has more than the traditional "thrice" refused the nomination and denied the Bourbon crown; and Duke Gwin, the aristocratic driver of the California Democratic delegation, has settled the whole thing in a Herald interview, by giving the Pacific States and the nomination to Field.

A THRILLING TALE OF THE PERIOD.

By Mrs. Flyaway Forester.

Author of "Shall We Associate with Her?" "Don't Mention It," etc.

"He wins, he wins! No, d—n him, he doesn't!" The speaker is a lady. "A real lady?" cries the reader. Sir or madame, if you will take the trouble to reach down Johnson from the shelf, you will see that in defining the noun lady the lexicographer makes no mention of refined manners and gentle bearing, but simply explains it as a word meaning a woman of high rank. Therefore, as the young girl who makes this outrageously unfeminine exclamation is the granddaughter on one side of an earl, and on the other of a baronet, and moves in good society, she is perfectly entitled to be called a lady. The words are half smothered, it is true, but they are heard by a man who, in the general excitement caused by the approach of the horses, has been pushed close to the speaker. He turns and looks at her with an expression of disgust which he does not for an instant attempt to conceal, and then, the race being over and the crowd dispersed, he moves away from her.

"I thought," he said to a friend, "that only ladies were allowed here."

The place is Sandown.

"Quite true. Why?"

"Is that a lady?" indicating with his eyes the girl who has so offended his ears.

"Certainly; she is a Miss Wylde. Rather rapid, but what a glorious figure—hasn't she?"

"Yes," answers Alan Fane. He is a handsome man of some three-and-thirty, home about a month from India, where he has spent the last ten years. His return was occasioned by his quite unexpected succession to ten thousand a year.

The last race is over; there is a rush for the members' train. As Fane is hurrying along the platform, looking despairingly in at the crowded cars, a voice cries:

"Here you are, Fane. Get in here."

When he is in he sees that there is not a seat for him, and that there are two ladies in the carriage.

"I will wait for the next train," he says, preparing to withdraw.

"Nonsense! it's all right. We shall have two or three more in before we've done."

At this moment Fane becomes aware that one of the ladies is Miss Wylde.

"Here, Bournemouth," she says to a fair, good-looking young fellow with a blasé expression, "you may sit on my lap if you like."

Lord Bournemouth coolly and at once accepts her invitation.

"Oh, get out! You're too heavy. I didn't mean it," rejoins the fair one, laughing. And then she happens to meet the eyes of Captain Fane fixed upon her with unmistakable disgust. A slight flush comes to her cheeks, an expression of defiance to her eyes, and then the determination seems to take hold of her to give him something to be shocked for. And by the time the train reaches Vauxhall he is as thoroughly shocked and disgusted as ever he was in his life. Miss Wylde's companion, Lady Blanc Dasshe, far excels her in the piquancy of her conversation, but then she is a married woman.

"Do you mean to say," Captain Fane asks his friend as the carriage takes them on to Waterloo, "that those women are tolerated in society?"

"Tolerated, my dear fellow! They are bright ornaments of it. Of course, they are in a fast set, but it is a set people are very glad to get into."

"Good God!" exclaims Fane, with such solemn horror that his friend can not forbear laughing. He is a little surprised, too, for Fane has the reputation of being anything but a moral or strait-laced man.

"Society has changed since I remember it," adds Alan.

Garlands of flowers, music, waxlights, youth, and good looks. Of such is composed Lady P. Z.'s ball, at which Captain Fane finds himself assisting. Lady Blanc Dasshe and Miss Wylde are there, and Fane has been reluctantly compelled to admit to himself that the girl's face is almost beautiful, while her figure is quite perfect. Somehow he feels irritated with himself because he can not help watching her; he objects to her style; he objects violently to the use she makes of her magnificent dark-blue eyes. He has lost sight of her at this moment, and is standing idly in a doorway when a friend's voice whispers:

"Would you like to be introduced to Miss Wylde?"

"Not for worlds!" he replies, emphatically; and then, turning, has the unexpected pleasure of seeing that young lady on his friend's arm. That both should color violently is only a natural consequence of the situation. The lady is, of course, the first to recover.

"Pray don't distress me by refusing!" she utters with stinging sarcasm, while those wonderful eyes of hers blaze with a dark fire. "I was going to ask you to dance."

"I shall be delighted," he stammers, overwhelmed with confusion, giving her his arm.

"I am not going to dance this—it is a quadrille," she says. "Let us go where my partner won't find me!" And she leads him half down the stairs to a corner with a low couch and velvet curtains. She throws herself upon it, and deliberately draws one curtain to screen herself from the public gaze. This action brings back Fane's coldness and disgust in a moment. She contemplates him with perfect calmness.

"Why 'not for worlds'?" she asks.

Fane feels not only embarrassed, but angry. The girl's behavior is so daring and unfeminine that she seems to him to have lost the right to the courtesy which is the special due from his sex to hers.

"Because," he answers, coldly, "I have not the remotest idea what to say to you."

"Really!" with a mocking laugh. "How is that?"

He is silent, and she repeats the question.

"Do you insist on knowing?" he inquires.

"Of course I do."

"It is rather an awkward thing to say," he observes, halting for a moment.

"I shall enjoy it all the more," remarks the girl, defiantly.

He looks in her face with perfect coolness, and says, deliberately:

"I know how to talk to a lady, and I know how to talk to women of a class which it is not usual to speak of before ladies; but I have not the remotest idea what to say to any one who is just between the two."

If Miss Wylde was in want of a new sensation she has got it with a vengeance this time. Her face is scarlet; she trembles with anger; and yet she has shrewdness enough to know that by forcing herself upon this man she has handed the reins and the whip into his keeping.

"Will you explain yourself?" she asks, controlling her voice by a violent effort.

Alan Fane never felt more uncomfortable in his life, but he is resolved, now he has the chance, to make the most of it.

"I had the honor," he says, "of standing next you at Sandown, and heard you curse a horse for not winning. Afterward you invited a man in my presence to sit in your lap, and exchanged repartees of a questionable nature with your male companions. These are the manners and customs of that class which," bowing, "I dare not name before a lady. I meet you next in the house of a person whose claim to that title is indisputable. I must, therefore, ask you to excuse my embarrassment. You see, I have been away from England for ten years, and when I left there were only ladies and—and—the other thing."

The most deadly humiliation has taken possession of the girl's breast. If there had been a covert impertinence in Captain Fane's manner she could have borne it better; but his voice was cold and matter-of-fact, and his air that of a man who answered simply a question put to him. What could she do? She would rather die than put her hand on his arm again. She felt almost on the verge of bursting into tears. One moment, and she had pulled back the curtain and fled, leaving Fane sitting there with very mixed feelings.

"After all, it served her right," he said to himself.

Then he descended the stairs and left the house.

It was a December afternoon, and Captain Fane was lying on a sofa beside a cozy fire. He had a broken leg, and that kept him quiet.

"What cursed bad luck!" he kept saying to himself.

"Upon my word, it was very good of that girl."

The explanation of these two remarks is as follows: First, he had come down to stay with a friend for a week's hunting, and his horse had fallen, rolled upon him, broken his leg, and kicked him in the head. Secondly, he had learned that, while insensible, Miss Wylde, who lived in the county, had ridden up, exhibited the greatest nerve and presence of mind, had caused him to be carried to a neighboring cottage, and gone herself at full speed for a doctor.

"Upon my soul!" said Fane to himself. "I think if I'd been a woman, and a man had said to me what I did to her, he might have lain there for me."

He was alone and found it dull, so he tried to amuse himself by thinking.

"After all, they say she is not a bad girl," he mused. "A weak, silly mother, and got hold of by a fast, good-for-nothing woman like Lady Blanc Dasshe. Thank goodness she's gone off with Charlie —, so she won't have the chance of spoiling any more girls."

The door opened, and who should come in but Miss Wylde, and alone. She walked straight up to him, and said with quite a friendly nod:

"Well, and how are you getting on?"

She was looking lovely; a slight color in her cheeks, a more than lustre in her deep-colored eyes, and her figure set off to perfection by the neatest of habits.

Fane felt covered with confusion. If she had forgotten that little episode at the ball, he had not.

"Excuse my not being able to rise," he stammered. "I—I—believe—I am told that I owe a great deal to you."

"Oh, no; not at all," she answers, bringing a small chair and sitting down beside him, so that the firelight plays on her really charming face. "I met Mrs. Aymer, and she told me you were here alone, and that it would be a charity to come and talk to you. I did not feel altogether sure of that," with a ring of mockery in her tone, "because, you know, conversation can't be all on one side, and you have not the remotest idea what to say to me, as you once said."

Fane's confusion is really painful.

"Are you fond of music?" inquires Miss Wylde, after a moment's pause, during which she seemed to enjoy his discomforture.

"Passionately," he answers.

She rises and opens the piano, plays a few soft chords, and then she sings in the sweetest voice he has ever heard. And as he listens with a delight that grows to rapture, he forgets what he has thought of her in the past, and looks at her almost with reverence, as though she were some white-winged angel. From song to song she goes, all tender, pathetic, harmonious, till suddenly she breaks into a snatch of a music-hall song.

"Stop! for heaven's sake, stop!" almost shrieks Fane, so loud that she looks at him startled, and gets up from the piano.

"How could you," he says, reproachfully, "after you had carried me right up into heaven?"

"Oh," she answers, coolly enough, "I did not know how your particular taste ran. Bournemouth, now, dotes on that song, and yawns over the others."

"Bournemouth is a brainless fool!" cries Fane, with intense irritation.

"I suppose," observes Miss Wylde, calmly, seating herself at a little distance from him, "that it is in India's burning clime you acquired your charming habit of outspokenness?"

"I am a brute," he says, contritely, "and I beg you ten thousand pardons. But to see you looking like an angel, to hear your exquisite voice, and then to be brought down with a run to the memory of a low music-hall—"

"Thank you," returns his companion. "I will take the sweet with the bitter, and try to get them to mix."

She sits and talks for half an hour quite sweetly and gently, without once saying anything to vex him.

"You will come again, won't you?" he urges, in tones of deepest entreaty, as he holds the hand she gives him at parting.

"Perhaps," she says, with a tantalizing smile from her wonderful eyes.

When she has gone Fane lies back and thinks what a madness of delight it would be to have those eyes always looking at him with that expression. But it would be madness of quite another kind, he reflects, to see them fixed in the same way on any other man.

A week goes by. Alan is still confined to the sofa, and every day, regularly, his lovely visitant comes in and sings and talks to him. In the whole week not one trace of her cloven foot has appeared. On the seventh day, as she sits beside him, she says, suddenly: "I am going away to-morrow."

Then Fane is quite certain of what he before suspected—that he is madly, passionately in love with her. He looks yearningly, wistfully at her for a moment; then turning away with a heavy sigh, he says:

"Perhaps it is as well, after all."

"Why?" she asks, quietly.

"Because," he answers, in a suppressed voice, "if I saw much more of you, I should be obliged to make a fool of myself."

"How?" still the same contained voice and manner.

"By asking you to marry me. Of course," hurriedly, "I know you would refuse me. Sometimes," with a sharp upward glance, "I think you want to make me do it in revenge for my brutal rudeness to you."

A slight blush comes into the girl's face.

"No," she says, "I don't bear malice. I hated you for the time; oh, how I hated you! I had serious thoughts of getting Bournemouth or one of them to call you out. Well," her voice trembling, "suppose you made a fool of yourself, and—and—suppose I let you; what then?"

He seizes her hand and draws her toward him.

"Do you know," he cries, his eyes flashing and every feature quivering with intense excitement, "I worship you to that degree that it lies in your power to make my whole life a curse to me? Not by refusing me—I might get over that; men do somehow—but by marrying me, and then changing from the angel you have been lately to what you were when I first saw you."

"What was I then?" she asks. "A devil?"

"No."

"Something between the two?" maliciously. "I seem always destined to be something between two things."

"Don't!" he cries, almost violently. "For heaven's sake, don't just about it! Oh, if you knew how men adore and reverence good women, and how they loathe a fastness and coarseness that make ladies seem to approach what is common and unchaste, you could never, never try to lower yourselves in our eyes, and think it good fun! I have a mother—a saint, an angel. Never did I hear an ungentle, unseemly word from her lips. What do you think I should feel if my wife rapped out an oath or told a doubtful story in her presence?"

"Oh, then you think me capable of that?" asks the girl, in a quiet voice, but with tears of bitter mortification in her eyes.

"My darling," he cries, beside himself, "I don't know what to think! I only know that I love you with all my soul."

She drags her hand from his grasp and moves away.

Never has he so cruelly felt his helplessness. If it were not for his broken leg he would rush to her; he would not let her go.

"Come back, darling!" he implores. "For heaven's sake come back and tell me that you care for me!"

"No," she cries, with flashing eyes, "not until you have more confidence in me than you seem to have to-day."

And to Fane's agony she goes out, and he hears her ride away.

Some one told me the other day that Miss Wylde had become quite altered and quiet. Some one told me that a Captain Fane is madly in love with her, but that she has refused him. It is, however, thought that she will not improbably exert the prerogative of her sex and revoke her first decision. Revoke is good.

"Sakes alive," said the good-natured Colonel Solon, as he rushed into the Oil City Derrick office, "I never felt so warm as this but once afore in my life, an' that are time 'twasn't so awful hot in the atmosphere, either." "When was it, colonel?" "Don't believe I ever told you that, did I? 'Twas some time ago. I was livin' in Jamestown, and was a respectable member of one of the churches, an', like all respectable members, had a ticket for my sleepin' berth during long sermons on hot days. One day when 'twas more'n usually hot I was just a droppin' off to sleep when I thought I'd wipe my forehead. I felt, but couldn't find my handkercher. Just then I noticed suthin' white on the floor beyond my feet, an', bein' a little nigh-sighted, I took it for my missing rag, and went for it. There warn't no partitions below the seats in that are church, so when I reached down I saw some one in the pew front of me had a foot on my handkercher, an' it riled me a trifle; so when I got hold of it I yanked about two-hundred-weight on it the first haul. Sakes alive! There was the alfredest scream yer ever heard, an' there I had got hold of old maid Jenkins's summer dress, an' yanked her off the seat an' under it into my own pew afore I node myself. She flounced up in a second, with a long dust mark down her back, her hat jammed over one eye, her sleeve ripped open, an' half her false hair hangin' down on her shoulders. I jest set thar sort o' stunned like, with the minister an' the whole congregation watchin' her crawling out from under my pew, lookin' like as if we'd been havin' a fight, an' she'd got the worst of it, an' me not a-knowin' what to say. L ain't abin to that church since, an' as Miss Jenkins said I was drunk, they kind o' read me out of the place, an' I never had a chance to vindicate my karakter."

A Western newspaper says the bride of Hon. Heister Clymer wore a gown of pearl-colored silk; and "a soft tint of warmth seemed to blush in the rich fabric where it lay in thick folds, and about the edges of the ample court train riffs of fine lace lay like rime; and the pale pearl of the petticoat, flecked and shadowed by deep falls of superb duchesse in a pattern of oak leaves and roses alternating with scantily-shirred puffs of the pearl-tinted silk, was simply and almost severely elegant." We should say so.

THE SPEED AND DIRECTION OF GHOSTS.

A Scientific Investigation by the "New York Times."

A very large proportion of ghost stories, when they come to be carefully examined, prove to have no more basis in truth than has an average political table. There is, however, one variety of ghost story which claims respectful attention. It usually runs as follows: A person sitting alone in his room suddenly sees the apparition of an absent friend. He notes the precise time, and a few days later learns that the absent friend died at that exact hour and minute. Incidents of this kind have happened to so many persons of such unimpeachable veracity that it is very difficult to doubt them. They have happened too often to be explained as singular coincidences, and unless we boldly assume that in all cases the persons thus visited by alleged ghosts were either deceived or deceivers, we must admit that this particular type of ghost story is worthy of belief. There is one remarkable feature in all this apparition of ghosts who are understood to come straight from the death-bed of their bodies to visit their distant and surviving friends. They apparently make no allowance for differences of longitude. A ghost, for example, appears to a person in New York at, say, nine o'clock on the night of the tenth of June, and the person subsequently learns that the ghost in question left its body in London at nine o'clock on the same night. Now, in point of fact, when it is nine o'clock P. M. in London it is about four o'clock P. M. in this city, and when it is nine o'clock P. M. in New York it is about two o'clock A. M. in London. It is hence evident that when the ghost of a person who died in London at nine o'clock in the evening by London time presents himself here at nine o'clock by New York time, that ghost has apparently been about five hours in crossing the Atlantic. If he had made the journey at the electric rate of speed at which ghosts are popularly believed to travel, he would have arrived here at four o'clock in the afternoon by our time. As he did not, it is clear that his rate of travel is precisely that of the earth's revolution on its axis. In other words, the ghost has not traveled at all, but has simply poised himself in the London atmosphere and waited until New York came around. This is a fact the importance of which cannot be overestimated by students of ghosts and their habits. A careful examination of all the authenticated ghost stories of the peculiar type now under discussion will show that in every instance the ghost came from the East. Persons in England have seen the ghosts of friends who died in India or China, and persons living in America have seen the ghosts of persons who died on the Atlantic Ocean or in Europe. In no instance has a ghost arrived in London in hot haste from the United States, or has a New York man been visited by the ghost of a Chicago friend. It seems to be the invariable rule that a new ghost never travels in an easterly direction. The ghost may have to lay a course to the north-west or the south-west; but, no matter how much northing or southing he makes, he always appears at a point west of that from which he started. We are now in a position to combine what we know of the direction and rate of speed of ghosts, and to deduce the important law that ghosts have the power of moving in a northerly or southerly direction, but that, while they have an apparent motion from east to west, coincident with the apparent motion of the sun, they can not, by any motion of their own, change their longitude. The new-made London ghost, if he desires to visit a New York friend, follows the meridian of London in the direction of the equator at a speed so great as to be inappreciable, and, having reached the latitude of New York, poises himself in air, and when the revolution of the earth brings New York under his feet, quietly drops into his friend's room. We have here the first well-established ghost law that has ever been formulated, and we have a firm basis of facts for its support in the shape of the only authenticated class of ghost stories. We may go even further, and deduce the hardly less important law that the period during which the new ghost can thus hover near the earth is less than twenty-four hours. If the London ghost could remain as long as he chose, watching the earth revolve, and selecting his own time for dropping in on his friends, there would be an end of the interesting appearance of ghosts at the precise time of their escape from their bodies. The ghost that appears to announce his escape from the body is never behind time, but always appears at the precise time, by the watch, at which the melancholy event took place. We are thus compelled to believe that, while the ghost can remain near the earth during twenty-four hours, and can use that time in making farewell calls, he is afterward compelled to remove to some distant sphere between which and the earth there is no regular and easy communication. These facts are submitted as the beginnings of a true science of ghosts, and it is to be hoped that they will be followed by the discovery of other and equally important laws, the knowledge of which will enable us to separate with certainty the true from the false in ghost lore.

Monsieur Giraud's idea of a tax on idleness, or persons of fortune who do not follow any occupation, proposed by him recently in the French Chamber of Deputies, is not new, and really belongs to Alexandre Dumas, who put it forward in La Question d'Argent. He defines it as follows, as a civil conscription: "It is the most simple thing in the world, and would serve as a substitute for the military conscription, for it is probable that in a given time all the nations will be united by interest, art, trade, and industry, and war will disappear from the face of the earth. Society will then only demand from men the tribute of their intellectual capacity. When a man shall have completed his twenty-first year the State will ask him, 'What career have you adopted? What are you doing for your fellow-creatures?' 'Nothing, sir.' 'Do you mean to work?' 'No, I do not intend to do anything.' 'Then you have a fortune?' 'Yes, sir.' 'Well, sir, you are free to not work, but you must provide a substitute. You will pay so much a year for those who have no fortune to work in your place, and we will then deliver to you a carte de paresse, by means of which you can go about unmolested.'"

Ralph Waldo Emerson keeps two cows, and milks them himself. Some of his brightest thoughts have come to him while being kicked half way across the stable.

A Secret.

It is your secret and mine, love!
Ah me! how the dreary rain,
With a slow persistence all day long,
Dripped on the window-pane!
The chamber was weird with shadows,
And dark with the deepening gloom,
Where you, in your royal womanhood,
Lay waiting for the tomb.

They had robbed you all in white, love;
In your hair was a single rose;
A marble rose it might well have been,
In its cold and still repose.
Oh, paler than yonder carved saint,
And calm as the angels are,
You seemed so near me, my beloved,
Yet were, alas! so far.

I do not know if I wept, love,
But my soul rose up and said:
"My heart shall speak unto her heart,
Though here she is lying dead.
I will give her a last love-token
That shall be to her a sign
In the dark grave—or beyond it—
Of this deathless love of mine."

So I sought me a little scroll, love,
And thereon, in eager haste,
Lest another's eye should see them,
Some mystic words I traced;
Then close in your clasped fingers,
Close in your waxen hand,
I placed the scroll as an amulet,
Sure you would understand.

The secret is yours and mine, love—
Only we two may know
What words shone clear in the darkness
Of your grave so green and low.
But if, when we meet hereafter,
In the dawn of a fairer day,
You whisper those mystic words, love,
It is all I would have you say.

Our Dead.

Nothing is our own; we hold our pleasures
Just a little while ere they are fled;
One by one life robs us of our treasures;
Nothing is our own except our dead.

They are ours, and hold in faithful keeping,
Safe forever, all they took away;
Cruel life can never stir that sleeping,
Cruel time can never seize that prey.

Justice pales, truth fades, stars fall from heaven;
Human are the great whom we revere;
No true crown of honor can be given
Till the wreath lies on a funeral bier.

How the children leave us! and no traces
Linger of that smiling angel band;
Gone, forever gone—and in their places
Weary men and anxious women stand.

Yet we have some little ones, still ours;
They have kept the baby smile we know,
Which we kissed one day, and hid with flowers,
On their dead white faces long ago.

When our joy is lost—and life will take it—
Then no memory of the past remains,
Save with some strange, cruel stings, that make it
Bitterness beyond all present pains.

Death, more tender-hearted, leaves to sorrow
Still the radiant shadow—fond regret;
We shall find, in some far, bright to-morrow,
Joy that he has taken, living yet.

Is love ours, and do we dream we know it?
Bound with all our heart-strings, all our own?
Any cold and cruel dawn may show it
Shattered, desecrated, overthrown.

Only the dead hearts forsake us never;
Love, that to Death's loyal care has fled,
Is thus consecrated ours forever,
And no change can rob us of our dead.

So, when fate comes to besiege our city,
Dim our gold, or make our flowers fall,
Death, the angel, comes in love and pity,
And, to save our treasures, claims them all.

For the likes of yer honor to shpake wid the pen;
Tell him I'm well, and mavourneen Daisy
(The baby, yer honor) is better again.

"For when he wint off, so sick was the crayther
She never hilt up her blue eyes till his face;
And when I'd be cryin' he'd look at me wild like,
And ax, 'Would I wish for the country's disgrace?'

"So he left her in danger, and me sorely grieved,
And followed the flag wid an Irishman's joy;
And it's often I dhrame of the big drums a-batin',
And a bullet gone straight to the heart of me boy.

"Tell him to sind us a bit of his money,
For the rint and the docther's bill, due in a wake;
And—shure there's a tear on your eyelashes, honey,
I faith I've no right wid such freedom to shpake.

"I'm over-much thriflin', I'll not give ye trouble,
I'll find some one willin'—oh, what can it be?
What's that in the newspaper folded up double?
Yer honor, don't hide it, but rade it to me.

"Dead—Patrick O'Conner! O God! it's some other!
Shot dead? shure scarcely a wake has gone by,
And the kiss on the chake of his sorrowin' mother,
It hasn't had time yet, yer honor, to dhyr.

"Dead! Dead! O God, am I crazy?
Shure it's breakin' my heart ye are, tellin' me so;
And what in the world will I do wid poor Daisy?
Oh, what can I do? and where can I go?

"This room is so dark I'm not seein' yer honor—
I think I'll go home"—and a sob, hard and dry,
Rose up from the bosom of Mary O'Conner,
But never a tear-drop welled up to ber eye. —Anon.

WINE CELLARS.

The reader will observe that this series of short articles on vineyards and wine matters is intended to convey information of a purely practical character to persons, in the first instance, who are considering about entering into the wine industry, and, next, to those who have to enlarge their accommodations and are in a position to turn hints to a useful account—remembering all the while that all the wisdom of the world has not yet found a local habitation and a home in this favored State. Whatever is here written, in the form of advice, is the result of observation and actual experience, stretching over a period of many years, in both old and young wine countries, where climate and soil were not very dissimilar from those of California. It is the privilege of new countries to profit by the errors and mistakes of old ones—if they would only learn what they are and where they come in. It was said of old:

Felix quem faciunt aliena pericula cautum.

"Happy the man who takes caution from other men's blunders." Circumstances seem at present to be singularly favorable to the progress of the wine industry. The various districts of the State have been prospected, and their suitability for different growths of wine fairly ascertained. The cost of labor and material is not high. There is the Viticultural Board of State Commissioners, with an open office in San Francisco, to afford information and advice, and circulate information among cultivators. And there is every prospect of remunerative prices for produce for many years to come—in view of the failure of the vineyards of the old world.

The purpose of this article, however, is to throw out some hints about the construction of wine cellars—an indispensable necessity of a vineyard, and one on which much money is often uselessly spent. A wine cellar is, of course, always an expensive affair; and how to keep down the expenses is the present object. Example will probably instruct and assure those who have not yet constructed cellars better than the mere laying down of rules—for which purpose I will select two as applicable to all the country within one hundred miles of San Francisco. I visited nearly all the great vineyards which have been in bearing for more than a quarter of a century in New South Wales, Australia, during the early summer of 1877, and spent several days with the proprietors, and had the fullest opportunity both of seeing for myself and hearing from them the result of their experience in vineyard and cellar management.

Sir William Macarthur, of Camden Park, first introduced the wine industry into New South Wales, Australia, some forty or more years ago. It was for him that the late Mr. Busby (whose journals might profit cultivators here) collected vines in Spain and in the south of France. In due course they came into bearing; and when the supply of grapes exceeded the local demand, his attention was turned to wine-making. But he had made no provision before the crop was ripe; so, as the best he could do, he cleaned and repaired some old cow-sheds and milking-sheds and used them. And, as the whole affair was an experiment, he let the musts take their chance. Some little attention was paid to them, such as racking from the lees, etc., but they were for the most part left to themselves. In their third year these musts proved to be excellent, delicate wines, especially the white kinds—in some respects resembling the Sonoma Gutedel. From year to year, with occasional additions, these same sheds continued to be his cellars; and all along the wines proved of the same light, firm, delicate character, of good bouquet and low spirit-strength. In 1858, Sir William, through his agent, sent to me, in Melbourne, samples of all his stock, both young and old, with abundant samples of various European kinds for analysis and study. The report was favorable. And, perhaps partly on that account, he decided on making permanent cellars of the most substantial kind. These were of stone and brick, arched and vaulted, light and airy. Yet he assured me, and both the stock in hand and my own experience of his former produce confirmed his word, that he had never been able to make and mature white wine like that made and matured in the old, rough wooden sheds.

The second instance is a record of the experience and practice of the most successful producer of wines for which what I will call the coast climate of the State is suited—Mr. John Wyndham, who had under keeping and treatment some one hundred and fifty thousand gallons—Imperial—at the time of my visit. Now, his cellars are constructed as follows: There is a substantial brick wall on the side whence the prevailing winds blow, and no other of a solid kind. The rooms formed along it, and others adjacent to it, are mostly used for the last fining and bottling. All the rest consists of bay after bay of wooden structures, roughly and cheaply constructed, only one story high, with hard clay floor, and the customary fittings for all purposes, with plenty of light and air everywhere. There is, however, a good sprinkling of fresh-slacked lime laid down and scattered about, which secures sweetness and prevents swarms of vinegar flies. His keeping vats are very large, and kept full to the bung. On my inquiring about the effect of variation of temperature on wines kept in those huge vessels bound with strong iron, and strengthened with iron rods, he replied: "Practically little or none."

Now this is the kind of cellar I would unhesitatingly advise, both for cheapness, facility of enlargement, and the success achieved by Mr. Wyndham—whose red wines, for body, color, bouquet, and finish, have not been surpassed in Australia, which is saying much, for there the struggle goes on from year to year, and from one wine show to another, who can show the best; for, besides a name and medal, there are usually considerable money prizes awarded also for the best in each class. Now, where adobe land exists, cellars of the best description can be cheaply constructed; and with a liberal use of lime, in the interior at least, both on walls and floors, which should be of hardened clay, or, still better, cement, they can hardly be surpassed. When a hill-side can be tunneled, excellent rock cellars may often be cheaply made and enlarged; but here two things must be carefully noted—viz., that they be dry, and free from any mineral that might produce an offensive gas. Many rocks contain substances such as iron and other pyrites, which are liable to decompose and yield an offensive smell.

A much vitiated taste has made all of us fond of first nights. Time after time we secure the best places and crowd to the theatres, a foolish drove of people, knowing absolutely nothing of what we are going to see or hear. And it is invariably the fortune of the first-night people to see the thoroughly worst performance of the season. How can it well be otherwise? At the Comédie Française, perhaps, where every actor is an artist, and every artist of them all is a person of more than ordinary intelligence, there may be reason for the convening of all the aristocracy of the Parisian Bohemia in the auditorium of the famous theatre on a first night. But the mere reading of a new play at the Comédie Française is the talk of all Paris, and by the time it is presented to the public it has been rehearsed until it is flawless. If these ladies and gentlemen—intelligent, educated, and cultivated as they must be to get there at all, endowed, some of them, with genius, and skilled, all of them, in the very finest details of the histrionic art—find long and laborious rehearsal necessary, what shall be said of our little people on a first night? Take a bird's-eye view of them as they stand in all the glory of fresh, beautiful costumes and limitless make-up, and try to estimate the amount of stupidity to the square inch of each pretty or ugly face. Fancy the drill and discipline necessary to give them any degree of certainty as to where they shall stand or what they shall do, to say nothing of teaching them to sing in time or tune. Is it quite fair to a patronizing public to present these people without a preliminary dress rehearsal? Indeed, is a manager doing justice to himself? for upon the verdict of a first-night audience much depends. Take, for example, Boccaccio, which is doing better in its second week than its first—although the house was crowded to repletion on the first night—simply because there has been time to reverse the verdict of the first-night people. It was getting into the "wee sma' hours ayont the twal" when they left the theatre, tired and bored, and not a one of its pleasant catching melodies ringing in their ears. Nothing is so fatal to pleasure as its too long continuance; and the most ardent theatre-goer does not care for more than a three hours' sitting. And do you not know, O sisters mine, how much the length of a play affects your theatre-going? Are you not accustomed to that growl from behind the newspaper, when you ask to be taken to the play, "How long does it last?" or to use the extraordinary phraseology of the day, "How late does it let out?" After all, it is the patronage of women which supports the theatres, the newspapers, and the publishers. Any man who runs a theatre which the ladies patronize, or a newspaper which the ladies love to read, has hit upon the secret of success. For, while a man may stray into the theatre whenever he likes, he is soon and easily wearied, and is not much given to straying there in any case. But a woman may not go alone, and if she fancies a play it means two admission fees. Also, a man's pleasure is soon forgotten; but a woman is likely to animadvert upon it for days following, to spread a report of it abroad, and to do a great deal of gratuitous advertising generally. As she warms with the theme she imbuces all her female relations with her own fancy, and they in turn attack their newspaper-trenched husbands. Do you not all know the process? As for the newspaper, it is woman's natural intuition which leads her to select unerringly the one which not only has the most news, but the best manner of telling them. As for the publishers, the book-dealers will tell that they would soon be obliged to close their doors if they depended upon men, for women do the better part of the world's reading, though men write all the master books. To return to Boccaccio. Upon the first night the curtain fell upon the first act at the hour when it now falls upon the second, and upon the second when it was almost the morrow. A dress rehearsal would have secured all the necessary cutting in good time—would have prevented an infinity of boring and growling, and would have brought much more money in at the doors the second, third, and fourth nights. By that time it began to be bruited abroad that Boccaccio was something quite delightful; and, as to appreciate music you must hear it more than once, the first-night people very sensibly began to stray back again, and very sensibly to contradict themselves. Backed by such an authority as Emerson, this is easy to do. He says: "A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines. With consistency a great soul has simply nothing to do. He may as well concern himself with his shadow on the wall. Speak what you think now in hard words, and to-morrow speak what to-morrow thinks in hard words again, though it contradict everything you said to-day." I said last week, O sage of Concord, that the second act of Boccaccio was inexcusably bad. I say to-day that it is incontestably the best in the opera. What with the clipping of the amateur's wings, some most discreet cutting, and the delightfully smooth manner in which everything now runs, one has time to observe that almost all the gems of the opera occur in this act. First, there is the pretty sweetheart song, then the coopers' catching chorus, the pretty trio serenade, the charming reading of the letters, and what not besides, including the finale. True, Miss Lily Post who is extremely pleasing as the barber's fickle wife, has all her music in the first act. So, also, is the sweet little song at the church door, faintly suggestive of the "Last Rose of Summer," which little Miss Plaisted sings so prettily, Miss Emelie Melville so feelingly and expressively. For the rest, the amateurs revolve about as usual, though with a trifle more ease, and Max Freeman has toned his performance down a shade, and is infinitely more acceptable. There is another recantation to make. It is hard when one gives honest advice, however small its weight, to be misconstrued. Therefore, when one, writing of the three acts of Boccaccio, says, "Flee the third," it is rather disconcerting to have the compositor put it "See the third." The sentiment concerned has really an altogether different construction, but it gives a chance to say again "Flee the third." That bit of stuff which they advertise as an Italian Commedia del Arte is done in an incredibly bad manner. Furthermore there is neither music nor action to induce any one to sit it out. Fortunately, it is the last, and one may enjoy the first two with simple and unequivocal delight.

Is it not Hazlitt who says we occasionally see something on the stage which reminds us a little of Shakespeare? I am quite sure he would have included Adelaide Neilson's "Juliet" among them. It has been objected a thousand times that by the time an actress knows how to play "Juliet" she is too old to play it. It is only given to one in many to play it in the heyday of youth with all its fervor and passion, and Miss Neilson is one of these. Every one should see her "Juliet" once, even though the management have so very injudiciously raised the prices. It has kept hundreds of people away who would have willingly spent the money twice over. The raising of prices is always an unsafe venture in this city, and is never justifiable except in the case of the grandest of our grand opera seasons. But every one should invest just once to see "Juliet," for when Miss Neilson shall have retired from the stage, it will become historical like Miss O'Neill's or Fanny Kemble's, and it will be something to remember by and by when we all get old. What use to criticise it? Acres of paper have been covered on the subject within the past ten years, until almost every one knows her "Juliet" by heart, whether they have seen it or no. It bears traces even now, after these years of playing, of study and elaborations. Little changes have been introduced, and the entire scene eliminated in which "Juliet" receives the news of "Romeo's" banishment. For the rest, "Juliet" is the same rare and radiant creature who flashed upon the town six years ago. Mr. Compton as "Romeo" looked up a little. He has a peculiarly hollow and expressionless voice, but either the "Juliet" inspired him, or he has been carefully trained in the part, for he was really eminently satisfactory. As for O'Neill, he really ought to have been the "Romeo," but in that case he would have left the house hard pushed for a "Mercutio," and he played it in such a way that it was not at all a second part. Elia tells a story of Eliston, an actor whom our great-grandfathers loved to see. He says:

When in melancholy after-years again much near the same spot [St. Dunstan's Church] I met him, that sceptre had been wrested from his hand, and his dominion was curtailed to the petty manership and part proprietorship of the small Olympic, his Elba. He still played nightly upon the boards of Drury, but in parts, alas! allotted to him, not magnificently distributed by him. Waiving his great loss as nothing, and magnificently sinking the sense of fallen material grandeur in the more liberal resentment of depreciations done to his more lofty intellectual pretensions, "Have you heard?" [his customary exordium]—"have you heard," said he, "how they treat me? They put me in COMEDY!" Thought I—but his finger on his lips forbade any verbal interruption—"Where could they have put you better?" Then, after a pause, "Where I formerly played 'Romeo,' I now play 'Mercutio'; and so again he stalked away, neither staying nor caring for responses.

Thus it is with O'Neill. They will not allow him to play tragedy, because a fine-looking young man, without a grain of talent, comes in the train of the star. They have put him in comedy, and he avenges himself by playing it delightfully, and would have carried off all the honors if Compton had not slain "Tybalt" in really superb style. Poor Mrs. Saunders! She filled a trying place in the part of the nurse, and filled it well, though she made quite a different old lady of "Juliet's" trusted friend from the fond, foolish, garrulous old creature with whom Mrs. Judah has made us familiar. But we can not look for an unbroken "Juliet" cast forever.

MORSE'S PALACE OF ART, 417 Montgomery St.

HEBE'S LETTER.

PALACE HOTEL, Friday, June 18.

One of the most delightful of all our sea-side resorts is Pescadero, thirty-two miles down the coast from San Mateo. You take the 8:20 train at San Francisco, and arrive at San Mateo at a little after nine; then you take a Concord coach, and, after passing through a diversified country, dotted here and there with farm, farm-house, and settlement, you arrive at Pescadero about three o'clock. I was one of a party of seven ladies who rode down to Pescadero on Sunday last on top of the coach. And when I tell you that those ladies were all young and pretty and jolly (not excepting myself, mythologically speaking), you will perceive that Jimmy, the driver—and an Apollo Belvidere is that same boy James from the word go, and in love with every red-headed girl on the road—was not only in clover, but pretty completely smothered with it. It was the most thoroughly enjoyable stage-coach ride I ever had in my life, the greater portion of the way being upon a bluff, or a series of bluffs, overlooking the ocean.

I found here quite a number of San Francisco people, who divide their time between picnicking, driving, bathing, fishing, lounging, and pebble, moss, and shell-gathering. Judge Hoffman always spends his vacations at Pescadero, and makes himself quite agreeable, at least to the ladies. At a picnic on Monday last the girls enjoyed themselves hugely making the judge pack water from a neighboring creek; it looked all the more funny, as the judge had just seriously related what he knew about the old New York aristocracy and English nobility. However, they all set a good deal by Judge Hoffman, and always anticipate his coming with pleasure. Among the other guests here are Mr. J. H. Applegate and family, who have spent a month or more at Pescadero for twelve or thirteen seasons; Dr. S. S. Stanbough and wife; R. H. Swain and family; Master B. Patrick, a son of Mr. James C. Patrick; E. H. Holmes and family, W. M. Greenwood, G. M. Britton and family, T. M. Cook and family, Mrs. E. R. Olden, Miss S. H. Burnham, Miss J. Fish, Mrs. W. H. Barnes, Misses Sherman and Stevens, Mrs. E. C. Kindick and daughter, Mrs. Sykes and family, Mr. W. R. Davenport and family, and many others. By the way, Mrs. Davenport is the champion lady-fisher of the season, she having caught as many as sixty or seventy trout in one day.

The new hotel at Monterey is daily receiving accessions in the way of permanent guests, quite a large number having arrived since my scree from there a week ago, among whom are Miss M. B. West, Hyram Joseph and family, A. L. Tubbs and family, P. Chrystal, E. L. Goldstein and family, Stafford Parker, William H. Porter and family, William F. Whittier and family, of San Francisco, and William S. Clark and family of San José. The following-named parties have engaged rooms at the hotel in addition to those I gave you last week: Mrs. J. Sugden and daughter, and S. D. Hovey and wife, who arrive on the 25th; Mrs. D. C. Cushing, James Phelan and family, I. L. Requa and family, A. N. Towne and family, Charles Crocker and family, and a party of nineteen from Chicago, on the 26th; Mrs. McMullin and daughters on June 29, and Walter Turnbull and family on the 30th; also Dr. and Mrs. J. D. Whitney, Mrs. Major A. R. Eddy and daughter, and Col. Fred. Crocker, on July 1.

The swell affair of the week in town was the annual inspection of F company, Second Regiment Infantry, N. G. C., and company drill last Tuesday evening. The attendance was exceedingly select. This is the crack drilled company of the State, and, in the opinion of your correspondent, has the handsomest captain. This is the company that wouldn't tear off the red stripe, you know, under certain circumstances. Company G—that is, I mean "G Company"—is the nob company of the N. G. There is a new company, "E," composed exclusively of members of the Olympic Club, that is looking forward to high honors, and is being drilled by Harry T. Hammond, a graduate of West Point, and at present the lieutenant-colonel of the regiment. Among the ladies present on Tuesday evening last there were Mrs. James Johnson and daughter, Mrs. Colonel Stevenson and daughters, Mrs. Charles A. Low, Mrs. Hall McAllister and daughter, Mrs. Stuart M. Taylor, Mrs. M. D. Boruck and daughter, Misses Carrie Gwin, Dora Miller, Bertha Washington, Mary Meares, Susie Coffee, Lena Cheevers, the Misses Sophie and Nona Smith, Miss Lander, Mrs. Captain Field, Mrs. T. R. Church, Mrs. William Fulton, Mrs. P. B. Cornwall, Mrs. Sidney M. Smith, and many whom I cannot call by name. The National Guard was well represented by its officers of line and staff.

Among the distinguished strangers domiciled at the Palace this week are John Russell Young and family. Mr. Young comes out here on a tour of observation for Bennett and recreation for Young. He will visit Monterey, Los Angeles, Sonoma County, Oregon, and Arizona, and perhaps get up a pictorial sketch of the Pacific Coast after the style of his Trip Around the World with General Grant. Mr. Young goes to San José as a guest of General Naglee on Sunday next; the succeeding Sunday he will spend at Monterey. General Haldeman, a brave Federal officer during the late war, is also at the Palace, en route to Siam, as consul. So, also, are Hon. James B. Angell, the new minister to China, and Commissioner Trescott and son. Mr. Angell was tendered a reception and supper by some friends at the lecture-room under Doctor Stone's church on Tuesday evening last. Ben. Butler, after doing Los Angeles and the Yosemite, returned early during the week. Great crowds daily call on this remarkable character, and quit his presence pleasantly impressed. Ben is here, as he always has been at Washington and elsewhere, strictly agreeable and entertaining when on his good behavior.

The San Francisco Yacht Club gave a hop at Saucelito on Saturday afternoon last, which proved to be a very delightful affair. The officers of the flagship gave a hop and collation last week; it was so pleasant that another is hoped for, although a goodly number of our society people are out of town. On Tuesday morning last Colonel Fred. Crocker, Colonel Gray, and Major Hammond left on a special car for Santa Fé, to be absent until the first of July.

HEBE.

The Californian for July is out, and with a new title-page that suggests the almanac. It is not pretty or tasteful, or in any sense an improvement. The contents are up to the average in excellence, the most noteworthy papers being "The Homestead by the Sea," by W. C. Bartlett, and "The Protestant Hero of the XVIIth Century," by Bernard Moses.

ACTRESSES' LOGES.

A recent correspondent of the staid Thunderer thus discourses: I have often thought that a brief description of the dressing-rooms of well-known actresses would make an amusing article wherewith to please the general public, who now and then like to have glimpses "behind the scenes." In the olden time there was not much to note in dressing-rooms. They were plainly—not to say poorly—furnished, unless the artist added a few knick-knacks to spruce the place up, the management provided nothing but the bare necessities. Rose Cheri, of the Paris Gymnase, was the first actress who really taught her companions to upholster a loge, as they term it in Paris. Her husband adored her; he was rich, and, as she spent six hours of the twenty-four in and about her dressing-room, he bought her furniture that would have gratified the Princess Badroulbador. The carpet was of rich Aubusson; the time-piece was gothic; there was a Psyche of Pradier on a bracket; the lounge was in velvet of Utrecht; there were satin hangings of sheeny texture, in poetic cloudy blue. In short, nothing was wanting to make the retreat of this gifted little actress a boudoir of beauty. Madame Desclée, who came next, stripped this nest of its opulent adornments. The grandioles and the splendours they reflected were cast away, and dull draperies of sad-colored cloth replaced them. The loge of the famous Madame Grisi was always supplied with a store of raw eggs, which the diva sucked before entering on the scene to sing her great embroidered numbers. That of Madame Persiani never lacked the flavor of old cognac, with which the cantatrice used to strengthen her voice, or her "organ," as the critics at present elect to term it. Taglioni, the sylphide, was more temperate. Her little weakness was "limonade gazeuse," a harmless aerial beverage, with stouter brag than body. Madame Guvemard was more sober still. She, in her loge, was satisfied with a gilt looking-glass and four horse-hair chairs. Marie Battu received her friends in a room white, clean, and cheerful as a Chester County farm-house parlor, or a Dutch kitchen. You will remember, it is only the field officers of the mimic army who are complimented with loges; the subaltern must submit to the accommodations of the green-room. Sarah Bernhardt's room at the Française was expensively decorated and upholstered; and in the latter days of her career at the Variétés, the Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein—Madame Schneider—inhabited a room that might have been allotted to a real bona fide grand duchess. To-day, the most luxurious dressing-rooms of Paris are enjoyed by Théod and Judic, the opera bouffists; and Léonide LeBlanc, the actress, has spent ten thousand dollars on her loge.

We have been favored by the publishers with a copy of the Illustrated Hand-Book of Santa Cruz and Monterey, "a work intended to furnish concise and reliable information regarding our two sea-side resorts and their delightful surroundings." Mr. Henry Meyrick, a gentleman who sought and found in Santa Cruz a complete restoration to health, has compiled this hand-book more as a labor of love than a source of profit—and he has done his work well. There are maps and references and sketches—in fact, everything that the tourist, or transient visitor from the city, needs for his guidance. Arrangements have been made for a general distribution of these books in the East and in Europe, and on all the overland and local trains.

The Grizzly Club, an organization of gentlemen connected with the press and literary publications of this city, announces a grand Dramatic Authors' Masquerade, to take place at the California Theatre on Friday evening, July 2. The management is in the hands of well-known gentlemen, which is a guarantee that the ball will be conducted with decorum and prove an enjoyable occasion for all the guests. The stage, orchestra, and parquette are to be floored over, and several new and pleasant features will be introduced.

A good many rich Europeans have subscribed liberally "to keep poor Mario from starving." They are now pleased to hear he still resides, in the most comfortable circumstances, in his palace in the Corso at Rome, that he has resumed his rank and title as Marquis of Candia, that he has white hair and heard, and is in the happy enjoyment, as incumbent of the sinecure post of curator of the Royal Museums of Italy, of the comparatively trifling sum of ten thousand lire per annum.

Here perhaps is the secret of the impressionist school of art. An amateur conversed lately with an impressionist who tried to gain his admiration for a laundress. "It seems to me," said the amateur "that the hands are rather confused." The painter contemptuously replied: "When a washer-woman is scrubbing clothes can you count her fingers?"

A Western actress recently fell down a cellar-way and dislocated half a dozen limbs. She didn't mind that, but when the papers charged her with doing it to advertise herself she was so mad she could have bitten that editor's ear off.

The American engagement of Sarah Bernhardt leads us to think that Boston, next season, will have a dramatic feast—in point of fact, a dessert of Sahara.

Answer this! How can you drive sickness and poverty from your door so well as by the use of Hop Bitters, which produces such health that you are always able and willing to work. Try it.

The expenditure of brain power too early or too severely in children often results in physical debility. The use of Fellows' Hypophosphites exerts a singularly happy effect in such cases.

WOOD'S NEW STYLE GOPHER TRAP*GRAND SUCCESS! GRAND SUCCESS!

One Thousand Dozen have been sold in the past year. One hundred gophers have been caught in a single trap in one week. They are now the best and cheapest trap in the world. Ask your merchants for them, and take no other, as this New Style Gopher Trap is the only one giving perfect satisfaction. Guaranteed to catch gophers when set according to directions where no other trap will.

DUNCAN'S RETREAT, Kane County, Utah, March 22, 1880.
Messrs. Baker & Hamilton: Please send me by mail three of Wood's Cylinder Gopher Traps. I like them. I had not set my last one for over fifteen minutes before I caught a gopher, and I caught quite a number with it. Having left it in my field, however, some one stole it, so I want you to send me three more. I enclose postage stamps, not having currency. Please register them; I enclose ten cents extra for that purpose.

Respectfully Yours,

ROBERT W. REEVE.

DIRECTIONS.—Wherever fresh dirt is thrown up, dig until the open horizontal hole is exposed, as shown in cut; then place the trap wholly in, and set a board at an angle behind the trap, and cover with dirt in such a manner as to form a dark chamber behind the trap, which the gopher tries to fill, and frees the spring.

Push the spring door back until it passes the end of the rod, which it will do only when the back end of the rod is close to the back of the trap; then also push down the front of the rod until the back end rises to the shoulder on the inside of the back door, on which let it rest but very little, that it may be set light, so as to spring easily. Set the trap with spring on top. Steel springs will always break more or less, particularly if small and under water or in damp ground, hence a quantity have been made for free distribution.

If your merchants do not keep them, you can obtain them from

VOL. VI. NO. 26.

SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 26, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

MILDRED'S PIECE OF HUMBLE-PIE.

Under one of the magnificent elms for which Riverview, that old ancestral home, is noted, Mildred sat with her companion; the stillness of the Sabbath and the country brooded over them; the lazy clouds just drifted in the sky; the river sang a dreamful song of rest; the birds sat leaf-embowered, or soared to sunny heights, or sang on sunlit bough; the flies moved through their mazy dances, and the little Sabbath-breaking bees flew by with drowsy humming.

"It is the old, old story;
But to whom it happens, his heart will break."

"Fraulein," he continued, throwing down the book from which he quoted, "it seems to me there is no poet like those old Germans; none who, like them, can put a whole lifetime of love and woe, of love and joy supreme, into one brief sentence; they seem to reach right out for the soul of things, and bring it up standing, so to speak."

"The same is true of German music," said Mildred, "it is full of meaning and thrilling with suggestions, as the thought of their own Black Forest."

"Do you know the Black Forest?" asked Marsden, quickly.

"Oh, yes, as well as ever I shall, I suppose; my old German teacher used to tell me so much about that region and her cherished Hartz Mountains, that even now my heart almost stops beating at the thought of them."

"And, contrariwise, mine beats faster at the mention of those old loved places that I knew when love and hope were young."

"You speak like an old sojourner in this 'valley of the shadow.'"

"And so I am, if time may be counted by heart-throbs—and gray hairs," he added, passing his fingers lightly through his dark, abundant hair.

"It is pretty well threaded with silver," said Mildred, "but it doesn't make you look so very ancient."

"And yet my heart is old and weary, fraulein."

This appellation was an ingenious device on the part of Mr. Harry Marsden. It was entirely respectful and proper, yet as caressing as if he had said "darling." And sometimes, when he uttered it in that slow, sweet tone of his, and with that smiling, tender glance into Mildred's eyes, it sent a tide of blushes over her fair young face; but the sight of Mildred blushing was enough to tempt any man. It was in precisely that blush-provoking way that he had just pronounced it, and he added, after a pause:

"I wonder what a girl like you would do with love."

She turned her rosy face away for a moment; then, with her gaze upon a cloud that slowly faded in its sea of blue, she answered lightly:

"I should treat it very well, I believe, if I knew it to be the real angel."

"And what of 'angels unaware'?"

"I can't afford to make any such hospitable plans as the one included in that rule, since there can be but one Angel of Love for any heart."

"You mean by that—do you indeed believe that we can love but once?"

She smiled. "It is an old, old question, is it not?"

"Yes, old—old as life. But can you answer it?"

"I can but give you my opinion, you know."

"That will be sufficient for me, just now," he answered, with a seriousness that half startled her.

"Well, then, no. Whatever name, men and women may give to their regard for each other, for only one being can it be love. The sacred fire can never be carried to a second shrine, and if it dies it can never be rekindled. Behold my Creed of Love!"

"But to whom it happens," he murmured, and, arising, he walked away to a flower-bed.

The sunshine glinted through the boughs and touched her hair, the shadows of the leaves trembled here and there upon her white dress or flitted an instant across her lovely, thoughtful face, as she sat watching Marsden, wondering at his abruptness.

He returned presently, smiling, and tossing a handful of pink and white balsams in her lap:

"How pretty they are! I used to gather them in grandmother's garden when I was a boy, and they always bring me a vision of that beautiful old soul, smiling over them as she arranged them in one of her precious china saucers. Now, isn't that the pleasantest kind of a way in which a man may 'see his grandmother'?"

Mildred was inclined to be vexed at the cool way in which he received the opinion he had seemed so in earnest about. She began putting the flowers in clusters on her dress, unconsciously giving him a sweeter memory to cherish than even that vision of his admired grandmother.

"And so," he said, at last, "you do not believe in second love?"

"No"—never lifting her eyes.

"If one offered it to you, you would perhaps feel insulted?"

"Oh, not so bad as that," she laughed. "Only I could never consent to take a second place in any man's heart."

"Not if you loved him?"

"Not even if I loved him. First and best I must be, or nothing at all."

"And yet," he said to himself, looking at her thoughtfully, "she does not look selfish, only proud and firm. She will hold to her creed, though it break her heart, till time shall have taught her that love can not be set to human creed or rule."

"Would you care to hear a chapter of my history?" he asked her.

"Above all things, Mr. Marsden. You must have some rich experiences put away, like old letters, to be dreaming over on rainy days. You were dreaming over one just now, I suppose, even on this sunny day; but dream it aloud to me, and I will forgive you."

"Ah, fraulein, it is the sacred story of my heart."

She paled a little, as if she almost feared to hear it.

"During my student life in Germany, in the famous old city of Heidelberg," he commenced, "I became intimate in the family of my classmate, Carl Shaffner, and never did a homesick youth find sweeter welcome and comfort than I did in that hospitable household. Mina Shaffner was often talking of her friend, the Fraulein Rosenberg, who was completing her musical studies in Berlin. She had a rare voice, they said, and might become famous if she would go upon the stage; but her study was purely aesthetic, she was too timid and sensitive for a public career; besides, her family had high notions, and would consider it a disgrace. Bertha was the only one among them all that cared for art. Mina's loving talk of her was so glowing with enthusiasm that I mentally put her down as an over-praised young lady. Mina must have written her a good deal about me, for in a letter, which she gave me to read, the fraulein said: 'As for your American, I am surely to be disappointed in him, you praise him too much.' [Here's a curious coincidence, I thought, feeling a little piqued.] 'However,' she continued, 'I am learning some English songs for him.' That soothed my slightly wounded vanity, and I began to take an interest in the young lady. I should have mentioned that she was soon to pay her friends a visit, and had promised Herr Shaffner to sing at a festival in which he was interested; for meinherr was a musician also, and Fraulein Bertha was a great favorite with him. It so happened that she did not arrive until the day of the festival, and I saw her for the first time when she appeared upon the stage. I could not describe her face as I saw it then any more than I could her singing, or the effect that both had upon me—it was all exquisite, pure and fine, and sweet as a perfect idyl. 'Twas

"Like the milky way in the sky,
A meeting of gentle lights without a name."

"Mina had spoken of her as being timid: I was surprised, therefore, at her perfect repose of manner. 'At her age,' I thought, 'it can only come from perfect forgetfulness of self; and, indeed, that was the key to her character, the charm of her winsome beauty. After her song I threw her a bunch of blue violets; being recalled, she appeared wearing them on her breast, and with a smiling glance at me, where I sat with Mina, she sang our loved 'Sweet Home.' It was the song I least expected, because the most common of our English songs; yet there is none so dear to us, so thrilling with life's fondest memories; and heard as I heard it then, far from a home toward which the heart yearns with unceasing affection, it is touching beyond expression. There were a good many English and Americans present, and I assure you mine was not the only head that was bent to hide the homesick tear. I left the hall that night with my senses in a curious whirl, and the days that followed did not in the least dispel the wild dreams that had taken possession of me. I was deeply, undeniably in love. How beautiful she was, how womanly and sweet! That she should love me so wholly and devotedly seemed to me too blissful to be real; and to this day I cannot understand how such a woman could give herself, with such utter steadfastness, to me."

Mildred bent her face to the rosy blossoms in her hands, then turned her gaze a little wearily toward the river where it disappeared far down among the sighing willows.

"You are tired, fraulein, and a little pale," he said, gently. "My selfish, sentimental story wearies you."

This tone brought the swift tears to her eyes, but she bravely forced them back, and answered, brightly:

"Oh, no, I am not tired; your romance interests me exceedingly. Pray continue; I am anxious to know if the way of your true love ran smooth."

"No; it bore the Shakespearean test. We had a rough and heavy sea to cross before we reached our quiet haven. Bertha's family had grander plans for her than a marriage with a young American nobody. She had a persistent suitor in the Count von Schlesinger, an old debauchee, but after all a noble, able to take his countess into the highest circles, where, with her beauty, her rare musical gift, and the charm of her winning character, she was sure to have a career of dazzling brilliance. They were infatuated with the prospect, and steeled their hearts against the young girl's gentle pleading. But she had a power of resistance that they never suspected. To her the idea of such a future was horrible; bound to a dissolute old man, forced into scenes that were distasteful to her retiring nature, separated forever from him she loved so faithfully—the thought was unendurable. She could not and would not accept it."

"After finishing our course at the university, Carl and I set out for a year or more of genuine travel—I say genuine, for we had always spent our vacation in some kind of an excursion that we dignified by the name of travel. I heard constantly from Bertha by way of our faithful little Mina, who would have gone through fire to save us. Maddened by her firm resistance, Bertha's family were tormenting the poor girl to such a degree that her delicate constitution was beginning to give way. We had been absent a little more than a year, when Carl said to me one day:

"I thought you Americans had more spirit—pluck, as you say. If I were in love with Fraulein Bertha, I would not leave her to suffer the persecutions of those creatures that call themselves her father and mother. Do you imagine they have any longer a claim upon her obedience? I would take her from beneath their very wings, and from under that old red nose of their noble count. My mother said this to me long ago, and added that we must not interfere; but I can't stand it any longer!"

"Did the dear mother say all that?" I cried, springing up. "All that, and more, my brother."

"It was the kindling breath that fanned into flame the long-repressed longings of my heart, and even from the hills of Palestine we turned our steps and hastened homeward. When we arrived at Heidelberg we found that the Shaffners had gone to their summer retreat. This was a most romantic place—an old deserted monastery in the region of the Black Forest. It was a noble building, that staunchly resisted the ravages of time and neglect. Over its lichen-stained walls the ramping ivy spread with unmolested freedom. Its linden grove embowered a throng of nightingales, as mad with melody as those of which Coleridge writes; the fountains, fed by never-ceasing streams, fell over their broken, mossy basins to the green turf at their feet, and nourished the wild flowers that sprang up in profusion. The habitable portion of the monastery was magnificent with richly stained windows, frescoed ceilings, carved pillars, and painted panels. There, long years before, unresting souls had wrought from the genius that could not be quenched by fast or feast, but burned and grew within them to a holy flame that wrought its visions on their prison walls. I had known not what feeling of mingled reverence and compassion as I gazed upon them."

"To this retreat we followed the family of Shaffner. We arrived late, and, leaving our horses a little distance away, we quietly approached toward the light and laughter that came through an open window. Mina, as usual, was the centre of the group, relating in her piquant way some droll adventure, at which the others laughed and applauded. But my quick, love-sharpened sight had discovered a dearer one, sitting a little apart, leaning against a great carved pillar, round which the fire-light played, now lighting up its grotesque figures, now leaving them in deeper gloom, to shine like a halo around my darling's golden head and sweetly smiling face, and now just climbing to her listless folded hands. She was like an angelic vision to me."

"I could not meet her then and there, before them all. Whispering to Carl to join them and not mention me for the present, I turned to the lindens, just where a fountain murmured, shimmering in the moonlight. The song of the nightingales filled the grove with a passionate outpouring that gave voice to my over-full heart. The calm beauty of the night, the distant glimmer of the stars that showed in glimpses between the trees, the lonely splendor of the golden moon sailing high over head, the grand repose of the monastery, the dim, mysterious outline of the great forest beyond—all combined to hush my wildly throbbing heart, and I was about to leave the grove, when, like a part of the dream-like scene, Bertha, in her white dress, came slowly through the moonlight. The nightingales were mute, the music of the sad-sounding waters, the stirring of the night wind in the linden leaves, was all that could be heard. Fearless as Una, she came, pausing beside the very fountain where I stood, and dipped her fingers in the clear waters. Hidden by the shadows, I neither moved nor breathed, it seemed to me; the moonlight shone full upon her face, and I saw that tears were on her cheeks; and sweeter to me than the notes of the nightingales sounded her voice, although so low and trembling, as she sang a little song of love and tender remembrance:

"Ich denke dein
Wenn durch den Hain.
Der Nachtigallen
Accorde schallen.
Wann denkst du mein?"

"Ich denke dein
Im Dämmerchein
Der Abendhelle
Am Schattenquelle.
Wo denkst du mein?"

"Ich denke dein
Mit süßem Pein,
Mit bangem Sehnen
Und heissen Thränen.
Wie denkst du mein?"

"With faltering voice I took up the well-known song:

"O denke mein
Bis zum Verein
Auf bessern Sterne!
In jeder Ferne
Denk' ich nur dein."

"Can I ever forget my darling's look while she listened, or when I came out from the shadows and took her in my arms and kissed her tear-wet face?"

"That was long ago—it seems to me as if a century had passed since those days of youth and love—those summer nights when I walked with Bertha beside the fountains and under the lindens of the Fatherland, and listened to the 'sweet accord of the nightingales.' Many a night, too, have I left my sleepless pillow to walk alone in the grove. Gazing at the dark and slowly crumbling walls of the monastery, I used to wonder if ever one of its old inmates had thus crept forth with tortured heart to walk beneath these trees. Heaven knows. 'It is an old, old story.'

"But the end of those days soon came for Bertha and me; we were married, with the whole Shaffner family for witnesses, in a little English church, whose rector was my friend. We sailed immediately for America. That was ten years ago; three years of unbroken happiness were ours—in the fourth my Bertha died, leaving for my only solace our one child, my little Mina. I have grown old and gray and weary since that time."

His story was ended; the torn petals of the flowers lay at their feet—a breeze came up, and scattered them across the lawn.

"There they go, fraulein, the rosy hopes of youth. What shall we do when the rose bloom has departed, and we walk alone in gray, deserted paths? My little friend, your weeping gives me sweeter comfort than you know, and dearer than I ever thought to find this side of heaven. You are the first woman I have met, in all these years, for whose sympathy I have cared—your companionship has been to me the very balm of rest."

The sun was sinking slowly down behind the woods, the white clouds turning to faint amethyst and rose.

"Shall we have a fair morrow, fraulein?" he asked, with tender tone, as he followed her gaze toward the sunset.

For all answer came the rich song of an oriole from a blossoming shrub, till at last Mildred said, as in a reverie:

"Who heaps his goblet wastes his wine."

And Marsden, with that smile of his, added the refrain,

"Ich bin dein."

"Tea is weddy, eve'ybody!" cried little Lulu, flying down the path, "and the table is all setted out on the porch, and do please to come now."

"Are you in such a hurry, Lulukin?"

"Yes I are, cause I want my strawberries."

"Here goes, then!"

In the twinkling of an eye the little pink and white fluff was on his shoulder, and, with a bow to Mildred, away went the pair, Lulu's golden curls flying out upon the breeze, her joyous laughter rippling back to Mildred, who came, slowly enough, along the flowery path.

When she reached the porch Lulu was entertaining Marsden on an account of her kittens, and how they "ran after each ozzier one."

But tea, things to eat, after such a story as Mildred had just heard! Her soul revolted. Yet the little table was a pleasant sight, all so daintily spread on the wide, breezy porch. Around them the roses nodded and the honeysuckles swung their perfumed censers—their evening service was beginning. Before them stretched a noble view of broad, elm-dotted meadows, and silver, winding river, upon whose opposite bank reposed the little village of Riverside. Above its brown roofs the church spire, with its gleaming cross, stood clearly outlined against the pale-blue sky, where here and there melted a lingering fleck of rose cloud.

Mrs. Challis, Mildred's Aunt Mary, was an artist in tables; the village people thought it hardly possible to have a tea-meeting, or festival of any kind where tables were spread, without some of her deft touches in the decoration.

"If it ain't a treat to see her trim a table!" said one of her admiring neighbors. "The way she twists a vine round a cake basket, or puts a bouquet together, or lays the sprigs over a plate of cold meat, is wonderful."

"It's a gift from the Lord," piously answered the deacon's wife.

And so it was; the perception of beauty, the artistic touch that weaves it in with every prosaic act of life, is a gift from the All-Beautiful. But let us return to Mrs. Challis's own tea-table on the porch, with its rare service of silver and china, its delicate, sprig-garnished meat, its vine-wreathed basket of cake, its snowy bread and golden butter, the strawberries in their crystal dish, glowing on a bed of their own dark leaves, and flanked by their adjuncts of sugar and luscious cream. In a wine-glass beside Marsden's plate was a bunch of large wild violets. He flushed a little when he saw them, and glanced at Mildred.

"It is late for violets, Mrs. Challis; or do you cause flowers to blossom at your pleasure? I should not be surprised at that, you have such a way with them."

"No, Mr. Marsden, I have no such magic gift; but there is a good deal in searching after beauty. Lulu and I discovered these to-day in a cool and shady nook by the river. The snow lingers there so long that Spring is almost in despair before she can get a chance at adorning it. I know the place of old, I always get my late violets there; and, like all things discovered late, they are very precious."

"Yes; and I have a peculiar love for blue violets, but I did not dream there were any more in reserve for me."

"What's the matter, Cousin Milly?" Lulu, sharpest of infant terribles, was beginning. "You look dust as if—"

"See here, Lulukin, hear the goats going up the mountain," said Marsden, shaking his goblet of water to set the bits of ice tinkling against the glass like distant tiny herd-bells.

Mrs. Challis, perceiving that something like trouble was in the air, made artful endeavors to promote ease and appetite.

"Milly, have some more cream on your berries. Mr. Marsden, taste this white cake; it is from Mrs. Bowker's choicest recipe, and it was through a special dispensation that I obtained it. She was in a glow of gratitude to me for helping to decorate her parlors and tables for a grand party. If you can get Milly to describe that party, you will think it as rich and rare as her cake."

Milly having regained her composure, the repast went merrily on until the vesper bell sent its sweet call across the water, and they walked through the meadow-path to church. Mildred, through her gentle courtesy, acted as village organist; or, rather let us say, through a desire to render her tribute of praise by means of any talent that God had given her, though there were those who called it an act of condescension on her part. She had also accomplished a good work in training the voices of the choir, and it was with pure taste and fervent feeling—led by her fine touch upon the organ—that they sang that night their old pastor's favorite hymn:

"The night is dark: I can not see the way.
Lead Thou me on."

Marsden's eyes grew tearful at the closing lines:

"Till with the morn those angel faces smile,
Which we have loved long since, and lost a while."

When he bade adieu to Mildred at the gate, he said: "Fraulein, it seems to me to-night as if even this side 'the sweet fields of Eden' there might be 'rest for the weary'; and, if you ever come to believe it possible for a man to love one woman's memory and another's sweet human presence, believe, then, that I love you, and am waiting for you."

Under the summer starlight he walked away, and Mildred watched him until his form was lost in the shadows.

"Yes, lost in the shadows!" cried the voice of Mildred's heart. "Oh, my love, my one hope of happy life, lost in the shadows of the past!"

Alas! for

"The old, old story.

To whom it happens, her heart will break."

Poor Mildred! That fair summer night, that might have left her the happiest of loved and loving women, was spent in bitter weeping—the burial time of the sweet young hopes that had fallen victims to her "creed of love." Ah, my Mildred! did you not know that for all immortal things there is resurrection and eternal life?

* * * * *

"That was a foolish theory you used to hold, Milly—that no one, under any circumstance, could love but once. The truth is, so far as my experience teaches me—and you will admit that I have had a pretty large one—there are some natures that are capable of but one real love. You remember Howells's lines:

"The tree whose strength and life outpour
In one exultant blossom gush,
Must flowerless be forever more."

Yes, Mildred had bitter cause to remember these verses; she, too, had quoted from them; and her heart thrilled with sweetest sorrow at the memory of the answering voice that had added their refrain:

"Ich bin dein."

"That is true of some," Mrs. Challis was saying, "but they are not the grandest or best, though they may be most intense. I have known the purest, most lovable of men and women, fond, faithful, and devoted in a first love, yet equally so in a second. In fact, a love that comes late in life—when the heart has been deeply tried, the judgment ripened, and the perceptions of character quickened by experience—must be fuller, richer, and even sweeter than 'love's young dream.' I know of many a second marriage that is as nearly perfect as any human state can be, though the first was one of the sweetest dreams that young hearts ever know. In a word, Milly, love is not to be bound to any one's theory—no one can lay down a law for another's spiritual experience; and here is the end of my sermon, though I don't know why I should take such pains to convert you from a theory that you must have outgrown. I am very much like Uncle Jasper, 'When I git to goin' a argerin', seems as I couldn't stop till I'm clean run down.'"

Both women laughed, for the imitation of "Uncle Jasper's" peculiar drawing tone was perfect.

"Well, Aunt Mary, if you could have converted me from the theory that I not only preached but practiced, three years ago, you would not have seen your niece going steadily and unflinchingly on toward the doom of an old maid."

Mrs. Challis looked at her a moment with the tender, questioning look of a mother.

"My child, you know I have never tried to force your confidence, but there have been some points in your life which, I confess, have not been explained to my satisfaction."

"My dearest aunt," Mildred answered, "if I thought I had ever grieved your tender heart by any want of confidence, I could not forgive myself; I have always confided in you as I believe I would have done in my mother, yet there has been one experience in my life of which I could not speak, partly because of my natural reserve, and partly because I felt it would grieve you to know how I suffered. Time has dulled the pain, though he has not yet healed the wound," she said, smiling and blushing; "I can speak of it now to you, and it may all be told in half a dozen words—Mr. Henry Marsden was a widower."

"Now, you never mean to say," cried Mrs. Challis, excitedly, "that you refused Harry Marsden for such a silly girl's whim—that splendid!—oh, Milly Day, you wretched girl!"

"Yes, Aunt Mary, it is all too true, 'that splendid,' and I am indeed a wretched girl. But, oh, the bitter, bitter humble-pie on which my soul has fed all these three years!"

Here Mildred broke down and sobbed passionately; her aunt's distress was complete, though a moment's reflection seemed to brighten her up wonderfully.

"Well, Milly, humble-pie is wholesome food for youth; I'm sure it has done you good. But did it never occur to you that Mr. Marsden might some time reappear upon the scene? He did not seem like a man who would give a woman up so easily."

Milly recalled his parting words—though indeed they were never long forgotten—"Believe, then, that I love you; and am waiting for you." For a moment a new, glad hope sprang up in her heart, but she would not entertain it, and answered, dolefully:

"No, it is too late. I dare say he was married long ago to some less exacting woman; for if a man may love twice, why not thrice? You see, I have grown liberal in my views," she added, with a little cynical smile that ill became her womanly, sweet face.

Three years of study, travel, and society had done much for Mildred. From a girlhood sweet and thoughtful, they had developed a rich and noble womanhood—a mind evenly balanced, and well stored with life's best wisdom. Her culture had been complete.

After all, how vain it is to try to plan one's life for any time, since that shaping destiny is ever about our way, and at every turn points us to a new path. Now, there was a great and wonderful thing about to happen to Mildred, though she had not the slightest warning of it, so silently, so suddenly does Fate approach.

Mr. Marsden, she had learned, was in Germany, whither he had accompanied his little daughter, who was to be placed, during a course of German study, under the care of her mother's friend, Mina, now the wealthy and beautiful Frau von Blumenwald, and it was said that Marsden intended to remain in that land, so dear to him by association. Mildred thought it highly probable; but, however it might be, it could make no difference to her, since by her own folly he was forever banished from her life. No repentance, however bitter, could restore that golden opportunity that had once been hers. That he could, through such a length of time, uncouraged by a sign from her, remain true to his parting words, she had not the faith to believe or courage to hope. But, oh, how dear he was to her! How beautiful, and wise, and good he seemed to her in comparison with other men that came to woo her—some of them, perhaps, his peers, but him only she saw in the glorifying light of love and loss.

She had long ago translated the German song of which he spoke, Bertha's song, and often when she sat alone at twilight, singing the songs she loved, and that gave voice to her longing heart, she sang that one, softly, almost timidly, as if Bertha herself might be listening and smiling at her. So she sat one night in the gathering shadows of the parlor at Riverview. She was quite alone; her aunt had gone to the village; Lulu, tired out with her long play-day, was fast asleep in bed; and Mildred was indulging in the odd songs and snatches of melody that came at random to her thought. With a little tender thrill and tremble of her voice, that sounded so sweetly in the great room, she sang at last her song of remembrance:

"I think of thee when in the grove
The nightingales sing of their love.
When dost thou think of me?"

"I think of thee at eventide,
Dreaming the shady fount beside.
Where dost thou think of me?"

"I think of thee with tender fears,
With sweetest pain, with burning tears.
How dost thou think of me?"

"Oh, think of me until we meet
Beneath some brighter star, my sweet;
Though ever stray my wandering feet,
I think alone of thee."

Though here were neither fountains nor nightingales, the yearning, faithful love was hers, and doubly sad in its despair. If he to whose memory she sang could have heard this cry of love from her heart of hearts, surely it would have awakened anew the love he once had given her, for, though so long denied and scorned, it might be slumbering yet.

Ah, heavens! what voice was that, thrilling through the gloom?

"Fraulein, Liebkin, do you yet believe in me?"

No need to give other voice to her answer than that one glad cry; and, oh, what joy on earth so sweet as the bliss of resting in that faithful heart, whose depth of love she never more could doubt.

CALISTOGA, JUNE, 1880.

And now the Albanians and Bulgarians are carrying on again. There is but one solution to this Eastern question. Looking into "Childe Harold," Canto II., observe the picture of the party reclining on the rock. Observe his legs. They are clothed in bags. He is an Albanian. Turn to your "Eothen" and read: "The immense masses of clothes that swathe his limbs, force the wearer in walking to swing himself heavily round from left to right and from right to left." That animal is a Bulgarian. The unspeakable Turk wears bags, of course. The philanthropy of Europe must be roused to reform this point, and the Western nations stirred up to woo white-robed Peace beneath the cry of "Let no guilty bag escape," by conscientious thoroughness of extermination. When there shall no longer be a Bulgarian to massacre, nor Turk to perform the office, and the last Albanian lying on his rock shall have been pitched over it to enrich the soil he is too worthless to till, the home-farm of the Constantines may once more know repose, and the partitioning powers recoup the expenses of their missionary labor.

An extraordinary marriage recently occurred in Odessa. The bridal party assembled in the church with due formality, but the priest unexpectedly refused to perform the service on the ground that the bridegroom was drunk. The young man's father immediately yanked him outside the church, and gave him a first-class bouncing to sober him off. Meanwhile, the father of the bride proclaimed her engagement annulled, and invited any eligible candidate for the vacant place to offer himself. Two young suitors promptly presented themselves. The bride and her father, after a few minutes of decision, politely dismissed one, while the other took his station before the altar and was married to the insulted bride.

An incident in the marriage of Dr. Wilm and the young Princess of Wurtemberg: During the ceremony the clergyman exhorted the groom to love and cherish with all the strength of his soul the woman who, in order to cling to him, had renounced all the grandeur and dignity of her royal position. The young princess did not seem to relish these remarks, for, after pronouncing the "sacramental yes," she added with charming vivacity: "I have renounced nothing which was dear to my heart, and am perfectly happy." The loud applause with which these words were received showed how much the audience admired the noble lady's spirit.

An indignant tenant and a rather negligent landlord were overheard in the following conversation:

Tenant—"My chimney smokes."

Landlord—"What does it smoke?"

Tenant—"It smokes everything."

Landlord—"Has it tried cubebs?"

Tenant—"Cubebs!"

Landlord—"Yes. Give it cubebs. The chimney has probably got the catarrh. Smoking cubebs will clear the passage."

THE VACATION OF MUSTAPHA.

One of Bob Burdette's Fignments.

Now in the sixth month, in the reign of the good Caliph, it was so that Mustapha said: "I am wearied with much work; thought, care, and worry have worn me out; I need repose, for the hand of exhaustion is upon me, and death even now lieth at the door."

And he called his physician; who felt of his pulse and looked upon his tongue, and said:

"Twodollars!" (For this was the oath by which all physicians swore.) "Of a verity thou must have rest. Flee unto the valley of quiet, and close thine eyes in dreamful rest; hold back thy brain from thought and thy hand from labor, or you will be a candidate for the asylum in three weeks."

And he heard him, and went out and put the business in the hands of the clerk, and went away to rest in the valley of quiet. And he went to his Uncle Ben's, whom he had not seen for lo! these fourteen years.

But when he reached his Uncle Ben's, they received him with great joy, and placed before him a supper of homely viands, well cooked, and piled up on his plate like the wreck of a box-car; and when he could not eat it all they laughed him to scorn.

And after supper they sat up with him, and talked with him about relatives whereof he had never, in all his life, so much as heard. And he answered their questions at random, and lied unto them, professing to know Uncle Ezra, and Aunt Betbesda, and once he said that he had a letter from Uncle George last week.

Now they all knew that Uncle George was shot in a neighbor's sheep-pen, three years ago, but Mustapha wist not that it was so, and he was sleepy, and only talked to fill up the time. And then they talked politics to him, and he hated politics. So about one o'clock in the morning they sent him to bed.

Now, the spare room wherein he slept was right under the roof; and there were ears and bundles of ears of seed-corn hung from the rafters, and he bunged his eye with the same, and he hooked his chin in festoons of dried apples, and shook dried herbs and seeds down his back as he walked along, for it was dark. And when he sat up in bed in the night he ran a scythe in his ear.

And it was so that the four boys slept with him, for the bed was wide. And they were restless, and slumbered cross-wise and kicked, so that Mustapha slope not a wink that night, neither closed he his eyes.

And about the fourth hour after midnight his Uncle Ben smote him on the back, and spake unto him, saying:

"Awake, arise, rustle out of this and wash your face, for the liver and bacon is fried and the breakfast waiteth. You will find the well down at the other end of the cow-lot. Take a towel with you."

When they had eaten, his Uncle Ben spake unto him, saying: "Come, let us stroll around the farm."

And they walked about eleven miles. And his Uncle Ben sat him upon a wagon and taught him how to load hay. Then they drove into the barn, and he taught him to unload it. Then they girded up their loins and walked four miles, even into the forest, and his Uncle Ben taught him how to chop wood. And they walked back to supper. And the morning and the evening were the first day, and Mustapha wished that he were dead.

And, after supper, his Uncle Ben spake once more, and said: "Come, let us have some fun." And so they hooked up a team and drove nine miles, down to Belcher's Branch, where there was a hop. And they danced until the second hour in the morning.

When the next day was come—which wasn't long, for already the night was far spent—his Uncle Ben took him out and taught him how to make rail fence. And that night there was a wedding; and they danced and made merry, and drank and ate; and when they went to bed at three o'clock, Mustapha prayed that death might come to him before breakfast-time.

But breakfast had an early start, and got there first. And his Uncle Ben took him down to the creek and taught him how to wash and shear sheep. And when the evening was come they went to spelling-school. And they got home at the first hour after midnight.

And when Mustapha went to bed that morning he be-thought him of a dose of strychnine he had with him, and he said his prayers wearily, and he took it.

But the youngest boy was restless that night and kicked all the poison out of him in less than ten seconds.

And in the morning, while it was yet night, they ate breakfast. And his Uncle Ben took him out and taught him how to dig a ditch.

And when evening was come, there was a revival meeting at Ebenezer Methodist church, and they all went. And there were three regular preachers and two exhorters and a Baptist evangelist. And when midnight was come they went home, and sat up and talked over the meeting until it was bed-time.

Now when Mustapha was at home, he left his desk at the fifth hour in the afternoon, and he went to bed at the third hour after sunset, and he arose not until the sun was high in the heavens.

So the next day when his Uncle Ben would take him out into the field, and show him how to make a post-and-rail fence, Mustapha would swear at him, and smote him with an axe helve, and fled, and get himself home.

And Mustapha sent for his physician and cursed him. And he said he was tired to death; he turned his face to the wall, and died. So Mustapha was gathered to his fathers.

And his physician and his friends mourned and said: "Alas, he did not rest soon enough. He tarried at his desk too long."

But his Uncle Ben, who came in to attend the funeral, and had to do all his weeping out of one eye, because the other was blacked half-way down to his chin, said it was a pity, but Mustapha was too awfully lazy to live, and he had no get up about him.

But Mustapha wist not what they said, because he was dead. So they divided his property among them, and said if he wanted a tombstone he might have attended to it himself, while he was yet alive, because they had no time,

OUR SPIRIT THAT WAS.

Recommended to be Read in Patriotic Churches on the Fourth of July.

Many and many a day ago
(When he who writes was a hoy),
A soldier's head, as white as snow,
Was out in the general joy.

The street was thronged, and huzzen notes
Clanged far on morning fair,
And from a thousand marching throats
Glad huzzas filled the air.

The brilliant flags breathed softly out,
Like blessings on the breeze,
Up-horne it seemed upon the shout
Of martial sympathies.

The aged soldier sat at home,
With grandchild on his knee,
His cracked voice shrill, above the drum,
Far-reaching in its glee.

Flag after flag went by his door,
And hove its colors low—
Low at the cottage of the poor—
But this was long ago.

And when the pageant passed him by,
Till distance held its noise,
He told—and with a heavy sigh—
This story for the boys:

"Hit was arter we'd crossed the Dillewar—
The Gin'ral pitched his tent,
I was on guard, an' peeped in thar,
An' see him a sittin', hent—

"Bent over at his little stand,
(Hit was dark outside as pitch!)
An' he hed a paper in his hand;
Hit was writ or in print—dunno which.

"The clouds was thick in the winter sky,
An' the mud was a kind o' froze,
An' I was trampin', a by an' hy,
In the way 'at a sentry goes;

"An' I see the Gin'ral read that thar
(He on'y wore specs at night),
An' hear him say "God!"—he didn't swar,
But he howed his head in the light.

"I jist walked soft as a cat right then,
With the muskit, up and down;
But I swore, over and over agen,
"—the English crown!"

And here the pensioner struck his cane
On the floor with a vinful thud,
For his dim eye seemed to see again
The trail of the troops in blood.

"What was that as the Gin'ral read?
Wall, at fust I couldn't contrive,
But arter I knowed—a reward for his head,
Whether taken dead or alive.

"Ah, them was the days, as writ Tom Paine,
'The days for to try men's souls'—
When men were true in the hurricane,
An' the ship a-plowin' the shoals.

"For we was whipped an' runnin' away,
An' there was desertars, a few;
But Washington hadn't a word to say,
'Cept orderin' us what to do.

"He was jist as calm as a summer sea
When all around looked lost;
But the British found, next day, 'at he Took Hessians for less'n cost.

"But I'll never forgit that time on guard
At the Gin'ral's tent, at night,
When he was readin' a king's reward
An' leadin' a losin' fight.

"But that's what made us—jist that kind
Of honor that resked hit all,
An' hung to the cause in heart an' mind,
A-hearin' no other call.

"Not money against, nor money for,
To him made a mite o' odds.
He follered his duty, an' fit the war
In nary a fear hut God's.

"But there was others, an' more will be,
Who'd sell their souls for coin,
An' swap off a cause to the innemy,
Or any cause they'd join.

"An' you mark this, my freeman son:
Whenever it's money fust
To a public man, his Union's done
An' rotten enough to hust."

And here the old man rose to his feet,
As he put his grandchild down,
And, tottering off in his stamping heat,
Went muttering of a "crown."

His pious daughter took the child,
And, wiping away its tears,
The crown, "said she, "just sets him wild,
And then he curses and swears."

Yea, let him swear—he knows the cause
Whereof he speaks and—Why!
To damn the crown is the law of laws
On the fourth day of July.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

A Bohemian of the first water was recently turned out of his lodgings, and installed in a miserable little room absolutely without furniture. He met a friend and said to him: "Lend me a chair?" "What for?" was the answer. "My dear, I should be so ashamed if burglars should come into my room!"

A young couple, just married, are passing the honeymoon in a pretty villa.

"Tell me, my love," said she, "that you are not tired. I fear sometimes that you regret your bachelor life."

"On the contrary, my angel," he replied, "I regret it so little that if you were to die I would marry again right away."

At the Mabile: "Lea, do you know what the Argentine Republic is?"

"Not exactly, my dear; but I should suppose it is a republic where everybody is very rich."

A lady recently married was detailing to the girl she wished for a servant the advantages of the place.

"The work is very easy. There are but two of us, and we have no children."

"Oh, madame," cried the girl, "I pray you will not inconvenience yourself on my account. I adore children."

At Monte Carlo it was.

A female habitué of the place, seated at the rouge-et-noir table, slyly endeavors to pick up a stack of louis belonging to another gambler of the opposite species.

"I beg your pardon," says the young man, politely but firmly, "but those are mine."

"They are mine, monsieur," she explains.

"Well, I am firmly convinced about it, madame; still, to avoid unpleasantness, I'll tell you what I'll do—I'll divide with you."

"Agreed."

"Ah, then," says the young man, raking up all the coins, "you see they are not yours, sissy."

X. is dining one day at the house of an old lady, who takes him to task for having stained his shirt-front with wine.

"I always do so," he says, carelessly.

"I never do," says the old lady, sharply.

"That is because your mustaches, madame, are not yet quite as long as mine."

The new girl had only been with them a week when she came to say she was going away.

"Why?" asked the lady.

"The place does not please me."

"Again, why?"

"Well, monsieur is altogether too cold."

In the Principality of Gerolstein:

A gendarme arrests an unknown and suspicious-looking individual.

"Your papers, sirrah!"

"It isn't usually the custom to ask a traveler for his papers, is it?"

"Not usually, but there are so many people wandering up and down the country without means of subsistence—"

"My name, then, is Schipmann."

"Ah, you are the man that stole two hundred thousand florins last week?"

"I have that honor. You see, cap, that I am not without means of subsistence."

"You are right. Beg pardon for stopping you. Pass on."

"My cousin, whom I sent you last week, doctor, is an imaginary invalid, isn't he?"

"Of course he is. The fellow has a constitution which defies all our remedies."

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

June 12, 1880.—I am writing from St. Jo, in Michigan, where I have been staying for a few days since the convention. This small village, lying across the lake (Michigan) from Chicago, is the metropolis of a fruit-growing country that finds its market in that city. All the region round about, so far as I have prospected, is divided into small "fruit farms," from five to forty acres, and devoted to growing all the temperate fruits, beginning with strawberries in the early spring, and ending with apples in the late fall. Here I see in its larger development what I am so enthusiastic about, and concerning which I have written so much in California—viz., an industrious, cultured, and refined people, maintaining themselves in comfort and independence, in the enjoyment of the luxuries and refinements of society, by the cultivation of small farms. I have within the past three days driven about among villages and through country lanes, where I have seen not less than ten thousand people living with churches, schools, society, and enjoying all the higher privileges of civilization, yet the whole area is not so large as many of the great unsightly cattle and grain farms of our State. Where broad acres and machinery are substituted for small holdings and personal cultivation, the results are one wealthy ranchero, a multitude of shiftless, unambitious laborers, and an army of tramps—in contrast, as here, with beautiful homes and contented, happy men and women, with troops of joyous children. This is a country where there are few rich men, and where many count themselves as poor; but it is, nevertheless, a better country than ours in all that constitutes healthful conditions. When I observe this people, and their industries, and their mode of living, I wish the people of the county of Berrien could be set down within some of our beautiful valleys and beneath our genial sky, to illustrate what results could be achieved by small farming. However, we must not be impatient, as our various colonies throughout the State are beginning to demonstrate what can be done with us. The growth of vines, the cultivation of fruits, and the curing of raisins will, in process of time, give us a rural population of which we shall be justly proud—an intelligent, industrious, prosperous, middle class; middle between the peasant and the feudal lord; independent because living upon and cultivating its own acres, and patriotic to save the nation, because it owns it. Growth in this direction is indispensable to save the country from the demoralization and profligacy of the great towns.

I have had but small opportunity to make any observation concerning the result of the Chicago nominations. The Eastern press have so far commented not enthusiastically, but not unkindly, upon Mr. Garfield, and not at all enthusiastically, and indeed scarcely friendly, upon the name of Mr. Chester A. Arthur. He is identified with the machine, has no public record other than in the New York custom-house, but is admitted to be a gentleman of business capacity, and of unquestioned personal integrity. He was nominated to conciliate Conkling, and Conkling was willing to be thus conciliated because it was a rebuke to the Administration to have the National Republican party choose for one of its corners a stone rejected by Hayes. Conkling had two friends turned out of office by Mr. Hayes. One he has made Governor of New York, and one (if he gives the State of New York to the Republican party) he makes Vice-President of the United States. Conkling is an able man, a great leader, vain, imperious, and tyrannical, and will never again attempt to cast the vote of a united delegation in a national convention. The district representation system strikes a fatal blow to the insolence of the leaders, and hereafter Cameron and Logan must be content to wield only such power as comes from their genius and the legitimate influence resulting from party service. We may swap off three or four great machine-drivers for a multitude of smaller men. Had Chandler lived, and had Logan not have raised this scandal in Illinois, there would have been no serious revolt in New York or Pennsylvania, and Grant would have been nominated without serious opposition. The Illinois quarrel was so pronounced in the streets of Chicago, and in the galleries of the convention, that it exercised a great influence over delegates, and nerved them to an irreconcilable opposition to Grant. The arrogance of Conkling and Logan was displayed with such unbounded insolence that all their opponents were welded together in opposition to Grant and the third term. I think the country has escaped a great peril. The rank and file of the Republican party has achieved a great triumph; but, as it is in the nature of an internecine struggle, I am not certain that it will not cost the party a great effort to win a victory over the Democracy. So far, among the people of this region, there is no enthusiasm. The name of Garfield has stirred no man's blood. I have attended one political meeting in this village. If it is a specimen of the campaign, the campaign will be a cold one. Reference to the war, allusions to past conflicts, even the bloody shirt, created no apparent interest. I believe the nomination of General Grant would have made a more earnest contest, and I am not quite sure that his election would not have been more certain than that of Garfield; but, as every one knows, I would prefer the election of almost any Democrat to that of General Grant. Had General Grant declined a party candidacy on the day he landed in San Francisco, he would today be the grandest human figure of God's creation. He is to-day a defeated party candidate—dragged through a national convention, as Ajax was dragged by his hair around the walls of Troy. He was sacrificed by the Triumphs, and everybody in convention believed that he was being used. There has been a vast deal of laudatory bosh over the fact that three hundred and six delegates stood by him. Mr. Emory Storrs proclaimed this fact as something immense; that in thirty-six ballots he lost no friends. When the personnel of his following is analyzed, it will not seem so altogether wonderful. One hundred and twenty delegates from Republican States—and these nearly all packed and stolen—and the balance darkeys and politicians from Southern States that can cast no Republican electoral votes. The candidacy of General Grant has been in the nature of a conspiracy, and his defeat is, in my judgment, a triumph second only to that which preserved the Union from dismemberment.

The dense ignorance which prevails all over this country in regard to the Chinese question is something most unac-countable. I had supposed, as the question was a national one, and had passed both houses of Congress, that it was generally understood. The press has a flippant, superficial way of treating the subject that is altogether disgusting, while the leading delegates and representative men in the convention were in almost total darkness. Mr. Edwards Pierpont, chairman of the Committee on Resolutions, admitted that he knew nothing of the matter, and yet he attempted to formulate a resolution for the platform composed of well-mouthed and euphemistic nothings. This was the resolution that our press so justly scored. Another and a stronger resolution was only substituted after a hard struggle. The Republican party is now, however, pledged squarely to legislate for the restriction of Chinese immigration, and as I have no doubt that the Democracy will outbid us in this direction, we have a reasonable assurance that this Chinese evil will not be allowed to increase. The thing that ought to be done is for the Republicans of California, and the Democrats as well, to send some of our best speakers to stump in the Eastern States and discuss this Chinese problem. A revolution of public sentiment might be wrought in this way, and this campaign affords the occasion. I commend the suggestion to the leaders and managers in both parties. I have made one anti-Chinese speech in Michigan, and it was listened to with a greater interest than is accorded to any of the exploded questions of the war. I am mistaken if eloquence expended in this direction would not be more profitable, if not more interesting, than any recital of incidents in the lives of candidates, or any biographical reminiscences of the early struggles of barefooted boys driving horses on the canal. Most of our delegates, availing themselves of the time and expenditure that have brought them to Chicago, will take occasion to visit Eastern friends. This is what I am doing, and I shall turn myself homeward about the twentieth of this month. Mr. Huff, of Alameda, is also here at Saint Jo. It is his native place. F. M. P.

Grant.

Great captain! glorious in our wars!
No need of praise we grudge to him;
We breathe about his brow the stars
That neither time nor chance shall dim.

But History, as she brooding bends
Above the tablet on her knee,
The impartial stiles half suspends
Before she writes the cold decree:

The wisdom won in fiery air
Of siege and battle scarce availed
To serve him when he sought to wear
The civic laurels. There he failed.

In that to other brows they fall,
More fitting, let him read his fate:
In battle, great among the small;
In statecraft, small among the great.
—Thomas Bailey Aldrich.

To James A. Garfield.

Thou who didst ride on Chickamauga's day,
All solitary down the fiery lane,
And saw the ranks of battle rusty shine,
Where grand old Thomas held them from dismay,
Regret not now, while meaner factions play
Their brief campaigns against the best of men;
For these spent balls of slander have their way,
And thou shalt see the victory again!
Weary and ragged, through these broken lines
Of party reel, and thine own honor bleeds.
That mole is blind that Garfield undermines,
That shot falls short that hired malice speeds.
That man will live whose place the State assigns,
And whose high mind a mighty nation needs!

A bird's nest made of a love letter and miscellaneous stuffing was recently picked up underneath a tree in a Cincinnati suburb. Closely interwoven with the bits of sticks and dead leaves and little tiny feathers was a little leaf from somebody's little diary. It was weather-beaten and yellow, and on one side so worn, no doubt by the going in and out of little red-breast, that the words, delicately written in a girl's hand, could only here and there be deciphered. On one side was "Katie: We have often met and spent an hour together. Will these hours be soon forgotten? When we part, our paths will lead in different directions. Perhaps we may never again meet in this world. Shall we remember? P. B." On the opposite side was Katie's reply. It began:

"Ah! heart, so sadly broken,
Cease, cease thy panting thrill;
Those vows so falsely spoken
Have done far worse than kill.
The sun has lost his glory,
The queen of heaven her light,
So sad—" (And here Katie's verse was bitten off.)

To Messrs. A. L. Bancroft & Co. the Argonaut is indebted for the following books and pamphlets: Joan of Arc, by Janet Tuckey, one of the "New Plutarch" series; Life, His True Genesis, by R. W. Wright; Free Land and Free Trade, by Samuel S. Cox; Putnam's Library Companion, Vol. III.; William Ellery Channing, his opinions, genius, and character, by Henry W. Bellows; and Monsteur Leocq, from the French of Emile Gaboriau. The last-mentioned book is republished in this country by Messrs. Estes & Lauriat, of Boston. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, print the others. Mr. Cox's brochure—it is scarcely more in the literal sense—is both entertaining and instructive. Chilion Beach sends us Helen Campbell's clever Sunday-school story, Unto the Third and Fourth Generation; and also Henry Wikoff's Reminiscences of an Idler, a bulky volume of rather heavy self-adulation. From Messrs. Billings, Harbourn & Co., we have the recent Boston sensation, Certain Dangerous Tendencies in American Life; Mrs. Whitney's new novel, Odd or Even; Martha Finley's last contribution to the interminable "Elsie Series," entitled Elsie's Widowhood; and two oddly contrasted volumes—latitudinally considered—Selden Jackson's Alaska, and Titus Coan's Adventures in Patagonia.

Some one observed to Monsieur de L., who was about to wed a girl of seventeen, that he was rather old.
"I am old enough to do for both of us," said, gallantly, the old gentleman.

A BICYCLE TRAGEDY.

A bicycle is dangerous, not when it is in motion, but when it is at rest. It is then that it throws its rider and tramples on him viciously. When the novice tries to get on his bicycle, he invariably falls over and under it two or three times. If he once gets it started at a fair pace, it will be docile until the fatal moment comes when he must try to dismount. As soon as the speed of the bicycle is checked it begins to wobble like a dying top, and if the inexperienced rider can manage to dismount without falling off, he is exceptionally lucky. The only way to avoid this humiliating method is to hire a man to catch the bicycle and hold it. Of course, after long practice the bicyclist is able to mount and to dismount eight or nine times out of ten without an accident; but the certainty that an inexperienced rider must end his ride by lying on the ground with his legs almost inextricably tangled with the spokes of the driving-wheel deters timid souls from becoming bicyclists. That the sport is an innocent one is generally admitted, and the bicycle is rapidly growing in favor with young and athletic clergymen. Hitherto they have been compelled to content themselves with croquet, but that sport demands on the part of the player a degree of self-control which renders it difficult for a nervous or irritable man to play it with credit. There are clergymen who can smile and keep their tempers when told by their leading parishioners that they have cheated by claiming "hoops" which they had never passed; and there are exceptional clergymen who can even be struck on the ankle with a mallet by an angry sister and meekly turn the other leg to the striker. Such men are, however, confessedly rare, and it is no wonder that the average young clergyman hails the bicycle as a welcome and safe substitute for the croquet mallet. And yet in one conspicuous instance a worthy clergyman has been utterly ruined by a bicycle, and his case may be useful as a warning to other and, as yet, more fortunate men. What has long been desired is a motive power, other than the human leg, which is capable of being applied to the bicycle. This great want has, it is claimed, been lately supplied by an ingenious Chicago inventor. He has constructed a bicycle driven by the expansive force of a strong steel spring. When the machine is to be used the spring is wound up. The rider then leaps into his place, and the moment his weight presses the saddle the spring is released, and the bicycle starts off at full speed, thus obviating all danger of falling. The spring is warranted to keep the bicycle in motion for an hour, and by pressing a lever placed immediately in front of the saddle the machine can be instantly stopped. Rests for the feet, unconnected with the treadles of the driving-wheel, are provided, and the rider can thus journey without making the least exertion, until, at the end of an hour, he is obliged to dismount and wind up the spring. The Rev. Mr. Macpherson had been for nearly a year the rector of the church in Ishkatakahunky, Iowa, and, together with his young and attractive wife, had won the warm admiration of all but the unmarried ladies of his parish, when he became interested in bicycles. Being young and athletic, he soon became an excellent rider, and every afternoon, after four o'clock, he was accustomed to mount his bicycle in the back yard, to ride swiftly down the carriage path to the street, and thence through the village. As the house was an isolated one, and no curious neighbors were near, Mrs. Macpherson undertook to learn to ride, and in a short time was able to mount with ease and to ride the length of the yard, where her husband would meet her and hold the machine while she dismounted. She greatly enjoyed the sport, and it may possibly have been in order to remove the temptation to venture to ride outside of the yard that her husband avoided teaching her to dismount without his help. A fortnight ago Mr. Macpherson bought one of the new Chicago spring-motor velocipedes, without informing his wife of the nature of the purchase. It was delivered at his house while he was absent at the Diocesan Convention, and his wife was filled with admiration of its beauty. She was entirely ignorant that it was in any respect different from other machines, and late in the afternoon she determined to try it. Her husband not being at hand to help her dismount, she called the cook, and gave her full instructions as to how to catch the machine and hold it. Then, taking the new bicycle to the extreme rear of the yard, Mrs. Macpherson sprang into the saddle and was off at a speed of fifteen miles an hour. It need hardly be said that she was terribly frightened. Scarcely less frightened was the cook as she saw her mistress sweeping down upon her at so terrific a speed. Instead of trying to stop the machine, she screamed wildly and ran out of its path. The gate was open, and Mrs. Macpherson whirled into the street. She would have given worlds to stop the runaway bicycle, but she did not know the secret of the lever, and she did not dare to risk her life by jumping off. In a few minutes she found herself entering the long, principal street of Ishkatakahunky, and saw that the inhabitants were flocking to the sidewalk to watch her. She was crimson with horror as she reflected that the machine was strictly designed for riders with trousers, and for a moment she almost made up her mind to throw herself to the ground regardless of consequences. Fortunately, she reflected that the results of a fall would be even more startling and extensive than those entailed by keeping her seat; and so, trying to comfort herself with the reflection that they were real Balbriggan, and unusually tasteful in color and pattern, she rode on. She would gladly have changed places with Mazeppa, who rode through a desert instead of a crowded street; and she envied Lady Godiva, who had induced the people of Coventry to close their window-blinds. The sensation she made as she rushed through the village, and out again upon the prairie, can not be described; but she knew perfectly well that no possible story that she could devise would be accepted in explanation of the frightful impropriety of which she had been guilty. The runaway bicycle came to a stop ten miles out of Ishkatakahunky, and close to a railway station. Mrs. Macpherson promptly took the train to Milwaukee, where her parents resided, and then telegraphed to her husband. Of course, she never returned to Ishkatakahunky; and Mr. Macpherson was requested to resign his parish, on the ground that the conduct of his wife was to the last degree scandalous. He has since given up bicycling, but he is under a cloud, and his hopes of usefulness in the church are ruined.

THE TEMPLE OF ASAKUSA.

The professor looked vaguely to the southern horizon, one sunny winter's afternoon in Tokio, and opined that we had best go to Asakusa. We were busily sight-seeing, but we had not yet visited the famous temple, nor heard much of it, for the residents soon grow indifferent to the lions of the place.

Asakusa was at the edge of the city, a good five miles from the legation reservation; and, as we spun along the smooth streets of Tokio and across Nihon Bashi—an insignificant arched bridge, from which all the distances in Japan are measured—we learned that Asakusa had once been an independent village; but the growth of the big, million-souled city had crept to its edges, and finally swallowed it in, so that it was now but a district, and famous for its temple, where the common people went to pray and all the world went to stare.

The streets seemed to grow narrow, the people more numerous, as we approached Asakusa; and it was finally in the midst of a most turbulent crowd of top-knotters that we halted at the main entrance. A long, stone-paved avenue, lined on either side with booths for the sale of the most extraordinary articles, led the way to the gate. But the profane jinrikisha and the profaner trap may not roll their desecrating wheels upon the pave, and we willingly walked this little distance to see the strange sights which surrounded us. A procession of Japanese men, women, and babies formed behind us, to take close observation of our dress, manners, and gait, for the foreigner is not yet a familiar spectacle in all parts of the capital. The clatter of their clogs accompanied us throughout the entire afternoon, for they came up in relays, and one squad relieved another as curiosity was gratified.

The booths were small wonders in their way, and devoted mostly to the sale of toys, which the Japs have a pretty knack at making. But, besides, there were pipe-booths, book-stalls (vastly different looking affairs from our own they are, too), devotional stalls, where prayers and beads and incense were sold, and refreshments of various kinds displayed in the most attractive style of Japanese art. There was rice set out most invitingly in red lacquered bowls or oblong dishes; there were tea-kettles simmering in the hibachi; little white flaky rice-cakes, and some candy—real Japanese candy. Then there were fish, laid out in every style—some of it sizzling and frying just then in some sort of foul-smelling oil; some of it raw, but ready for eating, and looking not unpalatable on the big round trays of "old blue." There were eels impaled on skewers, and covered with soy—said to be the foundation of all the Eastern sauces—and a lot of terrified-looking little oysters.

As we neared the big red gate—seventy or eighty feet high—a lot of old beldames greeted us with an unintelligible chorus, which we finally discovered to be an appeal to buy their wares. These consisted of beans, set out five in a lot, on a little plate; each plateful cost a hundredth of a cent, or some such magnificent figure, and the expressive pantomime of the old women finally showed us what the beans were for. They pointed overhead, where hundreds of pigeons were whirling and circling, as much at home as if it were San Marco's itself, where all well-regulated pigeons seem to belong. They are left undisturbed of the faithful, and it is deemed a holy and a wholesome thing to treat them to a few beans now and again.

We entered by the great, red, useless gate, and were within the great Temple of Kuanon. It is delightfully ancient, magnificently dirty. Kuanon is the Goddess of Mercy, and there are many temples dedicated to her throughout Japan, but this is the chief and greatest of them all, and, as a temple, is unique. It has the black-tiled roof of all the temples, with its beautiful parabolic curves and immense gables, and the usual decorations of bronze and lacquer. But we were not obliged to take off our shoes, as at Shiba, to walk over polished lacquer floors; and we stood cheek by jowl with the gods, and examined, not at all irreverently, but as we might a bit of curious ware.

We are confronted, first, by the two frightful, highly-colored demons called the Ni-O (two kings), which guard, like dragons, the front of every Japanese temple. They are hideous, frowning, contorted monsters, and whether they were gods or demons we could not well determine; but that the faithful seek to propitiate them was evident, for their prayers were there in very tangible form. The wide-meshed wire screens which guard them were hung with hundreds of straw sandals of every grade and size, put there by people with sore feet, who in this manner pray for recovery. These ungainly idols were covered with prayers in another and a worse form—spitballs! When your Japanese is in fervent mood he writes his prayer on a bit of paper, chews it to pulp, and throws it at the god. If it stick, his prayer will be answered; but if it drop, he will have prayed in vain. It is a very funny thing to see a man throw a spitball in a spirit of true and rapt devotion. Within the temple one sees, first, the usual censer, with some indescribable monster rampant upon its lid, and clouds of incense rising up about his ungainly head. The old woman who tends the sacred fire receives a few coppers for a pinch of incense from every one who passes within. It is a cheerful, lively place. The cheery chatter of conversation and the ripple of laughter are heard everywhere, for your Jap's religion is not at all a solemn affair. He is on the most cordial and intimate terms with his gods, and if he grow devout it does not at all interfere with his pleasure.

It is true the chief god, in fact the entire main altar, is guarded by a wire screen, but this has been rendered necessary by the spitball form of prayer. But there are exposed gods in various parts of the temple, and if you could see old Binzuru you would understand the wear and tear involved in being a popular god. He is reputed to cure disease. Catarrh is his specialty, a disease to which, in that damp climate, the natives are peculiarly susceptible. So the natives have rubbed noses with him, lo! these many hundred years, until the poor god's nose is rubbed off. His ears, eyes, and mouth eventually followed it, and the rubbing of hundreds of thousands of rheumatic members has carried off his arm. So there he stands, a dirty, greasy, black, dismembered, denuded, old god, but a prime favorite still.

There are gods and goddesses here, there, and everywhere;

Buddhist disciples, some handsome carvings, and some rare old paintings—called in Japan kakimono, although everything is a kakimono, whether embroidered, painted, or written, which hangs on the wall as ornament. Some of these are pictures of angels, but there are no Michaels or Gabriels in the Buddhist list. The angels are all feminine. It is curious to see some of the devotees reverently counting beads in the most Roman Catholic fashion, but there is a tradition that some missionaries of that faith invaded the island some two or three hundred years ago, and the beads are probably a remnant of their forms. We prayed a prayer and passed out—not the objectionable form of prayer, but bought one in a decorous manner, and burned it in a cleanly way.

Outside the temple all was festivity and gayety. One street of the district is entirely given up to shows of all kinds. Great illuminated placards, which dimly suggested our circus posters at home, flashed from the walls; but they were gotten up in an odd, fantastic style—for there is a touch of Dord-like exaggeration in the Japanese brush. The Japs outside rattled rude castanets, and called the value of their wares in a shrill treble to the passers-by. We halted and hesitated which to choose, but finally decided upon a huge Siamese elephant, and passed into a tent. Perhaps we did not decide aright, for he looked precisely as an elephant does in any other country; but there seemed to be something delightfully absurd in his understanding the Japanese language. A tiny little Jap, who thought it polite to adopt the manner of a bashful boy speaking a piece, was expatiating upon the animal's attainments in the high-pitched, artificial manner which they adopt as being the elegance of public speaking.

From the elephant we strolled to the shooting galleries. There is a whole street of them, and they are presided over by pretty young girls. With the unerring sagacity which distinguishes his species, the professor made straight for the youngest and prettiest and brightest of them all. The hair-dresser had not called that day, and her hair was hanging down her back like a long black mane; but her face was fresh from the cosmetic brush, and her black eyes sparkled, and her white teeth shone through a bewildering amount of red and white. She was charmed to meet the foreigners, and coquetted with them in the most delightful manner—for the art of coquetry has attained its highest degree in Japan. She asked the most embarrassing questions in the plumpest manner, and wanted to know where we came from. America was a word quite unknown, so we stammered, in a mixed gibberish, that we had come from five thousand miles away—Go sen ri? Ah, no, she could never believe it. From the moon, perhaps, or from one of the three thousand worlds which some Japanese maker of literature had visited; but five thousand miles on this little world? Impossible. She would have us to try her shooting gallery, and brought out several sets of bows and arrows, which she handled in the daintiest way, for they cultivate every motion of their fingers, and are immensely vain of their dexterity. The bows are of the universal bamboo, and the arrows of cherry wood—little things not a foot long; they are tipped with bone, and the feathers are of gay colors. She hit the bull's-eye every time, practiced as she was, and laughed in the most delighted manner if we hit the drum, in the centre of which is the bull's-eye, or even the cushion which flanks it. She served us with tea in tiny cups of egg-shell porcelain, and bade us adieu in the most regretful manner as we crossed the way to see the wax-works.

Though not so old as the temple, they have been one of the attractions of the Asakusa for a longer time than we Americans know how to count. Like the temple they are dedicated to the Goddess of Mercy, Kuanon, and are supposed to perpetuate many of her deeds. They are in a low, shabby building, and one winds through the most labyrinthine passages following up the figures, for they are all arranged in tableaux. There are, perhaps, thirty-five or forty of them in all, and they are really wonderful works of art. The most intelligent travelers declare them to be superior to Madame Tussaud's, and certainly in the dim light of the place they are strangely real and life-like. If they had but a little distance to help the illusion, it would be next to impossible to detect them as wax. But there is neither glass nor gauze intervening. You may hang over the rude rail, and almost touch them. The expression upon the faces is something wonderful, and between them all is represented almost all the emotions. The veins and muscles and lines, the very tint of the different skins, is there with vivid intensity, while the action of the figures is like life. The dresses, of course, are all exactly correct, and you only need a well-informed cicerone, like the professor—who has lived among the Japanese until he knows and loves them and their stories and traditions—to tell the stories of the tableaux as you walk along, to enjoy one of the most interesting sights in the Japanese capital.

From the wax-works we rambled into a garden. Strange to say, although there is an immense number of florists in the cities, although the Japanese are passionately fond of flowers, although you encounter hundreds of peddlers of them in the streets, the flora of Japan is not large. The camelia, of course, grows everywhere. Great trees of it line the roads, and the farmers make their hedges of it. The chrysanthemum is much prized, partly because it is the Mikado's crest, and the azalea is the summer flower. They grow their fruit-trees for the flower, not the fruit, and their cherry-blossom festival is equivalent to our May-day. In July, the moats and canals are said to be covered with the languid fragrant lotus. It is one of the few flowers that have any fragrance, for I remember gathering some purple violets within sight of great Daibutsu, but they were as scentless as the queen flower of Japan. After all, they best love the wistaria, which they call the fuji, or peerless flower, and train it with a world of care, which its short-lived bloom does not seem to justify. For the rest, they devote themselves to evergreens, and in the little garden at Asakusa tiny trees and shrubs and ferns were contorted into all sorts of fantastic shapes. Many of these ferns have been brought to America made into boats, or balls, or rings, or what not, but they usually remain ingloriously brown, and will not turn to living green. Upon their native heath, where they are tended with practiced hands, they come out in every shape, from a mountain to a mole. In fact, a Japanese flower-garden is a queer-looking, fantastic, toy-like place, and, to speak plain truth, hideously unnatural. But in landscape gardening they are artists beyond cavi. A gnarled old tree impeded our way as we passed through the little Asakusa garden, and we expressed some surprise that it had not been removed; but the look of horror which the mild remark called forth proved us on the spot to be vandals.

The professor pointed to a tiny shoot of green, which was just sprouting from the decayed old tree, and remarked that in the days of the daimios' grandeur, before the abolishment of feudalism, and when the court-yards of the yashikis (their big dwelling-places) were all blooming gardens, any of the barons would have given a thousand dollars for just such a tree, so sanctified with age, if green could yet grow from it. Feeling most ridiculously new—brand-new—we accepted the artistic reproof in a proper spirit of mildness, and retraced our steps to the temple to get out of the Asakusa.

Once more past the greasy gods and the adhesive prayers, the monster censer and the gazing crowd, the lavatory where the faithful wash before prayer, past the tall pagoda which is said to oscillate in an earthquake like a knight's feather, and through the ridiculous red gate which never swung on hinges, past the many-hued, pink-toed pigeons, past the bean-selling hags, down the long, stone-paved, stall-lined avenue—and good-bye to the ancient, noisy, dirty, crowded, curious Asakusa.

BETSY B.

The Rev. J. S. Furnis, a British clergyman, has given the following description of hell, which he designed for the instruction of the young. It is a red-hot picture. Those of our readers interested in details will be entertained. The fiery Furnis opens as follows: "We know how far it is to the middle of the earth; it is just four thousand miles. So, if hell is in the middle of the earth, it is four thousand miles to the horrible prison of hell. Down in this place is a horrible noise. Listen to the tremendous, the horrible, uproar of millions and millions of tormented creatures, mad with the fury of hell! Oh, the screams of fear, the groans of horror, the yells of rage, the cries of pain, the shouts of agony, the shrieks of despair, from millions on millions! There you hear them roaring like lions, hissing like serpents, howling like dogs, and wailing like dragons! There you hear the gnashing of teeth and the fearful blasphemies of the devils. Above all, you hear the roar of the thunders of God's anger, which shakes hell to its foundations. But there is another sound; there is in hell a sound like that of many waters. It is as if all the rivers and oceans of the world were pouring themselves with a great splash down on the floors of hell. Is it, then, really the sound of waters? It is. Are the oceans and rivers of the earth pouring themselves into hell? No. What is it, then? It is the sound of oceans of tears running down from millions of eyes. They cry forever and ever. They cry because the sulphurous smoke torments their eyes. They cry because they have lost the beautiful heaven. They cry because the sharp fire burns them. The roof is red hot. The floor is like a thick sheet of red-hot iron. See, on the middle of that red-hot iron floor stands a girl. She looks to be about sixteen years of age. She has neither shoes nor stockings on her feet. The door of this room has never been opened since she first set her foot on this red-hot floor. Now she sees the opening. She rushes forward. She has gone down upon her knees upon the red-hot floor. Listen!—she speaks. She says: 'I have been standing with my bare feet on this red-hot floor for years. Day and night my only standing place has been on this red-hot floor. Sleep never came on me for a moment, that I might forget this horrible burning floor. Look at my burnt and bleeding feet. Let me go off this burning floor for one moment—only for a short moment. Oh! that in this endless eternity of years I might forget the pain only for one single moment.' The devil answers her question: 'Do you ask for a moment—for one moment—to forget your pain? No, not for a single moment, during the never-ending eternity of years, shall you ever leave this red-hot floor.' Not even the hope, mind you, of 'hardly ever.'

The New York Hour says: A New York belle of a century and a half ago, while on a visit to Mrs. Clinton, wife of the colonial governor of the period, wrote in the following manner of what she termed her "diversions" in the then scantily populated city of New York. After dining—a ceremony apparently performed in the middle of the day—Mrs. Clinton took her guests on board an English man-of-war, then in port. The formidable vessel carried forty guns, and, in the words of the fair writer, "was dressed out with all her colors, well manned, and very fine she looked. . . . Do not say I was mad if I tell you that we stayed aboard until nine the next morning, and that I danced right merrily with my partner, Captain Parce, for several hours on a stretch. . . . As soon as we got aboard, Mrs. Clinton was saluted with fifteen great guns. . . . This vessel is reckoned the finest that has been in New York. As I was never aboard a bigger vessel before than an Albany sloop, it was quite a sight to me, and something—as Mrs. Clinton said—for me to tell my grandchildren." In another letter the same writer alludes to "the many strange alterations that are made in this town, and which again renews a great deal of party discourse. . . . My mother will inform you of these changes, which will afford you an hour or two's discourse." Whether the changes above alluded to could have been a prophetic vision of the new post-office and the Tribune building can not now be determined. An entertainment given at the house of the Chief Justice De Lancy, "on Wednesday was a week," is spoken of "as the handsomest ever given in New York." The letter closes with an offer of "duty and humble service," and "a prayer for long life and happiness," on the part of the young lady, "to the best of fathers." A marked difference certainly exists in the manners of our ancestors and their descendants of to-day. Whether the change be an improvement is a question open to discussion.

Don Piatt, writing in the Capital regarding the cruelty of women toward the fallen of their own sex, says: "We have often thought that, had the crowd gathered about our Saviour, when he was appealed to by the prosecuting witnesses of the woman taken in adultery, been of her sex, his call for the first stone would have been followed by such a fall of geological specimens that Christ himself would have been in danger."

Grief counts the minutes; happiness forgives.

The Lover and the Rose.

Rose, you were at the feast—
The feast I could not share;
Rose, your charms increased
The charms most lovely there.

As on her breast you lay
And watched her red lips move—
Was there any, pray,
To whom they spoke of love?

Rose, you could see her eye
Of soft and star-like beam—
On any one near by
Cast it a loving gleam?

As on her breast you lay,
And heard her heating heart—
Came there any nigh
Who made it quicker start?

"No," breathed the rose, "I vow.
But had there been—I wis
His I had been now,
Nor known your loving kiss."

Blue-Flags—(Fleur-de-Lis.)

What sweet rebellion in thy blood,
My June, hath hid thee raise
Thy royal standards by the wood
And through the meadow ways?
What stir of passion, darling sprite,
Spread these blue banners to the light?

Past lily buds and arrowy blades
The glorious pageant flies;
In sunny shallows, reedy shades,
Unnumbered blossoms rise.
By rocky coast, in salty bight,
Thy banners glitter in the light.

Wrought of warm noons and morning dew,
And painted from the skies,
Say, have they not the very blue
Of Maiden Marian's eyes?
Ah, June, thy flags are not so bright
As those blue banners in the light!

"My Heroine."

I'll introduce you to a girl I know.
"Pretty?" you ask.
Well, I'll attempt to sketch her portrait, though
No easy task.
I fear, however, you'll pronounce her "slow,"
For nowadays
We vote a dash of fastness all the go
(Excuse the phrase).

She's not accomplished—no, indeed, poor dear,
I dare assert
She does not know the latest slang—I fear
She's not a flirt.
She could not name the winner of the Oaks,
She does not bet;
I'm pretty sure she never even smokes
A cigarette.

"A beauty?" Well, she's not considered such—
You girls know best.
Her dearest friends do not abuse her much,
And that's a test.
Perhaps she has not Mrs. L.'s eyes,
Or rose-leaf skin.
But still so sweet a face to criticize
Were downright sin.

She does not scream when skittish "Polly" rears,
Not she—and wait,
'Twould do you good to see the way she clears
A five-barred gate.
She can not sing bravura runs and shakes—
She does not shine
When seated at a "grand"—but then her cakes
Are just divine.

With high-heeled hoots she cares not to distort
Her pretty feet;
Her lilies and her roses were not bought
In Regent Street.
And still more shocking, I regret to state,
Her want of taste;
She can not be induced to cultivate
A wasp-like waist.

You would not in her hair a vestige find
Of "golden" tinge;
She wears it in a simple knot behind—
No trace of "fringe."
Such pretty hair! so lustrous and so long—
A modest brown.

"False, I dare say!" Nay, ma'am, for once you're wrong:
I've seen it down. —Chambers's Journal.

A Mountain Fire.

A long, low murmur on the midnight air,
As of the tide upon some far-off shore;
A swell among pines standing tall and fair,
A whisper as of danger leaning o'er;
A strange light growing up the hollow sky,
Eclipsing the white glory of the moon;
A signal flag, on the wind streaming hy,
Of wreathen smoke outflung, has followed soon.

Out of the darkness starts a tongue of fire,
Wrapping the white trunk of some dead old pine,
Mourning in fierce and absolute desire
To reach the glowing heavens' altar-shrine.
The dark is flooded with the crimson light,
The green pines shiver in the fire's roar;
The scene of grandeur grows upon the sight,
And the wide, doming heavens arch it o'er.

The hollow circles of the smoke uproll
Against a sky of palpitating flame—
Writhing above the pines, scroll upon scroll
Swelling and rising in the crimson stain.
The moon is dead. The stars' green points of light
Merge in the drifting sparks that fill the night;
And the great flames sweep upward, fold on fold,
Till the dark mountain stands swathed round with gold.

BETRAYED.

CHAPTER I.

Madame de Bretache would have been perfect, had it not been for one little fault. She was romantic—though not as is the fashion of to-day. She loved poetry, moonlight, and tales of startling adventure. She did not herself aspire to be the heroine of like adventures—being the most loyal little woman in the world—but her relish for this style of literature was not the less keen on that account. She lived in this world, where she was possessed of a charming husband and of a thousand things which made life desirable; but she lived also in a world of chimeras, a realm of fancy, where the worthy Gaston de Bretache played but a very insignificant part. Nevertheless, Madame de Bretache, who had the most exaggerated ideas concerning conjugal fidelity, and in whose eyes Artemisia lamenting Mausolus was but a very ordinary personage, had not as yet had the slightest reason to complain of Gaston, and flattered herself with the conviction that her husband maintained toward her the same inviolable faith which she herself maintained—and which truly could pass for a model of its kind—inasmuch as the extremely refined sentiments of the lovely Madame de Bretache addressed themselves rather to a Gaston of her dreams than to him who was her liege lord and master; for which sentiments he could in no wise be held responsible, since there was not a grain of poetry in his composition.

To retaliate, he felt all the forbearance of a good-natured Hercules for what he termed his wife's caprices. Therefore, when she insisted that he should wear her colors—in cravats—he submitted to the whim with commendable good humor. For an entire season blue was the predominant color in her dress, and the excellent Gaston exhibited a charming variety of ties of the same hue; then it was red; upon more serious occasions, violet; during the penitential season, Carmelite brown; and invariably Gaston followed the prescribed order with faithful exactitude. He had the same perfume for his handkerchief, the same sachet for his linen. Touching evidences of tenderness, such as these, afforded infinite, delicious satisfaction to Madame de Bretache, and caused her to look with tender eyes upon the recalcitrant Gaston when, on proposing that they should read aloud to each other, he prosaically replied:

"Yes, let us read the newspaper."

This was the extent of his intellectual capacity—all, in fact, that he found equal to his comprehension. But, to do him justice, he took an almost artistic delight in hearing the prosy news through the medium of a sweet, cultured voice; and nothing sent him more comfortably into the "arms of Morpheus" than the recital of crime thus seasoned. Madame de Bretache hoped, by degrees, to cultivate in her husband a taste for literature—a taste which she fondly deemed latent. Meantime, she comforted herself with the reflection that this worldly reading offered her, through some incidental phrase, an opportunity to expand upon the grandeur of "great thoughts," upon the actual nobility of those desperate, forsaken beings who find relief from their sorrows—in the Seine. At the same time she did not disguise her excessive indulgence for the fierce Othellos who played with knives and daggers. Yes, all this she believed to be perfectly right, just, and natural. But she considered it even more just, more natural, that a husband should have eyes and thoughts for his wife alone. Nor did she dissimulate the fact that, so far as concerned herself, she would not submit to inconstancy. She even went so far as to doubt whether she would survive the mere suspicion of such a thing. Her husband listened with calm philosophy, and, when she forced him to reply, he amused himself by teasingly saying:

"But, my dear little one, what difference would it make to you if you were not cognizant of the matter?"

"Gaston!"

"But Gaston does not hold to this opinion. Look at your good friends so and so. Are they more unhappy for it? On the contrary, it is that which makes their husbands charming."

"Gaston, you do not commit such infamies, do you?"

"Do not question me, I conjure you."

"Immediately—I would divine it."

"You would divine it? You would divine nothing at all."

"Yes?" This was said with an emphatic nod of the pretty little head.

"No, I repeat. But meanwhile calm yourself. Your husband is a spotless lamb."

"I do not want a spotless lamb."

"What, then, do you want, imperious woman? Is not my cravat of the prescribed hue? Do I not always return home at a stated hour? Am I not cited as the pearl of husbands?"

"Yes, Gaston."

"Then what more could you ask?"

"Well, I am satisfied." This last after due deliberation.

After this conversation good little Madame de Bretache could not refrain from talking confidentially to one of her friends, one of the "so and so" designated by her spotless husband, in the course of which conversation she naturally let fall a word here and there, touching upon the inexpressible comfort of having a husband who was so exceptionally faithful.

"I acknowledge that, in regard to this subject," said she, "I have but one opinion: the idea of a division of love is simply horrible to me!"

Her friend smilingly listened to these remarks; nor did she hesitate to insinuate some doubt concerning Monsieur de Bretache. The young wife overlooked these insinuations, but did not like them; and it was not without a certain degree of uneasy jealousy that she saw the majority of her friends openly flirting with her husband.

"With Monsieur de Bretache one can be perfectly at ease," said they to her, "for unless you, my dear, are the subject of discourse, we can not command his attention for five minutes." "Monsieur de Bretache," said another, "you will kindly see me home, will you not? You will permit him to do so, my dear? You know he will not be absent longer than need be," and several other pleasantries of like nature.

Madame de Bretache occasionally thought it would have been wiser had she kept to herself the secret of her felicity, but blushed the instant the thought suggested itself, condemning it as cowardice. One must have the courage to confess one's sentiments, especially when those sentiments are noble, delicate, legitimate, irreproachable. All this is true; but the truth could not prevent the tears from falling when her husband said to her one evening:

"My dear, you are giving me the reputation of being an imbecile."

"An imbecile?" she echoed, in tones of astonishment.

"Exactly; and from to-morrow I shall vary my cravats as I please."

"Gaston, you will not do that!"

"I will do it, my dear, and yet love you quite as well as before."

"Some one has won your heart from me?"

"No one is sufficiently ambitious of that honor to take the requisite pains, I assure you; but it is unnecessary to carry one's heart on one's sleeve, and this is what you persist in my doing."

CHAPTER II.

From this time dated Madame de Bretache's unhappiness. Notwithstanding her sighs and the reproachful glances which she directed with her soft eyes toward her husband, he affected a complete independence so far as cravats were concerned, and assumed a gayety which was positively juvenile. However, he continued to accompany her everywhere, and, beyond the little established flirtations to which she should long ago have become accustomed, she saw nothing which could awaken her suspicions; she, nevertheless, watched, with a surveillance which rendered her slightly ridiculous, every act and gesture of "her Gaston;" and those of the ladies with whom he conversed. She did not confess to him that she searched his pockets the morning after a soirée, with eager curiosity; that she buried her dainty little nose in his pocket-handkerchief, and that she even went so far as to investigate into the depths of his opera hat. She was perfectly well aware that Monsieur de Bretache would not approve of this procedure; would, in fact, have denounced it as very wrong. She herself did not consider it altogether right or proper, but she found self-justification for the act in repeating to herself that she must defend her rights; and a secret voice, one of those presentiments which never deceive those who are in the habit of having presentiments, warned her that her rights were threatened. She thought she read a mocking glance in Madame de Lastic's eyes, who was a personage in whom she placed not the least reliance, and whom she knew to be thoroughly versed in all matters pertaining to the world; the first to discover hidden preferences, and the last to keep her own counsel concerning them.

Madame de Bretache—who lived in a cloud—was, on the contrary, profoundly ignorant concerning these things, and had no male friend from whom she could receive instruction. Her two cousins—good-natured boys—inspired no confidence in her. She always kept them at an affectionate but respectful distance. In despair, she resolved to call upon Madame de Lastic, and to observe attentively all that went on around her; but as it had always been her custom to submit, for her husband's approval, the intended programme for the day, she announced at breakfast her projected visit.

Gaston continued to eat, and did not reply—which seemed to her a bad augury; then, to assure herself regarding his intentions, she requested him to accompany her.

"No, my dear; conjugal visits, of all things on earth, are the most ridiculous."

"But, Gaston, we have made innumerable visits together—"

"Yes, and people laugh at us for it."

Madame de Bretache contemplated her plate with an air of consternation; her husband continued eating all the time with undiminished appetite.

"You can very well pay your visits alone now, my dear. Henceforth I do not care to go. What sort of a figure does a man present, anyhow, at your teas? Go to Madame de Lastic's; she will be charmed to see you. I, if I have time, will go some other day, when she does not receive." Upon which he finished his cup of tea, and passed his cup for a second.

Madame de Bretache felt her brain whirl. What! must this perfect union, this life where everything was common, this delicious intimacy, cease? Gaston had burst asunder the loving bonds with which she had held him entranced! Gaston would then resemble all other husbands; she would no longer have the consolation of saying he was an exception. This thought was like a death-blow. She felt that existence began to be an intolerable burden. However, she would struggle yet a little while, and await overwhelming proof, before deciding upon a course. What that course was to be she did not know; but she would not be passive—some active step she would assuredly take. Never would she submit to a life from which had fled light, love, and hope. And with these thoughts she poured out a second cup of tea for her husband, serving it badly, with too much sugar and too little cream; and heard him say, in consequence, that she had better descend from her high pinnacle—at least at meal-time.

After such a conversation, she could not well carry a smiling face to Madame de Lastic's—where they commenced, actually before she had taken her seat, to ask news of her concerning her husband.

"Where is Monsieur de Bretache? How does it happen that he allowed you to come alone?"

The lovely Baroness de Rincy, who was eating a piece of Mayonnaise bread, hastened to say, with her mouth full: "I will venture to assert that Monsieur de Bretache is in the carriage. Lucie is jealous, and has hidden him. Oh, it has been obvious for some time past that you have been hiding your husband."

Madame de Bretache thought that the intimacy of childhood was but a pretext for impertinence; but, as she had not been blessed with the gift of repartee, she could only reply: "I do not hide my husband."

"Do not deny it—do not deny it!" said Madame de Rincy, wiping her lips—slightly Mayonnaise-stained—with her small, highly-perfumed handkerchief.

Madame de Bretache thought this woman used perfumes of extremely mauvais ton. Patchouly was her special aversion.

Madame de Lastic laughingly forbade that anything further should be said concerning Monsieur de Bretache. "Since he is not here to defend himself, do not speak of him." And she began a conversation of polite nothings with Madame de Bretache—the latest comer; while Madame de Rincy, with two or three others, laughed around the tea-table, chatting in a low tone of voice.

Madame de Rincy was the first to rise. Passing Madame de Bretache's chair, she stooped and kissed that lady on the brow, saying: "Farewell, chérie. Do not be angry." With this parting thrust she left the room, escorted by her hostess.

That evening the family dinner was a very silent affair. Madame de Bretache had not the strength of character to enable her to hide her melancholy. On leaving the table, she related to her husband the incidents of her visit. He listened to her good-humoredly, laughingly mocked Madame de Lastic and all women past, present, and to come, and ended by begging her not to be cross. To render the prayer more eloquent, more effective—he kissed her. But Madame de Bretache, instead of returning the caress, turned pale at first, then burst into convulsive sobs. Poor Gaston, overcome by surprise, looked at her with terror-stricken eyes.

"You are ill Lucie—what is the matter?"

"Nothing, nothing."

"How, nothing? People do not cry for nothing;" and he tried to take her hands.

"Leave me, I beg of you, leave me; I want to be alone!"

She left the room with the air of a tragic muse, went up to her chamber, and rigorously imprisoned herself therein. On the morrow, Monsieur de Bretache received a line announcing that his wife was about to retire to her mother. Not a word of explanation, save this terrible postscript:

"Your mustache was scented with patchouly."

CHAPTER III.

Gaston's first impulse was to yield to insane laughter. Then he mentally sent to the devil both women and patchouly. For, in truth, his passing fancy for this especial perfume was not nearly so serious as was that which he felt for Madame de Bretache. He was really concerned upon learning, a few hours later, that his wife's resolution was serious.

Poor Gaston's mother-in-law combatted with all her might her daughter's mad caprice, assuring her, though unavailingly, that one might be the most devoted of husbands, and still perfume his mustache with patchouly. But even the weight of this argument failed to convince Madame de Bretache that she had not been betrayed.

"Betrayed!" This single word threw her into nervous attacks, from which she recovered only to draw an analogy between her wrecked life and those of all the unfortunate women whose peculiar cases memory could conjure up. This continued for some time. The days began to be very long, and soon became interminable. Those around her noticed this, and her mother—a sensible woman—hastened to speak of her husband's repentance, and of his ardent desire to again see his wife.

To this discourse Madame de Bretache lent an ear; but, faithful to her convictions, refused conciliation. "A betrayed woman can only moan over her lost happiness," she said. This happiness commenced to be very seriously compromised; for Monsieur de Bretache, although at first somewhat flattered by the violence of his wife's sentiments, finally became exasperated at her persistency; the more so, that he was made to appear ridiculous in this rôle of adored one.

The affair became noised abroad, and ladies feigned a reluctance to touch his hand, were their own ungloved, at the same time warning him that Spanish kid conveyed a perfume which was indestructible. Deeply annoyed by remarks of this nature, he sought the home of his mother-in-law, baving first come to a definite resolution.

On the morrow, without giving Madame de Bretache the slightest intimation of having received a visit from her husband, the wise lady suggested to her daughter the advisability of making a call upon one of her aunts, whose château was but a two hours' journey from Paris.

"This little change will benefit you. Leaving in the morning, you will be able to return after dinner. Undoubtedly one of your cousins will see you home."

Madame de Bretache, who had become very weary and low-spirited, began by refusing; then hesitated; and finally yielded.

"In fact, I do feel the need of the country. A day's quiet will be good for me."

She was not contradicted; although to speak of seeking quiet in a house where nine sat down to breakfast was slightly incongruous. On the contrary, the need of calm, the salutary effect of country air, was highly extolled. "In the spring time the country is so beautiful!" Madame de Bretache shed a few secret tears at thought of spring, but finally announced that she would go to X—the Tuesday of the following week.

The programme was executed in detail—that is to say, she left and arrived at the stated hour. She found her aunt lovely, but her uncle laid up with the gout, and both of her two cousins absent, each upon an imperative engagement. The day passed in walking, driving, and dreaming—a thousand times was the image of the faithless one evoked. Dinner was late. That surprised Madame de Bretache—in a house where punctuality was insisted upon with military precision. The repast was a long one. When too late she recalled train-time. Well, having missed the nine-o'clock train, it was evident that she must wait the ten—unless she preferred to spend the night at X—.

This last proposition Madame de Bretache positively declined, upon which they consoled her for the unavoidable delay with the usual arguments: "The carriage would certainly await her, as her mother would divine that she had missed the train. Then the ten train was an express, which would go straight through without stopping. After all, if one goes directly home, not to a hotel, it makes but little difference whether one reaches Paris at ten or twelve o'clock at night."

In arguing the matter she well nigh missed the ten train, leaving herself barely time to hastily embrace her aunt, and to spring, without looking, into the first carriage, into which she was assisted. When she was seated, and had time to catch her breath and look around her, she experienced a slight tremor in discovering that she was alone with a gentleman, who was asleep in the corner. They would not change cars, nor would the train stop. Accordingly, Madame de Bretache—coming to a determination—doubled her thin gauze veil and tried to look outside. But the night was too dark, there was no moon, and, besides, a disagreeable little wind came through the open window. She disliked to make a noise and awaken the tranquil sleeper. However, after having attained the moral conviction that she would have a sore throat did the window remain open an instant longer, she arose and pulled the handle with all her might. In vain; the more she pulled the more obstinately stationary the window remained. As she gave it up in despair her fellow-traveler—aroused by the slight noise—passed respectfully before her, with the visor of his traveling-cap drawn over his eyes, shut the window, and returned to his seat.

"The night air is fresh, madame," said he.

She thought that silence would perhaps be aggressive, so replied, frigidly:

"Yes, sir."

Renewed silence, marked by the noise of the train. Madame de Bretache thought she never in her life had traveled in a car whose motion was so disagreeable. The gentleman appeared to divine her thought, for he said:

"It jolts a great deal, but there is no danger."

"I fear none, sir."

"Not but that an accident would have its agreeable features!"

He was becoming impertinent. "Ah, if Gaston were only here!" But henceforth she was destined to travel alone through the journey of life. The gentleman continued:

"We are here imprisoned for a couple of hours. In the impossibility of release, I shall console myself."

This was becoming frightful. For an instant Madame de Bretache conceived the idea of sounding the alarm. But, happily, the gentleman appeared to have understood the significance of her silence, the reserve of her attitude, and apparently acquiesced in her desire to remain undisturbed. Looking at him from under her veil, he appeared to have settled himself for another nap. His air—comme il faut—slightly reassured her. But he was not asleep; he moved; and Madame de Bretache saw, with affright, that he was approaching her.

"You are going to Paris, madame?" She was so terrified that she replied:

"Yes, sir."

"And there your husband will meet you?"

Her husband? Yes, her husband, certainly; for she had one, who would always defend her. It seemed to her that she was evoking him in saying, proudly:

"Yes, sir, my husband will meet me."

"Are you sure of that?" And the wretch, with these words, changed his place, and took a vacant seat beside her. Suddenly, to her terror, she felt an arm around her waist; her head was forcibly raised, and a voice whispered, in tender accents:

"Are you certain of that?"

She gave a scream of terror—succeeded by one of joy.

"Ah, Gaston! it is you—you will save me!"

"Yes—from yourself, my darling."

To her dying day she believed that it was to chance she owed this meeting. As a thank-offering, she became a voluntary martyr to the extent of affecting a taste for patchouly.

SAN FRANCISCO, June, 1880. S. R. HEATH.

It is to be deplored that some one qualified by experience to give the true inwardness of the business, will not expound toad-eating, both as a vocation and a fine art. We have some lively English sketches of the mystery. The craft appears to have been brought to high perfection there at an early date. It has continued to flourish in great vigor. The Germans have cultivated a variety which attains a peculiarly rank development. But neither of these varieties is quite identical with the home-grown American. For one thing, the American patron or patroness does not appear capable of those extremities of savagery—mere brutal truculence and gratuitous insult—toward his or her toad-eater that are reported to thrive in England and to luxuriate in Germany. At the same time, the American toad-eater is not observed to move on quite so depressed a plane of servility as his European congener. Altogether, the general condition of the species upon our shores is doubtless one of comparative comfort, and often not a little real enjoyment. There's "Jim Keene," now: Keene is, without much doubt, an easy, indulgent, and not niggardly patron. A diary faithfully kept by Keene's henchman would be not only priceless to posterity, but its MS. would command handsome figures from the publishers of the Argonaut. We do not wish to beget distrust in any manly or gentle breasts nearer home, or to breed an acetous fermentation in any fount whence the milk of human kindness now flows, to refresh arid and thirsty souls, but we suggest to these dependents that a diary, punctually kept, may, in some future day of pecuniary stress, be found available to relieve the pressure. Apart from the enterprising publisher, it should be apt to command a comforting figure from the former patron—if a he; it might prove a competence, if the patron be a she.

The Ultramontanes, it is announced, are incubating a campaign against Bismarck. This is the first item of cable news in four months that is calculated to accelerate one's circulation. A campaign of Ultramontanes vs. the Prince Chancellor ought to be a fascinating spectacle for all lovers of the fine old sports. In an account of Queen Elizabeth's entertainment at Killingworth Castle, we read:

Well, Syr, the Bear was brought forth into the Court, the dogs set too him, too argue the points even face to face. It was a Sport very pleasaunt of these beests: to see the Bear with his pink nyz leering after his ennmy approach, that if he wear bitten in one place, then what shyft with byting, with clawing, with roving, tossing, and tumbling, he would woork too wynd himself from them: and when he was lose, to shake his ears twyse, or thrise with the blood and the slaver about his fizmny, was a matter of wodle relief.

We are gratified to learn further that this entertainment was "not without risique to the Dogs from the teeth of the other; and it sometimes happens that they are killed on the spot." The cable gives the names of two aspirants for this martyrdom, Prince Edward Radziwill and Count Ballestrow. The chancellor's portraits present a "fiznamy" that might occupy itself with a relish in sprinkling off the blood and slaver of conflict. Anyhow 'twill be brave sport, and we want to buy a pool on the bear.

THE INNER MAN.

Although among the business and laboring classes of many communities the hour for dining has been at mid-day, among the circles of fashion there have been many changes respecting it; the hour which in one period or century was considered highly fashionable, becoming in another period vulgar, and changed for another. Thus in France, in the thirteenth century, nine o'clock was the dinner hour, of which there is a saying extant:

"Lever à cinq, diner à neuf,
Souper à cinq, coucher à neuf,
Fait vivre d'ans nonante et neuf."

Ten was the appointed time, a century later, at which dinners were served both in France and England. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, eleven was the fashionable hour. The hour continued to advance, till in Addison's time two o'clock is mentioned. Thirty years later it was three; and so it has advanced, until now the fashionable dinner is partaken of at any of the hours between five and nine; the moderns imitating in this respect the ancients, who took their second meal at evening. The fashionable world, in thus appointing so late an hour for their dinner, have been obliged to recognize another meal, to be eaten in the middle of the day, and which, though it is entitled "luncheon," is nothing less than an unceremonious dinner.

The following verses illustrate the difficulties and annoyances of modern dinner-giving:

For wealthy palates there be that scout
What is in season for what is out,
And prefer all precocious savor;
For instance, early green peas, of the sort
That costs some four or five guineas a quart,
Where the mint is the principal flavor. —Hood.

One loves the pheasant's wing, and one the leg;
The vulgar boil, the learned roast an egg;
Hard task, to hit the palates of such guests,
When Oldfield loves what Dartineuf detests. —Pope.

Gorgonious sits, abdominous and wan,
Like a fat squat upon a Chinese fan;
He snuffs far off the anticipated joy;
Turtle and venison all his thoughts employ. —Cooper.

Some fretful tempers wince at every touch;
You always do too little or too much;
Serve him with venison, he chooses fish;
With sole, that's just the sort he would not wish;
He takes what he at first professed to loathe,
And in due time feeds heartily on both. —Lid.

A correspondent writes: "I find this in the New York Hour, and it just breaks my heart: 'But the hard and barbarous sliced cabbage known as cole slough should be treated with the contempt it deserves. It is a relic of Dutch barbarism.' Now I think that cruel sentence is real mean. I have Dutch blood in my veins—a very little, though, and I have always liked cole slough; but I know a great many people, of English and even French extraction, who also like cole slough, and they are very nice people, too." If there be among the readers of this department any one who dislikes cole slough, with sufficient intelligence and intensity to say so in these columns, we shall be glad to tender him—or her—all the courtesies and opportunities of the joust.

Another correspondent writes to ask "an infallible recipe for dressing salad." There is no infallible rule for that gracious accomplishment, as there can be no hard and fast directions for being always graceful. "It is the easiest thing in the world to dress a salad. It's as easy as lying," said the late Cutler McAllister. But then Mr. McAllister was a very talented man as well as an accomplished bon vivant. It lies in the heart of every good liver—deeper than truth in a draw-well—that he is the one man appointed by the Lord to dress salads as they ought to be dressed. At most tables the salad is the one rock on which all tastes shiver in contentious foam, and the result is often a sad tribute to mediocrity of skill and poverty of judgment. When once spoiled, no additions can redeem it. There is an old Spanish proverb concerning the right dressing of a salad. It insists that "four persons are indispensable to the production of a good salad, to wit: a spendthrift for the oil—a miser for the vinegar—a counselor for the salt, and a madman to fatigue it."

Brillat-Savarin, in his Physiologie du Goût, complains that the lexicographers of his country have never defined properly the word gourmandise. In the meaning appended to it there is always a suggestion of gluttony and voracity, which is far away from the honest comprehension of the word. It is intended to express the Athenian elegance, the luxurious extravagance of Rome, and the delicate appreciation of the French cuisine.

This recipe for making New England pie is from A Tramp Abroad: "To make this excellent breakfast dish, proceed as follows: Take a sufficiency of water and a sufficiency of flour, and construct a bullet-proof dough. Work this into the form of a disk, with the edges turned up some three-fourths of an inch. Toughen and kiln-dry it a couple of days in a mild but unvarying temperature. Construct a cover for this redoubt in the same way and of the same material. Fill with stewed dried apples; aggravate with cloves, lemon peel, and slabs of citron. Add two portions of New Orleans sugar; then solder on the lid, and set it in a safe place until it petrifies. Serve cold at breakfast, and invite your enemy."

CXXXIV.—Sunday, June 27.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Asparagus Soup. Fried Oysters.
Veal Patties.
Green Peas, Green Corn, Mashed Potatoes.
Roast Beef.
Tomato Salad—Spanish Dressing.
Gooseberry Pie. Blackberries.

Fruit-bowl of Peaches, Plums, Cherries, Apricots.
To make Spanish Dressing—See Argonaut, Vol. I., No. 8.
ASPARAGUS SOUP.—Take thirty-five or forty large asparagus heads. Boil them in a saucepan, with three pints of stock. When done, remove the asparagus; pound it in a mortar, and pass it through a sieve. Melt about one and a half ounces of butter in a saucepan, and mix it with two tablespoonfuls of flour. Add a little sugar, pepper and salt, the asparagus pulp, and all the stock in which the asparagus was boiled. Boil, and, if not of the proper consistency, add more soup stock. Then put in a little spinach greening, and, lastly, a small pat of butter or half a gill of cream. Serve over small dice of bread fried.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1880.

The political game is made, the campaign inaugurated, the lines of battle drawn. We have passed through the fever and fret of conventions and nominations and ratifications to enter upon the task of an election that promises to be more than ordinarily close and exciting. For, contrary to all expectation, the oil of harmony has, as if by miracle, been poured upon the troubled waters. On both sides ambition has been sacrificed on the altar of internal peace, and the hatchet of discord buried to win. Grant has fallen, Conkling has been placated, Tilden buried, and Kelly, the Tammany chieftain, reconciled to his tribe. Everybody is, or appears to be, satisfied. The Republicans are confident of the strength and popularity of their nominees; the Democrats claim that they have not named a better ticket in twenty years. If there are heart-burnings, they have for the nonce been smothered out of sight; if dissensions born of disappointed hopes are still alive, they are not apparent. Both "dark horses" have an even start in the race; both are military men, and understand the conditions and the nature of the contest; both are fortunate in not having bitter personal enemies to override, and the opposition of political hatred and revenge to overcome. One expects the support of the "United North;" the other, though a Union soldier, the backing of the "Solid South." And while the fight is to be à l'outrance, and with the visor down, there is every reason to believe that it will be with the lance and not with the bludgeon—a campaign of principle and decency. With Hancock at their head the Democrats thank God that the sanguinary shirt can no longer be flaunted in their faces, and the epithet of "Confederate brigadier" mouthed to their discomfort. With Garfield to the fore the Republicans have stilled the cry of "imperialism" and the "third term," and in the record of Hayes have silenced the murmur of "corruption and fraud." And with the epithet goes the faction. Lines of separation have been swept away. There are now no "stalwarts," "independents," or "liberals" with Republicans, and in the somewhat disorganized Democratic ranks the Bourbon cavaliers warmly clasp hands with the meanest in the rank and file in a common allegiance. Political lines of the past are broken up, and amid the general reconciliation, there is actually a casting about for some issue, something to distinguish between Republicanism and Democracy, something to fight about and over in the coming campaign. It is clear that the issue will not, can not, be made on the men. The one is as good as the other. Their ability is unquestioned, their records unassailable, their patriotism undoubted. In the matter of personal inspiration of enthusiasm both are colorless, so to speak. The difference in their personal characters is not enough to divide parties. Whence, then, the interest and the point at stake in the forthcoming contest at the ballot-box? Candidly, there is nothing at stake but pride and profit of government on one side, and an itching for the spoils of office on the other. The "ins" do not relish the idea of stepping out, and the "outs" are on the verge of insanity to get in. This is the nude truth of the whole matter. It will really be interesting to analytical minds to work out the issue governing the choice which the people of this country are to make next November between General Garfield and General Hancock as an administrative officer of this Government—between the control of the Government and the destinies which depend upon the success of the Republican or the Democratic party.

But notwithstanding there are no clearly defined issues, the battle of next November will be fought with all the desperation that can be developed. It will be a square test of the strength of parties. Every vote will be polled. Already the political statisticians—the same fellows, probably, who figured on the respective nominations—have got the result down to a few doubtful States. The "Solid South" is conceded to the Democrats without the thought of an electoral vote from that quarter. The North and West for the Republicans, with the exception of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Indiana, and California. These States gave at the last Presidential election Democratic majorities as follows: New York, 32,742; New Jersey, 12,445; Connecticut, 2,900; Indiana, 5,515, with 9,533 votes for Cooper—California being saved to the Republicans by the insignificant majority of 2,769, after the closest possible working. These five States have between them seventy-one electoral votes; and if forty-seven of them can be secured, the Democrats will be victorious—that is, provided the conceded "Solid South" is faithful, and the Republican North firm. The tug of war, then, will be in New York, if the figures are right. It is New York and New Jersey; New York, California and Connecticut; New York and Indiana to win, with Pennsylvania, Indiana, and a smaller State as a bare possibility in case New York is lost. To accomplish these States the Democrats will strain every nerve and bend every fibre. In New York, though the machinery of State government is against them, it is believed they have or can get the votes necessary to their success. The conditions are certainly favorable. A reconciliation of leaders, a burying of the local hatchet, an immense working population, a tremendous immigration, and a last chance at the loaves and fishes will develop Democrats like leaves of grass in the Empire State. In opposition the candidacy of Arthur counts for nothing. Indiana, with a candidate and Democratic proclivities, is almost sure to swing into the Bourbon line. Connecticut and New Jersey are not difficult to turn either way, and if there is any electioneering virtue in a decided stand on the Chinese question, it will be a close call for California.

But it will not do to speculate too wildly in advance—the result of the conventions has taught us a lesson in this respect that we ought to heed. Let us know something first of our men; learn something of our respective parties. We Republicans opened the campaign artistically in the eighth section of our declaration of principles when we read: "We charge upon the Democratic party the habitual sacrifice of patriotism and justice to a supreme and insatiable lust for office and patronage; that to obtain possession of the National and State Governments, and of the control of place and position, they have obstructed all the efforts to preserve the purity and conserve the freedom of suffrage; have devised fraudulent certificates and returns; have labored to unseat lawfully elected members of Congress, to secure at all hazards the vote of the majority of States in the House of Representatives; have endeavored to occupy by force and fraud places of trust given to others; have by methods vicious in principle and tyrannical in practice, attached partisan legislation to appropriation bills; have crushed the rights of individuals, and vindicated the principles and sought the favor of rebellion against the nation, and have endeavored to obliterate the sacred memories of the war, and to overcome its inestimable good results—freedom and individual equality. We affirm it to be the duty and purpose of the Republican party to use all the legitimate means of this Union to secure the perfect harmony which may be practicable; and we submit to the practical, sensible people of the United States to say whether it would not be dangerous to the best interests of our country at this time to surrender the administration of the National Government to a party which seeks to overthrow the existing policy, under which we are so prosperous, and thus bring destruction and confusion, where there is now order, confidence, and hope." This is our compliment and our gage to the Confederate brigadiers. Now hear theirs to us: "We [Democrats] pledge ourselves anew to the constitutional doctrines and traditions of the Democratic party, as illustrated by the teachings and example of a long line of Democratic statesmen and patriots. The existing administration is the representative of a conspiracy only, and its claim of the right to surround the ballot-boxes with troops and deputy marshals to intimidate and obstruct the elections, and the unprecedented use of the veto to maintain its corrupt and despotic power, insult the people and imperil their institutions. The great fraud of 1876, by which, upon a false count of the electoral vote of two States, the candidate defeated at the polls was declared to be President, and for the first time in American history the will of the people was set aside under a threat of military violence, struck a deadly blow at our system of representative government. The Democratic party, to preserve the country from the horrors of civil war, submitted for the time, in the firm and patriotic faith that the people would punish this crime in 1880. This issue precedes and dwarfs every other. It imposes a more sacred duty upon the people of the Union than ever addressed the conscience of a nation of freemen." These are the published opinions of the parties, one of the other. Neither of them are very pleasant or complimentary in their references. Both insinuate of high crimes and misdemeanors; both blaze with patriotism of the most fervid kind. And between the two the people, in their sovereignty, are called to decide—the one following being that of Garfield and Arthur; the other, that of Hancock and English. And may the Republican win.

At least one of the American commissioners to China is destined to a monumental surprise when he comes in contact with Chinese officiality. It is certain that Mr. John F. Swift, and it is probable that both his companions, has little idea that all high-class Chinese regard him and them with nearly the same contempt that a free-born American of the generation now passing away regarded the fellow-being he called a "nigger." The late Mr. Burlingame probably succeeded in getting as far inside of Chinese life on its higher plane as any barbarian since Polo. Possessing a singularly subtle mind, with all of an American shiftness, trained to political finesse, and almost an oriental in that diplomatic adroitness which borders on chicane, he appears to have pleased the literate Chinese nearly as much as they pleased him. "Well, Burlingame," asked an eminent Boston scholar, on his return, "what do you think of China?" "Fancy," answered the envoy, "fancy a country that has two hundred Ralph Waldo Emersons, That's China." We are to bear in mind that the people of China are divided into two groups: (1.) the mandarins and literati (the mandarins being only the literati in office, and the literati, mandarins in posse); and, (2.) the remaining four hundred millions. Between these two there is a gulf—bridged, it is true, by the schools in which the literati win their honors, but impassable by any other road. The Chinese we know, out of their native country, with the sole exception of the diplomatic agents, are of the ignoble mass, looked down upon alike by the superior order, whether merchants, medical men, or domestics, and not looking up one to another, save as the possession of superior wealth may extort some tokens of consideration. But they all look up with an admiration, respect, and reverence, that have now nearly passed out of the life of Christendom, to the whole class of literati and mandarins. The last constitute the China of foreign relations. They constitute something more than the government of the State: they are the State. It is with them and them alone, it is with their sentiments and views of policy and theirs alone, that our commissioners are about to deal. Their feeling toward us—American, English, German, all alike—is one of unspeakable disgust, of contempt, tempered only by so much of hate as is bred of our forcible intrusion within their boundaries. Patriotism is often, on one of its sides, a narrow sentiment; the Chinese mind, in one of its aspects, is an eminently narrow mind; and among no people under heaven does the flame of patriotism, in its narrowest sense, burn fiercer or higher than among the Chinese. It is the one sentiment with them, the one feeling, that comes next after veneration for the father and devotion to the mother; it is the same veneration going out to the Fatherland, an equal devotion to the mother country; and the object of its liveliest activity the past forty years has been the Fankwei—the foreign devil, whose presence pollutes the sacred ancestral soil.

Not that this is the sentiment with which the poor boatman, laborer, or the trader of the treaty port regards the foreigner—far from it. To him, the Fankwei is a mine of wealth; his appearance is the signal for double fares and double charges of whatever kind; he seems to control dollars unnumbered and innumerable; he is charitable; he maintains free hospitals, where the poor victim of accident or disease can get mended and made whole without price; he is altogether a thing of joy to a few thousands of Chinese at the treaty ports, who are utterly without influence of any kind in the government, the entire mass of whom are not valued by the State at a string of cash. But let the foreign devil beware how he wander beyond the guaranteed bounds; in fact, he does beware; he knows much better than to attempt it. There are a few temples he is welcomed at. The priests forgive his disrespect to the Josh, or even his carrying off one or two little ones in his pocket, in consideration of the gratuity he leaves behind him. Our fellow-Christians do not carry off so many little Joshes now-a-days, since it has got to be suspected that they are specially placed in the way to tempt the desecration. As it is no longer any real desecration, the Fankwei does not care to commit it, or buy the image above the shop price. But all this has nothing to do with the attitude maintained toward the barbarian by the ruling classes. They do not live by his wages nor yet by his trade. To them, he remains what he was at his first coming—a brutal, half-swindling, underbred semi-pirate, combining the morals of a blackleg with the manners of a menial, preaching a grotesque and monstrous creed while practicing a shameless and debauched morality. We do not propose reciting here those facts in the customs of the earlier—and plenty of the later—foreigners domiciled at treaty ports, which have availed as a basis for this Chinese view of their character. But that such is the view really entertained of the European by that great body of the governing class throughout the empire—only the most trivial fraction of which has ever come in any contact at all with us—is abundantly testified. This class holds apart from us there, very much as we hold apart from the Chinese here, and with feelings which are not only similar in their general scope, but are identical in many of the notions entertained. Our newspapers have complimented the Chinese here as moral lepers; yet the editor might squirm a little on his "tripod" to realize that the least of their literati at home would (and does) regard him as just such an outcast—one whose touch ought to make a well-bred Chinaman keck! Looking, now, at this one feature of the diplomatic situation, let us ask ourselves the question, and answer it in a reasonable and candid spirit, what amount and kind of result are we to expect—can we expect—from the mission of Commissioner Angell? It needs only to think the question fairly out, to look at it from the Chinese standpoint, and the answer comes—None. The commission will have, must have, can have no result whatever. Nevertheless, it was politic, proper, and, in fact, necessary that it should be tried; but we, here, can not too soon give it up, and set straight to work to brace up the Congressional mind to the point of taking action as soon as the failure of the mission shall have been officially communicated.

The Congress that we shall have to address will have met after the election; those we have been recently dealing with had the election in view. There is a vast difference in the situation. At the last session they had our Pacific electoral votes in view; at the next, our votes will have been given away, and the next following election will be four years off—which is the same as a century in practical politics. We shall discover the difference as soon as ever we begin to talk, and that consideration for our mere political sentiment on the question has become as a feather weight. Besides, both parties, as to their Eastern members, are equally insincere in any professions they may make. Over there the question is not one of Republican or Democrat; it is a local Pacific Coast question—diametrically opposed to the general sentiment of the nation on race politics, and in which, in order to win, we have not only to get the ear of those people, but afterward persuade and convince them that it is both wise and right to make an exception of the Chinese race, and to discriminate against them as immigrants; to reverse, in fact, the traditional and existing policy of the country, as far as they are concerned. And we have to accomplish this in full view of the circumstance that the people we address have had no personal contact with, or experience of, the Chinese; i. e., have absolutely no personal knowledge whatever of the facts which we shall allege, and of the conclusions we shall draw from them and endeavor to maintain. Finally, we shall have the supposed interests of two sections—each of which, separately, far outnumbers us in votes—against us, to confirm the prepossessions we combat, and dull the edge of our most incisive argument. First, the commercial interest, commanding the votes of New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, through their leading commercial cities, counts seventy-seven noses, against our eleven. Second, the cotton-growing region, which has always hankered after the Chinese as a competitor against the freedman, and counts upon getting him on the completion of the Southern Pacific Railroad, numbers not less than forty-one, against our eleven. Here is a cheering prospect! And that Southern vote is destined to be found a peculiarly impracticable one. It will be good politics to antagonize it with the Northern humanitarian spirit, which, if it will only use its eyes, will perceive that this Southern policy means Coolieism later on—as inevitably and surely as the dark follows the day. But even the humanitarian zeal may cool if convinced that Chinese cheap labor means at first cheaper cotton and more of it, more to spin and more to export, more commissions, freights, and insurance, and a more favorable balance of trade. These are a few of the weapons already laid up in arsenal to be used against us. And we must successfully show, and convince a majority in an indifferent or hostile Congress, that, granting all these statements to be true, it is still also true that the part of political wisdom and moral right demands the exclusion of the Chinese.

There is at least one view of the case which the Eastern people are tradesmen enough and practical enough to understand—viz., that Chinese labor becomes a source of loss to the country and not of profit in industrial enterprise. It would not be so easy to show that his labor in the field, in the production of an exportable staple, might be equally a source of loss. We ourselves do not so much object to him in these fields. So far as we have employment for him in the orchard, or vineyard, or on the sheep-range, in building tule-levees, or other agricultural work, his presence has excited comparatively little anxiety and less clamor. But in manufacturing industry, of whatever sort, we in San Francisco are in position to mass the facts establishing irrefragably that we are made the poorer by John's presence as a successful operative. The indictment against John is, not so much that he earns less wages than another journeyman needs, but that he does not spend among us any part of the wages he does earn. From six to eight dollars per month maintain him. Even that amount he does not spend in such a way that the country gets any good of it. It is paid to his own tradesmen, and quite two-thirds of the amount pays for rice and other goods imported from China. This is the sense in which it is true that the whole amount of his earnings is really "drained" from the community. Not merely that a portion of them is remitted to China in specie, but that no part of their wages is returned to the common fund in exchange for the products of the labor of others. In other words, it is because, and it is only because, the Chinese do not exchange labor with the community of which they form part, that nearly the whole value of their labor is felt as a drain. Suppose the census shall show in San Francisco ten thousand Chinese employed as domestic servants; they are a source of comfort that is priceless; grant that, but at present we are engaged with a different aspect of the case; their average wages are near twenty dollars per month, or two and a half millions of dollars per year. Were this money paid to women, four-fifths of the amount would be repaid to the dry-goods shops of Kearny and Market Streets. As it is, scarcely fifty dollars of that important sum finds its way into this channel. In similar wise, the course of their earnings may be traced throughout their entire range of occupation. So far as they work up raw material—as tobacco or leather—they pay for it as any other operative does; but as to all the enhanced value paid to them for it in the manufactured state—it disappears, evaporates, is gone! And the result? Business prostration is the result—stagnation, paralysis, no progress, no enterprise, no homesteads, no house-building, no trade, no nothing. This is a condition of affairs which we do not despair of making the East understand. Its steps and processes are such as she is capable of realizing without the need of the sore experience. In much of his work, John is competing with her and her products, displacing her to that extent in the market, and taking nothing that she or any other white element produces as a compensation. It is thus that he will invade her; insinuate himself little by little into her own industrial system, gaining here an inch and there an inch, and never losing a hair's-breadth of ground once won—slow, insidious, a consumption of the body politic, wasting the vital parts while it mocks the sense with a flush that mimics health and cheats the victim into the belief that his malady is but a passing qualm. Fully forewarned and made to understand the disease, the sudden sense of danger may rouse our Eastern Sisters to an appreciation of the malady that is consuming us; and so stir them to act the neighborly part of aiding us to check its further inroads.

The conditions of prosperity in San Francisco will not come of a general hurrah. They will be the result alone of an intellectual comprehension of the place that we are to fill in the world of labor. Commerce of itself is not sufficient to maintain a large city. By commerce is meant the collection and distribution of commodities. Its commerce, though relatively vast, does not support London. Commerce is not the sole reliance of Paris. The exclusively commercial cities of the middle ages had small populations. Neither Venice, nor Genoa, nor Hamburg, nor Florence were large cities. The reason is obvious enough. Commerce presupposes consumers on a large scale. It gives direct employment only to ship-builders, ship-masters, sailors, commercial houses, clerks, porters, draymen, and, collaterally, to bankers and their assistants, lawyers, physicians, and a large number of other persons. The proportion which the persons engaged in commerce bear to total population has never been estimated. But it must be relatively very small. The cities of the olden time which went down apparently because of their loss of commerce had other and more serious derangements. Venice shriveled up more because it adopted the policy of exclusiveness than because it lost the trade of the Indies by the discovery of Vasco da Gama. Rome declined quite as much from the fact that the plunder of the world had ceased, and she had nothing to give in return for what she needed, as from moral turpitude. Examples of the same sort are quite numerous in our own country. New York, by the competition of her rivals, has lost in the past ten years upward of forty-four per cent. of her commerce; but New York can hardly be said to be going down. Philadelphia has not much commerce, yet it has grown almost as large as New York. It has, however, a large manufacturing business. If we apply these generalizations to our own city, it will not be difficult to predict her future. She began in commerce. All large cities have a like genesis. A few persons congregate at a given point because, either from natural or artificial advantages, it is a distributing point. They act as the agents of the people residing around. They import the things of which they stand in need.

But if our operations had been confined to commerce San Francisco would not be a large city to-day. She went into mining, and out of it she obtained a large amount of capital. With it and the profits of commerce the city was built up. It is not certain that the person who designed always reared the warehouse or the residence. A period of wild speculation set in. But whether there was disappointment in one or many cases, that was the object to which this capital was devoted. It built up a city in thirty years that under ordinary circumstances would not have attained to its present dimensions in three hundred. It has supplied us with hotels, theatres, public buildings, railroads, public gardens, parks, and all the appliances of modern civilization. It has founded schools, colleges, charitable institutions, and libraries. The surplus has created monopolies of great strength. A few men control all the money in the community; another association owns all the railroads leading to the city; a third combination has all the meat; a fourth, all the ice; a fifth, all the water; a sixth, all the gas. Nothing can be said to be left unappropriated but the air. That still remains free, and in its original abundance. Everything has been planned on a large and magnificent scale, for a lasting and prosperous community. But our avenues of employment, instead of increasing, are diminishing. The town is over-built. In the nature of things there will not be much more construction except in the way of improvement or renewal. This restricts the field for carpenters, mechanics, hod-carriers, brick-makers, plumbers, tanners, stair-makers, and plasterers. Our commerce is languishing for the moment under the extension of the railroads. A few years ago Nevada was wholly dependent upon us. Every foreign article which it consumed entered the Golden Gate. The State above and below us, Oregon, and distant Washington were in the same condition. But all this is changed now. The railroad from Ogden to the Columbia River will cut us off from the northern country by and by. The railroads to the south will alone bring us tributary territory within certain limitations. There are three facts which we have to look steadily in the face. (1.) Reduction of our commerce. (2.) Comparative failure of our great industry—mining. (3.) As a consequence of these two, a reduction in the field of labor. But they are not fatal facts by any means. They are not facts which suggest decay, but reorganization. Fortunately, the new form which is to take the place of the old has been growing and expanding all the time. We are making a thousand things now which we never dreamed of before. The margin we have still to work on is the list of imported articles. That is large and inviting. When we are able to make almost everything which we need ourselves we can look abroad for a market.

An idea of the future can be formed by considering what would have been the complexion of things in this city had we spent on manufacturing the eleven millions paid for mining in Nevada last year. That money would have gone among our own people; it would have enabled them to purchase more liberally; it would have put them in a position to acquire homesteads; it would have increased in property values, and produced contentment. As it was, it went to miners in another State, who now draw a large portion of their supplies from the other side of the continent. But before we can reach any great development in this line, a great many delusions will have to be swept away, and some bad habits will have to be given up. If San Francisco is to advance, it can only be by manufacturing enterprises. The line of its activity was first importing—it will have to become an exporting centre. Manufactures can alone sustain us. But a condition precedent in manufactures is that labor shall not rate higher here than at the East. There is not the least use in trying to blink this fact. It is the condition upon which a large population can live comfortably and happily here. It is as unalterable as the laws of the Medes and the Persians. It can not be repealed or avoided by any device. It is inexorable. The sooner all parties are prepared to accept this great truth the better it will be for all concerned. No one will go to making anything out of duty and pure philanthropy; he will only do it when he can make money. But there is not the least chance for success if there is difference between the labor market here and at the East. No doubt this may at the first glance be considered a severe lesson to learn. But it will have to be mastered. The schooling that is in progress at this moment is sure to be attended with the best effects. Nor is it among the laboring classes alone that delusions will have to be dissipated. The California manufacturer has an idea that elsewhere the man who proposes to make something has free access to the vaults of the commercial banks. We do not know any part of the world where financiering of that kind prevails. If it were so, the speculatives would have the entire control of all the capital in the country. It would be the banker and not the manufacturer who would be running all the risks. The individual who will make a success as a manufacturer must begin on a small scale. If he is working on well calculated lines, his business will soon expand. In that case, if he has an established character, bank accommodations will become possible. But the least of that kind of business which he transacts, the better it will be for him. The average Californian, proposing to make something, thinks he must launch out with an immense and fully-appointed establishment. Perhaps there is some justification for the notion, for he has seen a State and a city burst almost fully matured into life. For the rest, there will have to be less speculation and more attention to the details of legitimate business. But these are bound to come in due course of time.

FATIMA AND BLUEBEARD.

An Unblushing Libel upon a Maligned Social Contingent.

Fatima lay coiled on the four-hundred-dollar Turkish hearth-rug. A comfortable cushion, covered with garnet satin, elaborately embroidered in invisible emeralds, protected the little of her exquisite back from the ungracious angularity of the fire-dogs. A pearl-colored wrapper draped her willowy stateliness, and the masterly disposition of her ankles disconcerted her tiny, blush-colored slippers in a fashion that would have driven most anybody wild. Her chin was thrown back, at an angle not accurately measured, and her little hands were absently tearing a seven-hundred-dollar Burmese fan into long shreds. These she subsequently twisted, with rare thoughtfulness—assisted by her slender fingers—into cigar-lighters for her liege lord.

Bluebeard sat on a dais, with his legs crossed, after the manner of Turks in nursery books. He was smoking a thousand-dollar hookah. After an hour or so he ceased to inhale the pale, bluish smoke of the deadly, life-preserving, noisome, aromatic weed, took from between his lips the amber mouth-piece of his jeweled hookah, and said:

"Did you know, my love, that the fan you so industriously have been tearing into bits cost me seventy thousand mills, U. S. gold coin, in Mandelay?"

"No—did it? Thought you bought it at the Golden Rule Bazar. Don't care a reservoir what it cost. Don't believe it cost half that. Don't—"

"It did though, Fat, and I think you might be more careful. I made less than half a million last week, in my big turn in Northern Hades, we all thought would pan out so well. And Billings, Harbourn & Co. are going to charge me a cool hundred thousand for printing my last volume of vernal verse and those sonnets to your ankles, Fatzie."

"I don't care. You promised me a new dress for Mrs. Burrclover's ball next month. It will take two weeks to finish it properly, and I haven't even been measured. And you haven't said a word about it all the morning. It is so unpleasant to be asking and asking—"

"Now, Fatzie, you know very well why I've been so silent. You could not help knowing that I had my poem ready to read to you this morning. Yet you ran away from the breakfast-table as if you were afraid. You know our bargain. As long as you listen to my poetry, so long shall you have all the money you need. But when you kick, Fat—when you won't listen to reason and rhyme—you can't expect me to go on as if your half of the bargain had been kept. No listen, no listen."

Poor Fatima! How like the lot of ten thousand thousand women hers was. Her early life ran quiet as the brook by which her mother earned an honest living, in toilsome competition with the terrestrial Celestial. When she was seventeen, Bluebeard (his real name was Smif) burst upon her life's young dream like a Call editorial upon the rapt attention of a waiting world. The dazzle of his very wealthy wealth led her imagination captive, and she surrendered at the first fire. (It may be objected to this figure, that for a captive imagination to surrender at the first fire would be tautology of valor's better part. But this story is not intended to be either humorous or instructive; it is merely moral and alliterative.)

For her mother, Bluebeard purchased a controlling interest in the largest anti-Coolie laundry in the city, and led Fatima [her real name was plain Jane] to a mansion built on the loftiest pinnacle of Nob—bar none—where the luxury that surrounded her was simply untranslatable into words.

"It is magnif, dear Smif," she said in unreasoning ecstasy, and that unconscious inspiration had filled him with a wild longing to be a poet.

That sentence was the turning point in Bluebeard's life, and it rang the death-knell of Fatima's happiness.

Bluebeard was a mining king. He was a good operator in any species of the great Comstock squeeze game in which the under dog had no sort of chance. But he had heard of the "Banker Poet" Stedman, of Mr. Morris, who wrote the Earthly Paradise with the same badly whittled Faber that he used in designing pre-Raphaelite wall-paper, and he knew our own Vandyke Hubbard, and he thought it would be easy to be business man and bard at the same time.

It did not greatly matter for a while. He began with some harmless couplets like these:

"Fatima, Fatima come hither!
And how is your elderly mither?"
"The day is dusty, dull, and darkly dank
So is my balance in Nevada Bank."
"The languid bear reclineth in the shade,
The snorting bull bethinks him he's afraid."
"Fatima darling, come and kiss me, come!
And mix me a full flaggonnet of gomme (and rum)."

At first Fatima used to smile and even laugh, and thereby sowed the seeds of her own destruction. By and by her husband essayed bolder flights. Stanzas of four, eight, and sixteen lines; lyrics, pastorals, ballads, were written in such galloping sequence that they almost took away her breath. Naturally she wearied of them. And naturally—at last—told him so. But the habit had been formed, the mischief done, and poor Fatima could as easily have builded a dam with her little hands to check the tides at the Golden Gate as stay the torrent of Bluebeard's ruthless rhymes.

"Well!" he said, with an air of determination, "either listen to my poem, or stay at home from Mrs. Burrclover's party."

Fatima uncoiled herself and sprang impulsively to both her feet. There was a humid look in her lovely eyes, and two red spots suggested vermilion on her blanched cheeks. Then she sank upon her knees, and, clasping her little hands hard as ever she could, she cried (in blank verse):

"Hear me, my lord, and judge if aught I say
Be other than the factest fact. Have not I been
Your true, true wife three years consecutive?
And have I not, with patient ears, stood dumb
Before three thousand linear yards of rhyme?
My God! a woman is not made of stone!
Oh, let me off, this once, I pray you, sir!
And I will listen when my ears have healed,
And my weak stomach finds its tone again.
But, by the gods! if thus you force me now,
I'll something dreadful do, so help me Bob!"

Now, when a woman says "So help me Bob," she means it; and he is a rash man who disregards that solemn warning. But Bluebeard, alas! was intoxicated with prosperity.

The poem was read, the dress ordered, and the evening of Mrs. Burrclover's ball arrived. If Bluebeard had been less an idle dreamer, less a careless coiner of opportunities—if he had been born an editor or reared a proof-reader, for instance—his habits of thought would have compelled him to notice the change in his wife. She had grown thin and careworn, haggard and deathly pale, in a single week. She went around the house like a startled hind. [It may be objected by the captious, of whom the Argonaut readers number not a few, that startled hinds are not found in houses. But that is an objection which ought not to have weight, considering the deep subtlety of suggestion in the figure.] And when the evening of the party came, it required three ounces of the most costly "Parisian bloom" to bring her complexion into harmony with her dress. If Bluebeard had noticed then, all might have been well. But he did not. "It is by failing to notice that many things remain unseen," says Mr. Pickering, and the truth of this truth is very true indeed.

In the crush of the ball-room Bluebeard dropped his hat. When he had picked it up, and had turned around, his wife was gone. He searched for her unavailingly, everywhere. She was not in the supper-room, the ladies' withdrawing-room, the conservatory. She had disappeared! For an hour he searched, assisted by friends, and then drove quickly home. She was not in the house, but on the mantel of his dressing-room was a little note in Fatima's unmistakable handwriting. This is what it said:

MY DEAR HUSBAND: Because I love you I leave you. Your poetry has made me a monomaniac. For six weeks I have hovered upon the border-land of homicide. Last night I stood beside you with a razor in my hand and murder in my heart. Only your uneasy snoring saved you. Night before last I put arsenic in one of the demijohns in the wine-room—I forget which one. The night before that—but it would take a volume to tell you all. Suffice it that I leave you, and forever. Good-bye, and may Providence keep you, and teach you the value of not knowing how to write poetry.

FATIMA.

Bluebeard passed an awful night. His great folly—his great sin—was like a nightmare to him, and he could see no light ahead. The breakfast bell rang as usual, but he could not eat. Sadly and slowly he made up his mind, folding all his ideas carefully, and sprinkling them with lavender water so they would surely keep. Then he took a bath, dressed himself elaborately, and sent for his lawyer. His will was very simple. He left everything to his wife, should she return to claim it. In case she failed to turn up—which no legatee ever failed to do since the creation of the first lawyer—the estate was to go to a "Society for the Total Suppression of the Stale, Flat, and Unprofitable in Literature," of which Mr. Pickering was to be permanent president. After he had signed his will, Bluebeard took a toddy at his attorney's expense, and went out in search of a pile-driver. He found one of those interesting machines, in active operation, near the foot of Market Street. Seizing an opportunity with both hands, he sprang boldly between the uprights just as the pile man detached the driver from the chain. The huge hammer slid downward with loving swiftness. The intervention of our hero was of brief and inconsequent duration. No less skillful an official than the coroner of Alameda County might have made a showing of the remaining residue. The affair was so instantly instant in its accomplishment that the pile man thought some wag had been decorating the head of the pile with red and blue paint, in anticipation of the coming Fourth. To complete the joke, he emptied a bucket of lime on the canvas. * * *

Fatima came out of the hall closet and smiled superior. She had managed it very cleverly, she thought; and so she had. Having no sister Anne to help her enjoy the vast wealth her husband had left her, she started a daily newspaper in opposition to the — and the —, and had "heaps of fun" running through a million or so.

But Fatima has learned to know a blue beard whenever she sees one. She generally knows it by its blue color. In this she resembles the famous author of the latest "true story from the records of our swell society"; and she also resembles the good Mr. Pickering, who commonly knows a thing when he sees it, provided he knows what the thing is. SAN FRANCISCO, June, 1881. BARNIN KENT.

The magnificent beauty of the Countess of Lonsdale, at once dark and bright, has won the highest ecomiums from the veteran Beaconsfield, who sees in her the realization of the imaginary heroines that he has described with his facile pen. The remarkable splendor of the jewelry in which she luxuriates makes the resemblance still more striking.

An agricultural paper has an article on "Washed and Unwashed Butter." It says that the markets now demand that butter shall not only be fresh and rosy, but be properly worked and washed. A pound of butter that comes into market without having its face washed and hair combed is not fit for even a place on the centre table.

Professor Forbes has invented an instrument for detecting fire-damp and determining the quantity of light carbureted hydrogen in the air. He calls the invention a "damposcope." It may be a mighty good contrivance, but a pious miner will not permit his life to be saved by any such profane thing as a d—poscope.

"There," said Jones, triumphantly, holding up his egg at the breakfast table; "I was always told I wanted chic, and now I've got it." A smile perambulated the table, as a matter of course; and the young man who is studying French laughed immoderately after the joke had been thoroughly explained to him.

A country editor says that "he enlarged his paper for the purpose of giving more effective support to the anticipated candidacy of General Grant; but that the reboomatization of the general having proved unsuccessful, he now *ensmall*s it to its former size." How is that for high?

A brace of Canadian boys, sixteen years of age, planned to elope to the sunny South with two gentle maidens of fourteen. One boy was intercepted by his mother, while the other ran away with both the girls. There was nothing mean about him.

ALL ABOUT WOMEN.

Here is an instruction to her artistic dressmaker: "Dress me in such a manner that my vulgarities will pass for mediæval affectations."

While a Leadville lawyer was cross-examining a woman who was on the witness stand, last week, she exclaimed: "I'm a lady, and by thunder don't you forget it."

The brilliant Sophie Arnold, when she heard of a certain diplomatist that had been eaten by the wolves, exclaimed: "Poor brutes! Hunger must indeed be a terrible thing!"

A New York correspondent tells an interesting story about four women who go to dinners and receptions to talk and help the hostess entertain her guests. The price for their services is twenty-five dollars an hour.

"Why should woman more than man have been for ages the power behind the throne, moving at will its puppets and its princes—herself unseen—instead of the power on the throne, wearing its honors?" Give it up. Why should she?

A Syracuse girl was scared by an electric ball, which rolled down the chimney into her room, nearly into fits; but she wouldn't scare worth a cent at the sight of a red-headed lover who chewed tobacco and smoked Roman candle cigars.

The ex-Queen of Naples goes daily to the Hippodrome at Paris, and is taking lessons in circus tricks on horseback, a servant throwing balls to her, which she catches at full gallop and leaning back so that her head almost touches the horse's tail. The king stands watching her with mute admiration.

A Philadelphia youth, who committed suicide twenty years ago because a lovely being gave him the mitten, has been heard from through a medium. He says that when he gazes through the misty veil which divides life and death, and sees his old flame now with her fourteen children lying around loose, while she cleans house, he gets mad enough at his folly to cut his throat again, and his greatest punishment is in the reflection that he can't.

A worthy German farmer had a shrewish wife. After many bickerings, she recently announced her intention to desert his bed and board and never return. News of the occurrence reaching the neighbors, one of them called to console, and said: "Hans, I pity you." "My poy," replied the honest Dutchman, as he disturbedly knocked out the ashes of his pipe, "You was right. She has shust come back."

Rev. Olympia Brown has been going for David Swing. The Reverend David had told the woman suffragists he was in thorough sympathy with the cause, and all that kind of taffy, but—he had so many pressing engagements that he could not possibly come and talk to them for five minutes. Now, what was one of these pressing engagements? asked Olympia. Why, he had to go and see Pinafore at Central Hall, Chicago, which was too true. David was there. As the Reverend Olympia said, why should not the sweet Sunday essayist have frankly told the truth—the angelic liar!

They all say that Mrs. Garfield is a lady who will honor the White House. She is a woman of a sweet and winning spirit, and of bright and cultivated mind. As Miss Lucretia Randolph she was an exceedingly pretty and interesting girl, and her marriage with the general was on both sides one of ideal affection. Her intellect has kept pace with her husband's; she has studied the books he studied, taken up languages with him, and has so trained herself as to fit her boys for college in the most thorough manner. She is an excellent Latin scholar, and is also proficient in several modern languages. She is a little lady, graceful in carriage, and having most frank and charming manners.

A writer expresses his opinion of old maids in the following manner: "I am inclined to think that many of the satirical aspersions cast upon old maids tell more to their credit than is generally imagined. Is a young woman remarkably neat in her person?—she will certainly be an old maid. Is she perfectly reserved toward the other sex?—she has all the squeamishness of an old maid. Is she frugal in her expenses and exact in her domestic concerns?—she is cut out for an old maid. If she is kindly humane to the animals about her, nothing can save her from the appellation of an old maid. In short, I have always found that neatness, modesty, economy, and humanity are the never-failing characteristics of that terrible creature."

Talk about the unprotected female! A chunk of a girl, aged thirteen, not only totally disproved the theory in Cincinnati the other day, but "created a profound sensation and delighted a large crowd." She was materially assisted in the matinee by a bootblack, who, although his own conduct drew him into the game, was an unwilling actor through at least a part of the affair. For some reason, not material to the history of the case, the girl was standing on the pavement with her head stuck down into a barrel. Along comes the bootblack, and, seeing a chance for mischief, he couldn't resist the temptation, so he up-ended the girl into the barrel. Her ladyship hoisted herself out in considerable of a hurry, if not with dignity; and, making a reach for the bootblack, flopped him over in the street preparatory to business. Her next move was to snatch his box from him, and the next was to commence thumping him over the head with it. The vigor with which the enraged female whacked that boy's head was something wonderful. Each blow brought an answer in the shape of blood and a howl of pain. If it hadn't been for the interference of a gentleman the boy would have been killed. As it was, the gentleman got his shins barked to a quite sufficient extent for pleasure by the stoutly clad hoofs of the thoroughly maddened girl.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

Molly Muldoon.

Molly Muldoon was an Irish girl,
And as fine a one
As you'd look upon
In the cot of a peasant or hall of an earl.
Her teeth were white, though not of pearl,
And dark was her hair, but it did not curl;
Yet few who gazed on her teeth and her hair
But owned that a power o' beauty was there.
Now many a hearty and rattling gooson,
Whose fancy had charmed his heart into tune,
Would dare to approach fair Molly Muldoon,
But for that in her eye
Which made most of them shy.
And look quite ashamed, though they couldn't tell why.
Her eyes were large, dark-blue, and clear,
And heart and mind seemed in them blended;
If intellect sent you one look severe
Love instantly leapt in the next to mend it.
Hers was the eye to check the rude,
And hers the eye to stir emotion,
To keep the sense and soul subdued,
And calm desire into devotion.

There was Jimmy O'Hare,
As fine a boy as you'd see in a fair,
And wherever Molly was, he was there.
His face was round and his build was square,
And he sported as rare
And tight a pair
Of legs, to be sure, as are found anywhere.
And Jimmy would wear
His caubeen and hair
With such a peculiar and rollicking air,
That I'd venture to swear
Not a girl in Kildare,
Nor Victoria's self, if she chanced to be there,
Could resist his wild way—called "devil-may-care."
Not a boy in the parish could match him for fun,
Nor wrestle, nor leap, nor hurl, nor run
With Jimmy; no gooson could equal him—none.
At wake or at wedding, at feast or at fight,
At throwing the sledge with such dexterous slight,
He was the envy of men, and the women's delight.

Now Molly Muldoon liked Jimmy O'Hare,
And in troth Jimmy loved in his heart Miss Muldoon.
I believe in my conscience a purtier pair
Never danced in a tent at a pattern in June.
To a bagpipe or fiddle
On the rough cabin door
That is placed in the middle—
Ye may talk as ye will,
There's a grace in the limbs of the peasantry there
With which people of quality couldn't compare;
And Molly and Jimmy were counted the two Who'd keep up the longest, and go the best through
All the jigs and the reels
That have occupied heels
Since the days of the Murtaghs and Brian Boru.

It was on a long, bright, sunny day;
They sat on a green knoll, side by side,
But neither just then had much to say;
Their hearts were so full that they only tried
To do anything foolish—just to hide
What both of them felt, but what Molly denied.
They plucked the speckled daisies that grew
Close by their arms—then tore them, too;
And the bright little leaves that they broke from the stalk
They threw at each other for want of talk.
While the heart-lit look and the sunny smile
Reflected pure souls without art or guile;
And every time Molly sighed or smiled,
Jem felt himself grow as soft as a child.
And he fancied the sky never looked so bright,
The grass so green, the daisies so bright;
Everything looked so gay in his sight
That gladly he'd linger to watch them till night.
And Molly herself thought each little bird,
Whose warbling notes her calm soul stirred,
Sang only his lay but by her to be heard.

An Irish courtship's short and sweet—
It's sometimes foolish and indiscreet;
But who is wise when his young heart's heat
Whips the pulse to a galloping beat—
Ties up his judgment neck and feet,
And makes him the slave of a blind conceit?
Sneer not, therefore, at the loves of the poor—
Though their manners be rude, their affections are pure;
They look not by art and they love not by rule,
For their souls are not tempered in fashion's cold school.
Oh, give me the love that endures no control
But the delicate instinct that springs from the soul,
As the mountain stream gushes its freshness and force,
Yet obedient, wherever it flows, to its source.
Yes, give me the love that but nature has taught,
By rank unallured and by riches unbought;
Whose very simplicity keeps it secure—
The love that illumines the hearts of the poor.
All bluishful was Molly, or shy at least,
As one week before Lent
Jem procured her consent
To go the next Sunday and speak to the priest.

Shrove-Tuesday was named for the wedding to be,
And it dawned as bright as they'd wish to see.
And Jimmy was up at the day's first peep,
For the livelong night no wink could he sleep.
A brand-new coat, with a bright big button,
He took from a chest, and carefully put on;
And brogues as well lamplacked as ever went foot on
Were greased with the fat of a quare sort of mutton.
Then a tidier gooson couldn't be seen
Treading the Emerald Sod so green—
Light was his step and bright was his eye
As he walked through the slobbery streets of Athy,
And each girl he passed bid God bless him, and sighed,
While she wished in her heart that herself was the bride.

Hush! here's the priest—let not the least
Whisper be heard till the father has ceased.
"Come, bridegroom and bride,
That the knot may be tied,
Which no power upon earth can hereafter divide."
Up rose the bride and the bridegroom, too,
And a passage was made for them both to walk through;
And his reverence stood with a sanctified face,
Which spread its infection around the place.
The bridesmaid bustled, and whispered the bride,
Who felt so confused that she almost cried;
But at last bore up, and walked forward, where
The father was standing with solemn air;
The bridegroom was following after with pride,
When his piercing eye something awful espied.
He stopped and sighed,
Looked round, and tried

To tell what he saw, but his tongue denied;
With a spring and a roar
He jumped to the door,
And the bride laid her eyes on the bridegroom no more!

Some years sped on,
Yet heard no one
Of Jimmy O'Hare, or where he had gone.
But since the night of that widowed feast
The strength of poor Molly had ever decreased;
Till at length from earth's sorrow her soul released,
Filled up to be ranked with the saints at least.
And the morning poor Molly to live had ceased,
Just five years after the widowed feast,
An American letter was brought to the priest,
Telling of Jimmy O'Hare deceased—
Who, ere his death,
With his latest breath,
To a spiritual father unburdened his breast,
And the cause of his sudden departure confessed:
"O father," says he, "I've not long to live,
So I'll freely confess, and hope you'll forgive.
That same Molly Muldoon, sure I loved her indeed,
Aye, as well as the Creed,
That was never forsaken by one of my breed;
But I couldn't have married her after I saw—"
"Saw what?" cries the father, desirous to hear,
And the chair that he sat in unconsciously rocking—
"Not in her karkether, your riv'ince, a flaw—"
The sick man here dropped a significant tear,
And died as he whispered in the clergyman's ear:
"But I saw, God forgive her, a hole in her stocking!"

THE MORAL.

Lady readers, love may be
Fixed in hearts immovably;
May be strong and may be pure;
Faith may lean on faith secure—
Knowing adverse fate's endeavor
Makes that faith more firm than ever.
But the purest love and strongest,
Love that has endured the longest,
Braving cross and blight and trial,
Fortune's bar or pride's denial,
Would—no matter what its trust—
Be uprooted by DISGUST.
Yes, the love that might for years
Spring in suffering, grow in tears,
Parents' frigid counsel mocking,
Might be—where's the use in talking?

The Gaberlunzie Man.

The pawky auld carle cam' o'er the lee,
Wi' many good-eens and days to me,
Saying, "Goodwife, for your courtesie
Will you lodge a silly poor man?"
The night was cauld, the carle was wat,
And down ayont the ingle he sat,
The daughter's shoulder he gan to clap,
And cadgily ranted and sang.

"Oh, now," quo' he, "were I as free
As first when I saw this countrie,
How blythe and merry wad I be,
And I would never think lang!"
He grew canty, and she grew fain;
But little did her old nunny ken
What the'r slew twa thegither were say'ng,
When wooing they were sae thrang.

Between the twa was made a plot;
They rose a wee before the clock,
And willy they shot the lock,
And fast to the bent are they gane.
Up in the morn the auld wife raise,
And at her leisure pat on her claise;
Synne to the servant's bed she gae,
To speer for the silly poor man.

She gaed to the bed where the beggar lay,
The strae was cauld, he was away;
She clapt her hands, cry'd "Wala-day,
For some of our gear will be gane."
Some ran to coffer, some to kist,
But naught was stown that could be mist;
She danc'd her lane, cry'd "Praise be blest!
I have lodged a leal poor man."

"Since naethin's awa', as we can learn,
The kirk's to kirk, and milk to earn;
Gae but the house, lass, and waken my bairn,
And bid her come quickly ben."
The servant gaed where the daughter lay,
The sheets were cauld, she was away,
And fast to her goodwife did say:
"She's off with the Gaberlunzie man."

"Oh, fy gar ride, and fy gar rin,
And haste ye find those traitors again.
For she's be burnt, and he's be slain,
The weariful Gaberlunzie man!"
Some rode upo' horse, some ran afit,
The wife was wud, and out o' her wit,
She could na gang, nor yet could she sit,
But she cursed ay, and she bann'd,
Meantime, far hind, out o'er the lee,
Fu' snug in a glen, where nane could see,
The twa, with kindly sport and glee,
Cut frae a new cheese a whang;
The prairie was good, it pleased them baith,
To lo'e her for ay he gae her his baith,
Quo' she: "To leave thee I will be laith,
My winsome Gaberlunzie man!"
—King James V. of Scotland.

How Long?

If on my grave the summer grass were growing,
Or heedless winter winds across it blowing,
Through joyous June or desolate December,
How long, sweetheart, how long would you remember?
How long, dear love, how long?

For brightest eyes would open to the summer,
And sweetest smiles would greet the sweet new-comer,
And on young lips grow kisses for the taking,
When all the summer buds to bloom are breaking.

To the dim land where sad-eyed ghosts walk only,
Where lips are cold, and waiting hearts are lonely,
I would not call you from your youth's warm blisses,
Fill up your glass, and crown it with new kisses.

Too gay in June you might be to regret me,
And living lips might woo you to forget me;
But ah, sweetheart, I think you would remember
When winds were weary in your life's December.
How long, dear love, how long?

THE BANQUET OF NEBUCHADNEZZAR.

From La Tentation de Saint Antoine.

"And suddenly a mighty palace, illuminated by golden candelabra, seems to arise from out the darkness like a vast dream.

"Columns so lofty as to be half lost from sight in the shadows above stretch away in long files, beyond the line of tables, which seems to prolong itself to the verge of the horizon, where loom up through a luminous vapor superpositions of stairways, successions of arcades, colossi, towers, and, beyond all, a vague summit of palace walls, which far overtop the cedars, making darker masses against the darkness of the night.

"The guests, violet-crowned, lie reclining upon low couches; on either side of the long lines of tables are lines of attendants outpouring wines from amphoræ; and at the extreme further end, above the heads of the guests, sits the King Nebuchadnezzar, crowned with his tiara and blazing with carbuncles.

"Upon his right and upon his left stand priests in pointed caps, swinging censers. Upon the pavement below his feet crawl the captive kings, without hands or feet, to whom he throws bones to gnaw. Further off his brothers are seated, wearing bandages over their eyes; all being blind.

"From the depths of the slave-prisons below arises an everlasting cry of pain. The sweet, slow music of a hydraulic organ alternates with the voices of choristers; and one feels that all about the palace without extends an immeasurable city—an ocean of human life whose billows break against the walls.

"The slaves run to and fro, bearing dishes to the guests. Young women pass through the hall, offering drink to all; baskets creak under the weight of the loaves they contain; and a dromedary, bearing wine-skins perforated with tiny holes, walks hither and thither, sprinkling and cooling the pavement with vervain.

"Warriors are leading tame lions about the festal table. Female dancers, whose long black locks are confined in nets, turn agile somersaults upon their hands, while breathing fire from their nostrils; negro boatmen are juggling; naked children throw pellets of snow at each other, which spatter against the brilliant silverware. The clamor of the banquet is like the thunder of a tempest, and a fog hovers above the hall, so many are the steaming meats and the warm breaths below. At intervals a spark detached by the wind from the great torches traverses the night like a shooting star.

"The king wips with his arm the perfumed unguents from his brow. He eats in the sacred vessels, then breaks them; and within himself he counts the number of his fleets, and estimates the strength of his armies and the number of his subjects. In a little while he will burn his palace, with all the guests, for a kingly caprice. He dreams of dethroning God, and rebuilding the Tower of Babel.

"Antoine, from afar, reads all his thoughts upon his brow. They penetrate him, and he becomes Nebuchadnezzar.

"Instantly he feels as if satiated with dissoluteness and the drunkenness of blood, and a strange desire seizes him to wallow in degradation. For the degradation of aught that terrifies men is an outrage to their understanding—a new method of stupefying them with astonishment; and, as there is naught viler than a beast, Antoine throws himself on all fours upon the table and bellows like a bull.

"He feels a sudden pain in his hand; a pebble has accidentally wounded him—and he finds himself again alone in his hut.

"The bounding circle of the rocks is empty. The stars are burning silently in the night. All is hushed."

A curious point in Lord Byron's history has lately been raised, with which a ring has direct connection. Byron's mother was his female self, in temper, and in the unhappiness of her life—of which his own career was but a reproduction. At Newstead Abbey she lost her wedding-ring. Byron, on the day of the arrival of Miss Milbank's acceptance of that offer of the poet's which linked him to a life of married misery, was at dinner at the abbey, when the gardener brought him his mother's ring—which he had found buried in the mound under her window—just as the footman handed him his future wife's letter. The poet held the two in either hand for a moment, and said: "If it contains a consent, I will be married with this very ring." He was; and afterward, in writing of the wedding ring, called it "the damndest part of matrimony."

A lecturer in the interior writes: "The night was warm, and the first insects of the season were on the war-path. One large black beetle was particularly humorous. Twice he alighted on my head and got his legs all tangled up in my hair, so that when he tried to fly away he nearly lifted me off my feet. Then once, right in the midst of the most pathetic passage in the lecture, he slid down my back, and after scratching and buzzing around in the most annoying manner, finally crawled down my sleeve and shot out at my wrist like a bullet when my arm was extended toward the audience. Finally, the wretched thing flew through one of the foot-lights, burned off the paper muslin portion of his wings, and lay on his back looking up at me with an expression of reproach, as though it was my fault."

In a Milwaukee street-car the other day a near-sighted man was sitting near the fare-box reading a newspaper, when a lady passed up the aisle and accidentally dropped her handkerchief in the lap of the near-sighted man as she paid her fare. She did not notice her loss, and after she had taken her seat a gentleman sitting opposite the near-sighted person touched him with his cane to call his attention to the handkerchief. The near-sighted man looked down, saw the white handkerchief in his lap, and immediately covered it up with his paper, blushing as he did so. Then he inserted his hand under the paper, tucked the handkerchief in out of sight, and went on reading.

"Conkling" is the name of a new town in Kansas. It has just been laid out.

PALACE HOTEL, Friday Morning, June 23.

The departure of Prof. Angell, the new minister to China, and Messrs. Swift and Tresscott, the commissioners, and their families, by the Oceanic, on Saturday last, was an event long to be remembered by those who assembled in the saloon of the vessel to say bon voyage to the distinguished party, and to wish Mr. Swift and his charming wife a speedy journey and a safe return. Mr. Swift received his friends in Stateroom A amidst showers of Roederer, while the ladies made their adieux in the main saloon. The 8th Infantry band came from Angel Island especially in honor of the occasion. Among the ladies present were Mrs. Torbert and Mrs. Lieutenant Bailey, sisters of Mrs. Swift; Mrs. Colonel Woods, Mrs. Kaufman, Mrs. H. F. Williams, Mrs. Poett, Mrs. Norton, Mrs. Beers, Miss Hawes, Mrs. Lieutenant Smith, Mrs. W. F. Perkins, Mrs. Provattian, Miss Morrill, Mrs. D. W. Earle, Mrs. General Stoneman, Mrs. Henry Wetherbee, Miss Torbert, Mrs. Henry L. Dodge, and Mrs. Winslow. Among the gentlemen present I noticed General McDowell, General Kautz, Major Wilhelm, Colonel Stevenson, Lieutenant H. D. Smith, Lieutenant Bailey, Lieutenant Whitney, ex-Governor Low, Prof. Davidson, Selden S. Wright, Consul Bee, Mr. Ben Truman, Mr. D. W. Earle, Colonel Hawes, Mr. Torbert, Captain D. D. Stubbs, Captain Moore, Mr. T. F. Goodman, and many others. Minister Angell and Commissioner Tresscott and their families were the recipients of many courtesies, and expressed themselves greatly pleased with their stay in San Francisco. Among the passengers by the Oceanic was Miss A. Barney, of St. Louis, who goes to Hongkong to marry a gentleman whose business demands would not permit him to go to Missouri to marry her. Miss Barney must be as clever as she is pretty. Some girls are so easily imposed upon; I would prefer to live an old maid all my life rather than go, Mahomet like, to some mountain of a fellow away off among Asiatic influences. Mr. and Mrs. Henry Crocker and son leave San Francisco for the Eastern States on Thursday next, July 1. Miss Amy Crocker, daughter of Mrs. E. B. Crocker, of Sacramento, left on the overland train for the East on the 17th inst., en route for Dresden, Germany, where she goes to pursue her studies for the year. She was made the recipient of an elegant farewell party the evening before she started. Mrs. Robert Sherwood left on the overland for Europe on Saturday last. Mr. Crosby E. Noyes, editor and proprietor of the Washington (D. C.) Star, who has been quietly doing Los Angeles and the Yosemite, with his family, left for his home on Sunday morning last. John Russell Young, of the New York Herald, has gone to Southern California and Arizona. Miss May Crittenden, niece of Mrs. Mark Hopkins, left on the overland a few days ago to visit friends in New York and St. Louis. Miss Crittenden and her sister, Mrs. Severance, are the most expert lady swimmers on the Pacific Coast; either of the above ladies can make their mile or more along turbulent billows with ease. Miss Hattie Whitney, of this city—and who is, by the way, a great favorite in Washington—sailed for Europe in the steamer Montreal on the 17th inst. Mr. Brooks, proprietor of the New York Express, arrived in town a few days ago. The navy people upon this coast are in great sadness over the death of Lieutenant W. F. Zeilin, of the Marine Corps, who was stationed at Mare Island for a few months, and who left there in February last for Norfolk, to command the marine guard of the receiving ship Franklin. Zeilin was a great favorite. His death was one of the most tragic known, and was brought about by his having been thrown furiously from a runaway horse upon a turnpike near the Norfolk Navy Yard. Major Hebb, of the Marine Corps, who was ordered from Mare Island to Charlestown, Mass., and Mrs. Hebb, arrived at the latter place safely a short time ago. On the first instant, Doctor Fitzsimmons, of the navy, was married to Miss S. W. Russell, of Nashville, Tenn. On the second instant, Chief Engineer Henry W. Fitch, U. S. N., was married in Detroit, to Miss Emile A. Campan, daughter of a prominent capitalist of that city. The engagement of Lieutenant H. G. O. Colby, of the navy, to Miss Kitty Thompson, daughter of Hon. Francis Thompson, of Charlestown, Mass., is announced. Lieutenant Cowles, U. S. N., and wife (the latter a daughter of Senator Thurman), who passed through here for the East, from China, a few weeks ago, are at Annapolis, and were present at the ball given by the class of '81 to '80, at the Naval Academy, on the 10th instant. Miss Dollie Brown and her father, who have been recreating at Clear Lake, returned to the city a few days ago. Mrs. Charles Crocker has been spending a week or two upon her brother's farm, in Lake County. Miss Hattie Crocker is at Colton. General Houghton and family, Mrs. General Coey and children, Mrs. Coleman, Mrs. Thomas Brown and daughters, are at the Glenwood Springs, near Santa Cruz. Mrs. Fred Castle and the Misses Castle, Miss Bentley, Mrs. John Carroll, and Mrs. Mangles, are at Aptos. Mrs. John Russell Young is at San Rafael. Doctor Merritt and his guests—Miss Nellie Knowles, the Misses Dwyer, Miss McClellan, and Mrs. Garcelon—who left here in the yacht Casco on May 28th, arrived at Honolulu on the 29th. Mr. M. J. Thompson, eldest son of Judge Thompson, a wealthy lawyer of Los Angeles, was married on the 18th instant to Miss Minnie, daughter of the late Doctor Cunningham, of Oakland. Mr. Thompson and bride are spending their honeymoon at Pescadero. The engagement of Colonel Fred. Crocker, eldest son of Charles Crocker, and Miss Jennie Easton, a niece of D. O. Mills, is announced. Colonel Crocker is president of the Southern Pacific Railroad of Arizona, and an acknowledged leader in society. Miss Easton is a petite beauty and very accomplished. The marriage takes place in September. Captain Glass, of the navy, and Miss Ella Johnson, of Oakland, are engaged, the marriage to take place at an early day. Ed. Newhall, of this city, is engaged to Miss Hall, of New York, the marriage to take place in July; and Mr. Philip Hinkle and Miss Alice Rhodes, of this city, are engaged to be married in the same month. HEBE.

Sacramento, June 22.—We see Hebe has come on the "bill of fare" again, and it sets us to wondering if a dish served by your humble servants would not be as palatable? The Bric-a-Brac Club is the cause and effect. They gave one of their very successful soirées Friday evening, and they certainly deserve one of your columns if any one ever did. And, by the way, we wish those "Bébés-aux-Bavettes," who call themselves "Bric-a-Bracers" in your city, would vie with us in an exhibition of some kind. We'll extend a cordial invitation to every "Bébé" of that club, and every attendant "bonne," to visit us during one of our entertainments, providing they will do likewise. We are inordinately curious to see how these infant pliffers, who have taken our name in vain, conduct their affairs. We're always open to improvement! This is the second annual reception of the club. The first was held a year ago at Mrs. E. B. Crocker's. This year we congregated at Mrs. E. B. Mott's elegant rooms, on J, between Second and Third. During the year, we meet once a fortnight—no outsiders admitted. We exhibit our pictures, crude, half-finished sketches, sometimes; give a few musical and literary efforts; take mild refreshments, mixed with a little jollity, and disband at an early hour. This is the programme ordinarily. But when we give one of our receptions! Every mighty effort by every mighty member is put forth for this one exhibition, and a grand success can only be the happy result. About two hundred and fifty guests were invited; and, as spacious as Mrs. Mott's parlors are, they were crowded with all the beauty, brains, and bon-ton of the city. To tell who were there would be a week's undertaking. Just imagine two hundred and fifty of our best people, in full regalia! For a while the club did stagnate, and gave evidences of a last gasp. And when we did assemble, it made one think of the colors on a great palette, all arranged as one sees them when the artist first takes them from the tube—the light colors coming first, that one might call our artists; then the mezzo-tints, that we'll term the musical members; and then, merging into the darker colors, the literary members. There they all were, standing separate and alone on that palette—wouldn't mix for anything under the sun! The artists, drawn up to their full importance, in one corner of the room, or palette; the musical folks, as set up in their own concert, in another corner; and the literary in another. Now, what earthly, or heavenly, good did all these colors do, if they wouldn't blend? 'Twas distressing! And then a change dawned on the horizon of that palette! Such a determined, good-natured little palette knife, in the shape of Norton Bush, put in an appearance; who brought along an oil-cup in the form of Mr. Procter. And such a revelation! Procter poured his oil of fun and human kindness upon that palette; and palette-knife Bush went to work with a practiced hand, and mixed those stiff, uncongenial colors in a way that would make your eyes open! And soon every hush of art and musical and literary member was at work over that palette of paint, and we've had many a beautiful picture since. And all of a sudden the artists were making love to the musical people, and the literary folks were praising the artists, and everybody was saying and doing the nicest, most comfortable things of the other. It is certainly "the" thing of Sacramento; and we think it is the only thing of the kind in the State, where ladies and gentlemen assemble for mutual improvement. All those outside of the club are crazy to get inside; and all those inside are so happy that they are not outside. They rendered a very good musical programme; there were instrumental solos by Miss Griffin, Miss Gerrish, and Mr. Heyman; vocal solos by Mr. George Redding, Mrs. Mott, and Miss Milliken; besides several charming duets. Our quartet—Messrs. McNeill, Crandall, Putnam, and Freeman—sang several times; and what made it the more enjoyable, stood on the balcony; and when their pleasing voices came through the open windows it just carried one away! Good music is such a power; and wasn't it Addison who said, "Music is the only passion in which mankind may indulge to excess without injury"? Mrs. McNeill favored us with two solos after supper; she was received with enthusiasm. Mr. Fleissner, from Leipzig, Germany, who has just come to California to lead the Orpheus Musical Club in Sacramento, was present, and he sat at the piano and gave us something in a grand, masterful style. A niece of Mrs. J. T. Glover, Miss Briggs, of Oakland, performed with extraordinary skill. Messrs. Ball and McNeil and Mrs. Berkey gave us an instrumental trio—unusually fine. The only literary effort of the evening was from Miss O'Brien's pen, but the length and strength of this made up for the lack of others. She rendered her essay in good, clear voice, and with an ease and self-possession remarkable in so young a lady. About eighty pictures, in oil, water-colors, charcoal, crayon, and porcelain, were exhibited; but one has to see such things to really appreciate them; and we can give but a tame, limited description of the most important. Mr. Jackson's best was a crayon portrait of Dr. Haswell, and a larger landscape in the Sierra Nevada. Mr. Bush's best and largest—indeed, considered quite the best his brush has ever attempted—was a scene on the Rio Obispo, in the Isthmus of Panama. D. H. Woods had several good things in the portrait line. Professor Jordan also. Mrs. Bingay showed some excellent work in porcelain. Mr. Redding a fish picture, which, if Brooks could see, would surely turn him green with jealousy. A portrait from Mrs. Ballou, who has been astonishing Sacramento people with her work in that line. F. J. Lewis showed a scene in the Yosemite Valley—very good indeed. Mrs. John Lewis, two little figure pieces of Italian boys. Miss Amanda Austin had some charcoal drawings from real life, which showed genius in every stroke. Mrs. C. H. Hubbard exhibited a crayon portrait of her two-year-old infant, which was really one of the finest things on exhibition. Another scene on the Russian River, by George Redding, was a noticeable picture. There was a great deal of other work also. An elegant supper was served in the dining-room. And these Bric-a-Bracers offer you wooden plates and Chinese napkins, airy but still serviceable. Dancing was indulged in when the crowd had thinned out a little. The whole affair was a success throughout, and certainly a great satisfaction to the members. They combine improvement and advancement with sociability and hearty good feeling; and if there were more of such clubs in the State, California would not have quite the "uncultivated benighted" name that it has among our Eastern encyclopedia friends. And now to wind up with Bric-a-Brac news; have you heard the new Bric-a-Brac waltzes, composed by Joseph D. Redding, and named entirely in our honor? They are bewitching, and you should hear them. You know we are to have President Hayes here in September. That's what we get by living nearer the "Rockies" than you do! And we suppose then all manner of devices will be thought of to entertain our illustrious guest. Until then we presume Sacramento will vegetate, as every one seems to be emigrating to Santa Cruz or to the Hotel del Monte. BETSY AND I.

It was about 1852, at the time of Kossuth's visit to America, that a style of voluminous felt hat came into vogue called the "Kossuth" hat. "I do not mean to affirm," said the old Philadelphia major, "that no gentleman wears a Kossuth hat. I mean merely to say that when I meet a person wearing a Kossuth hat, it does not raise in my mind a presumption that he is a gentleman. On the other hand, sir, when I meet a person wearing a silk hat, it does raise that presumption." Now, allow us: When, in 1880, one meets a woman on the street wearing a painted face, it does not raise a presumption in our mind that she is an honest one. On the other hand, madame, when we meet a woman whose face is not painted, it does raise that presumption. A sadly large percentage of the women one meets on the streets in San Francisco at the present time wear painted faces. The fact by itself is not conclusive of the wearer's status any more than the silk hat was. In each case it merely fails to raise that favorable presumption which, in the absence of adverse proof, is determinative.

What this country really needs is an aristocracy. Livered menials we already enjoy, and they are a great comfort. Our monograms on the coach-panel are a solace to many troubled hearts. Our glass and tableware are not surpassed in the most favored nations. But, to the thinking mind, it is plain that there is still a void that must ache in many earnest souls, and which our existing institutions are inadequate to fill. The post-revolutionary society of the Cincinnati was founded on unsound principles, and properly succumbed. An aristocracy without wealth is a ridiculous object. Wealth is the proper as well as the necessary foundation for the genuine thing; and a title is its only fitting mark of distinction. The craving for title is an innate aspiration of the human heart, recognized as such throughout this land of liberty, where the ingratiating stranger propitiates his victim as "Colonel," or "Judge." But these designations, though they are a source of much genuine gratification, still leave the void unfilled; and the partner of the dignity is excluded from any participation in it. Quite seriously, we suggest that the time should shortly be ripe for dealing with this real evil in an earnest spirit. Why, for example, should not Mr. Vanderbilt, whose name stands against the largest figure on the books of the Treasury Department, be designated, so long as he retains that distinction, as "Duke of the Funded Fours"? One of our successful townsmen might rank as "Marquis of the Fives"—to be addressed "My lord marquis." The largest landholder in a county should be earl of the county, and entitled by its name; thus, Mr. Lux would become Earl Luxar and Baron Gillyroy; and Mr. Miller, Earl Fresno and Baron Millerton; Mr. Hagglin, Earl Kern and Baron Bakersfield, and so on. This ought to be a very gratifying thing to such gentlemen if they should have the proper feeling in the matter; and if they shouldn't, the business could be safely left to "Lady Shasta," "Lady Stanislaus," and "Lady Contra Costa," and the other dames, to make it so. This is a very pretty idea, and ought to be started in California, where we have so many suitable Spanish names to lend it grace. Of course, when you get to Indiana, and begin to have "Lady Bartholomew," "Lady Orange," "Lady Vermilion," and such names, the thing becomes ridiculous; but then the idea of Indiana aristocracy is ridiculous anyhow. Among ourselves it is quite a different affair. Consider, too, that while the eldest sons of dukes and marquises take their father's second title, all the other sons and daughters are styled "Lord Edward," "Lady Caroline," etc.; while of earls the younger sons are only styled "the Hon. George," etc. (which might confound them in some vulgar minds with members of the Legislature); still, the daughters would be called "Lady Jane," etc. Now, this vision is really bracing. Knowing, as we of San Francisco do, the lively emotions excited among us by the casual appearance of itinerant barbers claiming to be mere barons, we can fancy the agreeable tumult of feeling that would be maintained by a system of live Lord Gillyroys—heirs to the earldom of Tulare—of our own. It is clear to us that the Argonaut itself deserves a modest patent of nobility for having worked the thing out in feasible form and bestowed this boon on California. The least that could be done would be to make us Baron Vallejo-street and Knight Grand Cross of the Order of the Bathing-machine—an obvious American improvement on the effete order of the Bath.

Miss Neilson's "Viola" fairly captured the audience on its first presentation, Friday evening of last week. Newspaper fame had made the average play-goer familiar with Miss Neilson's charming portraiture of that archaic—almost ideal—heroine. But the average play-goer was scarcely prepared for the excellence of Mr. Edward Compton's support. The innocent archness—the arch innocence, to be exact—with which "Viola" carried her various points were almost equaled in quality by the dashing "dumensense" of Compton's "Malvolio." It almost redeemed his "Romeo"—if anything could quite do that. Romeo and Juliet closes the Neilson engagement at the Baldwin, this evening. This afternoon Miss Neilson will appear as "Viola," possibly for the last time in this city. At the Dush Street, Boccaccio is still running, and may reach its fifth week. Madame Favarit, an opera known to us through the interpretation of the Almée troupe, is now well in hand, and will be brought forward as soon as the favorite opera now on the stage ceases to attract.

Here is a little episode in John McCullough's life, related by himself: "It is strange to what extremes religious prejudice will carry people. I have a good Presbyterian sister up in Pennsylvania, who was so horrified when she heard I had adopted the stage as a profession that she refused to recognize me. She believed that the play-house was the vestibule of the devil's workshop. For years we did not meet. She never wrote me a line. Finally, in 1876, her husband concluded to go to Philadelphia and pick up one of the fortunes to be conveniently gathered during the Centennial. He sold his rural home and purchased a small shop in Philadelphia. In a short time he came to grief. I heard of the distress that had overtaken the family, and slipped quietly into the country, bought back the little home, put it in my sister's name, and sent her and her babies back to pure air and contentment. That vindicated the stage. The letter I received from her was almost worth the years of estrangement, and I don't believe she will live long enough to get done wondering why her church ever taught her that actors were bad people and the theatre the sum of all villainies."

For some months past rumors have been current in court and diplomatic circles to the effect that a marriage was "in course of arrangement" between Prince Alexander, of Bulgaria, and Mademoiselle Yusupoff, the daughter and co-heiress with her young sister of a Russian prince, who is popularly credited with being the Czar's wealthiest subject. This Muscovite millionaire's income is chiefly derived from house property in the Russian capital; and not very long ago he was prosecuted by the police authorities of St. Petersburg for allowing his houses to fall into decay and to lack the commonest sanitary appliances prescribed by law, so that an epidemic broke out among his tenants. Mademoiselle Yusupoff is an amiable and clever young lady, more remarkable for her varied accomplishments than her beauty. She will bring to the ruler of Bulgaria a dowry of $10,000,000, and expectations of a succession appraised at between $1,000,000 and $1,500,000 a year more.

Who would have thought, some five or six years ago, when ladies were hesitating as to wearing a red and white striped, or pale blue, or a rose-colored stocking, that in 1880 their arching insteps would be bearing a variety of designs, such as bouquets of flowers, humming birds, acrobats, ballet girls, beehives, and piping Highlanders, in all colors of the rainbow, exposed by the low Grecian shoe or the graceful Louis Quinze slipper? Would Martha Washington, who knit her own and her husband's hose during the Revolutionary War, be most delighted, astonished, or shocked to see the displays on the brilliant and attractive hosiery counters of to-day? Did Richeieu ever dream, or Voltaire most remotely imagine, that their sentimental but versatile and witty nation would some day choose to immortalize their names through the medium of a stocking, or that the most popular memento moris of the greatest statesman and the greatest wit of France would be in the shape of hosiery of Lisle thread and silk?

In a work on dramatic art, published in 1772, Monsieur de Cailhova, one of the dramatists of that day, says: "A new piece is advertised; all Paris flies there; the curtain rises, the actors appear, the friends of the author applaud—the enemies of his person or his talent hawk or blow their noses. They go to supper. Those of the guests who could not be present in the theatre ask about the success of the novel y. 'Tis pitiable, or 'tis delicious, says a merveilleux—who in his life never judged anything but by contagion. From the end of the table a pretty woman confirms his judgment, only adding that the hair of the actress was very badly dressed." Tempora mutantur, but might not this paragraph have been written in this year of grace 1880? It is not only in France, alas! that people judge by contagion.

The "working hours of ladies in high life" are given by Kate Field as follows: One hour and a half to bathe, dress, etc., in the morning. One hour to disrobe, get ready for retiring, and do up hair at night. Three hours going, coming, and doing the daily shopping. One hour and a half for meals. One hour dressing for theatre, operas, ball, or party. Three hours at theatre, opera, or ball. Two hours visiting or receiving visits. Total, twelve hours hard daily labor. Yet the "lower classes" complain because they have to work ten hours a day. Let them change places with us and they'd realize what hard work really means.

It is no uncommon thing in the west of England to meet a lady on a tricycle. The tricycle is becoming to athletic young girls all that the bicycle is to young men. It is fast enough now for the fastest, surely, as the speed obtained with a tricycle made by Singer, of Coventry, was nearly fifteen miles an hour. A tricycle club, partly composed of ladies, has already been formed at Kensington, and the fashion, having been set, is being greatly followed.

An English bride does not consider herself married unless she is attended by six bridesmaids, at the least. The prettiest fashion is to have all children, as happened in the recent marriage of a granddaughter of the Duke of St. Albans, the six little maids being quaintly dressed in Pompadour style, with mob caps and fichus, and each carrying a basket of fresh spring flowers.

Larry Brannigan (Lawrence Barrett) is writing a life of Forrest, to be published by Osgood & Co., Boston. This will form one of a series of actors' biographies to be published by the same house. Edwin Booth, it is said, will write the life of the elder Booth. It will be interesting to watch the development of the lesser literary-dramatic lights.

Minnie Hauk has just aroused another burst of enthusiasm in London with her Carmen. The Times of that city calls her "the first and still unsurpassed Carmen in England"—which is probably not pleasant reading for Madame Marie Roze, who claims to be the singer for whom the opera was originally written.

A procession of twenty icebergs coolly sailing down the Atlantic coast is what is troubling the Eastern June.

The only tragedy of the Romans which has reached us was written by Seneca, the philosopher.

According to the Republic, John McCullough, the tragedian who is not crushed, has recently returned from a very successful tour in the South and West. The journey was performed by his theatrical combination in palace and drawing-room cars, and all the luxuries of modern travel, and is chiefly remarkable in that it records the successful starring tour of the pupil over the route long ago traveled by the master in a widely different way. To follow the pupil in his own description, Forrest rode from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh in October, 1822, three hundred miles, "over such tremendous mountains," in company with a dozen men and women, and after playing there in a leaky old place they took a flat-boat on the Ohio River for Marysville, Kentucky, "floating lazily down for five days and nights," "filling the time with stories, games, and jokes," "a happy set, careless, healthy, and free." Eberle was the leader of the orchestra, Lucas scene-painter, Henderson stage-manager, Mrs. Pelby and Mrs. Riddle leading ladies. Forrest was the handsome juvenile, and played many odd characters. At Lexington, where McCullough had such a reception recently, Forrest had great success in more pretentious parts, but for many years his life was full of humiliation, poverty, and failure. That company left Lexington in February of 1823, in cold weather, the women in rude wagons, the men on horseback. They had a terrible ride, made pleasant by good humor and mutual forbearances. Forrest was just seventeen when they opened in Cincinnati. He played in The Soldier's Daughter, danced in Little Red Riding Hood, sang comic songs between the pieces, acted as the ragged daughter of the old soldier, played by Eberle, with his fiddle, on a wooden leg, was "Corinthian Tom" in Tom and Jerry, acted with his trained dog in The Dog of Montargis, a portrait of which he had painted for his house on Master Street, now one of the decorations of the Forrest Home, near this city. This animal often suggested some bitter comments to the great actor upon the fidelity of the dog and the ingratitude of man. How interesting to recall the contrast between McCullough and his combination, traveling in palaces on rail, living in palaces of hotels, and playing in palaces in towns, collecting thousands in their royal journeys, and young Forrest and his Bohemians in the West, fifty-eight years ago, men and women racked in old wagons and on poor horses, playing in barns and taverns, floating on dirty river scows, and personating darkeys, old soldiers, and ballad singers between the acts, as poor as rats, and as happy as they were poor.

When women enter the ranks as intelligent critics of the higher order of literature, many questions are observed under a new light. Thus, upon the old and trite subject of Shakspearean criticism, Harriet Martineau wrote in her private note-book: "I read Katherine and Petruchio with the same effect that play ever has—wonder at its fun and cleverness, and much enjoyment thereof, but intolerable pain at the treatment of 'Katherine.' Such a monstrous infringement of all rights, leading to such an abominable submission, makes one's blood boil as much as if it were not a light comedy, but a piece of history."

An Eastern correspondent blasphemously says: "The present summer hat for women is to be of straw. It will be knocked in on the front, jammed in on the back, shoved in on each side, and kicked in on top. Then the rim will be jammed up all around to make the whole effect harmonious. It will be trimmed with strips of sheet tin, turkey wings, old fruit cans, and debris generally. It is an economical kind of hat, as it can be made by taking a boy's old straw hat, running a wheelbarrow over it a few times, and hitching on whatever comes handy."

Private letters and recently arrived Englishmen convey the impression that our country is to be this year the fashionable resort of the British tourist. Large numbers of English swells, snobs, sportsmen and wanderers generally are going to invade the United States, enjoy our hospitality, go to sleep on the sofas of our clubs, slaughter our game, and carry away our pretty heiresses. It is to be hoped that only few invaders will go to the extent of writing books and adding to the tremendous amount of rubbish already published in the British Isles about us.

Mrs. Scott-Siddons is quoted as saying that she went on the stage at sixteen without a lesson, and has never had any dramatic training other than that of experience. She played Portia the first time she was ever on the stage, and that with only a week's notice and but one rehearsal. She hadn't the least instruction about gestures: nobody said a word to her about the stage business. "I made a success at first," says the actress, "and from that time to this have not lacked engagements."

There are good, pious, temperance men who will take all the whisky compounds named "eine," "line," "fo fun," "tum," etc., and keep on groaning and limping round with no relief, who will stand aghast with horror at a pure anti-whisky reliable remedy and certain cure because it is named Hop Bitters.

Persons under the operation of Fellows' Hypophosphites should examine their blood under the microscope from time to time, and mark the increase of red and active particles, and diminution of the white or dead ones; these observations are interesting and instructive.

GOLDEN DAYS.

BALLAD.

WORDS BY LIONEL H. LEWIN.

MUSIC BY ARTHUR S. SULLIVAN.

Andante.

The piano introduction is in G major, 4/4 time, andante. It begins with a treble clef and a key signature of one sharp (F#). The first measure has a forte (f) dynamic and a crescendo (cres.) marking. The second measure has a fortissimo (ff) dynamic and a decrescendo (dim.) marking. The piece concludes with a piano (p) dynamic.

1. Once in the days of gold-en weather, Days that were al-ways fair; Love was the world we walked to-geth-er,
 2. Ah! but the days brought changes af-ter, Clouds in the hap-py skies, Care on the lips that curled with laughter,

The vocal melody is in G major, 4/4 time, andante. The piano accompaniment features a steady eighth-note pattern in the right hand and a more active bass line in the left hand. The lyrics are written below the vocal staff.

Oh! what a love was there, Fresh as a flower when rains are fall-ing, Pure as a child that prays.....
 Tears in the ra-diant eyes; Part-ed a-sun-der, wern with grieving, Wea-ri-ly each one prays.....

The vocal melody continues with a decrescendo (dim.) marking. The piano accompaniment includes a 'colla voce' section where the piano part plays in unison with the vocal line. The lyrics are written below the vocal staff.

Once in the days be-yond re-call-ing, Once in the golden days, Once in the days be-yond re-call. ...ing,
 Ah for the days be-yond re-triev-ing, Ah for the golden days, Ah! for the days be-yond re-triev....ing,

The vocal melody is marked piano (p) and includes a crescendo (cres.) and fortissimo (ff) section. The piano accompaniment features a steady eighth-note pattern in the right hand and a more active bass line in the left hand. The lyrics are written below the vocal staff.

1st. 2d.

Once in the gold-en days, days.
 Ah for the gold-en days.

The vocal melody is marked piano (p) and includes a fortissimo (ff) section. The piano accompaniment features a steady eighth-note pattern in the right hand and a more active bass line in the left hand. The lyrics are written below the vocal staff. The piece concludes with a 'colla voce' section where the piano part plays in unison with the vocal line.
